"Addio, Tota, mai
Non ci vedremo più,
In questa val di guai,
Che strazzian quaggiù.

Mia Barca sta sul mar.
Mio cuore sta con te,
Di sol quello posso dar,
Dachè tu sprezzì me.

Se nel speco vi fosse,
Sol l'ultimo liquor,
Beverebber labbra mosse,
Ver te e il tuo cuor.

Salute, Tota cara,
Non ti scordar di me,
La vita m'è amara,
Giaché lungi da te.

Ma a te pensando, Io
Destino sprezzèrò,
Ben pago se col vostro
Il mio unirò.

Oh! how blithly sped our evenings in that old convent refectory of Zagarolo, and what reminiscences must not the very name revive in the memories of our friends! Would that we might here transcribe a few of these biting epigrams which the Podesta originated against the government of which he was an official—verily a "pars magna." Little did he then dream that steam-boats would one day ply on the Tiber, or that snorting engines would speed over the flat Compagna. Could any one have assured him that there would be an end to brigandage and such inefficient officers as himself, he would have concluded that doom's day was at hand. But, for aught we know, he has lived to witness the elevation of Pio Nono. One wish still fills us with anxiety for poor Pietro-e-Paolo, and 'tis that his holiness may be induced to diminish the duty on tobacco, nor leave the quondam Podesta occasion to quote that verse of Job which he was wont to apply to Gregory XVI.—“Contra folium quod vento rapitur, ostendis potentiam tuam? et stipulam siccam persequeris?” “wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?”

* "My boat is on the shore."

It was thus we wound up the sports of many a day during the September and October months; our excursions were always varied, nor was there a single object of interest from Castel Gandolfo to the ancient Lavinium, with which we did not grow familiar. More than once have we lost our way in the dark and intricate woods about Rocca del Papa and San Galliciano, and some of us bivouacked with the herdsmen and shepherds of the Campagna, when the blue moonlit-sky became suddenly overcast and hail torrents smashed the ripe grape, and the stately Indian corn that grows throughout the papal dominions in almost tropical luxuriance. Many of those who were the companions of our vacations have passed away; some of them still survive—and one who imparted much instruction to us, has won Catholic celebrity, and we hope, ere long, to learn that an Archiepiscopal mitre has decked his honoured head.

In these good days, the Irish students returned to Rome, at the beginning of November, re-invigorated in health and improved in mind. They did not feel like people who had been liberated from a penitentiary situated in an agreeable locality, with liberty to look at the sky and take as much exercise as a colt in a riding-school. Far otherwise; their movements were unconstrained—they mixed with the people—acquired an intimate knowledge of their language, even to its very patois; and they who enjoyed these most rational privileges cannot but compassionate those who are unwisely deprived of them.

But, it will be asked, how did it fare with those who spent September and October at Rome? We can very easily answer the question. September is dreadfully hot, so much so, that one wonders why Marcus Aurelius does not melt on his brazen steed, or the marble statues on the bridge of Saint Angelo don't turn over into the Tiber. 'Tis a very sleepy month, truly, yet, as it approaches October, it becomes more tolerable and less enervating. Some of our companions were doomed to spend that month drinking large draughts of Jesuits' bark, as they were plagued with terzana, and had to put up with a meagre dietary prescribed by a garrulous medico-custom house officer, who seemed to have made a much closer study of Capacelli's Doctor Acquafresca than of the works of Scarpa or Vacca.

This worthy, whom you might see on a market day in the square of the Pantheon, mounted on a platform, exhibiting to the wondering gaze of the peasants the handfuls of teeth he extracted at the low charge of a Paul per pull, was ever and always followed by an ill-clad vampire, who acted the Sangrado to perfection. A single glance from Acquafresca was enough—the patient, with throbbing head and shivering extremities, bared his arm, Sangrado earned his two Paul fee, and then came the dietary; roasted apples and “brodo lungo”—long broth, so called because it consisted of an ounce of lard to a gallon of water, and bore a strong resemblance to the definition of a right line, “length without breadth.” The course which the Doctor recommended to the invalid was nowise disagreeable to his companions, so, adopting Acquafresca's axiom, “Somnum est balsamum vitæ,” they contrived to sleep a few hours additional in the day time, and spent the cool evening in the villas belonging to Prince Borghese or Prince Doria Pamfili. Much did the poor students often regret the miserable state of the library in the Irish College, and more so when they contrasted it with that of St. Isidore's convent, which a reverend father of the Wexford Franciscans had provided with a large selection of some of the best works of modern English literature. Had care been taken to procure similar works for the library of the Irish students, they were well enough inclined to turn them to advantage, and we need not say that the vacation-might have proved a most agreeable period for those whose tastes inclined them to lay aside black-letter for a while, and make themselves acquainted with the charms of lighter literature.

When, however, the month of October sets in, the heats begin to cease. There is then an active stirring amongst all classes and conditions—the Corso is once more thronged—people grow less afraid of malaria and sirocco, and venture out into the streets and villas soon after mezzo-giorno. In the various vineyards you will find the shepherds with their flocks—for the grapes have been gathered, and the wine-press is at work in all directions. Monte Testaccio, which, they say, has grown out of the fragments of earthen vessels flung there by the old Romans, is the resort of the humbler classes, who flock thither in crowds to dance, sing, and drink flagons of orvieto. The Pons Milvius, whither Cicero sent his detectives to arrest Cataline's friends, is crossed by innumerable passengers on foot and horseback; some to disport themselves in the wine houses outside the barriers, and some to drink of a spa which an inscription vaguely tells us is a grand remedy for a thousand diseases—“Mille malis prodest ista salubris aqua.”

The noble owners of the many villas in the neighbourhood of Rome, influenced, no doubt, by the most kindly feelings, never close their gates against any one; and, far from being like some of our proprietors in England and Ireland, almost invite the people to avail themselves of the salubrious advantages they are calculated to bestow. Hence, you may find in the Borghesian, Pamfilian, or Albanian villas, multitudes of the people of all classes roaming through the grounds, or seated on marble benches, close by shady fountains, criticising the works of ancient and modern art. In the Villa Borghesia, an inscription on a small aqueduct, overarching the grand walk, speaks a volume for the kindness of the grandee, who does not order a gruff and liveried flunkey to send common people about their business. “Nē quem mitissimus amnis impediāt,” says the inscription, as though the lord of this splendid domain would not have the visitor at the inconvenience of wetting a shoe. The palaces, too, within these villas, are thrown open to high and low: and though they contain more valuable objects of art than can be found elsewhere, a single fraction is not exacted of the visitor; and need we say, that a people like the Italians, nursed and educated in the midst of everything that is honourable to man's creative genius, can pause, admire, and worship, divested of that stupid curiosity which is not gratified without doing mischief?

These villas and palaces are open to the Irish students as well as others. Here they might enjoy the cool breezes of the evening, and contemplate these gay picturesque groups that may not be seen elsewhere. No brawling drunkenness disgusted the eye—no squalid misery set you to meditate on the mysterious dispensations of Providence. Everything was joyful and serene as the cloudless sky above your head; and if anything jarred on the ear, it was the energetic enunciation of a group of stout, strong-limbed eminenti, at their game of morra, in which there is such ample opportunity for Italian gesticulation. This, in all probability, is the sport called by the old writers "par et impar," and if it be, we must conclude that the ancient Romans were a very noise-loving people. Oh! but it was charming to sit down in these shady-scented groves, and listen to some sweet strain of music gushing from the lips of the peasant girls, who came up to Rome when the vintage was over, to make an offering to the Madonna, and show off their fanciful costume! No stage-trick or milliner craft can produce anything like that gay attire, with its blending of colours and simple draping. In fact, the inhabitants of Poli, Nettuno, and two or three other villages in the neighbourhood of Rome, could supply choruses and costumes for half the theatres of England and Ireland. It was natural enough that the Irish students should enjoy such scenes, and cease to think of many privations in the buoyancy of these moments. Hard study for nine months of the year, was amply requited by the festivities of the month of October, and, irrespective of the open-air operas which they might witness in the villas, they could, when their tastes so led them, visit the churches, the museums, and the ruins. It should not slip our memory, either, that Christopher Boylan was an ecclesiastic passionately fond of English literature, and anxious to create a taste for it in the souls of the Irish students. His private library was at their service, and he allowed them as much delectable reading as they needed or required. A wise regulation was this, seeing how the students had many opportunities of forgetting English, and very few for improving whatever knowledge they had of it.

Another scene of amusement, for those of the students who remained at Rome during the vacation, was opened to them in the vineyard belonging to the college, about a mile and a-half outside the city. The kind rector allowed them the use of the Cassino, such as it was, and gave them excellent feasts, sometimes thrice a week. Their dinners, on those occasions, had always an addition of good cheer, and a plentiful supply of aleatico wine made them wish that the vacation would never end. With most considerate kindness, the reverend Doctor rarely joined them on these occasions, and left them to the guidance of a good-hearted man, who was his locum-tenens. This happiness, however, like all other terrestrial pleasures, was not destined to last and it thus came to its finale.

Close by the Cassino stands the Mons Sacer, and within stone jerk of that spot, where the Roman commons once held a monster meeting to discuss the question of out-door relief, the Tiber joins the Anio. The river here is muddy, noisy—nay, uproarious. 'Twas considered a good feat by the students to swim it across, and, on one occasion, the worthy vice-rector, whose Christian name was Moses, having been reared in a seaport town of Ireand, thought little of "plunging into the angry flood," and challenging the boldest to follow, him. While the students stood on the bank admiring his adroitness, they were considerably surprised to see him borne down by the current, and a few moments afterwards a loud cry of "Help! help!" came from our worthy Vice. A stout young fellow jumped in, swam to the rescue, and saved a life which has since proved valuable to the Kaffirs. This was fortunate enough for Moses, for he had a narrow escape of being found in a sadder plight among the bulrushes than his namesake of Egypt. The occurrence, however, soon afterwards came to the ears of Dr. Boylan, and, in order to anticipate such casualties, a more rigid system was enforced. Yet it was tempered with mildness, and, with the exception of swimming, the creature comforts were liberally allowed.

This brief sketch, written most hastily, may give you, kind reader, some notion of how we were wont to spend the vacation "long, long ago." It would not interest you, were the scene in Ireland; but as it is in a land of which you are reading every day, we fancied it would not prove unacceptable.

Since we were there, great events have come to pass, and now we grasp the hand of any one recently returned from the scenes of our boyish sports and studies, more warmly than we would that of Palmer come back from Palestine. The press, the reviews, the statements of our friends, tell us, that everything, save religion, has undergone a mighty change. Oh! what a change! We can scarce believe our eyes, as we pore over the broad sheet of the Bilancia and Contemporaneo, and think of the days when the "Diario di Roma" was the only journal allowed by the government. Altered times, truly!

"Magnus ab integro seclorum nascitur ordo." Three days have changed the destinies of Rome—of Italy—mayhap, the world. The Holy Spirit has called the greatest man of his age to govern the Church—to destroy inveterate prejudices, and re-assert the rights of down-trodden nationhood. Oh! may he succeed, for the sake of religion, humanity, and freedom! The spirit of reform has proceeded from the oldest and most exalted monarchy this world ever saw. Who will now assert that the Papacy is opposed to the march of mind and wide-spread of true liberalism?—None but a few narrow-minded despots, who would perpetuate oppression and misrule. Aye, in good truth, everything is undergoing a salutary change—from the head-gear of a guardsman, to the highest offices in the executive. This renovating spirit is pervading all classes throughout the Peninsula. Noble dames broider banners for citizen-soldiers, and make offering of heart and hand to him who, when the battle for fatherland is to be fought, shall bear himself most valorously against the invader. A few days ago, and the ladies of Columbus's city collected a sum of money, and with it bought four field-guns, which they presented to his Holiness. The priesthood, too, have ably seconded the people, and lent true moral force to the movement, or, as tis called, progresso. Night-schools have been established in every town of the Papal dominion, and the poorer classes are there taught what rights they should maintain against the powers of Hell and Austria. Nay, the poor Capucine fathers have been recalling the incidents of Lepanto's fight, and gathering flowers wherewith to festoon every Moto-Proprio that emanates from the chair of Peter. The conservatism of abuses is dead and buried, and no power can ever reprobinate it. The stupid theorems of past ages may moulder on library-shelves, and books with such quaint titles as "Lascia star le cose come sono" can only serve as food for moths and worms. The rising youth are not now, as we gladly learn, addicted to the idle pastimes which characterized them in our boyish days. Stern duties command their attention and fire their souls. They have ceased to be votaries of pleasure and masses of discontent. Hitherto, every popular commotion in Italy reminded us of the history of Enceladus shaking himself in his cavern, only to augment his agonies. All now is changed. Energy has succeeded listless apathy—the most jarring elements harmonize, and universal brotherhood is the watch-word of all.

The villas and the meadows along the Tiber are no longer the scenes of the ballet and picturesque mummeries. They are now converted to nobler uses. Platooning and parading are more manful pursuits, and more likely to prove serviceable to an emancipated people. Every hamlet has contributed its mite to furnish arms and a contingent against the German—for it grieves us to say that the Austrian eagle still flies over Ferrara. In that city—immortalized by Tasso and Ariosto—Calvin once dreamt of raising the standard of revolt. May the machinations of Austria prove as fruitless as those of Servetus's burner!

Such are a few brief recollections of things as they are, and have been. God grant we may soon learn tidings redounding to the honour of that bright land to which our thoughts so often revert with pleasurable gratitude! Above all, may Heaven second the counsels, and nerve the arm of Pio Nono, to whom we may seasonably apply the verses of Italy's great poet:

"Signor, gran cose in piccol tempo hai fatte
Che lunga eta porre in oblio non puote.
Partiti nimista vinti e disfatte,
Superati disagi e trame ignote,
Si che al grido o smarrite o stupefatte,
Son le provincie intorno e le remote,
Se potessi acquistar novelli imperi
Acquistar maggior gloria indarno sperì."

St. Dominick to the Blessed Virgin Mary.

I.

By Gabriel's message to thy sinless soul—
Or, by thy anthem, hymned from pole to pole—
Or, by that birth in Bethlem's dreary stall—
Or, by Siméon's sword of grief and gall—
Or, by the hour thy son was found by thee—
By all these "joys," O Virgin, pray for me.

II.

Yet, by the agony of thy chalice Son—
Or, by the scourges, thickening one on one—
Or, by the tortures of the thorny crown—
Or, by the cruel cross that pressed him down—
Or, by thy Lord nailed to a cursed tree—
By all these "sorrows," Mary, pray for me.

III.

Oh! by his resurrectionary might—
Or, by his bright ascendatory flight—
Or, by his mission of the cloven tongues—
Or, by the seraph's own assumptive songs—
Or, by yon coronating Trinity—
By all these "glories," Mother, pray for me.

MIGUEL.

The Last of the Archons.

"Memento dierum antiquorum! cogita generationes singulas!"

'Twas night at Athens: and the moon—an Attic moon, oh reader!—poured its soft, mellow radiance over the earth and sea, lit up the gorgeous unroofed temples of the Aros, and lingered among the venerable statues of the wooded Agora, played with the shadows that flitted across the waters of the Piræus, and showed distinctly the palaces and gardens of the opposite hills. The stars, faintly twinkling in the cloudless sky, were mirrored in the wave, so clear and blue. Afar, across Themistocles' embankment, the light-tower of Erimenos gleamed welcome and caution to mariners—and nearer, the cymbals of the island-guards of Salamis, tinkling silvery-toned and cheerily across the waters, told of safety to the citizens. And the whole of the magnificent scene which Athens, even at the close of the first century of our era presented, wore that air, at once so bright and solemn, which thinkers love, and the placid moon alone can give.

But who are they who crowd, at such an hour, the platform of the Acropolis?—and why does that red, earthy, smoking flame glare up—blackening the statues of the gods—into the pure and holy light of heaven?

Let us approach.

Around a great fire of wood a large troop of Roman soldiers—an entire century, it would appear—is stationed. Some, with their helmets and sandals off, sit together by the blaze, talking loudly, and laughing long, as soldiers are wont—growing serious occasionally, to discuss the freaks of the Emperor, the successes of the Roti, the late military arrangements in Gaul, and other matters then full of importance. Many, with their short cloaks (saga) muffled closely about them, lie sleeping on the ground. A certain number, with spears slung and javelins pendant and quivers full, keep guard. A few walk moodily to and fro, glancing now and then in a rueful way at two persons in the back-ground, and at times scowling haughtily at the crowd which has collected around. They are evidently awaiting something, and from their impatience, you can guess that they have waited long. The crowd outside is large, and every instant increasing. It is composed of citizens of all ranks, from the wealthiest eupatrid to the humblest slave. On no face is a smile visible; but there are tears on many, and fierce, threatening looks in some. Every eye, and all attention are bent with watchful, sad anxiety upon the two individuals we have alluded to. And these are note-worthy. One is an ancient man, white-haired, and venerable. His forehead is open, high-arched, and dome-like—unmistakable insignium of the throne of vigorous thought. His eye, grey and vivid, flashes out upon you in a strange, piercing way. His person, though somewhat bent by age, or care, or both, is muscular and commanding. His silvery hair is divided by the tonsure worn by the priests of the new religion called Christian; and the agos, or pearl-studded crucifix he holds, shows him a dignitary of that priesthood. He is praying; his countenance seems radiant with joy—joy, quiet and serene; while a firm setting of the lips, and a slight wrinkle of the brow tell of stern exertion of the will and bold triumph thereof—tell that it is no ordinary joy, but has something heroic in it!

His companion is of another, though not in every respect dissimilar, mould. A young maiden, of purely Grecian contour of face and figure; she looks, as she kneels by the old man's side, with face upturned to the starry sky, almost a realization of what men have dreamed of antique loveliness. On her cheek, sorrow or fear has set no pallor. In her large, blue eye, grief has filled no weak woman's tear. In her face, you can read nothing but the bravery and the flush of high enthusiasm. Strongly alike in feature—an arm of each around the other—both calmly praying—both serenely firm—you soon perceive that you look at a parent and his child; and—why should we conceal it?—a minute's thought will tell you, too, that he, that royal-looking old man, and she, that bold Greek girl, are this night to die a fiery death for the faith of Jesus Christ! The prætor's order is only awaited, to consign both to yon fierce-flaming pyre.

"Pontiff," roughly asked a soldier—the centurion of the band, and one of those who had been talking so loudly—"wilt thou tell us something of thy life, or of that strange madness which hath possessed thee, to give thyself and thy fair daughter to a fate so fearful as that thou meet'st, this night—for the sake, too, of some fanciful notions, for which true men and brave soldiers care not a sesterce?"

The old man turned round, and mildly said, "Friend, I have little time."

The soldier was silent; but he soon repeated his request.

Dionysius at length arose, and taking a seat, put his hand around the white neck of his daughter; and with cheerful calmness, signified his acquiescence. Then the soldiery crowded around, and the citizens, though beyond ear-shot, mounted the pedestals of the statues that surrounded the place, and strained to catch a sound of that voice, so dear, so familiar, and so soon to be for ever silent.

"The story of my life," he commenced, "is brief, and possesses little of startling interest; but if it urge any of you to reflection, or nerve one to endeavour I shall not think my last moments ill-spent. It is something less than seventy years since the city-crier published that Dion the Archon, had born to him a male child. Great was the bustle and stir throughout the city, for Dion was loved by everyone. He was the last of an illustrious Grecian line, and had got entwined about him the sympathies, and affections, and prejudices of all the citizens. His only son, the heir of his fortunes, and the last of his race, was cared for, as you may imagine. Tutors from Alexandria, scholastics from the Peripateticon, rhetoricians from Antioch, comedians from Padua, musicians from the Isles, and palatians from Rome, were summoned and maintained for the amusement and instruction of my youth—for I was the son of the Archon. Expense or care was unheeded to render me a worthy successor of the olden chiefs, and fit to transmit my name and race. And in some matters I did not disgrace my instructors. Few were so swift and agile in the race or combat—few so persuasive and eloquent in the Bema—few so bold and fearless in the field—few so studious in the schools—and no young man of my time so acute in the halls of the philosophers. I soon became popular, and was selected for places of trust and honour. I grew renowned, and my name was known throughout Greece. And so I spent the years of youth, floating down the stream of life, you would say, as gaily as mortal ever did. Crowned with civic, scholastic, and poetic honours—surrounded by so many advantages of circumstance—and gifted with so many blessings of nature—living the life of a prince and of a philosopher—the heir of the only unsullied line in Greece—and the wealthiest and most beloved citizen in Attica. But, oh! I was not happy. One great, deadly doubt had taken possession of my soul, and set at naught the efforts of friends and the gifts of fortune. Wildly it dashed the cup of pleasure from my lips; fiercely it threatened me in the midst of the proudest triumphs; spectre-like it haunted me day and night. There was no rest from it. I loved music, and my heart would throb; and my eye grow tearful at its strains; but, oh! in the midst of the most glorious harmony, that thought would come, and put it all to flight. Poesy I loved, and for whole days would sit and dream, and think, and write by the wave-lashed rocks of Salamis; but the doubt would cross my mind, and take the muse's throne amidst the very glow of her inspiration. As most men will, I delighted to take the foremost part in the fight, and the proudest in the council: in the midst of both, that agonizing thought full often has paralyzed me, Philosophy, and the profound enquiries and subtle analyzations of Socrates, and his mystic pupil—the Stagyrte, and his friends, it was my passion to study; but they were all shallow—false, and shallow-child's babble to answer the questions that stirred my soul. Damaris and her fair child, I loved with all a husband's and a father's love; but I was not satisfied! Gaily floating down the stream of time, I said—yes, but I was floating down! And whither—oh! whither? Gods nor men, scriptures or thoughts could not answer me whither! The mystery of life—the mystery of death—the mystery of that other life beyond death, at whose awful portal we this night are, were then to me all mysteries indeed—without design, or clue, or hope of unravelment. And yet they were all-important—the great acts of existence, without a knowledge of which my life was aimless, and my doom uncertain. By the ever blessed mercy of God, I could not live—as ye and many do—careless of what is so vital, heedless of what is so fearful. I could not satisfy myself—as ye and many do—with the fictions of the priests, and the juggleries of the temple. The mass of them were palpable deceits, and known as such. The best of them possessed no strength, or force, or closeness—could not answer those momentous questions—were utterly powerless to solve those fearful doubts. What was I to do? Where, and whence should I seek aid? I first gave the priests a fair trial, and got initiated into the 'inmost' of the Eleusianian 'mysteries,' so called—to find them, as even you know, foul and false trickeries. Then, nothing daunted, I flung myself into the torrent of philosophical speculation. For a while, hope, current-like, carried me away; but it left me farther, and deeper, and more unaided in the sea of thought. After long years of study, I learned enough to know that my search was fruitless, and that my guides were weak and ignorant. Though my brow was lined, and my mind overstrained, I did not yet despair. I resolved to travel, and see what the minds of other climes had done, or sought, or found, or conjectured. And to Egypt—the mother-land of Greece—the parent of her arts, and the teacher of her young governments, and commerce—to Egypt of the pyramids, I turned my footsteps. There, my friends, under the show of civilization, a heartless and hopeless despotism ruled; and under the semblance of refinement, a worn-out and morbid taste influenced the people. At Alexandria, shouting rhetoricians and imitative poets held almost a royal court; but there was no freshness or vigour in them. At the capital, the pontiffs ruled not only the kingdom, but the king—had splendid temples, and noted and surprising juggleries; but though my birth and wealth would have procured me initiation, I was too weary of such things to pursue the investigation. I left Egypt, disquieted and disappointed. I travelled to India—but the dawn is at hand, and it would take too long to give you any adequate notion of my wanderings."

The old man paused. Emotion filled his eye with tears. Tears trickled down the flushed cheek of Damaris. Stooping to kiss them off, he recommenced, amidst the breathless attention of the soldiers.

"I must bring my account to a close. I cannot refrain, however, from mentioning a remarkable incident of my stay in Palestine. I had been at Jerusalem, and had spent there a longer time than at any other place during my travels. My hopes had been raised to the highest, and depressed to the lowest—heart-sickened and weary, I rode from the places I had thought always to venerate as the shekinah of my faith. It was a glorious day in a glorious spring-time. All nature, as if in mockery of man's darkness, looked bright and hopeful. The air seemed to me balmier—the sky serener—the mountains grander—the streamlets brighter—the tints of field and flower richer, and more beautiful than ever I had seen them before; yet never was I in a mood so desperate! The spirits of good and evil appeared contending for my soul; and the latter had well-nigh triumphed. Self-destruction gleamed before my mental vision, radiant, tempting—the only thing promising relief or knowledge. I will penetrate the mystery, thought I, at all risk, and every hazard. But gradually and awfully, as I journeyed and as I thought, there came over my soul an influence holier and more sublime than ever before I had felt or dreamed of. I breathed a new atmosphere; the air to me seemed rife with spirits, and nature radiant in the presence of its Creator. Flinging myself upon the sword that clothes Mount Ararat, for the first time I felt that there was a Deity—for the first time in my life I prayed—I prayed that "unknown God" to help me; I prayed long and fervently, weeping as I prayed. And, lo! the scene before me changed—changed suddenly, dreadfully, unprecedentedly. The lordly sun, that never before or since withdrew his beams, was darkened. The great mountains—types of eternity and strength—swayed from their foundations, and rocked to and fro. In the dimness of a starless midnight, rocks were upheaved high into the air, houses toppled, and vast masses floated in the upper sky. The whirlwind, leaping from its couch of cloud, swept the earth, and uprooted mighty forest trees; and laid low famous palaces. The air itself thickened and grew hot. The very frame of the giant Earth, shook and trembled with a heaving tremor. And—oh! fearful—gloaming aloft, heralded by loud-pealing thunder, made visible by forked lightnings, SPIRITS strode the clouds! Paralyzed I sunk on the ground.

"It was many days afterwards when I awoke to consciousness, to find myself in my caravan, far from Palestine. I determined to return; but my friends insisted on my proceeding. I never forgot that terrible scene. It is now as vivid in my memory as this one is to my eye. But it was only lately I discovered that on that very day, and at that very hour, the Saviour of the world—my Saviour, and your Saviour, in whose blessed name I this night die—expired upon the cross."

Here again the narrator was obliged to pause. Meantime the demeanour of the soldiers had become one of the profoundest respect and deepest attention. No word or look betokened aught but this. They listened as if awe-stricken or spell-bound.

"At length," he continued, "having traversed nearly half the world, inspected almost every place of civilization, and investigated nearly every variety of religious or philosophical belief, I returned to my native city, still more doubting and unhappy than I left it; and neither the enthusiastic welcome of my fellow citizens, nor the honours they immediately heaped upon me, nor even the more matured grace and intellect of dear Damaris could remove my melancholy. The same dreadful sensation of having no belief to anchor by in this life, and no life to look to for the next, the awful consciousness of being an intellectual and moral creature living the life of an animal, cankered, as of old, every enjoyment. As a last poor resource I penned some rude and ill-conceived tenets for myself, and erected an altar in my home and in the temples; "to the unknown God," and before them, poured out any prayer or worship of which my crushed heart was capable. So I spent some years, taking an active part meanwhile in the affairs of the city, and labouring by word and work to preserve such faint semblance of liberty as our conquerors had left us. I was made Archon—an office, I need not say, merely titular, but preserved out of love for olden laws and rule.

"One night—I remember it full well—I was praying in the temple. It was just such another night as this. The moon shone with the same placid light. The stars were bright as now. And the cymbals of yon watchers struck upon the ear with the same harmonious tinkle, making more still and solemn the stillness and solemnity of the scene. In the Parthenon I prayed. The altar-crowded place was lightsome as in the blaze of day. Praying, I bethought me—what if I should die thus?—and what if I were following a Maros-flame—and what, aye, what if my doubts were solved? The thought, often entertained, now struck upon my soul with a new rapture. Prostrating myself on the marble step, I besought the unknown Deity to enlighten—to save me, with all the earnestness of my being—so earnestly that for some time I did not hear or heed the messenger that summoned me to attend the court of the Areopagus, the sittings of which, I need not remind you, were held at night. Somewhat calmed, I arose and followed the messenger. I heard that the cause to be tried that night was of no ordinary interest, or importance. An eastern stranger, of noble mien and persuasive tongue, had been in Athens for some days, disseminating in the public places, from any rude pulpit he could find, the tenets of the frightful and extraordinary belief that had lately arisen in Palestine. Some philosophers and rhetoricians of the Stoic and Epicurean sects had attempted to argue with him in public, and had now summoned him before this, the last free court of the Athenians. The greatest interest had been excited concerning him. The court was crowded to excess in every part, by citizens of every class. Amongst the rest I noticed my daughter, Damaris, who, I should have mentioned, had imbibed her father's doubts and unhappiness. I was one of the chief judges, and on my arrival the proceedings at once commenced. At first I was little struck with the appearance of the accused. A small, thinly-clad, intellectual-looking man, he leaned, half-obscured by shade, against a pillar, awaiting his turn to speak.

"'May we know,' demanded his opponent, 'what this doctrine is which thou preachest; for thou bringest in certain new things to our ears. We would know what those mean.'

"Then it was my fate to summon Paul of Tarsus to account for his belief. Having steadily mounted the platform whence speakers were heard, he stood, half-revealed in the dimness of the scarce-admitted moon light—for no light was supposed to enter the court—and spoke an address of which it would be utter vanity to attempt giving you a description. Even in Athens 'of the orators' never was heard a strain of eloquence so sustained and moving. Though a stranger, none amongst us spoke more purely the Attic tongue. Though poor and thinly-clad, none trained to the quirps and catches of rhetoric could compete with him. His voice, musical and soft at first, soon pealed through the hall like an alarum-trumpet. His figure caught a proud dignity and god-like energy. As he stood there, stirring all hearts, confounding all intellects, so simple, so grand, so alarming, you could not deem him else than what he declared himself—the missioned priest and preacher of a new salvation!

"'Passing by,' said he, 'and seeing your idols, I found an altar on which was written, To the Unknown God—what therefore you worship without knowing, that I preach to you.'

"And then, in clear, plain terms, he developed for us the stately, uninvolved, and compact scheme of Christianity, concluding by imploring us by every tie most dear, and every right most sacred, and every interest most important, not to close our eyes to the light—not to shut our ears to the glorious truths he announced. And some grew thoughtful, for the things he said were 'new' indeed; and some smiled incredulously, for they passed above and beyond all old ideas. But upon my ear his accents fell more sweetly and satisfyingly than softest music. During his address I could not move hand or foot. Many disappointments had made me cautious, but now that same high and solemn feeling, unfelt since the awful day on Mount Ararat, thrilled every pulse of my veins. Not so much by the slow process of reasoning, not by induction logical, but instinctively, intuitively, I knew that I had found what so long I had sought and prayed for. The merciful God rewarded my perseverance and earnest search by immediate vision of the truth. Paul had scarcely concluded, when, unchilled by doubt, unalarmed by the suddenness of the occurrence, I flung myself at his feet, hailed him as my deliverer, and proclaimed aloud my full belief! I warned off the crowd—I grasped his garment—I nearly fainted. And Damaris—brave, clear-seeing Damaris—was with him too. She clasped the apostle's hand and cried, that she was ready to die for the Lord God of the Christians! O it was a thrilling hour! Some followed our example; some mocked our enthusiasm; some declared "they would hear again concerning this matter." For us, we brought the man of God to our home. We listened to his every word. We became catechumens, and were soon after baptized Christians.

"The rest is soon told, and partly known to you. We were the earliest and most influential members of the church of Athens. I surrendered wealth and civic station to become the first minister of the new congregation. The people, who loved me so well, in grief and rage abolished the titular Archonate when I renounced it. By the blessing of God I followed, at humble distance, the footsteps of sainted Paul. I preached Christ crucified from the Bema of Demosthenes, and the pulpits of the philosophers. Converts crowded from every class and every district, and before long a flourishing and numerous congregation was created. At length, unworthy as I was of an office so high, and a trust so great, I was made first bishop of the church of Athens. We were tried with persecution; we were despised and degraded, we were fined and imprisoned; we were scourged, and we were decimated. We lived in temporal suffering, but, oh! we lived in unworldly joy. Damaris and I this night are to suffer fearful death at your hands; yet, hear us, soldiers, and you citizens, listen, yet we had happiness beyond that we had hoped for, or dreamed of—yet do we esteem ourselves this night more blessed than since the sun first shone upon us—yet would we not exchange yon fiery couch for the throne of the empire! Beyond—beyond anything the earth supports we deem ourselves favoured. The last and least worthy of our ancient line have become the first and the proudest. You are amazed. Mark you, my friends, the eastern sky. How fearful it looks! See the lurid dawn peeping between yon gloomy, empurpled hills, and those vast flakes of burning cloud drifting, as if to herald destruction, across the firmament. Soldiers, how grandly fearful! And yet you fear not—hoping with firm faith in the speedy approach of the calm, glorious morrow. In like manner we look upon the terror and horror of death, for we know—aye, we know that eternity's great, joyful day so soon shall beam upon us."

He would have continued, but a trumpet pealed loud and clear from the heights of the Acropolis, It startled the soldiers. They sprang to their feet, and looked blankly and sorrowfully at each other. The sounds announced the fatal approach of the prætor. The father and daughter knelt in prayer once more. The trumpets neared. At length the magistrate arrived. The death-sentence was proclaimed amidst a sad, sob-broken silence. Slaves heaped high the funeral pyre, until its flames overtopped the palaces. The people knelt around. The soldiers, too, by an irresistible impulse cast themselves on the ground; and cheeks were wet that had not felt a tear for long, long years, and muttered prayers were heard from lips trained to blasphemy. In full, solemn tone the old man broke the silence: "The time has come to die, my child." In clear, unfaltering voice, the maid replied: "The time has come when true life has commenced!" So, having embraced his daughter, and blessed the citizens, and blessed the soldiery—all calmly as if in chapel-quiet—and having rejected the ordinary scaffolding, Dionysius prepared to mount, unassisted, the burning pyramid. And steadily, unhesitatingly, holding each other's hand, and lifting on high the crucifix, THE MARTYRS entered, and were soon lost in the flaming mass. But amidst the wild, agonized cries of the people, and the startled groans of the soldiers, and the peal of the death-trumpet, and the sharp crackling of the wood, and the wild roar of the flames; amidst and above them all, two well-known voices were heard, crying aloud in unison; "INTO THY HANDS WE YIELD OURSELVES, OH, CRUCIFIED LORD JESUS!"

* * * * *

The sun rising, clear and bright, next morning, showed nothing on the platform, save a heap of smouldering cinders, a wide, blackened space, and a few weeping mourners; but the Church has blessed the memory of St. Damaris and St. Dionysius the Areopagite, and the men of Athens long remembered the lives and the fate of Damaris the Beatiful, and the Last of the Archons.

* * * * *

So Christianity giving to men lofty aims, gave them true enthusiasm. So, in the olden day, mind triumphed over matter—faith over suffering—the courageous spirit over the failing flesh. So, of old, ancient men and tender maidens dared to be true to their belief—dared it even in the last, final trial-time!

Reader and friend! has this no moral for you? Have you a faith which you do not, and dare not abide by?—which you do not, and dare not carry into action, or into suffering? Oh! if so, go—go in God's name and our Lady's—and in trial, or in triumph, ACT IT OUT!

CHAPTER II.

FURTHER PARTICULARS OF HIS EARLY LIFE, TIMES, AND EDUCATION.

O'DONOVAN having now completely overcome his difficulties, soon began to experience, in ease of mind and domestic comfort, the delightful consequences of his own industry and skill. His wife, too, pure-minded in morals, exhibited, consequently, a natural love of cleanliness and order, in everything that came within her sphere or under her immediate management. Their large white house, comfortably thatched, was a model of its kind—their clean farm-yard was a kind of novelty in the country, whilst the garden was so well filled with fruits, vegetables, and flowers, that its very management was little less than a useful and practical essay upon cultivation and agricultural knowledge. It was easy to see, in fact, that no man could have kept it in such admirable condition, unless one well acquainted with the improved principles of husbandry that were just then beginning to become known to the few who made husbandry their study. The hedges were all neat and well trimmed; the gates in good repair; the enclosures firm and compact, and the haggard marked by great order, and free from any appearance of slovenliness and neglect.

The interior of the house, the kitchen, parlour, and bed-rooms, absolutely diffused through the mind a feeling of cheerfulness and comfort that made it a pleasure to enter them. The dresser shone with a cleanly lustre that told of the virtuous and industrious wife. The pewter upon it was bright, and every culinary utensil there, or anywhere visible in the kitchen, was positively almost white with cleanliness and care.

On a golden summer evening, when the slanting sun shot his rich, broad beams in through the windows, it was a sight that might well fill the heart with a sense of peace and happiness to witness the serene radiance which filled, with its mellow light, this beautiful scene of domestic comfort and truthful affection.

Thomas O'Donovan was now an independent man, beloved and respected by all who knew him. He had, fought with success the battle of life's early difficulties under which so many, from want of firmness and resolution, are crushed and perish. It is true that on some occasions slight manifestations of his constitutional warmth of temper would appear, but in consequence of the habitual training which he had received and was every day receiving, unconsciously, from his pious wife, and in consequence, too, of the lessons received from the recollection of what he had suffered during his struggles, he was enabled to overmaster the attack when it occurred, and to reason with himself so successfully under its very influence, that it generally passed off after a hasty word or two, that seldom gave offence or excited notice. It was at this time—being about a month before the subject of our biography was born—that a conversation occurred between Mr. Harris, the agent, and his brother-in-law, Brooklawn, which, as it had reference to O'Donovan, as well as to thousands in his condition, we shall briefly recapitulate.

We have already hinted that Brooklawn was reckless in his expenses, and negligent of all those duties which are inseparably annexed to property, and that, consequently, he was a needy landlord. It is unnecessary to add that a needy landlord must always be a severe and greedy landlord; for, like the apothecary in Romeo and Juliet, it is frequently not so much his will as his necessity that urges him to press the struggling tenant, who is forced to dispose of his crop to meet the demand upon him when the markets afford only ruinous prices. Be this as it may, Harris, one evening that Brooklawn had dined with him, was called upon by O'Donovan, according to appointment, in order to give his opinion as to the value of a newly-reclaimed farm in the neighbourhood—and of which, during Saunderson's absence on business in Dublin, he was considered the best judge. We shall not dwell, however, upon the value of the reclaimed farm, for our business is only with the conversation which took place between the landlord and his agent after O'Donovan had departed. And here again, slight as the circumstance may seem, was the value of residence in both landlord and agent.

"Harris," observed the former, "I am glad that O'Donovan has turned out so well as he did—he's a d—d great improvement upon his father—hey? a great improvement—hey, Harris?"

"Yes; but do you remember the conversation we had some years ago, as to whether we should eject him or not?"

"I think I remember something like it—he was some two or three years in arrears—and I was poor and greedy at the time, Harris—hey?—wasn't that it?"

"Yes; that was it—you were then poor, and, as you say, you were also greedy—and, by the way, Brooklawn, my worthy brother-in-law, if I had not myself given you a lift, I really don't see how you could have got your neck out of the mill-stone that was about it—you should have been obliged, in fact, to press your tenantry to ruin, when a little timely indulgence might have saved them—as it did;—others you would have ejected, in order to get better tenants and higher rents; and in this you might have been mistaken again—for it is not always the tenant who offers the highest rent that is either the most honest or the most solvent. And with respect to either land or house property, you may take this observation as infallible, and one which every landlord should repeat half a score times every day, in order to impress its truth upon both his heart and understanding, "there never yet was a farm or a house in good condition in which there has been a quick succession of occupants."

"Well," replied the other, "that certainly never struck me before—hey? I believe you're right, Archy. But we were talking about O'Donovan—I am glad he has disappointed me—the man is now prosperous, and an excellent tenant—punctual as the sun."

"So are most of your tenants now, Brooklawn—and look at the condition of your property at present, when contrasted with its almost hopeless state ten years ago. Had I, when old O'Donovan died, or soon afterwards—about the period, for instance, when we were discussing the situation of his son—had I then ejected him, and all those who were similarly circumstanced, what would have been the consequence? Why, that a series of agrarian outrages would have been commenced upon your estate, and heaven only knows what might have occurred."

"At all events, Archy, I thank you most heartily for the improvements you have so judiciously effected in the condition of my property."

"Had we ejected those men at that period, we might have done so with much plausibility in the eye of the world, and with all the prestige of legal right and justice on our side—for no one could say that we had not waited long and patiently, otherwise they never could have got into two years and a-half or three years' arrears. Had we evicted them, however, notwithstanding all these plausibilities, we would, as the case stood between us, have acted unjustly towards them. Let it never be forgotten that the landlord is bound to be the friend of his tenantry, and that it is an imperative and solemn duty upon him to advance their interests and improve their condition by every just means within his power. Now, taking these facts—for facts they are—into consideration, would we let me ask you, have been morally justified in turning your tenantry out upon that occasion, so long as any possible alternative for their advantage was left to us?"

"You can't expect me to reason against my own interests or those of my class, Harris—hey? D—e, no; I won't do that—hey? I won't do that, certainly."

"I expect no such thing, Brooklawn," replied the other, "on the contrary I am now reasoning for your interests, and for those of our class—for am I not a landlord myself?—instead of against them. You remember it was about this time you dismissed Brunton, and that the property came into my management. Well, what did I do? I knew your tenantry in general were honest, whatever other faults they might have had. I knew they were far back in agricultural knowledge. I knew a great number of them had a disposition to improve themselves if they could, and only knew how. I knew, besides, that severity—ejection—would have ruined them without at all benefiting us. The fact was, I saw at once that all they wanted was a little indulgence, and a good deal of training and instruction. I treated them, in fact, with kindness, and made them feel that in doing so I was in earnest, and felt a most anxious and sincere interest in their improvement. I, therefore, resisted your wishes, and discharged your duty towards them faithfully, almost in spite of you. I did not eject them, but I did encourage and instruct them; and taught them, through my steward, whom I procured for the purpose, how to cultivate their farms to the best advantage. And now let me ask, which of us was right?"

"D—e; you were always glib in the tongue, Harris, and could make black white whenever you liked. I knew when you were courting my sister that you'd carry her in spite of all opposition—hey?"

"I wooed your sister and won her like a man of honour, you must admit, Brooklawn," replied the agent. "But you do not answer my question."

"You're right, Archy—you're right," replied the landlord, "and the state of my own property, which has improved precisely as my tenants have improved, is certainly the best proof of it."

This conversation we deemed one of too much importance to be omitted, even although it may, in some degree, impede the progress of our narrative.

About this period, Thomas O'Donovan had been better than ten years married, and was the father of three sons and a daughter. The eldest was named Michael; the second, James; the third, John; and the daughter, Mary.

There can scarcely be a more striking proof of the melancholy depression which has come upon the country, and her people, than the cheerless spirit with which our old, exhilarating festivals have, during recent years, been permitted to approach and pass away. The old, harmless mirth, cheerful and hospitable, that formerly threw its simple and hereditary feeling of innocent enjoyment over the general face of the country—developing, by its kind and social influences, the racy and antique virtues of the peasantry—is all gone, or nearly so; and neither Christmas nor Easter, nor Halloweve nor Shrovetide, come to us as formerly they did, with glad tidings, or with those feelings of good will, kindness, and brotherly love, by which our hearts were taught to expand towards each other, as in the olden time.

Easter was now fast approaching, and we need scarcely say that the little youthful circle, around Thomas O'Donovan's hearth, felt all that eager and palpitating delight which in those days characterized its approach. The enquiries as touching the period of its distance came upon Mrs. O'Donovan, who was then on the eve of her confinement, so thickly and incessantly that the usual placid composure of her handsome features was often relaxed into mirth at the tiny debates and calculations which were made upon the subject.

"Mother," said Michael, "how long is Aisther away now?"

"Only a fortnight, Michael."

"Only a fortnight; why, my goodness, is it a whole fortnight away yet, mother?—that's a long time."

"A fortnight! how many days is in a fortnight?" asked John.

"Fourteen, John."

"Fourteen! oh, beatha! dat flogs—fourteen whole days 'till Aisther—dad, I wisht it was come, so I do. Jemmy, how many eggs have you for our faist?"

"Ah! ha!" replied Jemmy, to this insidious dodge after a secret which rack and tortures could scarcely extort, "don't think I'm so soft as that comes to. Wait till Aisther comes, and then you'll know."

"Wont we see de sun dancin' den, moder?" asked Johnny.

"If the day's fine, you'll see it dancin' in a bowl of water," replied his mother, smiling.

"Aye, an' in the sky, too," observed Michael, "an' it was so bright last Aisther, that when I looked at it I had to close my eyes, an' bad cess to the one but I seen it dancin' still—an' them shut! now!"

"Me has two eggs for de faist," lisped Mary.

"Oh! you little fool," said Jemmy, "to go to tell any one! sure no one ought to do that, Mary; aren't we all strivin' to see which of us 'ill have most, when Aisther Sunday mornin' comes."

Blessed times! happy anxieties! harmless purloinings! when we stowed away every egg we could safely lay our hand on, and searched every clump of brambles, and most heroically committed ourselves among the rankest nettles, in search of the hens' nests, that we might add their contents to the precious hoard, secret as the grave, which we were gathering for that luxurious feast of Easter! And the sun! who will dare to tell us at this present hour that he does not dance on an Easter Sunday? Do we not remember him as if it were only yesterday? Did we not ourselves prepare the large bowl of water, which with our own eager and trembling hands we placed on the threshold of the door, in order to see him dancing in the pure and unpolluted chrystal! Did we not also see him with our own eyes dancing in the cloudless sky? and are we not, therefore, perfectly competent to corroborate honest Michael O'Donovan to the very letter? For, after looking at him in the heavens, and when we, too, closed our eyes, there was no shutting him out, nor keeping him still; on the contrary, there he was bright as ever, dancing and scintillating with a sacred rapture, that was caught from the exulting spirit of the day, as it diffused itself over all nature around us and within us!

At length Easter Sunday arrived—and with it the subject of our memoir, who entered into life about six o'clock on that morning of general happiness and joy.

From the moment of his birth, and from the circumstance of his having been born on that particular festival, his mother resolved within herself to dedicate him to the service of God—a resolution in which she was not at all supported by her husband, who had selected his brother John as the individual of the family designed for a clerical life. Mrs. O'Donovan, finding that her husband was not inclined to give way in the matter, and feeling that it was her duty to submit at once, yielded up the point without a moment's hesitation.

The period of early life, as it is the happiest, so does it also pass with most fleetness away. Owen O'Donovan was from the beginning a remarkable child. His heart was unquestionably amiable and good, and his disposition manly and generous; but in spite of all those excellent qualities it was evident to every one that he, beyond every other individual of the family, had inherited, along with his father's virtues, his peculiar and prevailing weakness—impetuosity of temper.

This fact had, for a considerable time, reconciled his mother to the choice which her husband had made in the person of their son John, whose temper was exceedingly good, and whose heart, in fact, was also full of affection and kindness. He and his brother Owen were, in a peculiar manner, the inseparable companions of the family. They were always together, going to and from school, and it was well for Owen that this was the case, in as much as his brother's presence has frequently prevented our young hero—if we may so call him—from rushing into many a tiny battle with his schoolfellows, upon grounds, which, except in his own quick and irritable fancy, were ludicrously inadequate to occasion warfare between the parties.

One of the first anecdotes which we remember of Owen was rather a remarkable one in its way, and we shall relate it here. His mother and he were one day by themselves in the house, the other children having been out, some at their appointed avocations, and others probably at play.

At the time when this anecdote occurred the child could not have been more than between four and five years of age—certainly under five.

"Mammy," said he, "what is God, and who is he?" "He is the creator of heaven and earth, and sovereign lord of all things."

"Do you know God, mammy?"

"What do you mane, dear?"

"Did you ever see him, or spake to him?"

"No, darlin'."

"Where does God live?"

"Why sure you ought to know that, dear?"

"Oh ay, in heaven—but where is heaven, mammy?"

"Up, darlin', above the sky."

"Isn't it well for them, mammy, that God loves?"

"It is, darlin'."

"He gives them every thing good, then."

"He does, dear."

"Mammy, wouldn't it be well for you and me, an' all of us, that my father was God—for then he'd be good to us, and bring us all up to heaven; but, mammy, if heaven is up high there in the sky how is God able to stay up without fallin' when he has nothing to walk upon?"

His mother took him in her arms, and kissing him, said, "darlin', you're too young to be able to know these things yet, but when you grow big, an' get larnin', you'll know all about them."

"Me knows one ting," he said, "me wouldn't like to lave you, an' my father, an' all of yez, to go away to heaven, where I would'nt see yez—me would rather stay here than go to God—for sure I'd be among strangers then."

The tears started to that loving mother's eyes as she replied, embracing him again, "my darlin' child, its your affectionate little heart that makes you spake as you do—but, acushla machree, I hope we'll all meet in heaven, in God's own time, where none of us, as you say, will be a stranger to the rest."

This dialogue disclosed the early workings of a thoughtful mind and an affectionate heart, and we mention it here, because it is characteristic of the virtues for which he was remarkable in the after part of his pious and laborious life.

At this period, that is about the years 1804–5, and up, in fact, until a much later date—but especially at the time of which we write—the state of education in the country at large was such as we are inclined to think would occasion much scepticism among those who do not remember it in the present day. The parish in which O'Donovan first saw the light was, in fact, one of the largest in a large and extensive diocese. It was very nearly ten miles long, and close upon seven in breadth, and although it was not all reclaimed and cultivated, yet it contained a very large population. It lay in an exceedingly rich and beautiful valley that might be, perhaps, about thirty or forty miles long. This parish, however, was, in point of fact, literally a large valley in itself, that stretched between two lines of low mountainous hills that ran from north-east to south-west, bounding it in as they went along. The centre of it was land of the richest description, fertile, undulating in surface, and remarkable for an aspect that betokened great wealth and skilful cultivation. This portion of it was inhabited by the descendants of those who settled upon it both in Elizabeth and James's time, and indeed they have reason to be thankful that the lot of their ancestors was cast in a land literally teeming with abundance. Up on the mountain sides and rough bars are located the original occupiers of this wealthy district, or rather their descendants; and as the creeds of both parties are strongly adversative—as, indeed, their habits and feelings upon many points are—it is hardly necessary to add here, that about the years we have mentioned, when the country, and the rival parties who occupied it, had not yet shaken off the sanguinary antipathies of the rebellion, it presented such a state of party division and social disorganization as we sincerely trust may never be witnessed amongst us again. In this large parish, full of wealth and teeming with population, there was not a single school of respectable character—so completely was education neglected by all classes. Two or three hedge schools, scattered over this immense extent, were the only sources from which knowledge could flow. We must, however, correct ourselves—there were two others, one of them called the Blue School, in which a certain number of poor Protestant children were educated. This was a parish school, or rather a kind of endowment connected with the church, and it was called, or rather nicknamed the blue school, because the children who received their education in it were clothed in a blue livery. The other was a Protestant school, also, at which the attendance was remarkably thin, the fact being that every class, Catholics, Protestants, and dissenters of all kinds, preferred sending their children to the hedge schoolmasters, in consequence of the high opinion they entertained of the qualifications attributed, and very often with justice, to this eccentric and original class of instructors. It was no unusual thing to see two or three hundred pupils of both sexes, and of all ages and sizes, assembled in a barn, or school-house, some of whom may have come a distance of four, five, or six miles, often across moors, and mountains, and rough upland, for the purpose of acquiring education.

Much has been said of the hedge schoolmasters of that day, and, indeed, we regret that in point of morals little can be advanced to their credit. They were of an easy, impudent deportment—stilted up by a consciousness of the wonderful notions which the people entertained of their capacity and acquirements. Their lives with respect to each other were lives of literary warfare, and everlasting challenge and contest; and nothing could be more amusing and original than their discussions on the chapel-green on a Sunday, touching some point of grammar, book-keeping, or arithmetic. They lived among the parents of their pupils, going round from one comfortable farmer's house to another, generally night about; so that, in point of fact, they led an easy, careless life, utterly exempt from the trials and responsibilities of the world. The seats in these schools were, in general, round stones and bosses—the latter being a description of hard, firm, light moss, exactly in the shape of a cheese. The fire was always in the centre of the floor, around which the scholars sat, in rotation, during winter—every pupil being obliged to bring, under his or her arm, two sods of turf each day. The hedge school-houses were also remarkable for never having chimnies on them; that which served for the chimney being nothing more nor less than a large hole in the roof, exactly over the fire.

One circumstance, very detrimental to the morals of the masters, and not unfrequently to those of the children and parents, was an absurd opinion, entertained by the latter, that a love of drink was a certain indication of great talents and extensive information on the part of the teacher. It must, consequently, have been exceedingly difficult for a man thus situated to maintain a character for sobriety, when, in order to raise himself in the estimation of his supporters, all he had to do was to indulge in liquor. This frequently led to computations between the master and the country people, who were anxious “to stand a treat” in order, as the phrase went, “to draw him out.”

Of such schools and such masters there might have been about three in O'Donovan's native parish, and at such schools, only, did he receive the early portion of his education.

We have said that Thomas O'Donovan had selected his son John as the person whom he looked upon as best calculated, by his gentle and affectionate nature, for the serious duties of the priesthood. In this, unquestionably, so far as ordinary judgment could go, he calculated correctly. His mother, however, who loved her son John quite as tenderly as did his father, possessed a much keener insight into character than he did. She saw clearly, no doubt, that John was gentle, generous and affectionate, but she saw, besides, that he wanted firmness, energy of character, and, above all things had not in his whole disposition a single spark of the enthusiasm which so frequently kindled in Owen. It is true the simple woman did not know it by so philosophic a name, but she saw a principle in him by which he was urged forward upon occasions of difficulty, with a kind of impatient resolution that enabled him to concentrate all his powers in the accomplishment of that which he wished to effect or overcome.

In the mean time she did not attempt to set herself up in opposition to the wishes of her husband on the subject; she only proceeded with the silent task which she had imposed upon herself, of teaching Owen to check, regulate, and, if possible, ultimately to overcome his natural impetuosity of disposition, with the same judicious and persevering spirit with which, always under higher aid, she had succeeded in eradicating this deep-rooted feeling from the character of his father.

When we speak of impetuosity of temper as the hereditary failing of Owen O'Donovan, we should, perhaps, give a somewhat clearer description of it than we have yet done. It was not exactly such a temper as his father had, although it certainly seemed of a very cognate character. The latter was hasty, rapid, and fiery, when provoked by contradiction, or anything which he considered offensive or insulting. So far Owen and he were perfectly identical—each possessing that high, but unregulated sense of honour with which, notwithstanding its offensiveness, it is really difficult to quarrel. The son, however, displayed an impatience on being denied his own way or will, which constituted a formidable impediment to his mother's exertions, and which formed no part of his father's character, or at least to a very limited extent.

When about eight years of age, a circumstance occurred, which, as it was significant of the traits that characterized the different dispositions of O'Donovan's children—at least the male portion of them—we shall relate here.

There lived a tailor in the adjoining hamlet, named Ned Moynagh, a poor, quiet, stupid creature, who, in point of fact, had very little business, and deserved little, so far as a knowledge of his trade went. This is truth, and we can take it upon our conscience to say, that if ever we, the writer of this memoir, cut a strikingly ridiculous figure, it was in consequence of Ned's vile handy work. We remember the old villain—heaven pardon us!—but we do remember the old villain—blockhead—making, when we were only ten years of age, a suit of clothes for us in the same shape and upon the same principle that he made them for our grandfather, who was then a very old man. For instance, he made the body so long that the hinch (haunch) buttons, as they are called, were so far down that we uniformly found them under us while sitting; and as we were not trained to hair-bottoms and mahogany, but to good hard oak, we need not dwell upon the comforts of such a fit. The waistcoat was wide and liberal as the coat—as a proof of which we have only to say that it was fearfully double-breasted, and had a pair of long flaps at the lower extremity, that went half way down over the thighs—whilst the breeches—knee breeches they were—buttoned somewhat below the calf of our leg—or rather where the calf ought to be—for we were not much overburthened with that commodity at the time. In fact the old villain—blockhead—sent us trailing about the country, a sucking patriarch of ten years—and a laughing stock to the neighbours—dressed in a suit of clothes that turned us into an irreverent parody upon our grandfather. The truth was, that poor Ned never had brains enough to be able to cut his cloth out of the fashion that prevailed when he learned his trade, and it mattered not whether those who employed him were young or old, he felt no remorse whatever in equalizing their condition, and turning them all out in the same antique costume.

One Christmas Eve, however, Ned, who on this occasion was employed by O'Donovan from motives of kindness and charity, brought home four suits of clothes, one for each of the worthy farmer's sons, who, as is usual on such occasions, lost no time in trying them on, in order to see how they might fit. The three elder brothers were very much chagrined at the antiquity of their appearance, but, after surveying each other for a minute or two, they were so completely overcome with a sense of the ludicrous, that they laughed long and loudly, as did Owen, also, who had not yet tried on his own. At length the experiment was made, and on surveying himself in the looking-glass, and feeling that his appearance was, if possible, more ridiculous than that of his brothers, he immediately reinvested himself in his old suit, and seizing a knife he commenced in a fury to destroy the clothes, which, in fact, he would have done, were it not that his brothers interfered, and wrested the knife out of his hand. His father, who was present, on witnessing this outrageous ebullition, ran to get a whip, and was about to correct him, in a state bordering on passion, when his wife, laying her hand gently upon his arm, exclaimed in a calm voice, "Tom, are you both angry? becase if that is the case, you know you aren't in a state fit to correct him."

Her husband paused and checked himself, and after waiting for some time, until he felt that the moment of excitement had passed, he got the whip and corrected him smartly. The boy, however, never uttered a sound; on the contrary, he bore the castigation like a statue.

"Now, my good boy," said his father, "you see I did not—thanks to your mother for it—correct you while I was in anger—but I have corrected you to make you know and feel that whenever you indulge in these fits again, the whip must do its duty—when-ever you're ill in future I'll give you the same remedy, never fear."

"Well, he wont', father," said his brother John, "he wont—can't you say," he added, aside to Owen, "can't you say you're sorry at wanst, an' he wont' be angry."

"No, I can't," replied Owen.

"And why can't you?" asked John.

"Because," replied the other, "it would be a lie if I said it, an' I wont tell a lie about it; I'm not sorry."

"An' why are you not sorry, Owen?" asked his mother.

"When I think that to-morrow is Christmas Day," he replied, "an' me without the daicent clothes I ought to have! In the first place the clothes are spoiled, and in the next I'm disappointed. Every body but me will have his daicent suit of new clothes on him to-morrow."

The whip is here still," said his father, "you have now tasted No. 1; take care you do'nt find No. 2 a little bittherer."

"If I had a cudgel in my hand," he exclaimed, "and was able to handle it, I'd make the stupid ould vagabone that spoiled my clothes feel whether it was sweet or bitther—I'd taich him to make an ould man of me before my time—may the devil fly away with him!"

The father was about proceeding to chastise him again, and had the whip raised, when his brothers rushed towards him and interposed—"Oh! father, don't—he got enough—he will be sorry—you know he's a little hasty."

O'Donovan was resolved, however, not to suffer such an exhibition of pride and self-will to escape without additional punishment, and made another effort to correct him, when one of his brothers called out to him to run away—to leave the room. To this he lent a deaf ear, and refused to budge an inch. The mother sat with her head resting on her open hands, evidently in deep distress at the contumacious obstinacy of her son—and his father, provoked at the interference of his brothers, raised his whip and struck John, who evinced most anxiety to save him, a severe blow across the shoulders, which made the poor boy cry aloud with pain. Owen, on seeing this, and conscious that it was on his account, and in consequence of his obstinacy that he suffered, rushed towards him, and, throwing his arms about his neck, wept bitterly at his pain—then going hastily to his father, he said, whilst the tears streamed down his cheeks, "here father, correct me—I deserve it all—I'm a bad boy—see how my ill temper has got poor John beaten! Father, I'm sorry for it all now—do what you like with me—I'll go to mass to-morrow in my ould clothes, to humble myself—or I'll do anything you wish me—whisht, John darlin'—whisht! Oh! what wouldn't I give that I could take the pain of that blow off you and suffer it myself?"

The mother had raised her tearful eyes, which she turned upon him with a glistening expression of pleasure that she could not conceal; and his father, laying aside his whip, took him over to him, and spoke kindly to him for a few minutes, after which he left the room, evidently moved more by the boy's generosity and affection for his brother, than by the extraordinary firmness and regard for truth which he had evinced. They both judged of him, naturally enough, by the appearance of those domestic virtues which they best understood, but were incapable of properly appreciating his hatred of falsehood, and the unshrinking fortitude with which he bore the severe correction he had received. On that night as he was about to go to bed he went over to his father, and putting his arms about his neck he said in a whisper "father, dear, forgive me—I acted very wrong to-night—forgive me—and I'll strive to be good."

His father's generous heart was deeply moved at this instance of repentance and sorrow, and his first reply was a kiss, accompanied by the words, "I do forgive you, darlin'; but its God you ought to beg to forgive you."

"So I have," said he, "and so I will."

He then went to his mother, and putting his arms around her neck, and his lips to her ear, whispered, "mother, dear, do you pray for me." After which he went to his bed-room, and it was noticed that on that night he prayed longer than he had been in the habit of doing.

We have said, in describing the low state of education in the country, and with reference to the hedge schools, that it was customary for the masters to go round at night to the houses of the neighbouring farmers. One evening, about this time, Owen's master, a Connaught man, was sitting at the kitchen fire, smoking his pipe, when O'Donovan, who had been out in the fields, came in to supper. This having been dispatched, the whole family arranged themselves about the fire, when the "masther," lighting another pipe, addressed the worthy farmer as follows:

"I think you mintioned to me some time ago, Misther O'Donovan, that you were nourishing a determination of putting your son John to the Latin—that is, provided a classical school were in sufficient proximity."

"I did say so," replied the other, "and I'm still in the same mind."

"Thin, if you be, the opportunity has presented itself," said O'Beirne, for so the master was called, "there is a sound and well indoctrinated classic about to open a siminary in Tom Hall's barn, in which nothing but the learned languages will be taught."

"Now, do you tell me so?" exclaimed O'Donovan, brightening, "in Tom Hall's barn! Gad, but that's not so very convanient," he proceeded; "why Tulnavert, where the Halls live, is, at least, five miles from this."

"An' what are five miles to a young and souple scion in the pursuit of knowledge?" asked O'Beirne, in a contemptuous tone; "nothing—besides can you not get him a pony—an' mount him—he's not the first condisciple I have seen pursuing litherature on horseback. However, if I might indulge in a small taste of liberty, Mr. O'Donovan, and venture on a suggestion, it would be that, in this instance, you're about to clap the classical saddle on the wrong horse—the concatenation should be between Owen and the classics, not John—at least, that is my opinion."

"Well masther," replied O'Donovan, "mine is otherwise, and, as I happen to be his father, I think, wid every respect for you, I'll take my own coorse—but, at the same time, I'm oblaiged to you, becaise it shows that you have an' intherest in my family."

"Unquestionably I have; but, Misther O'Donovan, I now predict, wid thorough confidence, that the day will come when you'll turn vane, and own to the opinion I have already expressed upon this subject. Both boys are good; but as for Owen, he's destined to shine in something yet—the material for greatness is in that boy, and all he wants is to have it elicited."

"Well, I'm glad to hear it, masther," said his father, "but still I decide for John as the makins of the best priest—Owen is smart I grant you, but he hasn't the agreeable temper of the other, and to tell you the truth that's a thing not to be overlooked in the makins of a priest."

The matter was accordingly so decided, and in a few days his brother John was sent to a classical school, kept by a man named Shannon, at a place called Tulnavert.

The motive, mentioned by his father as that which caused him to send John rather than Owen to the classics, was no secret in the family, and from the hasty turn of the latter, one might imagine that such a preference of his brother before himself would have occasioned him to feel rather jealous of him on that account. Owen, however, was quite too generous and affectionate to entertain such a narrow and illiberal sentiment. The only effect this circumstance had upon him seemed to be one that was more allied to regret and sorrow than either to envy or jealousy. And it was evident, besides, that he commenced a system of more practical self-restraint over his temper and general disposition than his family ever had an opportunity of observing in him before.

One evening, about this time, his mother, happening to pass into the parlour, found him in tears, with his brother's Latin grammar in his hand, through which it seems he had been looking.

"Owen," said she, "what ails you, dear? Why do you cry?"

"I'm sorry," said he, "that my father didn't send me to the Latin as well as John."

"Ay, dear," she replied, affectionately, "but then, Owen, you're sorry for the wrong thing. It's not sorry for his keepin' you from the Latin you ought to be, but for not bein' able to keep down your own temper; becaise, Owen, I know that if your temper had been as good as John's, its you he would 'a' sent an' not him."

"Well, mother," he replied, "that was what I meant to say when I tould you I was sorry—I'm sorry that my own bad temper made John be sent instead o' me—but it'll go hard with me or I'll overcome the same temper yet."

"Remember, Owen," she replied, "that you can do nothing without God's assistance—and that you must ax an' pray for before you can get it."

"It's through His grace I expect to do it, mother," he replied, "an' I hope, before long, that you'll all see a great improvement in me, in this respect."

"Well, darlin'," replied his mother, "let us see that—but, at any rate, you are goin' the right way about it, and I hope that God will assist and strengthen you."

"But, ah! mother, above all things, do you pray for me."

"I do, dear," she returned, "and I will always pray for you—why shouldn't I?"

From this out he was observed to be more sedate and self-possessed in his manner, and on many peculiar occasions succeeded in preserving an equanimity that was, they knew, very unusual, especially with reference to his efforts at self-restraint, when the nature of the provocations was considered.

Indeed, we cannot say that his poor brother, John, ever manifested any peculiar relish for classical information. So far, indeed, from that, his family saw, but without much surprise, that it was by his brother Owen's advice and persuasions he was urged to the preparation of his lessons. They could not avoid remarking, however, that Owen felt a singular delight in hearing him his tasks, and assisting him in understanding and overcoming them. So far and so strongly did this habit grow upon both, that it became a matter of necessity for John to depend upon his brother's quicker perception and greater facility in acquiring the necessary knowledge.

In this manner they proceeded through grammar, Hoole's Terminations, and syntax, when one evening, that Mr. Shannon came to spend the night, according to his rotatory movements, with Tom O'Donovan, it so happened that he was asked, according to the good old custom, to examine John, in order that his parents might hear, so to speak, with their own ears, the progress which he was making in this new department of literature. The examination took place in the presence of the whole family, every member of which looked on with a degree of wonder and interest which we are sure many of our readers will perfectly remember in connexion with this difficult and learned ordeal.

John, seeing that there was no loophole for any escape, and that he must walk coolly to the literary stake, to be baited for the edification of the family, gave a long look of distress and solicitation for assistance to Owen, who stood with an anxious but eager look, and an eye that kindled with an enthusiastic ardour for a participation in the scene that was about to take place. He perfectly understood his brother's glance of supplication, and without more ado, quietly placed himself at his side, but without seeming to come in to the rescue. At length the examination, which was of course quite simple and elementary, commenced—and as poor John was asked to decline and conjugate words, which the other members of the family could not understand, they all threw up their eyes with amazement at the extent of such erudition on both sides, especially at the lofty sense of his own superiority and acquirements displayed by the master. John's answering was, however, tolerably fair and rather respectable on the whole; but yet, we are bound to say that he by no means answered every question that was put to him, nor did his learned examiner intend that he should, inasmuch as this would have intimated that the youth, as far as he went, knew his business as well as his master himself—a circumstance which would have caused to escape, rather ingloriously, a great deal of the grave and learned dignity with which he sat inflated. On this account, therefore, we need not be surprised that poor John stuck pretty frequently in the learned mud of this profound examination; or, at least, would have done so, were it not that Owen, as often as the other was in a state of distress, contrived, as well as he could, to prompt him with the appropriate answer, and in many cases, where the answer was too long, he could not restrain himself from speaking out fairly, and with the same glow of enthusiasm in his eyes, to which we have already alluded, nor from giving out the full and correct answer himself.

"Pray, Mr. O'Donovan," asked the master, at length, with astonishment, "will you have the kindness to explain this matter to me? I am not aware that there is any other classical establishment in this vicinity but my own, and I was not aware, either, that you had any other son learning classics except John. Yet, here I unquestionably find that John is surpassed—in fact, forced to play second fiddle to his younger brother."

"Troth an' I know nothing about it," replied his father, "only that we used to see Owen there thryin' his brother at his tasks."

"Come hither, my good boy," said the master, calling Owen to him, "you, of course, can throw the necessary light upon this mystery. How did you become so well acquainted with the elements of Latin? when and where did you learn what you know of it?"

"Nowhere, Sir," he replied, "but at home here—I used to hear John his tasks—sometimes he used to tell me a word or two, or the way of a thing, and by degrees I came to know everything as well, or any how," he added, checking himself, from a principle of affection for his brother, "nearly as well as himself."

"No, but much better, my good boy," returned the master; "this, indeed, Mr. O'Donovan," he added, turning to him, "is surprising!"

He then took Owen to task, and after twenty minutes scrutiny, he said, "it is really astonishing to find so young a lad so incredibly well acquainted with the rules and principles of the Latin language, and that altogether by the aid of application and self-instruction alone. Of the two," he added, "this is certainly the boy whom I should select to receive a classical education."

In fact, the extraordinary progress of young Owen, unaided and untaught save by his own industry and quickness, joined to the magisterial opinion of Shannon, completely turned the tables in his favour, and from that night out his brother John never opened a Latin book. It is unnecessary, therefore, to say that Owen assumed his brother's satchel and books, and trudged off with Shannon, to prepare himself for that course of life to which, as it appeared, his poor, but amiable brother John had never been destined.

It may seem strange to our readers, but it is nevertheless perfectly true, that for some time after this change had taken place in the family—a change every way so gratifying to his wishes—his temper, so far from improving, in consequence of the circumstance, as one might naturally expect, began to relapse a little into its original acrimony. His usual cheerfulness seemed, in a great measure, to have abandoned him; he became graver, less flexible, and full of a spirit that looked like pride arising from the destiny which awaited him. The advice and judicious management of his mother, however, were perpetually at work to point out to him the errors into which he was falling, or, at least, likely to fall.

"Owen dear," she said, when he had been about a month with Shannon, "if there's one error that a boy like you ought to avoid beyant another it is pride. Don't misunderstand me," she proceeded, "for there is a kind of pride that we ought all to have, that is daicent pride—that pride that should prevent us from doin' a mane, ungenerous, or dishonest action—a pride that taiches us to respect ourselves, not to tell a lie, not to break our word, nor to do any thing that might be discreditible to our name, or to any of our family—sich a pride is one—if it is pride—that we ought all to have, bekaise it gives us good grounds for knowin' that we oughtn't to let ourselves down to low and unbecomin' conduct. Now," she proceeded, "it isn't against this that I'm warnin' you, but against thinkin' that you're betther now than any of your family, or, above all things, that you're betther, bekaise you're intended to be a priest, than you were before it."

"Why, mother," he replied, "this is a great lecture, but doesn't every one know that I ought to think more of myself since I went to Latin than I would of a boy that's not at it."

"Not on that account, Owen dear," she replied, "nor for that reason; only that you should keep yourself up according, as I said this minute, to what is right and proper; but you shouldn't get proud merely because we intend to make a priest of you. So far from that, Owen, you, ought to watch your own conduct, and your own thoughts, an' whenever or wherever you find that feelin' in them, you ought to keep it down."

"Surely, mother, you wouldn't have me put myself on a level with common boys."

"In one sense, dear, I would not—be above them in all that's good and proper, and deserving of respect; but don't think that they're worse than you are, especially because you are learnin' to be a priest. Maybe they're better—maybe they think more of truth."

"But you don't mane to say, mother, that I don't think much about truth?"

"No, dear, I don't mane any sich thing, for I know you love truth an' practise it; but in fifty things, an', above all, in the sight o' God, they may be as good or better than you are; so that while we strive to deserve the good opinion of others we ought to think humbly of ourselves; an' who is there but should think so, when they recollect how much they fall short of their duty?"

"Well, I declare, mother, I can't think that I'm getting worse than I was, at any rate."

"Indeed, then, Owen, an' to be plain wid you, I don't think you're gettin' better; for instance, you're not so cheerful as you used to be—your temper is not kept under as it used to be—nor you're not so friendly wid your playfellows—no, nor so completely at home wid your brothers and sisters as before you went to the Latin. Now, dear, you know there's nobody loves you as your own family does, and we have all of us observed this change for the worse upon you. This is a world, darlin', in which we must watch over our passions and failings as our greatest enemies, and strive to overcome them, because they are so; but you will strive to do so, an' we'll all live, please God, to see you a bright but humble ornament of our church, yet."

"Who knows," he replied, whilst his dark eye kindled as he looked upon vacancy, "who knows but I may be a bishop yet, mother?"

"Don't covet that," she replied, "merely because it's a higher, but because it's a holier office; only, whatever you are to be in the church, be it in the best sense; if you're to be only a curate, be the best curate, if you can; and leave the rest to God, who will reward you in his own way for havin' done your duty."

Such admirable principles as these perpetually impressed upon his heart, and kept always clearly before him, were of the utmost value in quickening and directing, not only his conduct, but his very habits and mode of thinking.

The truth is, that his mother, whose natural sagacity was as extraordinary as the piety and affection of her disposition, saw clearly that the pride arising from the contemplation of his future position in the church, or in other words, of the spiritual destiny which awaited him, had begun to make its insidious approaches to his heart, and she felt satisfied, although she was too humble and uneducated to understand the principle, whilst she feared it, that, if not met and checked in time, while the mind was flexible and the habits unformed, it might, like some noisome and prolific weed, be exceedingly difficult to eradicate it, if permitted to get footing in the character. She, accordingly, let no reasonable opportunity pass in which she could, in her own mild and affectionate manner, divert his attention to its symptoms, according as they chanced to appear during the ordinary course of his youth and education.

His progress at the classics was very rapid, and, indeed, highly gratifying both to his master and parents. That he possessed a disposition which required great watchfulness was indeed very evident, from many changes produced on him, by circumstances that one would have scarcely expected to cause them.

For instance, it soon became apparent that in quickness of apprehension and memory he was without a rival in the school. These were advantages with the possession of which he was not himself thoroughly acquainted until he commenced the classics. In a short time, however, he perceived this—but instead of availing himself of them, when understood, they only caused him to relax his application, and leave the preparation of his school business to the last moment. That he was unquestionably one of the smartest and most acute boys in the school was known to the master and every scholar in it. Having now ascertained the extent of his own powers when hard pressed, he began to be influenced by a love of athletic exercises, in which, even at the early age of thirteen or fourteen, he promised to excel. His master, Shannon, was one of those plausible and sycophantic wretches, who, living in a population where the wealthier classes all belonged to the Protestant and Presbyterian creeds, exhibited the most detestable partiality towards their children, whom he feared to flog or correct when they deserved it. The consequence was, that all his pupils who belonged to those creeds enjoyed a most shameful immunity from punishment, and it is scarcely necessary to say that their conduct was, in consequence of their consciousness of this most dishonest partiality on the part of the master, insolent, overbearing, and offensive beyond all endurance. They knew that complaint against them was useless; their parents fed and pampered this unprincipled pedagogue, and it mattered not what scoundrelly outrage their children committed against the sons of the poorer Roman Catholics. If a complaint happened to be preferred against these privileged young offenders, the complaining party was certain to suffer for the very act of having made the complaint, or if that could not, with any sense of decency or justice, be effected, the vile tyrant kept it in against the Catholic boy until some other pretext occurred, and then—then did he suffer for having put the pedagogue, even for a moment, in a painful position—in a position which rendered it even a contingency for him to correct any of his favourites.

And this man—this inhuman ruffian was not only a Roman Catholic, but affected to be a strict one. He generally spent every Saturday and Sunday in the house of the parish priest, on whom he imposed, and with whom he lived on terms of the strictest and most cordial intimacy. He frequently served Mass, and was, in point of fact, looked upon, by those who did not know him, as a most worthy and humane man, an excellent scholar—which he was not—and a most intrepid champion of the Catholic faith and morals.

One of the first to resent this tyrannical partiality was Owen O'Donovan, who entertained a generous hatred of the man and his conduct. He was himself rarely deficient in his lessons, but whenever he happened to miss any thing, the tyrant's eye instantly blazed, the teeth were furiously ground, and down came the inhuman horse-rod upon the naked head; whilst, on the other hand, it mattered not how stupid or how ignorant the favoured individuals were, he smiled at their mistakes, put the words into their mouths, or remonstrated with them in the blandest and most familiar terms. No passion, however—no stamping of the feet—or supplisio pedis—no grinding of the diabolical tusks, nor any other symptom of fury or phrenzy were visible so far as they were concerned.

Our readers may, we think, without much power of logic on our part, come to the conclusion that Owen O'Donovan, full of generosity, fire, and courage, and possessed of a natural disposition to resist oppressive tyranny such as this, was not likely to bear it when exercised against himself. This indeed was true; and we can only say, that no severity from Shannon—which, by the way, is not the real name—was ever known to make him move a nerve or a muscle, to utter one sound expressive of pain, or to shed a tear. This we know to be an indisputable fact, and we can assure our readers that we have frequently seen him corrected, as an after thought, upon the strength of his doggedness and obstinacy, as the master was pleased to say, because he was “too hardened to cry like another boy.” Owen maintained his triumph, however, and never did permit this “learned Nero” to enjoy the satisfaction of causing him to shed a single tear.

And yet, is it not strange that this boy, whom no severity could affect or subdue, was, perhaps, beyond any other in the school, the most easily influenced by witnessing severity when carried to excess upon another. The history of any thing remarkably generous or pathetic—any tale of distress or sorrow—melted him even to tears, at an age when youth is not very generally or strongly influenced by such narratives.

This conduct on the part of Shannon was, very naturally, calculated to produce a state of jealous, bitter, and vindictive feeling amongst his pupils. And it did so. The Roman Catholic party, if I may use the term, seeing that all was gross injustice against them, had nothing now for it but to punish or avenge themselves on those who were favoured by the autocrat, for the insolence caused by his partiality towards them. We know that a favourite is always hated, whether he deserves it or not. Here, however, were one-half of the school made favourites upon the most unjust and iniquitous principles. When the reigning sovereign, however, is hated, so will every one who stands high in his affection. Hence, our readers will at once perceive that the school was a scene of interminable strife and animosity. Battles—pitched or fought extempore—party challenges—attacks and reprisals were, in fact, the order of the school. This, however, was only to be expected. The plausible, but partial despot sowed the very seeds that were calculated to produce animosity and party hatred—and this they completely effected.

It is painful, now, to reflect upon the state of that school, which, in good truth, resembled too many others of the same class; if we might not compare it to the condition of our unhappy country at the time—and to the principles of partiality towards one class upon which its government was conducted.

There was something, however, to be said for the hedge-schoolmasters. Education, as we have shown, was in a low and most neglected state, and it was only a little before, that it was actually under ban. At the period of which we write, many of the respectable Protestants and dissenters were, in point of fact, glad in frequent instances to have an opportunity of sending their sons and daughters to hedge schools. Nay, in some instances the very gentry, or at least a particular class of them, sent their children to hedge masters, who were frequently good classical scholars—many of them, besides, being engaged to instruct the young ladies of the family in grammar, writing, and arithmetic. The consequence was, that the poor devils were quite flattered by any attention received from Protestants of respectability or wealth, and scrupled at nothing to stand well with them and retain their good opinion.

Among the most active of those who made a point to vex and harass Shannon, by annoying and putting down his favourites, was, beyond doubt, Owen O'Donovan. In a short time, in fact, he became their terror, and consequently brought down upon himself a double weight of the master's vengeance.

One anecdote we shall relate here, in order that the reader may see how strongly calculated such a school was to vitiate his mind, and distract it by a participation in some of the worst passions and propensities of our nature.

Shannon was in the habit of giving a fortnight's vacation every year, at autumn, for the purpose of his enjoying the salt water during that period. He took care, however, to make his pupils feel that, however it might be a vacation to himself, it could not be considered as such to them—the fact simply being, that he took care to give them, in the shape of tasks, nearly twice as much to do as they would have done had they received no vacation at all; in consequence of which the return of it was looked upon with apprehension and dismay by the whole school, but especially by the unfortunate Roman Catholics.

Owen, as we said, grew idle from a mere consciousness of the rapid powers he possessed for absorbing knowledge, and, as an obvious result, left, at least on too many occasions, everything to be done at the last moment. On the autumn in question, the task prescribed during the usual fortnight's vacation to the pupils who composed his class, was the committing to memory all the rules of Alvary's Prosody. It was, at best, an inhuman exercise at any time, but especially during vacation, when school-boys are naturally seized with a holiday spirit and a truant indisposition to work. Be this as it may, when the day of returning to school arrived Owen had not committed a single rule to memory, and he knew, without the aid of prophecy, the gratification with which the master would wreak his bitterest resentment and vengeance on him in particular. Instead, therefore, of directing his steps to school, he turned them towards an uncle's of his, who lived in the lower part of the parish, where he remained until, after much alarm and a close search, he was at length found by his brother James. He then turned at once upon his friends and family in the fiercest manner, and flatly refused ever to enter Shannon's school again; this, however, his father would not bear—he immediately insisted upon Owen's going, and Owen stoutly declared that he would not; “I will go to any other master you wish,” he replied, “but not to that cowardly scoundrel.”

“My good boy,” said his father, “it's clear that you're anything but improvin' on our hands—do'nt imagine, however, that I'll suffer you to brow-beat me, and take your own sulky way and will in spite of me—if you haven't your tasks you may thank your own idleness for it, instead of blamin' the mather—you knew you had to get them, an' you wilfully neglected them, so come now—turn out; for as sure as I've life in my body you must tramp, step by step, wid myself till I lodge you inside the school-house door."

Further and most obstinate resistance on the part of Owen was at last overcome by repeated punishment, and, about twelve o'clock, our sullen truant was handed into the school-house by his father. The latter, on their way thither, had been turning over the matter in his mind, and came to the resolution of making a kind of compromise between his son and the master.

"Mather," said he, "as to correction he has got enough of it, I think; but it occurred to me, that as he has'n't a line of his tasks, if you'd allow him a reasonable portion of time to get them—maybe you'd let him pass if he has them then."

"Well," said the mather, "I know its setting the other boys—the good boys—of the school a very bad example, but, since you've interfered, I'll allow it to be so—go home now, Owen, and stay at home for two days, then come to school again—but if you do, I'll expect you to have off all Prosody by heart—your father is present, Owen, and you know, dear, that, except himself, there is no one feels a warmer interest for your success and improvement, nor, indeed, a greater affection for you than I do—in fact," he continued, addressing his father, "he is one of my own favourites, for, I assure you, Mr. O'Donovan, that I have my favourites—every good boy that minds his lessons and conducts himself with propriety is my favourite."

"If I am your favourite, then," replied Owen, "why do you trate me so much like a common brute? So far from being your favourite," he continued, "there's not a boy in the school you trate as you do me—and all beaise you know that I understand you, and hate yourself and your cowardly tyranny as I do the devil out o' hell."

His father snatched the horse-rod, which the master held in his hand, and made a rush at him.

"You young vagabone," he exclaimed, "if I didn't hear sich language wid my own ears I couldn't a' believed it—I'll pay you now for it at any rate."

The master, however, interfered, and remonstrated with O'Donovan in a spirit so full of apparent mildness and forbearance, that the majority of his pupils were disgusted at the plausible hypocrisy with which he imposed upon the honest man; "never correct in a passion," said he; "be always cool and calm, and let them see that you do so, not to gratify the angry impulse of the moment, but because you feel that it is for their good."

"Ah! you hear that," exclaimed his father, "you hear that beautiful discourse, and that's the man that you say is a cowardly tyrant—troth instead of intherfarin' to prevint you from gettin' a good hidin' as you deserve, I wonder how he can keep his hands off o' you."

"Mr. O'Donovan," replied Shannon, "I'd be badly able to manage a school and bear such language as this, if I was not capable of regulating my own temper and passions—let him go home now, and I give him two clear days, besides this, to get the task that he neglected. You see," he added, with a smile that would deceive a saint, "what a life of trial and provocation, without cause and to no end, we unfortunate and hard-working teachers lead, and all because we do every thing in our power to promote the improvement of our pupils."

"I do, sir," replied O'Donovan, "I see it all; an' I'm only sorry that any son of mine should have disgraced himself as he did this day."

"Oh! well," replied the other, "he'll be sorry for it, and he'll take care not to do it again; but, above all things, and what troubles me most—I hope he'll pay attention to his business, advance himself in his education, and mend his conduct, for indeed—however, we'll say no more about that now."

"Good mornin', Mr. Shannon," said O'Donovan, and many thanks for your kindness, an' throuble, an' your good advice to him."

"Good morning Mr. O'Donovan, and Owen good morning too, dear."

Owen, during the miserable and inadequate period allowed him for accomplishing such a task, concentrated all his powers upon its completion. The book was never for a moment out of his hands, either by day or night, or at least during a great portion of the latter, and, when the hour for his return to school arrived, he went to join his companions and meet his master with a cheerful countenance and an intrepid heart.

"Oh!" exclaimed Shannon, in that tone of bitter and diabolical irony which emanated from him spontaneously when addressing the Catholics, "bless my soul, is this our respectable young friend, Owen O'Donovan! the pride of the school and the ornament of Tulnavert! Owen, you're heartily welcome, most worthy and industrious youth! We hope you are well, Owen! and we trust you have been so diligently employed in doing nothing as usual, that you will be able to repeat all old Alvary from beginning to end; for which, and as a brilliant example to the school, we now call upon thee, Owen, to stand up, and in a clear, distinct voice, repeat the aforesaid old Alvary."

Owen approached him, put the book into his hands, commenced with the first rule, and without one moment's hesitation, impediment, or forgetfulness, proceeded to repeat, rule after rule, verbatim et literatim, as old Alvary had composed them. Shannon was not merely amazed, but disappointed and chagrined, most bitterly. In truth, he gloated over the opportunity which he had hoped the occasion would have presented, of taking a sweeping revenge upon the manly and generous boy, for the unpalatable truths to which he had given utterance in the presence of his father. On repeating the last rule, which he did in a voice of firmness and triumph, there ran a slight murmur of applause through the whole school, at which the master ground his teeth, which was a habit of his whenever his black passions were rising or excited.

"Now," he exclaimed, "you imp of the devil, I will let you know what your idleness deserves—here's a young vagabond who can, when he pleases get all Prosody by heart in two or three days, and he often comes to school without ever having looked at a book. I will let him know now what his idleness deserves."

He accordingly commenced, and inflicted upon the poor boy, for as good as ten minutes, such a brutal and barbarous punishment, that several of the larger boys were forced to interfere, and prevent him from rendering the barbarity dangerous probably to his life.

Now, such was the irresponsible authority that all this class were permitted to exercise, at the period of which we write, and so strikingly ignorant upon the duties of schoolmasters were the people by whom they were supported, and upon whose bounty and hospitality they fed, that poor Owen durst not complain at home of this shocking cruelty, from an apprehension of being punished again for having deserved punishment in school. Such, in fact, too frequently was the consequence to the pupils for complaining of such masters to their parents at home. The latter took it for granted, that if their children had not deserved the punishment complained of, they would not have received it; and in order to prevent the recurrence of the offence which occasioned it, they very frequently bestowed upon the offenders a supernumerary flogging, by way of a rider upon that which the master had already inflicted.

We dwell upon those matters at the greater length, because, besides exhibiting the difficulties with which the people had to contend, they also enable us to examine a very peculiar condition of society at the time. These difficulties, and this condition, were only the natural results of the penal code, which by rendering education a crime to a certain extent, degraded and darkened the public mind, so that when scholastic instruction was permitted, it fell necessarily into the hands of a set of men who were in every sense totally inadequate to the discharge of its duties, whether as regarding instruction or morals.

At all events, we believe the proverb which says, that every evil brings sooner or later its own remedy, is not without some foundation in truth. After about three years, Mr. Shannon began to find himself getting unpopular. His Protestant and dissenting patrons gradually came to the knowledge of his cruelty and injustice to one portion of his pupils; and as they had this information now and again from their own children, they could not relish the man's hypocrisy and sweetness of manner. But there were other causes for this. The parents of the Roman Catholic children having at length been satisfied that the man was a liar and a most dishonest tyrant, laid their heads together, and making common cause of the matter, waited upon the parish priest, to whom they made a strong statement respecting Shannon's iniquitous conduct. It required, however, some time, and a frequent repetition of the charges, to stagger his good opinion of the pedagogue. At length this was effected, and he so far yielded to their representations, as to allow them to bring in a new master if they could procure one. In this state of affairs the matter reached Shannon's ears, who, feeling that the exclusive patronage of either party was inadequate to his support, came to the determination of conciliating his own party, by administering occasional doses of correction to his old favourites, thinking, of course, that something of that sort would have set him right with his own. Accordingly, proceeding upon this new principle, he bestowed upon them, to their utter astonishment and dismay, such scarifying and diabolical inflictions, that in the course of about a fortnight the whole party were in a state of extraordinary excitement. The orangemen threatened to shoot the scoundrel, as they called him, like a dog; and at all events, in the course of a month, they abandoned his school, deprived him of his school-house, and made him afraid to show his nose in either fair or market, whilst he remained in the neighbourhood. The period of his stay, however, was not long. When his school had been reduced from about fifty to three scholars, he deemed it time to decamp, and accordingly he disappeared one morning, and had never the assurance to return to the scene of those tyrannical practices which he had been permitted to play with impunity so long.

Owen's mother had perceived with grief and concern, that the principles on which this school had been conducted were such as left behind them very injurious consequences in the disposition of her son. The heart-burnings, bitterness, and all the bad passions generated by party feeling, were of necessity instilled into his mind, by the enmities and resentments, both personal and political, which his dishonest connivance at the offences of one party had caused them to experience. In fact, his conduct had not only set them together by the ears, but kept them in a state of endless personal conflict, as well as political hostility, all of which would have been avoided had the man been moderate, impartial, and just.

Still she observed, as did also his father, that if he suffered in one sense he had gained in another. For instance, he imbibed such a hatred of tyranny in all its shapes, of oppression, cruelty, hypocrisy, and injustice, as he had reason to be thankful for during the period of his future life. There are, as our readers must know, a class of persons who, during all their intercourse with life, are capable of deriving much more benefit from example than advice, and of this class was Owen O'Donovan.

The Sister of Mercy.

One of a second number of "Sacred Melodies," by Rev. Joseph Fitzgerald.

I.

SHE kneels at the couch where sickness lies,
And sooths infirmity there,
And, raising her heart to the hope in the skies,
She whispers relief in prayer:
And smiles with a beam such as angels give
When the penitent soul's forgiven,
And bids the dull hope of sadness live,
And points to its home in heaven.

II.

Like the ling'ring beam that eve's decline,
Will paint on the vanishing day,
Thus hope in its parting light will shine,
'Ere wingeth its spirit away—
And smoothing in peace those closing eyes,
"Oh!" exclaims the Sister then,
"Go, spirit to bliss." Wide Heaven replies,
"Amen! Amen! Amen!"

Loretto Abbey, Rathfarnham.

"THE Old Convents of Paris," is the title of a novel which we have been reading with very great pleasure and interest. 'Tis the production of a French lady, and does her honour; yet, when we contrast it with the exquisite writings of Manzoni, and those of the author of "La Monaca di Monza," how lightly must we think of the pen that has endeavoured to etch the lives and discipline of a few nuns, a short while anterior to the great French Revolution. There are in this little volume faults enough, yet such as may be deemed pardonable, when we remember how some modern writers have been accustomed to treat the contemplative lives of monks and nuns; on this subject, we have had books so filled with blasphemy against God, and cold-blooded misrepresentations of the holiest and purest motives, that we wonder how any one, pretending to the name of Christian, could have deliberately penned them. The motive, however, which influenced these horrid libellers is transparent; they wanted to earn money, and could not do so without catering to the vitiated and debauched appetites of the masses, in America and England. Beyond the Atlantic great and dreadful crimes were committed by an infuriated mob, who could tolerate the most fetid absurdities of Mormonism, because it had no ingredient of Popery in its constitution; we would not wish to recall the shocking circumstances attendant on the publication of two or three American pamphlets, because we would rather forget these atrocities, and sink the authors of them in oblivion—they did their appointed work, but, verily, they shall have their reward.

We have said, that "The Old Convents of Paris," is not without its faults, nor is it our intention to dwell on them; this, however, is certain, that the nuns, portrayed by the French lady, are not like those of the Mrs. Ratcliffe school—unamiable, cold, and stony-hearted; the interior of the convent, too, is not like a theatre-stage, or a Rhine castle, full of hiding-places, grated prisons, and trap-doors; on the contrary, if we except an odd hint about clammy, dripping walls, and such like flights of imagination, the convent wears a pleasing, nay a cheerful aspect, and the superioress and her community are full of cordiality, devotion, and kindness; the confessor, too, is an amiable and sensitive being, without a particle of sordidness in his nature, and quite unlike any of the clerics whom Scott has tricked out in such grotesque colours. 'Twould be worth one's while to contrast Shakspeare's religious with those of Sir Walter. The former represents his, as men of piety and benevolence—and Friar Laurence, in Romeo, is, in our judgement, a character more truthfully delineated than all the Copmanhurst Clerks and Priors of Jorvaulx of the latter; the same may be said of Shakspeare's notions of Catholicity. Scott's are the result of a cherished prejudice, nay, we would rather say, the deliberate conclusions of a man bent on misrepresenting and travestying truth. Shakspeare, on the other hand, had Catholic notions, which shine out strongly in Hamlet, and others of his great works. The soul "fasting in penitential fires" is a very good and very Catholic idea of Purgatory; Wolsey, at the gate of the monastery, telling the Abbat that he comes to lay his bones aneath it, speaks volumes for the peace and consolation that the bruised and thwarted spirit might receive under such a roof. 'Tis a theme on which we might dwell at great length, were it necessary to prove that some of the grandest intelligences, among whom we may reckon the great dramatist, formed an estimate of Catholic practices, very different from that of Scott, not to speak of the hired scribblers who blaspheme what they know not. Faulty, then, as "The Old Convents of Paris" may be, in some respects, it evinces a tone of feeling which we cannot hesitate to commend; in fact, its exemption from the gross inaccuracies and crude misrepresentations of the generality of writers on similar subjects, is its highest praise; and, if there be anything in the book worthy our commendation, 'tis the absence of the staple nonsense with which romance-writers are wont to invest the characters of nuns and priests.

Turning from the old Convents of Paris to those of Dublin, 'twould be worth the while of any observant man to collect materials for the history of the latter; 'tis a subject, in our minds, well worthy of consideration. Few, indeed, of the old convents of Dublin now exist, and the few that are still in being forcibly remind us of that period of Lord Chesterfield's viceroyalty, when the Catholics were permitted to hire a house in some back lane, for the purpose of divine worship. We never pass the convent of George's-hill, Warrenmount, or that of North William-street, without thinking of the penal times, for, of all the Catholic institutions in this city, none are so calculated to awaken recollections of that bigot-era as the three convents we have alluded to. In fact, the history of the Catholic religion, not only in this city but in every town and hamlet of Ireland, may be read in the rise and progress of its churches and pious institutions. The places where our fathers worshipped, about the middle of the last century, are now converted into store-houses and ware-rooms, in the back lanes where a relaxation of the penal code suffered them to exist. The modern churches, with cross and angelus-bell, are amongst the grandest ornaments of the city; and as for the schools, monastic establishments, and nunneries, they are so many evidences of the faith, love, and morality of the Irish people. Who can fancy the feelings with which some of the stupid bigots of the olden time would now regard the cathedral or the church sacred to St. Francis Xavier, could they get up from their graves and roam for a day about the city? Heavens! how would they not impeach the vigilance and orthodoxy of my "Lord Mayor," who would not send his band of armed ruffians, headed by some blustering, self-sufficient fellow, glorifying himself in the title of an alderman, to wreak vengeance on the rebelly papists! But, indulge the fancy, let us suppose that they saw the "annual lord" and his liveried staff, including such important functionaries as the Aldermen, going in state to High Mass; yea, verily, going within the chancel (which we must respectfully suggest ought not be done even by a lord mayor or alderman), how would they not reel and stagger at such a scandal? We are not over anxious for the visitation of our deceased mayors or aldermen, being nowise desirous of supernatural apparitions, but we would prefer a day's wandering through the Catholic edifices of this city, with their departed honours of Skinner's-alley, to twenty nights with Alexander Verri in the tombs of the Scipios. The preference, no doubt, argues bad taste; nevertheless, in these sad, sad times of jarring and starvation, we need something to make us merry, and where could we be more so than in the company of the old civic dignitaries (bless the word), staring at the churches, convents, and schools of this once great Protestant city? But a truce to fancy and farewell to their rueful mightinesses.

Change, in some slight degree, the well-known saying of Tertullian, and see how applicable it is to the Irish Catholics of our times, "hesterni sumus," said the Christian apologist—we are of yesterday, "yet we fill your camps, garrisons, palaces, and forum." We are but of yesterday—a quarter of a century has scarce gone over our heads—and our churches, schools, monastic retreats, and nunneries have risen as if by magic. Enter the city on what side you will, and this truth, "chronicled in stone," meets you. If you are journeying from England, the first object that arrests attention is the splendid nunnery on the rocky shore of Dalkey. This, in truth, is a grand object of art, sacred to the best and holiest purposes; little, perhaps, do people imagine that the country is indebted to the piety and genius of a venerable lady for this splendid establishment; 'tis, nevertheless, quite certain that we must attribute it to the exquisite taste and sound judgment of Mrs. Ball. Carried away in the whirl of this world's excitements, men find but little time for reflection, but the time shall yet come, when the name of that lady must be written on the page that records the great benefactors of Catholic Ireland. Enter the city by the Kingstown railway, and the immense church, under the invocation of Saint Andrew, with its handsome front and classic epigraph, confirms what we have been saying. Proceed along the shipless quays, and dome, cross, and spire tell you you are in a city, the great majority of whose inhabitants belong to that religion, of which the mustard-seed was the aptest type—springing up into a spreading tree, whose foliage has overshadowed the face of the earth. Look, then, to these blessed mansions, where pious maidens consecrate themselves to God, and devote their energies to succouring the ignorant and the needy. See the House of Mercy, in Baggot-street, where holy dames impart education to the untaught, and stretch out the hand of mercy and charity to the unfriended girl. If a stranger in Dublin, you cannot fail to be struck by those modest figures that occasionally cross your path, noiseless as spectres; but, if you would follow them to the object of their visit, 'tis likely enough you will turn away wondering how the tender lady, wearing that coarse black garb, can sit down in the pestilential cellar, or mount that ricketty stairs, to bring consolation and words of hope to the miserable wretch, whose tongue might parch were it not for the benevolence of these heavenly messengers.

Ah! but there is a reflection very naturally arising out of all this. The spirit of Catholicity glows brightly in the pure bosoms of these ladies—the genius of Catholicity prompts them to these works of love. They have no sordid selfishness staying their steps or circumscribing their career; they live not for themselves but for the glory and honour of God, and the weal of suffering humanity. Go, for a moment, outside the pale of Catholicity, and you will not find devotion and self-sacrifice assimilating, even remotely to this. Pass in the night-time the front of that conspicuous building, on the east side of Stephens'-green, and, supposing you a stranger in the city of Dublin, you will imagine that the interior of that mansion is lighted up for some gorgeous and voluptuous revel; yet, you will soon find yourself deceived. That house is an hospital, and those numerous lights are in sick-wards, tended by the Sisters of Charity. High-born dames, accomplished in all that adorns woman's character, have abandoned luxurious ease and worldly enjoyment to minister to the weary-hearted patients who seek that merciful abode; nor is their mission circumscribed by these walls—the refuge of the outcast, the abode of sorrow, sickness, and pain is familiar to them, is cheered by their angelical visitations, and, when this world's cares and sorrows are about to close on afflicted humanity, who so prompt to succour and breathe words of peace as the meek daughters of St. Vincent de Paul? Words of ours cannot convey an adequate notion of their blessed works; dear brother Gerald has essayed the task, and, beauteous and pathetic as is his strain, were he now alive, he would admit that it fell short of such a Heaven-inspired theme.

Oh! what food for reflection do not the lives of these holy ladies suggest! Turning away from the glare and pomps of life to live amid its sufferings and sorrows! herein is true fortitude—herein is the great victory over the senses, and the closest assimilation to the conduct of Him whose life was spent doing good to all. Why should we wonder that our Lord would vouchsafe to us the precious gift of the one true faith, when we know that such pure lips and hallowed tongues are daily imploring Him to look benignly on the suffering people of this island? Ah! truly 'tis consolation for our many woes, that we have such blessed harbingers of the better life amongst us. May the people honor them as they deserve, and fondly requite their unwearied exertions. What a splendid series of facts to adorn the archiepiscopate of his Grace Daniel Murray, may not the biographer collect from the institutions to which we have cursorily alluded! Illustrious testimonials they must prove, in sooth, of a life so valuable to religion and the dearest interests of mankind. There is not, throughout the wide field of Christendom, another bishop who has been more successful in diffusing the blessings of religion and education; and had he no other monuments to bequeath to after times, save those we have alluded to, they would be sufficient to mark him as the most distinguished prelate who has ever worn an Irish mitre. Yet there is another establishment to which we have invited attention at the heading of this brief notice.

Unquestionably, the most splendid Catholic institution of this country is the Abbey of Loretto, near the village of Rathfarnham. The site is not without its sad and dreary recollections, though centred amid scenery so varied and picturesque, that you would vainly seek any more beauteous and lovely. Hereabout, Jones beat false-hearted Ormond, and drove his flying forces to seek temporary shelter in old Drinnagh; and in this immediate locality, did ill-starred Emmet plan that rash movement which brought death to him and an additional rivet to his country's chain. We cannot separate these facts from the history of the locality, for they come athwart our memories as often as we visit the spot. But, kind reader, we would ask you to visit the abbey, just at noontide, when the mellow-toned bell rolls its solemn sound over hill and dale, to remind the husbandman and wayfarer of the great mystery of our redemption. Enter its gate, and see how grandly these towers and turrets lift themselves above the spreading trees and verdant sward, and if you know any thing of Catholic art, ask yourself if you do not fancy that this sacred temple was raised in the ages of faith. Yet you will soon be undeceived—these walls of granite, with their mullioned windows and rich traceries, bear not the marks of age; and a little enquiry will convince you, that the pious lady who, under God, was mainly instrumental in erecting dome and tower, still lives within the convent, and, with God's blessing, shall long continue to be its superioress. We will not here attempt to describe the interior of the abbey church. All that art could do to embellish it, has been done—the choicest sculpture of Italy has prepared an altar for the sacrifice of the New Law, and the chisel of our greatest artist has produced some of his grandest works to adorn the Lord's table. The holy quiet that reigns in that blessed abode—the silent lamp burning before the rich tabernacle, and the fragrant odor of which cloister and sanctuary are redolent, so work upon the senses as to make one forget the world without, and wrap the soul in the enjoyment of that blessed calm which entranced the psalmist as he bent him in the Temple of the Lord. When the venerable superioress shall have furnished the windows of the abbey church with stained glass, brightly storying the life of our blessed Lord, the joys and agonies of our Lady, and the victories of the saints, this must be the most beauteous of Ireland's ecclesiastical monuments. Seen within or without, we have nothing equal to it in any other part of the island; and the entire structure, so perfect in detail, and beautiful to the eye, should serve as a model for the church builder. Seen from the neighbouring mountains, when the setting sun is shedding its last rays upon the charming landscape, which borrows so much of beauty from these castellated towers, fancy itself cannot dream of object more lovely. Oh! but there are associations connected with this abbey-church which are still more pleasing. Beneath its roof, and at its holy altar, many and many a youthful heart has vowed a vow to the Eternal God to serve him, and spread abroad the glory of his name. Many, aye, many tender maidens, renouncing the pleasures of this life, have there consecrated themselves to Christ, and, heroically severing all ties of home and kindred, are now engaged under the burning sun of Calcutta and the snows of Canada, training youth in the practices of virtue, and furnishing their young minds with a knowledge of supernal truths. A few days ago, and the twenty-fifth anniversary of this abbey's institution was celebrated. Within that short time, the venerable superioress has seen sixteen houses of the society established in various quarters. May all her pious labours be amply compensated.

It is almost superfluous to observe, that one of the grand objects of Loretto is to educate young ladies of the wealthier classes; yet it should be known, that the poor are not forgotten by the accomplished community. A large and commodious school adjoins the convent, in which the poor young girls of the neighbourhood are well instructed in all the requirements of their state. Of the education given to the boarders, we deem it almost unnecessary to say a word. Those who have been fortunate enough to meet any of the ladies who were pupils of Loretto, must have seen the effects of early training visibly enough in their mannerism and accomplishments. When it is remembered that their intellectual culture is committed to ladies of study and the highest attainments, nothing short of incapacity could account for dullness or non-proficiency. Were we to judge of the acquirements of all the ladies educated in this great school, by what we witnessed on last St. Cecilia's day, we would be inclined to form the highest notion of their musical powers, not to speak of the other constituents of woman's education. On the day we mentioned, the abbey held a musical academy, in honor of St. Cecilia; and even in Rome we have heard nothing to surpass the thrilling music of the pupils on that occasion. The young ladies assembled in a spacious saloon and delighted the auditory with the richest and most varied music. Harp and piano gave out their sweetest tones, and one highly-cultivated voice sang the compositions of Balfe and Sir John Stevenson with all the correctness and finish of a prima donna. That sweet voice is, we rejoice to say, about being dedicated to God, to sing his praise within the walls of the abbey; and the venerable superioress has good reason to congratulate her community on such an acquisition as Miss Doyle must be to her choir. Where all was excellent, we are almost averse to selecting individuals out of that harmonious group; yet we would be doing ourselves injustice if we did not here bear testimony to the exquisite performance of the Misses Conlan, and Miss Hodgins, of Beaufort. Mr. Caulfield presided at this musical festival, and the great proficiency of his youthful pupils does him the highest honor.

This short and hurried glance at Loretto, is not all that we would wish; yet it needs no words of commendation from us. Its character, as a seminary for young ladies, is known far and near; and the venerable lady who has seen it rising rapidly under her eyes, has done so much for the advancement of our holy religion at home and abroad, that no eulogy of ours could add to her claims on the respect and gratitude of the Irish people. That heaven may long preserve her to us, is amongst the dearest and most cherished of our desires.

A Legend of Ballylebane Castle.

AT Ballylebane, upon the high road leading from Athy to Castlecomer, there stand, or stood a few years ago, the ruins of a small castle belonging to the Hovendens family. Time had not spared it, and little remained to assist conjecture as to its former figure or extent; only a few feet of mouldering wall, or bare foundation, marked the situation of the inner square tower, or keep; while all the outer fortifications, with the exception of a shattered flanking turret, built over a deep draw-well, had entirely disappeared. The local traditions say, that Owen Roe, enraged at the death of a favourite piper, whom the Hovendens shot as he was sitting on top of a baggage-cart, had stormed the castle and reduced it, with dreadful slaughter of its defenders, to this state of desolation; be this as it may, it is certain that, somehow or other, it fell into a ruinous condition, and was deserted by the Hovendens, who pulled most of it down in order to build a dwelling-house upon the site.

The Hovendens are descended from one of those seven adventurers, who obtained such extensive grants of lands in the Queen's County, from Sir Henry Sydney, after the bloody and treacherous massacre at Mullaghmast, in 1577, where the proprietors were nearly all slain. The original founders of these seven tribes, as they have been called, may be taken as the very type of the early English settler in Ireland. Conscious that they were held in utter abhorrence by the native Irish, who still believe that none of their descendants ever lived to see his eldest son attain the age of twenty-one, they maintained a perpetual war with, and oppressed them by every means in their power. All the cruelties that the most diabolical invention could suggest, were hourly perpetrated upon the wretched and unarmed people around—the blood actually freezes with horror at the mere recital of the crimes committed by Cosby, who met his fate from the O'Byrnes, at Glendalough; by Bowen, whom young O'Moore, the sole survivor of Mullaghmast, shot at his castle-gate; or, by Hartpole, whose memory is to this day held in such detestation, that, when his monumental effigy was accidentally found in Carlow, a few years ago, it was dragged through the streets by the populace, and thrown, with every mark of indignity, into a quarry-hole near the present court-house; and, when this generation had passed away, when their descendants could no longer take the lives of the people by the sword, and the English trooper had slowly merged into the Irish landlord, they became grinding rack-renters and heartless exterminators; proud, ignorant, rapacious, and besotted, they plunged headlong into the wildest career of wickedness and dissipation; the Hovendens, then, if they never imitated the others in their earlier barbarities, seemed fully determined upon rivalling them in their latter extravagance. Ballylebane Castle, if we may believe tradition, exhibited an unchanging scene of drunken riotings for years together; acre after acre passed from their hands—frittered away, as well from the demands of their mortgagees as from the expenses of a continuous litigation between whole hosts of spurious claimants to the property (the Hovendens, somehow or other, never having been great admirers of the holy state of matrimony), until at length, they, who once lorded it over all from the Barrow to the Dineen, dwindled down to the impoverished masters of three or four townlands.

Gradually, as the property became more and more subdivided, they deserted Ballylebane, and erected a number of houses with tall, narrow windows and high gable-ends, in various parts of the country. The castle, consequently, fell into ruin, and was held in great disrepute by the country-people generally; as much on account of its lonely situation, and the unholy lives of its former proprietors, as because it was currently believed to be inhabited by several ghosts, and by "the spirit" of one hard-drinking, fox-hunting Hovenden in particular, who was known, in his old age, by the name of Daddy Jack. It is with it in this stage of its existence that we have to do at present.

On a winter's evening, in the year 183—, there was assembled, in Ned Murphy's house, a large circle of his friends and acquaintance, who had met to congratulate with him on the the joyful occasion of the christening of his first son. Ned declared he was the happiest of mortals. The company in general did not appear to labour under any depression of spirits, but seemed bent upon doing ample justice to the good things which, in the exuberance of his joy, he placed before them so plentifully. Ned was, in the eyes of his neighbours, a rich man; he had ten acres of land well tilled and well stocked, his rent was paid to the day, and it was reported that he had money in the bank; he remained a bachelor so long that half the girls of the parish gave him up in despair, when, suddenly he took a trip down the County Carlow, and, after a fortnight's absence, came back a Benedict. He was a round, dapper little fellow, with a roguish, laughter-loving black eye; in perfect keeping with the expression of dry humour perpetually flitting around the corners of his mouth. On this night, however, all was evidently not right; a vague shadow of uneasiness that crosses his face, occasionally, with a furtive glance at the door every now and then, showed that he apprehended some unwelcome visitation. Report stated that he was the most obedient of husbands, in other words, that he was dreadfully henpecked; his wife had the reputation of being a money-maker, or skin-flint, and it was even said that she kept the honest man upon short-commons occasionally. Hence his alarm, for, however improbable, still he dreaded lest she might pay him a visit every moment; when he had matters his own way he had determined "to do the thing dacent for wanse."

Nevertheless, not without some misgivings as to the result, when "the mistress" should come to hear of his extravagance; still he strove to conceal his nervousness, and, with the help of a few stiff dandies of Cassidy's best, partially succeeded.

But whatever anxiety honest Ned might feel, his guests seemed to be no way alarmed as to the consequences of his indiscretion. Never were people better disposed for enjoying themselves; as the glass circulated freely, the laugh, the joke, the quaint burst of humour, and the racy anecdote, showered merrily around. By-and-by, Matty Fahy's appearance with the pipes was greeted uproariously, and the room was immediately cleared up for a dance. Light hearts and glorious strains ye were made for each other! Sure never did mortal piper play so sweetly! never did gay youths and sportive maidens foot it more deftly or more untiring! And, whilst the young, with nimble feet, thus kept time to Matty's soul-stirring music, the old, yielded themselves up to enjoyments more tranquil, but not less dear. Some looked on at the merry dance, now chiding now reproving, kindling now with the contagious spirit of the moment, and enthusiastically beating time to some old favourite air, while ever and again reverting back, with a sweet melancholy, to those long-past, well-remembered times, when, at evening's close, they too were summoned to like festivities by the same delightful strain. But the greater number thronged round the fire, gravely discussing the state of the weather, the last harvest, the stirring politics of the day, and a thousand other such topics. Gradually the conversation takes another turn. The loud hum of many voices is stilled, while all are bending forward in attitudes of eager attention, as they listen to some story or other that Jack Farrell—the greatest shanahus in all Slievemarigue—is telling. Subdued sounds of admiration and astonishment burst forth occasionally—at these times his voice assumes a deeper tone, and his gestures become more energetical.

Jack is a strange character. Originally a gardener, he is now a self-taught mason; and, in the various ramblings, incidental to his new vocation, has cultivated an extensive acquaintance with the old walls, and older traditions of the neighbourhood. He is profoundly skilled in prophecies, and, I believe, entertains no doubt as to the authenticity of them all. He knows as much about records as a college of heralds—it is even reported that he has all the tombstones in the parish by heart. As a proof of his skill in genealogies, he has published his own pedigree, in which, with what justice does not exactly appear, he claims descent from Patrick Sarsfield, the chivalrous Earl of Lucan, and from the O'Moores of Leix. In consequence, he has long since repudiated the vulgar name of Jack Farrell; and, at the time of the late census, was, by his own request, enrolled among the rest of her Majesty's subjects, under the name, style, and title of John Sarsfield Moore O'Ferrall. Nevertheless, I am sorry to state, that this claim of his, however well-founded, is as yet far from being generally acknowledged; while some evil-minded persons, irritated, I suppose, at the results of certain inquisitive propensities, which he occasionally manifests, have strangely perverted it into Sarch-field Farrell.

Now, before introducing him more closely to our readers, it may be as well to premise, that his accuracy as to dates or occurrences is not always unquestionable. His stories, generally indeed, have some foundation in fact; but so much of the marvellous has, in process of time, been mixed up with the reality, that it is now impossible to distinguish between them. Bearing this caution in mind, however, we may now safely return to the chimney-corner, where we left him flourishing away a little while ago.

He had just concluded, in his own felicitous way, what he was pleased to term a historical account of the causes which led to the erection of Cobler's Castle—a nondescript ruin near Stradbally, and was drinking in, with gratified ear, the long murmur of wonder and applause that greeted the peroration—when Larry Doolan exclaimed:

"Why thin, Misther Farrell! its yourself, long life to you, that has a power of fine stories, anyhow! An' talkin' iv these ould, anshient places now, did any iv yiz, boys, ever hear him tell about this one here above in Ballylebane? Lord presarve us! there's a dale iv spirits in it."

Jack shook his head slowly, as he replied: "I often hard th' ould man sayin', that, barrin' the rock ov Dunamase itself, there was no place in the whole counthry to aigual it in the regard iv the quare noises by night. Throth I have stories about that same, that id make the hair stan' on yer heads wid pure fright—stout as many iv yiz think yerselves."

"Lord save us and bless us!" ejaculated Larry, "its they that wor the terrible wicked set, I'm sure. I was often tould that there was athilly no ind to the dhrinkin' an' swearin', an' fox-huntin', an' ballyraggin' iv all soorts, that used to be there. Begor they must have been shockin' rich to hould it out so long."

"Rich," said Jack. "Faix you may say that, alanna! Arrah! did none of yiz ever hear how one iv em kem back from the wars in a grand coach, wid six grey horses, an' the world's ind of goold in the boot? Its he that was the rale divil, too! Nothin' a'most was too hot or heavy for him. Such atin' an' dhrinkin' never was seen as was in his time, an' he was able to use as much as tin himself. Begor he had the right soort iv an appetyite, an' no wondher ayther! Many's the mornin', whin he was out in the wars, an' afther fastin' for three or four days together, maybe, that he'd have to sit down to take his share iv an ould horse, an' be thankful to get that same. Throth I think the hunger iv thim times never left his breast, especially the hardships he wint through at the siege iv Jerusalem. That was the awfulest siege I ever hard tell iv. I believe it happened a couple iv year afther the big frost. Such thunderin' iv cannon, such murder, or such confusion, never was seen afore. He was shut up in the town, while the Frinch peppered away at the walls; but divil the much harm they wor able to do thim, they wor so desperate high an' sthrong! Sum say it was Boney himself that follied thim hot-foot from Agypt, bud I'm iv opinion that it happened long afore his time. Howsumever, Captain Hovenden was shut up inside, an' things soon began to run mighty short. Min, wimmin, an' childher wor famishin' wid hunger, till they wor ready to swally one another a'most. Ev'ry ateable thing was soon gone; an' at last, yiz might see more given for a rot or a mouse maybe, than id' buy a pair iv bullocks here. An' this was how the captain med the money. His company was posted in a great ould barrack iv a place, wid more undherground cellars, an' shores, an' hidin'-places, than wor in all the rest iv the town—an' the whole iv em wor swarmin' wid rots an' mice galore. So he set his thraps, an' inthired into the purvission thrade. As he sowld his marchandize a thrife undher the market price, he soon got wondherful call intirely. All the goold iv Jerusalem, an' the plate, an' the diamonds, wor powrin' in to him like hail, so that he was in a fair way of makin' his forthin all in a slap, whin the guvernor surrendhered, an' he was forced to go home wid his ridgemint.

"Well, my dears, he kem back in the greatest splindhur, as rich as a Jew, an' he held his head a high as any lord. Many said he was to be married to th' Earl of Ossory's daughter; an' so he would too, I believe, only she didn't fancy him much, bekase he was so yallow in the face afther all the varmin he e't at the siege.

The goold was mostly in great long bars, an' I'm tould he med no more of one iv thim nor ov it was a lump iv coal, so that yiz might see 'em lyin' about the castle in all directions. He lived on in great pomp—every one, high an' low, payin' their coort to him, in the hopes iv a thumpin' legacy, for he had nayther chick nor child iv his own. Bud faix, he was able enough for thim all. He knew well what they wor about, an' that it was his money, not himself, they liked; so he hid it about the place everywhere—down in the dhraw-well, an' undher the foundations, an' in every hole an' cranny he could think iv. Thin he run out one mornin' in his shirt, roarin' millia murther, an' cryin' that the whitefeet wor afther robbin' him of every pinny in the world. Begor there was a grate change in his frinds from that minit! He was invited to a grand dinner at Bambrick's iv Maidenhead for that very night, bud whin they hard what happened, they sint him word they wor sorry they couldn't have the pleasure iv his company—Mrs. Bambrick was so bad wid the toothache; an' they cut him dead at church nixt Sunday. A'most every one did the same; so he shut himself up in th' ould castle, an' tuck to atin' an' drinkin' tin times as hard as afore. No livin' man could stan' it long, an' he dhropped down in a fit one mornin' while he was swarin' at the sarvint boy for not havin' his glass ready whin he called for it—so the sayeret died wid himself. All the goold iv Jerusalem, an' all the plate, an' all the dimons, was hid no one knew where; an' no one, barrin' he dhremt about it, ever found a pinny to this day! There's not many, to tell the thruth, id like to go nigh the place afther nightfall; bud I know well that there's a dale iv it down in the draw-well still, for wasn't there a silver spoon found below in Ballynamurrongha well; an' every one iv yiz knows there's an undherground passage between 'em."

"Begor, Misther Farrell," said Larry Doolan, "you're right enough in that. Arrah, boys, look at uz sthrivin' here, in could an' hardship, an' lashions iv goold rottin' away down there, widout as much as one to look at it or pick it up! What's to hinder us uz from makin' it our own?"

"Tut, tut, Larry," replied old Jack Lawlor, "what's the use iv talkin' in that wild way? The never resave the penny iv it nayther you nor any one else 'ill ever handle while Daddy Jack has it undher his thumb. Its a shockin' place for sperrits, the Lord be praised!"

"Faix!" answered Larry, very stoutly, "I wouldn't fear man nor divil, ov I was sure iv the money, an' I think there's more iv uz so, too! What do you say, Misther Farrell?"

"I'm afeard, Larry, that its a bad job. Howsumever, there's no use in talkin', the goold is in it, an' so are the sperrits; bud I often hard it said, that whin nine or tin go together, they don't like to face thim—especially ov all go in stout, lettin' on not to care a thraneen about 'em."

"Well, boys, what 'ill yiz do?" said Larry. "There's enough in it for us all; and if yez wait till mornin', it 'll turn to slates upon us. So don't be fainthearted. Faix, I think, we've all so much iv Misther Murphy's good sperrits inside ov us—an' here's many happy days to himself an' the little one—that we needn't stan' in dhread iv any bad sperrits that may be outside. So sind round the glass, an' let us be off in God's name! Misther Farrell 'ill show huz where to sarch."

Although "Misther Farrell" did not seem to relish the proposal much, still, after privately rummaging the cupboard for some preservative against evil spirits, he gave his consent. Larry's eloquence, or the dread of being esteemed cowards, induced nine or ten others to volunteer, and it was resolved to set out upon the expedition instantly, much to the consternation of old Jack Lawler, who looked upon them as doomed men.

The appearance of the night was certainly not calculated to renew their courage. It was pitchy dark—the rain was falling in torrents, while a bitter cold wind swept furiously along. Larry, however, who was beginning to get rather uproarious, declared this to be just the sort of a night that answered. "For, boys, you see," cried he, "its so mortal dark, that av there was a dozen ghosts right forninst us now, the nuver as much as one iv thim we'd be able to see!" Few seemed to coincide with him in this opinion, but appeared to be silently engaged in calculating the probabilities of Daddy Jack, or some other equally-dreaded "sperrit" being lurking on every bush on the way. A nearer approach to the castle did not tend to allay their fears. Many actually began to meditate on the possibility of effecting their retreat unobserved. Nevertheless, desperation kept them together, and all entered the old court-yard in silence.

Just then, a momentary gleam of moonlight revealed to them the figures of the twelve apostles, carved in stone, which the Hovendens, not for devotional purposes, it may be well presumed, had, at some remote period, built into the wall. This "Misther Ferrall" hailed as a propitious omen. They at once fell to work accordingly, and, under his directions, began to clear away the rubbish from a ruinous archway, leading, as he assured them, to the vaults. One of the company was set to watch, lest any "sperrit" should come on them unawares; and, as every one, under a great appearance of zeal, wished to be as much out of the way of all apparitions as possible. Such mutual objurgations as these might be heard on all sides:

"Purshune to you, Larry! do you mane to throw the wall o' top iv me?"—"Oh, millia murther, Tim Darcy, my leg's just bruck wid you!"—"Misther Farrell, will you see how this vagabone Collier has me just kilt!"

Nevertheless, the breach was at length reported practicable, and "Misther Farrell," not without some internal misgivings as to the preservative powers of the holy-water he had taken with him from Ned Murphy's, entered first, bearing a light in his hand. The aspect of the vault was not very inspiring. It was large and gloomy, with an indescribable feeling of dampness and mouldiness about it—unpleasantly suggestive of the presence of a couple of ghosts at the least. Slowly, therefore, and cautiously they followed, prepared to retreat upon the least noise. There was no gold, however, nor the appearance of any; and "Misther Farrell's" heart sunk within him as he reflected that the spoils of Jerusalem must have been hidden somewhere else. Suddenly, at the further end of the vault, he stumbles upon something. Heavens above! it is a bar—long and thick! and how clearly it rang upon the pavement just now!

Ah, gold! gold! let no one say he cares not for thee, until he has been tempted first! But a moment ago, and he vowed to share treasures untold with his companions—now he dreams only of appropriating this single bar. Mentally he estimates its value, as it lies before him—a thousand pounds at least—and resolves to live like a gentleman for the rest of his days. His own hurried glance alone marked it as yet. How shall he hide it from them for ever? A happy thought strikes him. He lets the light fall, as if accidentally, and while he places the bar in his breast, shouts in an agonized voice—"Oh, Lord presarve us! here's Daddy Jack!"

The word was enough. With a yell of despair, that will long be remembered in Ballylebane, all rushed to the narrow entrance; battling, shrieking, and trampling one another down, like a very incarnation of terror, they forced their way out. Down the steep hill-side, bruised and bloody, they broke away; nor paused till each, at his own fireside, told in breathless haste, how "the sperrit" had chased him; how, as he fled fleetly than the wind, it was agony to feel its fiery breath, growing fiercer every moment, while he dared not look behind; until, at his own door, it vanished in the most approved manner, with a hideous howl, pale blue flames, and a strong sulphureous smell. Next morning a thousand additional terrors were discovered, the fame of Daddy Jack being wondrously increased thereby, until he was universally dreaded by the whole parish as the most formidable 'sperrit' of whose appearance there is any record in ancient or modern time.

To return to our friend, "Misther Farrell." Chuckling over the success of his stratagem, he bent his steps homeward, rejoicing; over the green fields of Coom-beg, and by the pleasant hedge-rows of Castletown, he sauntered along; what delightful visions occupy his soul! Poising the bar in his hand, he ponders whether it will be more advisable for him to purchase an estate or to invest it in the funds; filled with these pleasing cogitations he arrived at his own door. What can have occurred? why this house is positively smaller than when last he saw it, and he registers a vow to exchange his residence on the morrow. Rat-tat-tat-tat! was there ever such a dignified knock as his? did ever a born gentleman pace his drawing-room more gracefully, than John Sarsfield Moore O'Farrell walks up and down, in silent thoughtfulness, upon his cabin-floor? Old Rose can bear it no longer.

"For shame! you ould vagabone, what a time it is for you to be out drinkin' an' gallivantin', disturbin' me from my night's rest, and showin' sich example to the childher!"

"Rose," replied he, pompously, "you should larn to speak more grammatically—your accent is shockin' vulgar, an' I'm afeard that I must get the masher to tache you for a long time, afore I can bring you into any soort iv dacent society! why you'll make a holy show iv me afore the quality."

"Oh! you misfortunate ould man, its blinded wid the dhrink you are, or gone cracked entirely! Boys, will yiz get up, an' help me to put yer father to bed?"

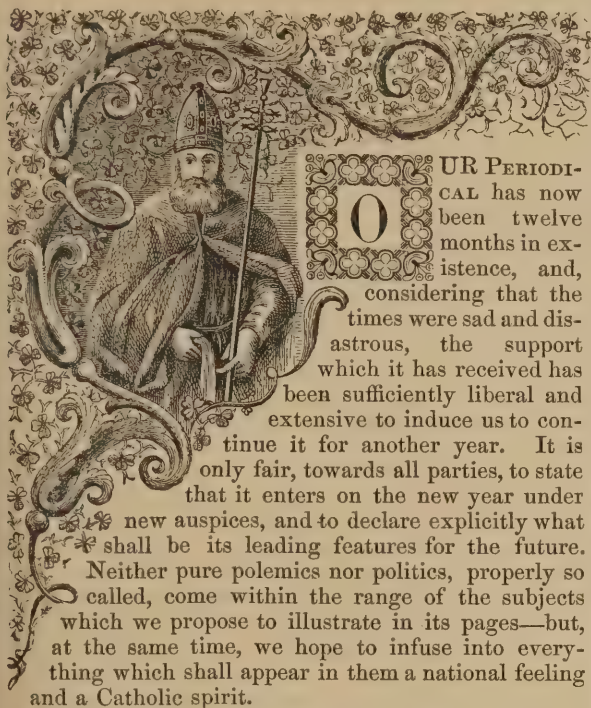

"Whisht woman! an' look at that. Light a rush, an' look at that bar iv goold—feel the weight iv that yer sowl—there's sumthin' to be talkin about!"

"A bar iv goold, morriah!" said Rose, as she took it in her hand, "didnt I know, you ould vagabone, that you wor blinded wid the dhrink—musha, look at what he calls a bar iv goold, a lump iv a rusty ould crowbar."

"Misther Farrell" got a lesson. He has not since alluded to the siege of Jerusalem, though he was heard to say "that the sperrit gave him a shockin' malavoguin' in the vault." Certain it is, that he appeared in public, next day, with his face in a woeful state of delapidation; but we leave it to our readers to determine whether old Rose or Daddy Jack knows the most about it.

Our First New Year's Day.

NEW MANAGEMENT AND NEW PROJECTS.

OUR PERIODICAL has now been twelve months in existence, and, considering that the times were sad and disastrous, the support which it has received has been sufficiently liberal and extensive to induce us to continue it for another year. It is only fair, towards all parties, to state that it enters on the new year under new auspices, and to declare explicitly what shall be its leading features for the future.

Neither pure polemics nor politics, properly so called, come within the range of the subjects which we propose to illustrate in its pages—but, at the same time, we hope to infuse into everything which shall appear in them a national feeling and a Catholic spirit.

There perhaps never existed so great a rage for tales and novels as at the present time; the numbers of them which issue from the press are beyond computation. We have announced, daily, English novels, French novels, German novels, illustrated novels, fashionable novels, and parlour novels, at all prices between three half guineas and three pence, for which we may read one in Punch, along with other interesting matters. If those novels were only the most miserable trash—as they are—if they were only stuffed with the most childish absurdities—which is the staple commodity of their composition—it would be a sad reflection to consider the number of those who cast away almost exclusively on such frivolities the precious time which is given them for the service of God and the benefit of their fellow-creatures. But when we remember that they are almost all filled with irreligion and immorality—and some of them even with downright Atheism, it becomes perfectly frightful to contemplate the effect which the universal circulation of this moral poison must produce on the minds of the rising generation, unless its influence be counteracted by some efficacious antidote. To effect this object by preventing the reading of works of fiction, might, considering the extent to which such writings have been abused, be perfectly legitimate, but it would also prove totally impracticable. The appetite of the mind is as rebellious as that of the body—neither can be satisfied without food, and both will use that which is agreeable to its taste, although it be unwholesome, rather than remain without it altogether. Perhaps we should speak more correctly if we said that the passion for novel-reading becomes like the passion for intoxicating liquors—an inordinate appetite, which will not be satisfied but by inebriation; and that the one is as ruinous to the mind as the other is to the body. Our object, therefore, shall be to change the kind and to moderate the use of works of fiction. The former of these objects we hope to effect by presenting our readers with tales which they may read for their children, in their leisure moments, without meeting with anything which can shock their feelings of religion or of morality; and the latter, by supplying them with other reading, which we hope to make more instructive without being less interesting. Whether we shall succeed in rendering our pages attractive or not, is a matter which we must leave to the decision of time and to the judgment of others; but we can at least promise, that whatever shall appear in the CATHOLIC MAGAZINE shall be animated by the double spirit of love of country and love of religion.

The bye-paths of the history of every country lead to the regions of romance and of poetry. We must not imagine, however, that everything which is romantic is untrue, or that everything which is poetic is unreal. On the contrary, the legend and the song, when rightly understood, are often the most faithful interpreters of history, and have kept it alive in the minds of the people by the charms which they flung around it when it must else have utterly perished. The earliest history of nations has been transmitted in verse. Formerly each chieftain had his bard to record his exploits; and even when this practice ceased, the periods in the annals of each country which have witnessed the most mighty revolutions and the most startling events, have also teemed with song and with legend which have embodied, always, their most interesting and often their most authentic story. They transmit to succeeding generations not only facts but feelings, not only what people did but what they thought, in past ages. There is, most fortunately, no country richer in lore of this kind than Ireland during the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. Every glen, and hill, and mountain—every ivy-clad ruin of church and cloister, and chapel, has its wild but true legend—whilst the sufferings and the piety, the grief and the heroism of the people are expressed in the burning ballad for which the author often paid the penalty of his life and obtained the crown of martyrdom. We purpose to embody the legends—or as many of them as we can collect—in a series of tales, and to translate the songs from time to time, so as to render our countrymen familiar with the feelings, the sufferings, and the virtues of their ancestors during the most sad and eventful periods of our history. For these purposes we have collected a large number of legends and of songs which exist, for the most part, only in the memories of the people, or in some rare Irish manuscripts; and, we need hardly say, that if any of our readers can increase our store, their contributions, particularly in matters of this kind, shall be received with especial gratitude. They are of the utmost value for the illustration of that most neglected but most thrilling period of our history—during which, although we were robbed of everything else, we kept the faith in spite of the most bloody persecutions—and many of them must be irretrievably lost if they be not speedily collected and committed to writing.

We shall not, however, confine our labours to the legends and to the ballads connected with the history of Ireland. We hope to be able to enrich the pages of the CATHOLIC MAGAZINE with rare and authentic documents, which either have not been published, or, at all events, are not generally known. In this particular department a vast deal has been done within the last few years by societies and individuals. But much still remains to be accomplished, and we shall co-operate with those who have already engaged in this great and glorious undertaking to the best of our humble abilities. Our country was, from the beginning of the sixth to the twelfth century, the school of Europe. Almost all the larger monasteries had seminaries attached to them, where not only sacred learning, but the arts and sciences, and the other branches of secular learning were taught, and the kings and bishops of the most enlightened countries in the world thought themselves happy if they could obtain an Irish Monk to instruct themselves and their people. This may appear to be an extravagant assertion, and we shall, therefore, have occasion presently to prove that it is literally true. The character of the Irish scholars who went abroad at once establishes the celebrity of our native schools, in which they were taught, on the testimony of all Europe. What appears most extraordinary is, that the Irish schools and scholars retained their fame during the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries—a period which was characterised by almost incessant domestic wars and by the plunderings of the Danes. The Irish princes, indeed, generally respected the abodes of religion and of learning, and even amid the desolation and fury of war, the peaceful virtues found an asylum in the solitude of the cloister. But the religious houses, and, amongst others, the celebrated monastery of Bangor, were ruthlessly destroyed by the Pagan Danes; yet the virtues and the learning which continued to flourish among the Clergy, in spite of all these obstacles, and which ultimately converted the Danes to Christianity, casts a redeeming glory over this portion of our history. Surely, therefore, any document which can throw additional light upon the history of our monasteries and their schools, and can enable us to see the nature and the extent of the learning which was taught in them, must be interesting to every true-hearted Irishman. Yet, writers of Irish history are, for the most part, so entirely taken up with wars and feuds, that they have scarcely found space to do more than mention the names of those schools whose genuine story would, at least, have relieved the dark picture which the annals of our country, during this period, usually presents to the reader. The glory, however, of the Irish schools is now beginning to be fully appreciated, and a great deal of valuable matter has been published in connexion with this subject within the last few years, of which we shall not fail, ere long, to avail ourselves.

Those Irish schools, as we have already intimated, were the seminaries which sent forth, for many centuries, the apostles and instructors of all Europe. As this assertion has been often disputed, and sometimes ridiculed, we shall bring forward one or two of the innumerable testimonies which we might produce in favour of it. There is scarcely a country in Europe on whose calendar you will not find the names of Irish men amongst its sainted benefactors—nor is there a nation through whose valleys or over whose mountains you can travel without meeting with monasteries or their ruins, or, at least, their memories, which were founded by Irishmen, and which were regarded for centuries as its chief abodes of piety and of learning. Our countrymen had made the name of Irishman as illustrious in the school and in the cloister during the middle ages as they rendered it, in later times, terrible and renowned on the bloodiest battle-fields of Europe; but the peaceful triumphs of the children of St. Patrick are as little known at home as they are universally acknowledged and appreciated in foreign countries. The Abbey of Fulda, in Hesse, which was founded by St. Boniface, a little before the middle of the eighth century, was the most renowned of all the abbeys in Germany. Its abbot was a prince of the empire—its members were required to be of noble birth, and it was subject to the jurisdiction of no one but the Roman Pontiff himself. Yet when it was in the zenith of its glory, its abbots desired nothing so much as to get some Irish Columbian monks, as examples of holiness and as teachers of piety and learning within its walls. "When," writes Christopher Braver, of Richard, Abbot of Fulda (apud Bollandistas, 9 Juni, in vita B. Mariani), "he knew that certain strange monks, who had come to Germany, were Irish Benedictines, he endeavoured, in order to banish sloth from the minds of his people, and to inflame them by examples of virtue, to bring many of these Scottish monks to Fulda, in order that, by their earnest application to holiness of life and to learning, he might revive the ancient piety and erudition of his monastery."* . . . "Even the very abbesses," say the Bollandists (ubi supra), writing of the eleventh century, "gave them (the Irish monks) cells and monasteries, that, by their learning and example, they and their people might be instructed in piety. For these purposes many monasteries were built in various places by the Irish.†" They then enumerate some of them, and quote the exhortations of bishops and the diplomas of kings, addressed to Irish monks for the purpose of inducing them to remain amongst their people, as mirrors of piety and masters of all kinds of learning. The celebrated Gretser, who was one of the most learned writers of the sixteenth century, says (lib. 1, observationum de SS. est etten-sibus, cap. 19, apud Bolland. 9, Junii), that "the reason why monasteries were built for the Irish in various places, was the gratitude of the Germans towards their benefactors."‡ Aventinus had written thus (lib. 6, Annalium Boiorum) in the previous century—"Ireland is an island, which is situated in the ocean, to the north of Britain. . . . That Ireland, of which I speak, has been the prolific parent of most religious and most learned sages amongst our ancestors. Thence Columbanus, Kilianus, and most others, migrated into Germany. They are now called Scots. Thence came the divine Marianus with his disciples. . . . By their obedience to the most strict religious discipline, by their arduous observance of chastity—by writing and by teaching, they acquired for themselves the greatest glory. They were a great and conspicuous example of piety, not only to the Boii but also to the neighbouring nations. They pleased all persons, and all, with one accord, predicted all good things of them."§

Such is the estimation, for learning and piety, in which foreign nations held the Irish missionaries during the middle ages. We could produce innumerable testimonies concerning the labours of Aidan in England, of Fiacre and Fursey in France, of Columbanus in Italy and elsewhere, and of innumerable others who were regarded as the chief lights of their age. Nor did they degenerate in later times; for one of the masters of St. Thomas Aquinas was an Irishman, and John Duns Scotus, to whom we hope shortly to establish our claim, was able to rival the fame of that most illustrious saint, and to share with him the empire of the schools. The early celebrity which our country had acquired for piety and learning, on the Continent, was ably sustained during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. We are anxious to claim these illustrious exiles, who are allied to us by blood and by affection, and to introduce them to their countrymen, to whom they have so long remained strangers. This is almost a virgin field, which we cannot hope, unaided, to cultivate properly. But we expect to direct the enquiries of our countrymen to this subject, which must be most interesting to them as Christians and as Irishmen.

We shall shortly return to this matter, and show how affectionately these illustrious men remembered, and how devotedly they loved, their native land, no matter how long they had been exiled from its shores. But we shall not allow this, or any other subject, to monopolize the pages of the CATHOLIC MAGAZINE. On the contrary, we hope to render its matter varied and interesting. Every new publication of merit, and more especially if connected with Ireland, shall receive an early notice. Literature and the Fine Arts shall not be neglected; and thus we hope to fulfil the old precept—of mixing the gay with the grave, and the sweet with the useful. If we shall effect this, we shall have done something for the interests of our dear native land; and if we fail, we can apply to ourselves what was said of no less a person than Phæton, when he fell from the sun's chariot—

Hic situs est Phæton currus auriga paterni,

Irish Missions and Missionaries.

NO. I.

"Quid memorem Hiberniam," cries Eric of Auxerre, ten centuries ago, while contemplating the numbers and enthusiasm of the Irish missionaries, "contempto pelagi discrimine pene tota cum grege philosophorum ad littora nostra migrantem?" The same destiny seems still to belong to Ireland. Change the marshes of Germany for the bush of New Holland; the Rhine and the Danube for the Ohio and the Mississippi; change the hills and plains of France, Switzerland, and Britain for those of India, Australia, and America, and many lands will echo in 1848 the language of trionali cubat . . . ea de qua loquor Hibernia apud majores nostros fecunda religiosissimorum doctissimorumque vatam fuit. Inde Columbanus, Chilianus, et plerique alii in Germaniam migrarunt. Scotos nunc unneupant. Inde dives Marianus cum sex condiscipulis . . . Difficilioris religionis obsequio, castimoniarum observantia satis ardua, scribendo, docendo, maximam sibi gloriam conquirunt. Spectatum satis magnum exemplar pietatis non solum Boiis sed et finitimis erant. Omnibus placebant, uno ore omnes omnia bona de ipsis dicebant.

France a thousand years since—"What shall we say of Ireland, that, contemning the dangers of the deep, comes hither with nearly a whole train of teachers?"

And, truly, there is something gratifying and mysterious in this segregation of Ireland "for the work of the ministry." As soon as we became followers of the faith we became its apostles. We received it without opposition, and preached it at every sacrifice. Proud of the security in which we enshrined it at home, we went forth into the wide world to develop its beauties and to gather votaries around its shrines. The country and hope of our fathers seems to have been, where the cross could be reared and a soul snatched from error. We need not refer to the inflexible Columbanus, who closed his wonderful life among the Appenines; the patron of Franconia, who died at the altar's feet; Livian, whose prophetic spirit sang the funeral dirge of his own martyrdom; Caidoc, Fiacre, Furza, and the countless others whose scholarship was the glory of the continental schools, while their virtues were a light in the sanctuary. There seems, in the number and devotedness, and, indeed, in the capacities of the men, compared with the time, that especial destination which the missionaries of our own times so characteristically perpetuate.

Here may be traced, at least, one fortunate result of the connexion between England and this country.—The great apostacy of the sixteenth century snatched from the empire of truth everything west of the Alps unless the soul of Ireland. Naturally, error endeavoured to make its victims become agents; and the power, riches, and influence of Britain were exercised to enlarge the domain of heresy. New lands were acquired, new peoples were subjugated. Millions of human souls were exposed to the indoctrinations of falsehood—the germs of new nations were about to be planted with the poison of error at their stems. Had Ireland not been a nominal sharer in the political advancements of her mistress, it is probable, humanly speaking, that heresy would have succeeded. Nay, had she not shared her fortunes, her language, and alas! necessarily, her excesses, the scene of action would have been entirely abandoned to the inheritors of Henry's passion and injustice. But, as it was, we have reason to thank God, Ireland has been pursuing her ancient vocation. Wherever Anglican arms conquered a kingdom, or Anglican policy won one, Irish faith ever stood by. When the battle had passed, and ambition called in false religion to guard the supremacy of the victor, the "children of the saints" proclaimed a new warfare. The forces of truth and immortal mind arranged themselves for a fresh conflict. And unto this day, by the rivers of India, and the woods and lakes of America, in the wilds of Australia, and at the Chinese wall, this battle is still being fought; and through them all, the might of Ireland's confessors is victorious. Looking at eternity, is there not much in this good to countervail the endurance of centuries, and light to read the characters of the Almighty's dispensations to this land?

Our dependence upon England—our poverty, numbers, and the laws which govern us, all tend to the "propagation of the Faith." Were property more equally distributed, or were its rights more wisely regulated and protected—were the laws everything that patriotic intelligence and unselfish legislation could wish them—it is said that many additional millions could live on the green hills and fertile plains of Ireland—we need hardly say that Irishmen would live on them too. We have met Irishmen, and men of every other country, in lands to which all were strangers, but we rarely knew any man's heart continue a stranger, unless he were a fellow-countryman. All the Irishman's thoughts turned homeward—all his hopes had treasured up their crown at home—at home beyond the sea. Where, then, would be the churches which the Irish people are raising through the overgrown empire of Great Britain—from the Himalah to the sea—from Hudson to Florida? Where would be the great Catholic nations which they are raising up? The Irish habits preach—the Irish morals preach—Irish affection, fidelity, justice, all the virtues of our people's character preach. We have attested facts of hundreds whose conversion to truth was occasioned by the example of the simple maiden who wrought at their side, or the honest labourer to whom they paid a dollar for hire. One of the greatest living philosophers, and the very greatest in America, Brownson, once the inventor of a new religion, recently the humble disciple of the old one, says, on this subject:

We, as a people, owe much to Ireland. She has given us a large portion of our population, many of our best citizens, of the firmest, bravest, and most enlightened friends and defenders of our republican institutions. She has, also, done more; she has contributed more than any other one nation to introduce and build up among us the Catholic Church. For this, as little as the mass of our countrymen may esteem it, we owe her an immense debt of gratitude—greater than we shall ever be able to pay; for to the existence and prevalence of the Catholic Church among us shall we be ultimately indebted for the preservation of our free institutions, and their success in working out the happiness of the people.—Brownson's Review.

We have frequently thought that a sufficiency has not been done to commemorate the labours and to illustrate the character of our great missionaries. Some have risen above the whole earth, and compelled men to behold them by the glorious light they have emitted and the powerful influence which they wielded.—Others, like the celebrated saint of Ponthieu, have moved along, haloed by the affections of millions of strangers, but unheeded or forgotten by their country, until they closed their eyes in the sleep of faith. And very many able, saintly, nay, wonderful men, have gone down to their obscure graves, the memory of one generation or two being all that could add a word to the inscription on their head-stone. This should not be. Our brethren on the missions owe it to the solitudes—the interests—the religion—the affections of home, that Ireland shall know everything of the "Irish Missions and Missionaries;" and our PERIODICAL will feel it a grateful duty to distribute information for which we know the public mind is peculiarly anxious. Fortunately, accidental circumstances, have already placed a considerable share at our disposal. We shall introduce it, as opportunity may serve, to render it useful; and we are much surprised if it shall not tend to nurture that missionary spirit which so strikingly distinguishes our people, as well as console those aged, and sometimes sorrowing friends, who found even the high calling of those whom they loved, almost insufficient to soothe the pang of separation.

It is true we cannot pretend to write about every Irish missionary, nor every Irish mission—for this, among many reasons, that such a thing would be quite impossible. But the great characteristics of the missions, and, as frequently as practicable, the leading characters among the missionaries might, we are assured, afford valuable and edifying information.

It is quite inconceivable to those "at home" how thoroughly Catholicity and Ireland are identified, in the minds of strangers, on many of our "foreign missions." We have always viewed the supposed identification as a great compliment; though sometimes, we will confess, the mode of enunciating it was not the most satisfactory to our vanity. We remember, on one occasion, an honourable lady, who lived in a locality to which an influx of labourers was necessary and continuous, and who, therefore, was familiar with straw hats, bright blue eyes, knee-breeches, and shirt sleeves. The lady met a missionary friend of ours. She seemed very thoughtful.

"Pray, Sir," cried she, after a while, "pray, Sir, are all Roman Catholics poor—and labourers?"

"Madam?" said our friend.

"Pray, Sir, are all Catholics men with bad clothes?"

"Oh fie," said her husband, who just came up, "have you not read the geography of Italy?"

The lady blushed and departed. The gentleman—and he was a true one—apologized.

We were much more self-complacent at the instance which came to our knowledge, in which a Yorkshireman, being badgered by a fellow-countryman, because, on his death-bed, he had sent for a priest, said he did so because he was d—— but héd die an Irishman!

In speaking of the Missions, we reasonably first direct our attention to that of America. Infinite in variety, absorbingly interesting, indefinite in its demand for the enthusiastic charity of Ireland, and encircling in its giant arms so many a hearty son of our soil—America must be beyond all competition the most worthy of deep attention. It is already the native soil of some generations of Irish by descent; and the aspiration of many a thousand hearts is, to be making pilgrimage, with its majestic rivers, into the beautiful world of its wilderness. No wonder, in truth, for it is only duty or necessity, now-a-days, binds men to our hapless country.

Yet our people should pause, and weigh well, before they leave home, both their hopes and their means of realising them. No man should seek that universe without defined ends. In better times, we have known stout labour, and some intelligence, sent back to Ireland by public charity. Time was first misspent—then were lost the means and energy which would have made it valuable—then nothing remained but a poor-house or Ireland—perhaps we should say, an Irish poor-house.

It is hard to condemn that which, very often, arises from the intensely religious feeling with which the poor Irishman grows. His means of subsistence are jeopardised at the very beginning; and we have known his hard savings sacrificed at the end of an enduring career, because he would not and could not efface the impressions which his early education had made. He will not leave the cities, because he cannot have his mass and his instruction for the country. He will abandon the fruits of countless toils and long years, in the rural districts, because he fears sickness, and he has no security that he shall have a Minister of Religion by his bedside. The indifferentist or the sectarian has the first place, in the race of competition, in the interior. Either will become the easy purchaser of the poor Catholic's hardly-attained property, when age and anxiety begin to oppress his soul. In the first case, he will remain in the large towns until labour becomes depreciated by the accession of members. In the second, having sold his little farm, he will expend every thing in some business of which he knows little, and into which the avarice of others inveigles him for his ruin. In both cases he is generally pauperised; and, with bending body but resigned soul, going along the streets, the creatures who cannot value and will oppress him, sneer at "these wretched Irish!" We speak no imaginary story—no picture is painted to adorn a page; we know the things which we state to be facts of continued occurrence, and have often almost wept at the self-immolation and glorious faith which they manifested. The noblest charity and philanthropy—if they be distinguishable—are those which send to the exiled people of Ireland the security which will give activity to the emigrants at their landing—permanency to them on their location—and the fortune and virtue of sober and persevering industry. It is hard to require—is it religious?—that a Christian being, holding the necessity of regeneration and the efficacy of the other sacraments, should sink himself into a wilderness and allow his children to grow up around him unbaptized—uninstructed—the creatures of passion and the victims of intercourse which he cannot suspend.

We may add, that the revenues of Protestantism in our colonies—and of the colonies we now principally speak—enable small congregations to accommodate themselves with churches and missionaries. The poor emigrant is thus placed in a frightful contrast with all who surround him; his scruples are not comprehended, because they are never felt by the sectarians—he is judged to be a barbarian, and his children have to bear the laugh and jeer of their equals in years and position. Time rolls on, the outlines of faith, deep in the old people, are, perhaps, shadowy in the young; many sad fathers have lived to see their children blaspheme the creed which embraced them at their birth and which poured its benisons upon their cradles.

Is it wonderful that the emigrant flies everything—even into the arms of death, to save himself and his progeny from this desolation?

We hope and pray that Heaven and the Irish people may make the Missionary College of ALL HALLOWS prosper. It is the hope of many a warm heart.*

* We feel a deep gratification in publishing the following extract, so honorable to the Archbishop of Australia, to ALL HALLOWS, and to Ireland. The letter is from an Australian Missionary, who, this time twelve months, left the Missionary College for the purpose of devoting himself to the good of man, in "the work to which he was assumed." Of course we shall hereafter refer extensively to this mission, and to the valuable communication from which we quote. The letter is dated 10th of May, 1847.

"Often, since I came, did I see fourteen or fifteen priests here for days together. The good old times, when the bishop's house used to be the "hospitum," are still kept up among the Benedictines. No matter from what part of the diocese a priest comes to Sydney, Dr. Polding's house is his inn, night and day, while he remains. There are now under Dr. Polding's own immediate jurisdiction (not including any of the suffragan clergy), thirty-six priests. Of these, one is a Scotchman, one a German, one a Belgian, one a Frenchman, three Englishmen, and, shall I mention it—O yes, for I am proud of it—TWENTY-NINE IRISHMEN. O glorious Ireland! O faithful Ireland! How have you cherished amongst all the nations of the earth the faith of St. Patrick?—the faith once delivered to the saints! How you may exclaim:

Quæ regis in terris nostri non plena laboris.

Yes, for I am sure that your missionaries are not only to be found in every missionary country on the face of the globe, but that they everywhere bear almost the same proportion to those of other countries which they do in Australia. Can not I count the companions of my own studies—all of us the alumni of an INSTITUTION, not yet five years in existence, spread over the five divisions of the globe? Yes, they are to be found in America—from Demerara to Nova Scotia; they are in Europe and Africa—from Scotland to the Cape of Good Hope; in Asia—from Madras to Calcutta; throughout the burning plains of India, and to the far-distant Australia. Often

While on this part of the subject, we may say, that there is a portion of missionary duty, not frequent, to be sure, but terribly destroying, which would be worthy the attention of our venerated Priesthood.

The most awful revealings of human woe that this earth can make, are on board emigrant vessels stricken with fever. It sometimes may happen that a few are spared. The charity of the healthful may then lessen the horrors of the dark plague. But, when, as often happens, every human being on board, unless a sailor and perhaps one or two officers, are lying down, imagination cannot picture—memory recoils from the frightful reality. Look along the hold of a large vessel. On the bare boards by dozens—on old boxes—in hammocks—coiled up in corners, surrounded by rotten beds—age, sex, and condition promiscuously huddled together—suffocating for want of air—mad with fever thirst—shrieking—cursing—singing in wild glee—their eyes glaring in a stray ray of the light—and their moans issuing forth from the darkness. Oh, such an hour to meet them! such an hour for a priest to prepare them!—and for them to die!—The parish clergymen who would warn their flocks to prepare before their departure, would perform a work of great merit, because of deep charity.

We knew a case once. The ship had been dismasted, and put into harbour for repair. The clergyman, a missionary, was called from the altar, immediately after last mass, about one o'clock. 'Twas a hot, July day—life and health were feverish. The clergyman went about a mile to the place at which the wrecked vessel lay. She was silent. No strangers' curiosity led them to enquire her destination or her fortune. Her story was told in the confusion and filth of her deck, in her broken masts and torn sheets, and in the groans from below. The clergyman ascended her side—entered her dark hold: spare us—they swung by his head—they crowded round his feet—he saw little, but what he did see was ghastly—shocking. Women, children, men, sailors, all were moaning with pain.

A poor fellow was just at the foot of the ladder; he wore half-boots, a jacket, light trowsers; his bed was the bare bottom of the ship. No matter for the story, a thousand times told. The man had finished his confession—the "amen" of the concluding prayer was just falling from the lips of the priest—"Hullo! tally, tally—ho! ho!" shrieked the victim. He had gone mad. God have mercy on him: he died, we believe, before the confessor left the ship. Next came mothers and young girls—they missed home and kind words, and kind looks, and gentle voices. Many a tear, hotter than the fever-cheek, flowed down, as they recalled the quiet country chapel, and thought of the priest whose stole they last had seen. One young girl wrote to me, Rev. Dear Sir, and let me know every particular about ALL HALLOWS. It is a glorious Institution—it will ever be dear to memory, not only on account of my own success therein, but on account of advantages which it pours upon religion in general. I judge from the testimony of persons who studied in France, in Rome, in America, and other places, that there is not in the world an institution more eminently calculated to promote the interest of the foreign mission. I repeat it; let any person, after mature consideration, after deep reflection on its benefits, and on all the directions through which they flow, and will flow for ever (for I trust its missionaries will "bring forth fruit that will remain"), point out another institution capable of doing more good than ALL HALLOWS, or even did so much in so short a time. I know from my own experience, that nowhere could there be more laborious teaching, more regular, diligent, and patient study; nowhere could superiors be more attentive to the interests of students, when with them, nor follow them with kindlier wishes when they leave them."

was quite alone—she made her peace, and lies in a stranger's grave. There were one or two sailor-boys—runaways—they had made parents weep; but even stern moralists would drop a tear at the soft hearts of the despairing penitents. How deep the love of the mother sinks—any name the young fellows could hear pronounced but "mother." That was lost in their sobbings. We hope that, after the frightful scenes in Canada, and the utter hopelessness of a fitting preparation, in the circumstances to which such scenes give occasion, that emigrants will never leave this country unprepared for the worst results of a voyage to America.

Take them all in all, we believe the best Catholics in our North American Colonies to be the Indians. We use the term of comparison, of course, principally to express their great fidelity to the ritual, and their scrupulous observance of the law "de communione cum Hæreticis." They are a most surprising race. No quantity of acquaintance with them can lessen your admiration of their quiet dignity, their unassailable solemnity, and their self-possessed conviction that they are in every thing quite "sartin." An Indian woman will carry her Papouse (infant) two hundred miles, and walk every inch of the road, in order to have her offspring baptized; and we have little doubt that she would travel—or any Indian—six or seven miles to the holy sacrifice, sooner than expose herself to the violation of the first precept of the church. It is melancholy that the early Missionaries of the North American Indians—at least many of them—have escaped the watchfulness of history. Their names would be a treasure in the heart of faith; for wonderful men they must have been to mould so thoroughly the moral being of the savage.

Few of our missionaries now understand the languages of the tribes. The Indians themselves are, we really think, too proud ever to learn the language of their conquerors. They must be preserved to religion by the agency of their own exquisite bird-like mode of communication. We hope sincerely that an effort will be made by the clergy now growing up, to emulate those "mighty men of old," "whose memory is in benediction," and who have absolutely trodden down impossibilities in their progress to the ends of their profession.

If the reader wishes to hear the Gregorian chant in perfection, he must seek and hear an Indian choir. Journey along to an Indian camp—you will find it near some calm lake, that reflects the forms of a thousand lordly trees—generally on some rising ground, or rising grounds, and picturesquely looking down upon the waters, or closing a long vista from the public way, you will espy the wigwams. If it be Sunday, come about eleven o'clock—the Indian is true to the time when his "Fader" said Mass in the camp, "long time ago." And now listen! Hear the "Asperges!" Have you ever heard anything like that single treble? How delicious! Mark how the others fall in—one, a second, a third, a fourth, all! Listen to that swell—growing—rising—filling everything up to heaven's gate! Is it not glorious? And now mark how they fall away. Hush! was there ever such a—what do you call the Italian term? No—the Italians have no term for such a thing—that is the old, sublime Gregorian chant.

We shall, in a future paper, enter more largely into the Indian character, religious and social. We feel, that for an introductory article, we have said quite sufficient for ourselves—perhaps a little more than enough for our readers.

Let us close by the following—rather a strange scene which illustrates itself—

A landed proprietor complained to a clergyman, a friend of ours, that the Indians tore the bark off his young trees—a thing which was useless to them, and highly injurious to his property. The clergyman accompanied him to the ground, where, sure enough, an old Indian and a young scoundrel were working might and main, hacking, stripping, and ruining. Each had a tomahawk, the old man had a rifle.

"In the name of heaven," said the proprietor, "why destroy my trees? Look at that young —. I say, Thomas, why does your boy cut off this bark?"

"I s'pose your boy 'muse himself. Well, my boy 'muse himself."

"But that is my property."

"No—God made 'm tree for Indian boy as well as your'n."

"Fellow, I bought that tree."

"God no' sell you?"

"Government sold me the tree, you Indian scamp; you rascal."

"Government can no sell you Indian's tree," replied the imperturbable Thomas.

The Indian cocked his gun very, very calmly. The proprietor started and looked at the clergyman.

"Oh, Tom!" said the priest, "you do an injury to this man. You do yourself no good. The law, which protects Indian—which Indian is bound to obey—gives this man the land. You are wrong, Tom; the bark should not be touched."

"Very well, fader," replied the man of the woods; and he walked away, accompanied by his boy.

And here we close for the present.

The Protector.

[By M. D'AUBIGNE. Oliver and Boyd, Edinburgh, 1847.]

It rarely happens that we rise from the perusal of the works of an intelligent foreigner, on the affairs of our own country, without having some of our ideas remodelled, and familiar facts placed in a novel light. Unbiased by national prejudices, he states facts as he finds them; and though his blunders may amuse, he is always read with fruit, if he has not borrowed from others, but has made personal acquaintance with the original authorities or the facts themselves. Such was the work of M. Beaumont on Ireland, such is not the work of Monsieur Merle D'Aubigne, unless we believe that Cromwell was the greatest benefactor that heaven ever sent to our shores.

"Cromwell," saith our author, "was familiar with that beautiful passage of Scripture: 'If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.' What are his directions to his son for that unhappy Ireland, where the most obstinate enemies of the commonwealth still existed?—Patience, moderation, and love, even towards those who entertain the contrary sentiments against him. Such is the law he imposes on his representative. No hatred, no revenge! On the contrary, let him strive to win their hearts. Since the time when Christianity first announced these great principles to the world, the governments of the earth have rarely been found to put them in practice as the Protector did."—p. 243.

M. D'Aubigne has received the degree of Doctor of Divinity in two worlds: from the University of Berlin, and the College of Princetown, United States; but if his acquaintance with Irish affairs were equal to his theological knowledge of the sin of blasphemy, he would not have hazarded an eulogy on Cromwell's practice of the "great principles of Christianity" in Ireland. The security of the rights of property, and of the rights of innocence hold a high place among the "great principles of Christianity;" you will search for them in vain in Cromwell's act of settlement, which in one line declares all Irish Catholics guilty who were worth more than £10. All Catholics possessed of more than £10 were condemned to forfeit one-third of their estates, and to be transplanted to Connaught, though they had taken no part whatever in any of the wars from 1641 to 1650. The act, correctly copied from the original, by Dr. Lingard, is found in the appendix to his history, vol. x.

"That all and every person and persons of the Popish religion who have resided in Ireland at any time from Oct. 1st, 1641, to March 1st, 1650, and have not manifested their constant good affection to the interest of the commonwealth of England, shall forfeit one third part of their estates in Ireland, to be disposed of for the use, benefit, and advantage of the said commonwealth; and the other two third-parts of their respective estates or lands, to the proportion or value thereof, to be assigned in such place in Ireland as the parliament shall think fit."

This was the sentence against those who had taken no part, at any time, against the commonwealth of England.

And what was their number? On the unexceptionable authority of Sir William Petty, it appears that "The number of landed Irish Papists, or freeholders before the wars, was about 3,000; whereof, as appears by 800 judgments of the court of claims, which sat in 1663, there were not above a seventh part, or 400, guilty of the rebellion."—Pol. Anat. p. 316. Thus 2,600 innocent men were robbed of one-third of their property, and driven from their fathers' homes by Cromwell's "great principle of Christianity." Happy for Irish landlords that Merle D'Aubigne is not prime minister of England. One-third of their estates could be at once justly applied for the good of this poor commonwealth of Ireland.

M. D'Aubigne, however, has made a very great discovery, that this transplantation of innocent men was no great evil, as Connaught was at that time a blooming paradise. No Catholic, it is true, dare go within a mile of the Shannon, or the sea, or into any garrison or town, but the interior of the province more than supplied all their wants and luxuries!

"Historians," he says, "even those most opposed to Cromwell, acknowledge that no statesman ever did so much as he for the good of the poor country. Public order and security, such as had not been known for many years, revived. The province of Connaught, then a vast, desert district, was soon changed into a fruitful country, and the rest of Ireland was everywhere cultivated with activity and confidence. In the space of little more than ten years the whole kingdom was covered with elegant and useful buildings, fine plantations, and new enclosures. Peace, ease, and industry had returned to that unhappy land. Clarendon, and M. Villemain, after him, cannot conceal their astonishment at it, and there is no impropriety in applying the rule of Scripture to Cromwell's conquest of Ireland—the tree is known by its fruits."

Be it so; let the tree be known by its fruit, though it is difficult to enter seriously on a refutation of this poetry. The value of land is not a bad index of national confidence and prosperity. Under the strong and happy government of Cromwell the price of land and all fixed property should have risen enormously, but what are the facts, founded on the evidence of one who had shared Cromwell's fortunes, and must have been best qualified to appreciate its profitable results!

"In the year 1653," says Sir William Petty—that is when Cromwell ruled supreme in Ireland—"debentures were freely and openly sold for 4s. and 5s. per lb; and 20s. of debenture, one place with another, did purchase ten acres of land; at which rate all the land of Ireland, if it were eight millions of profitable acres, might have been had for one million of money, which in 1641 was worth about eight millions."—Pol. Anat., p. 314.

The houses of Ireland in 1641 were worth two millions and a-half, but in 1652 not worth a fifth of the same—p. 315.

The adventurers after being ten years out of their principal money, sold their debentures for under 10s. per pound, in 1652, in open and free market.

But perhaps a new spirit came over the adventurers, enabling them in ten short years to raise Ireland beyond what she had ever been. Alas! figures once more dispel the delusion. In 1676, Sir William Petty computes the value of all the lands in Ireland at £9,000,000; the houses of Ireland at £2,500,000—p. 378. That is, it required seventeen years' peace after Cromwell's death, to raise houses and lands in Ireland to the value they had in 1641.

Such being the case over all Ireland, what are we to think of D'Aubigne's picture of Connaught two short years after the conquest? The transplanted Irish were compelled to support seventy garrisons in that province alone; they had not one good house, nor money to build it. "The province was well stored with trees in most parts, and with great woods and forests in Mayo and Sligo."—Boate, p. 68. But these plantations existed before Cromwell set his foot in Ireland.

There is another vulgar element of national prosperity, though unfortunately never regarded by the rulers of Ireland—namely, the comfort of the great mass of the inhabitants. The population of Ireland in 1672 was 1,100,000; of whom 800,000 were Irish Papists, "whereof near 700,000 do live in wretched cabins without chimney or window."—Pol. Anat., p. 327. "The said 1,100,000 live in about 200,000 families, or houses, whereof there are but about 16,000 which have more than one chimney in each, and about 24,000 which have but one; all the other houses, being 160,000, are wretched, nasty cabins, without chimney, window, or door-shut, even worse than those of the savage Americans, and wholly unfit for the making merchantable butter, cheese, or the manufacture of woollen, leather, or linen."—p. 379. This is the calm statement of an official report presented to the Lord Lieutenant, in 1676, twenty-six years after Cromwell had renewed the face of Ireland. If M. D'Aubigne had formed his estimate of Irish prosperity in one of those sooty huts, and not in his Genevese villa, from the poetic pages of Mr. Carlyle, we should have heard nothing of "elegant and useful buildings erected in ten years through the whole kingdom," unless said buildings helped the sale of his book.

But extending the principle, "the tree shall be known by its fruits," to the effects of Cromwell's policy, which continued with little intermission during 130 years, and are not yet removed, what a host of avenging spirits rise up in judgment against him! Before his day the Catholics had suffered, but their clergy, which were generally taken from the gentry, always found a refuge in the mansions, or on the estates of their friends, who were at the time one-half of the gentry of Ireland. He expelled all from the towns, and robbed of their property 2,600 innocent proprietors. No pope, no property for the Papist, this was the gospel he preached—the germ and essence of all these penal laws which by a gradual process of refined political wisdom at last announced judicially in the face of facts—“that, by legal construction, there was no Papist in Ireland.” The effects of that policy, as developed in the eighteenth century, are still felt by the country.

“The close of the seventeenth century was the commencement of the penal code; that was the age in which a law passed in England to deprive Ireland of her trade, to prohibit in Ireland the export of her woollen trade; that was the age in which a law passed in England to subject the Irish, concerned in that export, to be taken from Ireland, and tried, fined, and confined in England; that was the age in which a bill passed to deprive the Irish lords of their jurisdiction, and to establish the power of the British parliament to make laws for Ireland. See the effect of this policy on her fortunes. About 1779, the people and the government were both ruined—a nation possessed of about seventeen millions of acres, a temperate climate, a fertile soil, without the visitation of plague, pestilence, or famine, and without any misery in the country except her laws, precipitated in immediate ruin! Such were the effects of the penal code, and its concomitants, or rather such were the judgments of God on the land that had passed such a code—judgments inflicted by her Maker, and declared by her parliament. So connected were the penal laws and the poverty, the crime and the punishment, that it did not seem to be a series of cause and effect, but a superior power standing in the island, visible, inflicting with its lash, and exhorting with its bounty—and suggesting, by the indelible lessons of woe and weal, to my country how to get her liberty, and yours how to secure her empire.”

The code thus denounced by Grattan was the Cromwellian policy in Ireland, as surely as M. D'Aubigne is but a poor plagiarist of Carlyle.

We do not deny the great genius of Cromwell, nor the lustre shed by his victories on the arms of England. His portrait, sketched by the master-hand of Bossuet, exhibits him as a refined hypocrite and profound politician, indefatigable in peace and war, who never left anything to fortune, if he could wrest it from her by prudence or foresight, never lost any of the opportunities she presented to him; in a word, one of those aspiring and impetuous spirits that seem born to change the face of the world. Yet, if his Irish policy be viewed calmly as an imperial measure, the plantation of Ulster by James has been after all a more powerful link of British union than all the conquests of Cromwell. That act of James I. brought back to their old seats a sturdy race who, in 1833, and 1843, prevented the restoration of the Irish parliament. Compare now the parliamentary representation of Ulster with that of the other three provinces, and judge whether the glory of securing Ireland as the perpetual handmaid of England belongs to Cromwell or to James. Could England resist the unanimous vote of the Irish representatives?

The charge of Cromwell's hypocrisy is repelled indignantly by M. D'Aubigne:

“It was not as a statesman, or a warrior, but as a Christian hero, a Protestant Hildebrand that his name shall descend to the remotest posterity. ‘I call God to witness,’ says Cromwell to a foreign Protestant prince, ‘that I desire nothing so much as an opportunity to answer the favourable opinion the churches have of my zeal and piety by endeavouring to propagate the true faith, and procure rest and peace for the church. Hold firm to the orthodox faith which you have received from your fathers, nothing will bring you greater glory than to protect it as much as lies in your power.’—p. 291. Again, addressing the Irish bishops assembled at Clonmacnoise, ‘you cannot feed your flock, you poison them with your false, abominable, and anti-Christian doctrine and practises. You keep the word of God from them, and instead thereof give them your senseless orders and traditions. You teach them implicit belief. Thus are your flocks fed: but they must take heed of losing their religion. Alas! poor creatures, what have they to lose!’—p. 155.

Now picture to your mind, dear reader, these poor creatures, the objects of Cromwell's most religious piety; their priests hunted like wolves; their lords slain, or transplanted; themselves burrowing, to the number of 600,000, in those nasty cabins described by Sir William Petty. And what proof does Cromwell give of the sincerity of his religious zeal in their regard? What schools does he found? What fiery missionaries are raised to carry evangelical comfort to these houses of woe? What premiums for learning the English language? What Irish Bibles distributed? The first act of his government is “that no Irish Papists shall be allowed to teach, or learn reading, writing, or arithmetic.”—Hib. Dom., p. 702. The language of three-fourths of the Irish people, so late as 1672, was Irish alone; yet Mr. H. J. M. Mason has not discovered a single serious attempt of the Protector “to give the word of God to the people.” If Cromwell believed that the Irish people had souls, where is his sincerity?—how can he be excused from the guilt of hypocrisy? He weeps over the sufferings of the Vaudois in the secluded valleys of the Alps, and sends emissaries to France to know if the ancestors of M. D'Aubigne be strong enough to rebel, but consigns the Irish slave to spiritual and intellectual darkness. This may be Genevese sincerity, but it is incomprehensible to those who speak the English language.

The scenes of which hapless Friburg was lately the scene must have delighted the heart of this M. D'Aubigne. He gravely proposes that a monument should be erected to Cromwell, with this inscription, “To the founder of religious liberty.”—p. 274. He cannot in consistency deny the same honour to his countryman, Ochsenbein; both are the same enemies of the Papacy.

“It is the priests,” he tells us, “who have made the Irish what they are. A gross superstition, a corrupt system of morals, ideas false and out of date, which have robbed this nation of its energy, and engendered in it carelessness, imprudence, and misery. Priests degraded by error, have themselves degraded their poor flocks. We would say nothing to diminish the responsibility of England, she is great in every way, but all impartial judges must acknowledge that the Papacy will have to answer before God and man for the poverty and sufferings she has entailed upon an island which, before it was subjected to the Pope, was at the head of all Christian countries, and which is now, alas! at the lowest step of the scale.”—p. 164.

Such is his defence of Cromwell's intolerance to the Catholics of Ireland!

It would not be difficult to take up every period of Irish history, from Cromwell's to the present day, and demonstrate to M. D'Aubigne and the English and Irish press which re-echo his slanders, that the miseries of Ireland are not traceable to the predecessors of Pius IX., but we prefer taking one period in which Catholic influence was the sole influence that moulded the Irish mind; when the law had for a century been known only as a tyrant, and liberty as the power of enacting persecution; when the Catholic was an outlaw to the state, but a devoured son of his Church. In 1782 what was the conduct of those oppressed Papists?

“The Irish Catholics pursued a conduct so meritorious that even the bitterest enemies of that body acknowledged the uncommon merit of their conduct; their open friends multiplied, their worst enemies diminished; and they gradually worked themselves into the favour and confidence of their Protestant countrymen; though loaded with severe restrictions; though put out of the pale of the British constitution, and groaning under the most cruel and unjust oppression, they were active and patriotic, they forgot the tyranny under which they groaned, and felt only the chains which fettered and oppressed their country."—Barrington's Rise and Fall.

With this description, by an eye-witness, take another, from the pen of a man who had no religious sympathy with the Irish Catholic. Like a dream of heaven, it flashes bright and transient, never, we fear, to return. On the 14th of January, 1784, a British Earl, Protestant Bishop of Derry, answers an address from the Bill of Rights' battalion of Presbyterian Volunteers:

"There is in this island, a class of citizens equally respectable, and infinitely more numerous than those who have hitherto oppressed them—men who have long crouched under the iron rod of their oppressors, not from any dastardly insensibility to their shackles, not from any womanly indifference to the inalienable rights of man, but from a pious dread of wounding our common country through the sides of its tyrants—men in whose breasts beats as high a pulse for liberty, and through whose veins pours a tide of as pure blood, and as noble, too, as any that animates the proudest citizen in Ireland—men whose ancestors, at the hazard of their property, and with the loss of their lives, obtained the first great Bill of Rights, and upon which every other must be founded—the Magna Charta of Ireland—who with a fortitude as unexampled as their oppression, allowed everything dear to the human heart to be wrecked, except their religion and their patriotism—except their acquiescence in the will of an inscrutable God, and their affection for a mistaken and deluded country."

If the portrait be too flattering, the colouring is none of ours. Who will weigh D'Aubigne against the Earl-Bishop of Derry and the battalion of Presbyterian volunteers?

The national prosperity that followed the relaxation of the penal code, and the independence of Ireland, are too well known to be cited here, against the anti-social, and degrading, and pauperizing influence attributed to Irish Catholicity by this Genevese Rationalist.

But whence comes the present awful misery of this country? Not from famine, or absentees, or misgovernment, or bad land tenures; from none of those causes usually supposed by English, as well as Irish to be the sources of our woes—but from the increase of the number of the Roman Catholic clergy, and their seeking to absorb all the power and patronage of the state! Such are the causes of our woes discovered by this Swiss philosopher. The truth, it appears, burst upon him by the perfect parallel between Belgium and Ireland—the two most Popish countries in Europe; both sunk in misery, both fallen, by modern Popery, from the very high place they held under ancient Popery, when Belgium was the Birmingham and Manchester of the world. Belgium we leave to speak for itself, but on the increased number of Catholic Clergy in Ireland, how little does M. D'Aubigne know the real facts! How few are aware that in those days which are called and were days of persecution, the religious wants of the Irish people were in some respects more abundantly supplied than at the present day? You had not as good chapels, nor political liberty, but you had more priests in proportion to the Catholic laity.

"The body of the Irish Papists in 1672," according to Petty, "being about 800,000, were governed by about 1,000 secular priests, and 1,500 friars and regulars of several orders, whereof most were Franciscans, next Dominicans and Augustinians, but few Capuchins, Jesuits, or Carthusians."—p. 327.

"These priests were chosen for the most part from the old Irish gentry."—p. 363.

Sir William, who was a perfect specimen of modern iron political economy, protests against this proportion of one priest to every 320 souls:

"If the Irish," he says, "must have priests, let their number be reduced to the competent number of 1,000, which is 800 souls to the pastorage of each priest."—p. 321.

800 souls to each priest! the competent number in the opinion of Sir William—the man who surveyed Ireland for Cromwell's soldiers, and London adventurers. Were it possible to have that competent number now, many a curate, who goes forth from college rich in literary promise, but is soon overwhelmed with the holy slavery of the Irish mission, would then realize the fond hopes of his friends. The competent number of 800 souls to one priest, would give 8,000 priests to Ireland, if the Irish Catholics be, after the three famines, 6,400,000. The number of priests at present is, in round numbers, 2,800; that is, only 300 more than when Irish Catholics were 800,000! In other words, 2,300 souls is now the competent number for one priest, and so, alas! it must remain. Four colleges like Maynooth would no more than give the Irish people the proportion of clergy they had twelve years after Cromwell's death—the competent number, according to Cromwell's surveyor.

But to return to M. D'Aubigne, did the great number of Irish priests ruin the state, in 1672?

"His majesty," says Petty, "who formerly could do nothing for, or upon Ireland, but by the help of England, hath now a revenue upon that place, to maintain, if he pleases, 7,000 men in arms. From all which it is to be hoped that men seeing more advantage to live in Ireland than elsewhere, may be invited to remove themselves thither, and to satisfy the want of people—the greatest and most fundamental defect of this kingdom."—p. 319, 388.

The Marquis of Lansdown, they say, is the descendant of Sir William Petty; how like, how unlike, the policy of both!—Priests for one; police for the other!

A foreigner may, perhaps, be pardoned for being ignorant of those facts; but how is he to be excused for misrepresenting the conduct of the Catholic Church in Ireland, with regard to the principles of civil and religious liberty during the last fifty years? Had he known anything of our history, even what is contained in the eloquent epitome of Father Ventura, he dared not accuse the Catholics of seeking connexion with the state, or of endeavouring to monopolize the favours of government. They have struggled gloriously and successfully under their departed Leader to obtain the rights of the great constitution founded by their Catholic ancestors; they have given a second birth to that constitution by proving in their emancipation how, without any appeal to the sword, it can develop and incorporate with itself great organic revolutions; but it was reserved for foreign ignorance to accuse them of attempting to exclude their countrymen, of other creeds, from the fruits of their labours. M. D'Aubigne advocates the separation of church and state in Ireland, as the only means of promoting the growth of Protestantism; the brightest wreath he attempts to throw on the tomb of Cromwell is, that the intolerant soldier was the apostle of religious liberty, because, though he favoured the Independents, he professed to give not only toleration, but full liberty to all sects of Protestants. Now when have the Irish Catholics advocated the connexion of church and state, or prescribed limits to the political toleration of the myriad sects engendered by individual whim, and religious enthusiasm? Milton told Cromwell "to leave the church to the church, to disburthen himself and the civil magistracy of a concern which was half their incumbrance, and wholly incongruous with their appropriate functions, and not to permit the two heterogeneous authorities of church and state to continue their intrigues, to the enfeebling and eventual subversion of both." The Irish Catholics have not, it is true, condemned the connexion of church and state, as existing in other countries, but they refused to purchase their civil and political rights—they seek no emoluments at the expense of religious independence—leave the church to the church, was their motto. An experience of 400 years in Catholic times, from 1172 to 1550, gives melancholy proof that the English government never used Irish ecclesiastical patronage for other than English objects—the degradation of religion, and the slavery of the country—the exclusion of mere Irish from their own cathedrals, and monasteries, and benefices—the conversion of the Irish priest into the English policeman—policy which would be renewed to-morrow, in principle, if the English government had the power. The Irish Catholics knew these facts, and yet they are now accused by M. D'Aubigne, and in a second edition, too, of seeking to clutch the deadly favours of government connexion.

In this brief notice, we have passed over many great mistakes of our author, such, for instance, as the massacre of 50,000 Protestants, at least, in 1641, though even Sir William Petty advises those who rate the victims above 37,000, "to revise their opinions," and Dr. Lingard, and others, have proved that the massacre is a fiction. One point, however, we cannot refrain from producing, though it is not immediately connected with our design. M. D'Aubigne admires Great Britain; with the cunning hand of a commercial rhetorician, he attracts attention to his closing pages by a goodly constellation of asterisks, and then administers a potent dose to the spiritual pride of "holy England."

"I have been in England, I have seen in her great manufacturing cities the miracles of that commercial activity which covers the whole world with the productions of a petty island in Europe. In the ports of London, Liverpool, and other places, I have gazed upon those floating isles, those thousands of masts which bear afar, over every sea, the riches and power of the nation. I have admired in Scotland a simple, energetic, and active people, ready to sacrifice anything rather than abandon Christ and his word. I have wandered through those halls whence are conveyed to the four quarters of the world Bibles printed in every known language. I have prayed in the churches, and at the religious meetings have been transported by the powerful eloquence of the speakers, and at the acclamations of the audience. I have been struck with admiration at beholding the people of these islands encompassing the globe—bearing everywhere civilization and Christianity, and filling the earth with the power and the word of God. At the sight of such prosperity and greatness I said, this is the work of the Reformation—it is Protestantism that has so exalted the nation."

Wealth and religious zeal Great Britain undoubtedly has. The Free Kirk raises in a short time £2,000,000.

The Methodists subscribed last year £120,000 for the propagation of the Gospel. The Established clergy have divided among themselves in Ireland £800,000, per annum, during 300 years; but what are the fruits of their wealth and zeal? 6,000,000 of Irish Catholics—pagan ignorance, according to Lord Ashley, in the mining, and manufacturing districts of England—and few native Protestants in the myriad colonies of Great Britain! A few intrepid French missionaries have made more converts in Cochin China during this century, in spite of the most bloody persecutions, than all that were ever brought over by Protestant gold to profess themselves Christians. No; the propagation of the Gospel is not one of the glories of Great Britain. The imperial sceptre of Spain is broken in South America; Mexico may be incorporated with the States, but millions of Indian Catholics remain—the enduring monuments of Spanish religion and zeal. England exterminates or colonises, but cannot convert. If her hundred million of subjects in India slipped from her hands to-morrow, the traveller would seek in vain a real monument of English religion in the East Indies, while the native Catholics would still celebrate the glory of St. Francis Xavier and of Portugal. In his epitome of the glories of England, M. D'Aubigne forgets Cressy, and Agincourt, and Magna Charta, and of course never saw Hood's lines:

Shun pride, Oh, Rae! whatever sort beside
You take in lieu, shun spiritual pride.
Fancy a peacock in a poultry yard,
Strutting and dancing, and now planted stiff
In all his pomp of pageantry, as if
He felt "the eyes of Europe" on his tail—
I am that saintly fowl! thou paltry chick!

Reminiscences of the Irish Mission.

BY A RETIRED PRIEST.

NO. I. INTRODUCTORY—CONTAINING A HISTORY OF THE AUTHOR.

THE following pages are really what they pretend to be—the experiences of a Priest who has been long laboriously and actively engaged on the Irish mission. No person can know the Irish people so well as their Priest; he is almost the only friend to whom they can look up for counsel in their perplexities, for relief in their distress, and for sympathy in their sufferings. The sharer of their innocent enjoyments at the wedding and the christening, and of their deep sorrow at the time of sickness and of death; dependent on them for the very means of existence, he has no feeling and no interest apart from the people, but is thoroughly identified with them in everything. The experience, therefore, of the Priest must afford him an abundant opportunity of reading their very hearts. This knowledge is forced upon him; it becomes a part of his very being, and nothing but the clumsiness of the execution can prevent its communication from being deeply interesting.

From my earliest youth, religion had greater charms for me than anything else. I believe I owe this, under God, to my grandmother—rest her soul!—who was a most religious woman. The first words I have any recollection of are "in honour of God and the Holy Virgin," which she always made use of in giving her daily, and, for her means, abundant alms; and almost the earliest action I remember is, having quit my dinner, which I had just commenced, in order to give it to a poor person, which she told me I was bound to do when I saw any one in distress. Although I had both a brother and sister, there was no child living in the same house with me, nor, indeed, near me, for I did not reside with my father and mother, but with my grandfather and grandmother. The reason of this was, that the first child—a boy—with whom God blessed my parents, was so mercifully dealt with that he was taken to heaven out of this “valley of tears,” when he was only six months old. About the time of his marriage, my father had built a new house, and, in digging the foundations, it had been necessary to level part of an old fort or rath, which, as every one knows, is, or was, the residence of fairies. My poor mother always feared that the “good people” (as they are politely called) would resent the demolition of their dwelling, although she was a little comforted by an old nurse, who assured her then, as she also declared to myself, and to many others, long afterwards, and as she herself, I have not the slightest doubt, verily believed—that on the night after their habitation was torn down she met about ten thousand of them, and heard them say they were leaving the country, and going to Scotland. She, moreover, saw a large quantity of egg-shells, in which, she supposed, they were to sail across the channel, about a hundred being stowed away in each. However, the child died, and, as he was, until within a few days of his death, perfectly healthy, it was a settled matter—notwithstanding that my father was not only heretical, but downrightly atheistical, on the point, inasmuch as he obstinately denied their existence altogether—that the misfortune was entirely owing to the spite of the fairies.

What occurred at my birth—for I am the second child of my parents, who are, I trust, long since in heaven—although, I am sorry to say that it made no impression on my father, set the matter at rest for ever with all the rest of his household. It was about eleven o’clock at night, on the 11th of February, and the snow was falling, when my mother was seized with the pains of labour. My father ordered one of the servants, Peter by name, to mount a horse and ride with all speed for the doctor, whose residence was about a mile and a half distant. Peter, who was a faithful fellow, and would have risked his life for my mother, was ready in an instant. There was a large stack of turf in the farm-yard attached to the house, and about an hour after Peter’s departure one of the maids went out for some fuel to put on the kitchen fire. She was hardly gone when she rushed in again, and fainted on the floor. When she was recovered, by means of the restoratives usual on such occasions, she stated that the fairies had come for the child, and that there was one sitting in the yard on a horse as big as a mountain. What was to be done? They were afraid to tell my father, for, somehow or other, the fairies had an objection to show themselves to him, no matter how plainly they appeared to other people. It was at last agreed, in council, that the whole household, with the exception of the old nurse, who was with my mother—consisting of three maids and two men—should sally out together for the fuel. They had no sooner opened the door than they heard a tremendous noise, accompanied with something very like swearing, which so terrified them that they went in a body to my father, and told him that the yard was full of fairies, who would certainly carry off the baby as soon as born. My father seized a stick, and desired the men to go out with him. The swearing and striking still continued, but he went, without hesitation, to the sheltered side of the turf-stack, from which the noise proceeded. The night was very dark, and the snow falling thickly, but he plainly saw a white horse rearing and kicking, and something like a man on his back, belabouring him most furiously. The three men, whose hair was standing on their heads, thought that my father would address it in Latin—for, though a plain countryman, he had a smattering of that language—but, he no sooner saw it, than he shouted, at the very top of his voice, in plain English, “Is that you, Peter?” “Yes, Sir,” answered the fairy. “Is the doctor coming?” “Troth, Sir, I didn’t see him.” “Why?” “Because, Sir, this infernal white mare would not move a step in the snow, although I have worn out a whip upon her.” “Could you not have put her into the stable again and taken one of the other horses?” “Is it let her into the stable, your honour, and conquer me, as she wanted to do?—I’d see her d—d first.” Peter was a slow talker, but this last word was abruptly jerked out of him by a tremendous blow from the stick which his master held in his hand, and which knocked him clean out of the saddle. My father jumped into the seat which Peter had so unceremoniously vacated, and gave the white mare two such hearty blows, that, after rearing up, she dashed out of the gate at full gallop, and never drew up until she arrived at the doctor’s door. I, however, came into the world before the man of medicine arrived, who, however, prescribed for my mother, and set Peter to rights, the injury he received being no worse than a bruise on the shoulder.

Some sceptical persons may imagine, as my father did, for a whole week, that this incident was not brought about by the fairies. I pity their ignorance, as the whole house did that of my benighted parent, when my mother and myself being both well, they ventured to tell the truth on the subject. It was quite clear that the mare saw the fairies, as she would never have refused to move but for this cause, after all the flogging Peter gave her, and that, as usual, they must have disappeared when my father came out, or she would not have galloped off at once with him. Besides, the maid who first saw the fairy in the yard (which, of course, could not have been Peter, the horse she saw being at least ten times as large as the white mare), distinctly heard the said fairy saying to some other distant fairy, “bad luck to you, if you don’t go on fast we’ll be too late for the christening.” It was unanimously agreed against my father that if I were left in that house I must inevitably die; and, in fact, he was obliged to surrender, and allow my mother to take me with her, and to go and live with his father and mother until I should be weaned. At the expiration of this period my mother returned to her husband, but I remained where I was for the present, and, as my next brother died, doubtless because he was not removed from the dangerous dwelling, my stay with my grandfather and grandmother, much to their satisfaction and to mine, was allowed to be prolonged indefinitely.

The whole household consisted of my grandmother, grandfather, and two servants, a man and a woman, the latter of whom had lived with them, at the time I am writing of, about thirty years, and the former about seventeen. The woman was generally kept busy enough, but the man, whose name was Paddy Murphy, had little to do but to attend to a horse, and he used to say that idleness agreed with him wonderfully well. He had been a sailor, and was much fonder of long yarns than of hard work, and as my grandfather was entirely of Paddy's opinion, they got on admirably together. I had, generally speaking, no companion of my own age, but, nevertheless, my life was a most happy one, and I look back to it with that fond delight with which we all recall the innocent joys and the bright dreams of our early youth. I said my lessons, early in the day, to my kind and indulgent grandmother. Her chief care was to impress a profound religious feeling on my mind. My first lesson every day was to say morning prayer with her, and she always concluded by reading for me some interesting portion of a religious book. I can truly affirm that this duty was to me a real and sincere pleasure, and that every morning I poured forth my little heart with the greatest fervour to my God. Every night the whole household said prayer in common, and we always repeated one of the three parts of the Rosary of the Holy Virgin, whom I soon learned to love as a dear and kind mother, and whose protection during life I have never ceased to experience. As there were just five of us, each one used to give out "one decade" of the Rosary, the other four answering. On one occasion, when I was about five years old, a very singular thing happened to me—whether it was the result of habit or of some other cause I do not pretend to say. The day had been one of the loveliest in "rosy May," and I had wandered far through the fields with old Paddy, listening to some of his sea stories, gathering the wild flowers, and occasionally stopping on the margin of a beautiful lake to watch the gambols of the wild fowl. I felt my young spirit exulting with the glorious resurrection of nature, which I beheld everywhere around me. At night, however, I was greatly fatigued, and as my eyes began to close, in spite of all my efforts to keep them open—for there is no greater tyrant than sleep—my grandmother commenced the night prayers earlier than usual, in order that I might go to bed. We had, however, no sooner knelt down than I fell fast asleep, nor did I awake until I was roused by the noise of the others rising from their knees. The first thing that flashed upon my mind was the disgrace I must have incurred by sleeping at prayer, for as I always gave out the fifth decade of the Rosary, I knew that I must have been discovered. What, then, was my astonishment, to hear every one praise the beautiful, and, as they said, heavenly voice, with which I had given out the Rosary. They were all in raptures. I had commenced at my own time, and had repeated the doxology "glory be to the Father," &c., at the end of the tenth hail Mary. I had not the slightest recollection of the matter, for I had been sound asleep during the entire time. But the voice and manner were the theme of universal praise for a long time afterwards, and although I strove hard to equal them, I never got higher praise than "oh, you are a good child, you said your prayers very well, but it was nothing to what you did on the night when we had the prayers early, on account of your having been so tired."

The greatest affliction I had to endure, at this time, was in not being permitted to receive the holy communion along with the rest of the family, for my grandmother partook of the bread of life each Sunday morning, and the others on the first Sunday of the month. How I longed for the period when I should be allowed to receive my Saviour, corporally, within me, and to be united, body and soul, with my God! I well remember when this happiness was vouchsafed me, about six years afterwards—I was then eleven years old—with what anxious care my grandmother instructed me on the heinousness of sin, which deprived us of the friendship of God, and put us under the tyranny of the devil; how it robbed the soul of the glory with which it had been covered over as with a priceless garment, by being washed, in baptism, in the blood of Jesus. She then unfolded to me the infinite mercy of God, in instituting the sacrament of penance, by which those who had the unspeakable misfortune to renounce their baptismal vows, and to stain their souls with the heinous guilt of mortal sin, might be again purified and restored to the dignity of children of God and heirs of heaven; but that in order to apply this remedy we must examine our conscience carefully to see in what we have offended our dear Saviour who died for us; that we must, like Magdalen, be penetrated with the deepest sorrow for having transgressed His law; that we must kneel at the foot of the crucifix and bathe it with our tears; that we must say, with the prodigal, "I will arise and return to my father," and that, in fine, we must show ourselves to the priest of God, acknowledge to him all our transgressions, and ask of him to grant us pardon—not of himself but in the name, by the authority, and through the merits of Jesus Christ. With what anxious care did I prepare myself to receive the Lord of Glory into my breast, and with what extacy was my heart filled when I had him within me, how glad and joyful was I all the day afterwards! I am certain that, even setting aside their awful consequences, no sensual gratifications can be compared with the pure delights of religion, and that the libertine only indulges in his excesses because he has never "tasted and seen how sweet is the Lord." But I anticipate, for I am speaking of that period when the soul begins to look abroad and to drink in the glories and the mysteries of this vast universe, when nature, like the queen of night, only shows her bright side to the world; alas! we all awake soon enough from this early dream, but it is sweet to look back upon it, even as I do now, through the storms and darkness of nearly a century, for its brightness can never be dimmed nor its memory obliterated.

I am speaking of that period when I was about five years old, and when the spirit of religious persecution had somewhat abated; humble chapels began to appear in low retired spots, where the faithful had heretofore assembled, at night and by stealth, to celebrate the divine mysteries. One of these had just been built near where I lived, and my grandfather often showed me the places on the surrounding hills where he and others watched whilst mass was celebrated on the site of the little chapel. Many a hairbreadth escape I heard, many a heart-rending tale of murder; all these stories made me love my religion with an intensity which, considering my tender age, now astonishes me, and, young as I was, I almost regretted that I did not live a little sooner, in order that I might have died for the faith. My grandmother had turned all this to such excellent account, that I used to retire to pray alone even without her knowledge, and I would often conceal myself in the tall corn, when it covered the fields, in order to implore the protection of God and of the Holy Virgin, whom I earnestly besought to adopt me for her child. Naturally of a kind disposition, it had been greatly improved by my excellent instructress, and as I never, to my knowledge, saw a poor person sent away from the door without assistance, I used to give away almost all my pocket-money to the indigent, and really felt greater pleasure in this than in purchasing any of those luxuries in which boys delight. A rebuke which I received at this time, made an impression on my mind which has never been obliterated. I said one day, "grandmother, here is a beggar;" "my dear child," said she, "beggar is a term of reproach, and you should never use it towards those whom God has allowed to be poor, in order to afford us the great happiness of assisting Him in their person; tis to Him we owe all, it is His almighty power which quickens the dead seed which the husbandman buries in the soil, and makes it cover the earth with a green carpet in the spring, with gay flowers in the summer, and with teeming abundance in the autumn; this is a poor woman, but she must not be called a beggar at my door, and blessed be God I am enabled to help her." Tis now more than sixty years since this occurred, and I can safely say that I have never since been guilty of the same offence. I have been often astonished when I remember that at this period one mysterious thought kept possession of my whole soul—it was the thought of eternity! I often strove to fathom this abyss and always shrunk back terrified by its contemplation; I thought for days and weeks, and months and years, "we shall never have an end," without daring to breathe the subject to any human being, and, if in a solitary place, I would throw myself on my knees and passionately implore the Omnipotent to scourge me with a rod of iron, but not to cast me off for ever—not to separate me from the kind and the virtuous, and to place me for all eternity with those whose hearts were filled with hatred and iniquity.

It was at this early age that the thought of becoming a Priest first occurred to me; it was not, however, as might be supposed, from its being a religious state that this idea suggested itself; for, judging from those with whom I came in contact, I thought that all persons were faithful servants of God; it was rather founded, I should suppose, on some of old Paddy's instructions, who was my constant companion in my leisure hours, and a very pious man, but whose whole philosophy consisted in getting through the world as easily as possible. We lived in the country, and, as I have already said, near a chapel, and whatever clergyman celebrated mass in this chapel always breakfasted and, sometimes, dined with us. It was a portion of the bishop's parish, and I well remember the venerable old man with his bay wig asking me my catechism, and patting me on the head when I answered correctly. One Sunday he dined with us, and my father and mother were also there, as well as the curates of the parish and some other persons. After dinner I was introduced, and, as usual, the bishop asked me my catechism. I answered his questions correctly, and at the end he told me I would be a bishop. But I replied peremptorily, that I would not. "Well, then," said he, "my dear, what will you be?" "I'll be," said I, without the least hesitation, "either a priest or a tailor." This produced a roar of laughter, which was increased by what followed. "And why," pursued his lordship, "have you made up your mind to be a priest or a tailor?" "Because," I replied, "neither of them have to draw home their own potatoes." I had seen one of my father's horses drawing home some potatoes for one of the curates, and for the tailor who made my clothes, neither of them having a horse of his own, and I imagined that they were freed from all trouble, whilst their neighbours were obliged to keep horses for their accommodation. There was nothing said about the matter then, but, on the following day, my father took me in his arms, and told me that I must not be taking foolish notions in my head, and that he hoped, as I was his eldest son, I would, as soon as I was able, help him in his business. I made no reply, but he had not shaken my resolution in the least, and although I very soon saw the absurdity of my first reason, I was moved by a higher and holier one to abandon the tailoring scheme altogether, and to resolve, with my whole heart, to devote myself to God in the priesthood. I believe my grandmother was always accused with being at the bottom of this determination, but she was entirely innocent of it; nor, indeed, had it ever been suggested to me by any human being. When, however, I had taken up this resolution, she was my strong, zealous, and, indeed, only defender. The reason of the opposition of my parents and other friends, including even the clergy of the parish, was, not only that I was the oldest of the family, but chiefly, as far, at least, as the last-named individuals were concerned, because I was of so extremely delicate a constitution, that they feared I would not be able to undergo the fatigues of a college. I however, persisted in my intention; I prayed for more strength, and got it; the bishop allied himself with my grandmother, and by their joint assistance I triumphed. I have since then passed through a long life—I have had my share of sorrow and suffering, but I have never once regretted my early determination of becoming a priest, nor ever recalled to my memory the well-meant opposition of my friends without blessing my heavenly Father for putting it into their hearts to allow me to enter into his holy ministry. I have never ministered anywhere that I have not loved my flock, and been, in turn, beloved by them—nor have I ever, in obedience to the commands of my superiors, broken ties of this kind without mutual tears. If the wealth of the Irish people be not great, they are always ready to divide the little they have with their priest; and there is an inexhaustible mine of religion and of kindness in their hearts which is infinitely more valuable than all the riches in the world.

I was sent to school in a town at some distance, and oh! how delicious it was to return and spend the Christmas with my dear old friends, who all received me with "ten thousand welcomes." I well remember my first visit, after an absence of several months. I arrived on Christmas-eve, and one of the priests, as usual, said Mass in our house on the following morning, at which we all partook of the holy communion. We afterwards went to the chapel. The morning was dry, cold, and frosty, and the sun, although still below the horizon, shot his golden beams before him and dyed the cloudless sky with such deep and glorious colours as no pen can describe, no pencil copy. How delighted I was to see the dear old chapel, where I had so often prayed to God and assisted at the celebration of the holy and tremendous mysteries—for the very angels of heaven assist with us around the altar where Jesus Christ is really present—and cold, indeed, must the Christian be whose heart is not penetrated with the most profound veneration and the most burning love when he is so near his God. The hoar frost had adorned everything; the branches of the thorn appeared like splendid white coral, whilst the very straw that hung upon them appeared more beautiful than the most precious silver-lace. There had been a fall of snow, with which the thick shrubs were covered so as to make them resemble large plum cakes. But there was one glorious old yew, or, as the people called it, palm tree, whose branches had adorned on Palm Sunday their hats and bonnets since they dared to show publicly this emblem of the triumphal entry of the Saviour into Jerusalem, and had probably served their fathers and mothers for the same purpose, before the seamless garment of Christ had been torn, and when creed had not been set up against creed, nor altar against altar. It stood there in all its ancient beauty, unchanged and unreformed, a meet emblem of the people who came to worship almost under its shadow. Its beautiful branches, now bent to the earth by the pure white snow with which it was covered, sparkled as if they were adorned with ten thousand diamonds in the bright rays of the rising sun. Those parts of the boughs, too, which were not covered with snow were of the purest green, and appeared, in the bright beams of the morning sun, as the last relics of the departed summer, and the first harbingers of the coming spring. I entered the little chapel, which was decked out in its holiday attire of simple evergreens. The priest had not yet entered the chapel, being engaged in hearing confessions, but the people were reciting the Rosary, under the guidance of one of the oldest and most venerable men in the congregation. As soon as the prayer was ended, several persons urgently entreated this old man to get his granddaughter to sing a Christmas hymn. He said that she was too timid to sing it alone, but that she would join John Sullivan. The boy and girl were soon placed side by side, near the altar. They were each about fourteen years of age, and certainly I have never seen two finer or more interesting youths, as they poured forth their sweet and rich, though untaught, melody :

Song for Christmas.

ARISE! arise! The glorious morn
Has burst upon the astonished earth.
The wondrous child at length is born,
To whom a virgin giveth birth.
The Angels, rushing from the sky,
Pour forth their burning lay—“Glory to God, who dwells on high,
And peace to men to day.”

The charmed earth drinks in the song
More gladly than the summer's rain,
The stars their nightly watch prolong,
Enraptured by the heavenly strain—
And one, more brilliant than the blaze
Which flashing lightnings fling,
Descends to dazzle mortal gaze,
And sentinel its King.

Full sixteen hundred years, and more,
Since then have rolled away—
And still the heart bounds as of yore
To welcome Christmas Day.
Welcome, old friend, with thy hoary head,
Right welcome art thou here;
Bright is thy brow, and light thy tread,
Soft beams thine eye and clear.

And though in beauteous robes arrayed
The Earth no more appear,
But dead upon her breast are laid
The glories of the year :

And through the branches of the trees,
Where pensive sit the birds,
The dirge of Nature sings the breeze
In sounds more sad than words :

Welcome, Christmas—thy robes of snow
Proclaim the birth of Him,
Who shed upon this world below
The glory which brightest Cherubim
Adoring sing—and we will sing
This morn : for, amongst men,
This Altar is thy Throne, great King!
Here is our Bethlehem!

Welcome, old friend, for thou dost bring Back to his home the child
Whose heart to that dear spot will cling,
Albeit bleak and wild—
For hill, and dale, and stream, and tree,
Each has its tale to tell:
We garlands strung in that lone lea,
Or wandered down this dell.

And when the vacant seat appears,
And thou hearest the bitter sigh,
Thou quickly bidst us dry our tears,
And pointest to the sky.
Thou tellest of the loving prayer
Which the blest spirit breathes,
When freed from earth and worldly care,
For those dear friends it leaves—

Of infants whom their mothers wail,
As torn from their love,
Now pleading for their parents frail
Before the Throne above—
Of dearest friends whose loss we mourn,
Now as the Cherub bright,
Whose rapturous prayer to God is borne,
For those who weep their flight.

Our erring steps, however far
O'er this wide world they roam,
Still find in thee a guiding star
To lead them to their home.
And when the lamp of life low burns,
And Death's cold hand is near,
To thy bright light the spirit turns,
And sees her SAVIOUR near.

Shortly after the hymn was ended, the priest ascended the altar and commenced the holy sacrifice of the Mass. He had no one to assist him but the boy who sang, and his cousin, who was about the same age, who officiated as clerks, so that he could not celebrate a solemn Mass, but he sang the Epistle, Gospel, Credo and Gloria, in honour of the great solemnity of Christmas. At the Communion almost the entire congregation partook of the bread of life, and Father John (for such was the priest's name) delivered a simple but affecting sermon on the Nativity. The greater part of the congregation, now retired to their homes, but this unwearied pastor again resumed the labour of hearing confession, which he continued for two hours, in order to allow such members of the different families as were obliged to remain at home during the first Mass to arrive in time for the second. After each of the Masses the people paid their contributions towards the support of their clergy, and though but small they were really generous, considering the means of the contributors. They were, moreover, the sincere testimony of the affection of the entire congregation for the pastor whom God had placed over them. It was nearly two o'clock before the duties of the day had concluded, and up to that time Father John had tasted nothing but the sacred elements. He now, as usual, accompanied us home, where breakfast was prepared for him. Old Paddy was in great good humour, and as soon as the priest entered he saluted him—"A merry Christmas to you, Father John, and I hope you got a good Christmas-box this morning?" "Thank you, Paddy, the people are always kind and generous." "Oh, 'deed, Sir, it's yourself has the soft word of every body, but I'll lay a wager Jemmy the Guldercock did not give you a black dog, for all that?" "Come, come, Paddy, you are a little too severe, and I fear you have been taking your 'morning' to-day. I do not mean to say that you are drunk, Paddy, but a small drop lets your tongue loose." "Why, troth, Sir, I drunk jist one glass, in honour of this blessed Christmas mornin', an' a soberer man there isn't in Ireland this day. But as to Jemmy the Guldercock, by Gor, I'd as soon try to pull a cat, by the tail, out of a silk stocking without tearing it, as to get a hog out of his pocket." "That's your opinion, Paddy," said my grandmother, "but Father John's breakfast is ready for him, and I think he must be ready for it." "True for you, ma'am, and I'll not detain his reverence any longer, an' I'll gist go to the young master, whom I've had no time to talk to yet, and try how he's gettin' on at the langidges." "By my word, Paddy, I would rather lose my breakfast than that examination, so you must hold it in my presence, for I can listen, and eat at the same time." I must candidly confess that, for the first time in my life, I had stolen away from Father John, and hid myself, for fear of being examined on my progress in Latin, which I had just begun to translate. I advise all those who would preserve the good will of schoolboys to give up this pedantic habit, which was much in vogue in my youthful days. I believe, when Paddy announced to me that Father John wished to examine me (for the villain did not dare to tell me that he was to be the operator himself), that, for the first and last time in my life, a momentary feeling of displeasure towards him flashed across my mind. What was my astonishment, on coming into the good priest's presence, to hear him say—"Paddy, proceed, for I am quite ready to listen." Paddy loved me as if I were his own child, and I certainly returned his affection most sincerely; but, at the same time, I was thoroughly acquainted with what I scarcely know whether to call his impudence, ignorance, or simplicity, or a compound of all three, which made him imagine that he was tolerably conversant with all spoken languages—a conclusion at which he arrived by persuading himself that it was not in the nature of things that there could be any spoken language, except the English or Irish, and that all others differed from them only in the names by which they were called. He carefully excluded dead, or, as he called them, read languages, which he obstinately maintained to be their true name, and that it was derived from the fact that those languages had never been and never could be spoken.

On those points—although, as must be observed, they were manifestly incompatible with some of his other theories—he was totally beyond the reach of conviction. As soon as Paddy got Father John's permission he asked me "how many spoken languages are there in the world?" "Two, I suppose," said I, "English and Irish." "Ara, how 'cute you've got," said Paddy, "since you went to school in a town." "Will you tell me the names of all the spoken langidges in the world?" "Why," said Father John, "I think that, long as you have been at sea, you could scarcely tell that yourself, for they are very numerous." "Why, then," said Paddy, "maybe there are not so many of them as you think, unless your reverence knows all the spoken langidges as well as the read ones, for, you see, there are a great many of them that are only tongues, and not langidges at all. Now, the Hebrew's a langidge; but there's the Harrow-back (Arabic), and that's no langidge—it's only a tongue. That's the tongue of the Harrow-backs, who are called that by reason of their backs being for all the world like harrows." The maid having come in with a kettle during this harangue, told Paddy that it would be a charity to "scald the lies out of him," which turned the torrent of his eloquence in that direction, and my grandmother desired them both to go and settle the matter in the kitchen. "Paddy," said Father John, "before you go I have a word to say to you. I hope you have not been in Brian Maguire's shebeen this morning?" "Is it in Brian Maguire's, yer reverence? Why, then, not to speak of your hindrin' us to go there, I'd jist as soon have two buck cats in my belly as two glasses of the same man's whiskey. It's fightin' and scratchin' they'd be all day."

I cannot attempt to express the happiness I enjoyed during those happy Christmas holidays. I visited all my old friends over and over again. I renewed my acquaintance with the few youthful companions whose society I occasionally and at rare intervals had enjoyed. The fields were covered with snow, but the little lake was frozen, and we had great amusement on the ice. We visited every nook where we had sat together, every bank on which we used to gather the sweet primrose of early spring—every spot which was hallowed by the memories of childhood and of early youth. With what gushing delight, and, at the same time with what a full sense of its absurdity, did we recall the conversations which we held together, when the bright light of reason was just breaking on our youthful minds. I well remember one of these, which occurred when I was scarcely four years old. Another boy of the same age sat down by my side, under a large hawthorn tree, then in full bloom. We were grave as philosophers, and our discourse naturally turned on the miseries of human life. Various were the topics which we discussed, but at length we both agreed that the greatest misfortune we had to endure was, that neither of us could fasten the back buttons of his suspenders. I recollect my own declaration most distinctly—"that, whatever other misfortunes he might have to endure, I did not pity any man who could button his own—inexpressibles."

But I must hurry away from those scenes, on the memories of which I could linger for ever. I must try to forget childhood, with its innocent laughter, its witching smiles, and its bright tears, which fell soft and sweet as vernal showers. I must pass over the period of schoolboy days and college life, and come to the time when I returned, an ordained priest, from a far distant clime, to discharge the sublime duties of my ministry amongst the poor, persecuted, but ever faithful inhabitants of this "fairest isle of all the main." And yet its early morning is the only portion of my life which is unclouded by sorrow and undimmed by tears. Whenever I look at a later period, my brightest visions are darkened by the sorrows of my people, or by the death of dear friends. But, though scarcely one of the companions of early youth now remains, and I am like an old withered trunk, without leaves or branches—still, when I look back to my childhood, all the lost ones rise up before me, not in the cold shroud of the grave, but with the rosy cheeks and curling locks, and merry laugh of boyhood. I find it as painful to make “fond memory” leave those scenes now as I used to find it irksome to abandon them for school or college, and I can still repeat, with equal truth, what I wrote on one of those occasions :

And still as I leave the green fields of my birth,
 Their beauty seems brighter as they fade from my eyes ;
 For the image of Fancy is fairer than Truth,
 As the stars shine more pure in the seas than the skies.

The Ruined Castle.

WITHIN a mile of the bright, beautiful, and romantic little village of Dinan, in Brittany, stands the noble ruin of the Chateau de la Garraye. All that the painter's pencil can portray, or the poet's mind embody, is there represented, adorned and embellished by the magic hand of nature. It is indeed a lovely spot, and one which the wanderer feels loath to leave. There you have mountain and valley, and wood and water, and all the innumerable graces which the bounteous hand of God can alone supply. And amidst this vast assemblage of nature's choicest works stands the ruined castle, as if to give a striking proof of Time's decay. All around is beauty, bloom, and verdure ; but look at the chateau, and it tells a sad tale of rapine and war, with all its accompanying evils. The tottering tower, the mouldering walls, the ivy-clad windows, the grass-grown court-yard—all, all bespeak the desolating influence of the sword and the faggot. The companion of my wanderings in this vicinity was a young lady, a native of Dinan ; and, seeing how deeply interested I felt in the scene before me, she kindly recounted to me the history of its former inhabitants.

The young, wealthy, and handsome Count de la Garraye had just attained his twentieth birth-day, and around the vast territory that owned him for its lord, nought was seen or heard but smiling, hopeful faces, and the merry echo of the light laugh. The lord of the soil was about returning to the castle of his ancestors, bearing with him a young and beauteous bride, whose dowry extended far beyond the reach of probability. All was bustle, preparation, and anxiety. The orders given, that the castle should be adorned and ornamented to art's most profuse extreme, were complied with as speedily as the nature of the alterations would permit. Nothing was left undone to welcome the bridal train. The neglected tenantry of many years, looked smilingly hopeful of the future, when the young heir would not only be their lord but their benefactor. The children were told to be thankful for the return of the great man—for education would soon dispel the cloud of ignorance, as poor-schools were sure to be established by the young countess, and their infant minds would be trained to become good and useful members of society. The horizon of their destiny brightened at the prospect before them ; and joy reigned around and about all—for all were alike interested in the cheering future.

THE ARRIVAL.

The bridal party had arrived, and nought was heard from the interior of the castle but sounds of light and joyous revelry. The dance, the song, the merry thought, was succeeded by the gorgeous and profuse banquet. Sounds of celestial harmony greeted the ear on all sides. The hills, far and near, sent their glowing flames high into the air, and the peasantry danced to the merry pipe, and were occasionally observed in grave conversation with each other, hoping that the young lord would condescend to notice his long-neglected tenants, by appearing himself amongst them. But this hope was scarcely uttered, ere it was annihilated by the order—that the tenants were to instantly disperse, and betake themselves to their homes, as their rude merriment was disagreeable to the young countess. And so it was, for the fair and flattered Christina had no heed for other's enjoyment. The world, she thought, was made for herself alone ; and the great object of existence was to extract and enforce perfect subservience to all her whims and caprices. A coquette by nature, and nurtured by flattery, the wants of others were totally unheeded. She cared not to soothe the mourner's tear ; but deemed it the privilege of high birth and fortune to be exempt from all those vulgar annoyances that are the fit attendants upon poverty and obscure origin.

“Well, my love,” said the count, the next morning, to his blooming bride, as they stood upon the ample terrace that fronted the noble mansion, “what think you of the picturesque scenery that lays before you ?”

“I think, dearest, 'tis surpassingly beautiful ; and when the horses arrive, we shall often enjoy a good day's sport. You know how fond I am of violent exercise, and that a tame life would kill me. I require constant excitement in order to feel happy ; and I have found no means so successful in producing that, as keeping a fine steed, and, well mounted, flying before the breeze.”

“All your wishes shall be strictly attended to, my love ; and in our walk to-day we shall visit the stables, and see if they are fit for the reception of the noble animals that, I hope, will arrive by to-morrow.”

“Poor Charles !” sighed the lady, “how he would have enjoyed this sweet place. My poor brother was so fond of beautiful scenery—and to be taken off so suddenly, in the midst of all his enjoyments, was too bad.”

The stables were examined, and not at all approved of : they wanted space, capacity, and air, and it was determined that a new range of stabling should be built upon the site where a row of cottages stood. These cottages were inhabited by a number of the labouring tenants, who got instant notice to quit or their houses would be burnt over their heads. Entreaty and remonstrance were alike in vain ; the lady liked that situation, and determined upon carrying her point. Thus were thrown pitilessly upon the world these poor and unprotected people, and the lady watched with anxiety the commencement of the building.

The poor tenants soon learned that they were totally uncared for, or unthought of by their princely lord ; whose whole thoughts and time were devoted to forwarding even the half expressed wishes of his arrogant bride.

The stables were built, and money expended in profusion. The vast range of building was a miracle of elegance and comfort.

The Lady Christina was esteemed the very best horsewoman in the country, and right bravely did she sustain her character. The fleetest horse bounded gracefully under her slight form. The wildest and most untamed animal became docile at her touch. She rode until she left not a single perch of her hopeless tenants' land that was not trodden into powder. Over hedges and ditches, through promising fields and laboriously cultivated crops, on, on she went, accompanied by her retinue, till the ruin of her people followed the foot-steps of her charger. Arrogant and haughty, she listened not to complaints; she heeded not the mutterings which met her at every pass; and if any were bold enough openly to remonstrate, a notice to quit was instantly served upon them. One by one the tenants drooped, and sunk unheeded and uncared for by those who ought to have studied their interests and protected their rights—dismay sat upon all faces, and smothered curses followed in the foaming train that passed gaily along. Heedless and heartless, on they went, regardless of all but the mere sense of personal gratification.

Years rapidly fled in heartless gratification. Years rolled on—slow and desponding years, to the uncared and cruelly-injured tenantry, whose mangled crops yielded but little produce, until at length utter ruin, or in many cases untimely death released the sufferers from further allegiance to their cruel oppressors. Still naught appeared to rouse from the lethargy of sin those lordly despoilers of the poor man's sole means of existence. The horses were well fed—but the tenants pined in sorrowful destitution.

THE DRAWBRIDGE.

The dawn of summer was fast brightening into verdure the grounds around and about the castle. The fishing lake was dancing and glistening under the glowing rays of a May sun. The fairy fountains sparkled with foaming waters; and the birds coquetted in the bushes, or hailed, with full and joyous harmony, the return of that season which restores to nature her most charming aspect. A light and gentle breeze cooled the air, and perfume was wafted in every zephyr.

The Lady Christina bounded on her steed, accompanied by her lord and a train of noble visitors. Her habit of purple velvet reached even to the fetlocks of her pawing courser. Her long and jetty ringlets fell in profusion from under her plumed hat. Her fairy form, graceful and bounding, looked as proud as the noble animal she rode; which, in its turn, appeared fully conscious of its lovely burthen, and pawed and reared, and foamed and pranced, as if anxious to show to the greatest advantage the inimitable horsemanship of its graceful mistress. The avenue leading to the castle was a mile in length, and was arranged in winding pathways of singular beauty. At one moment you caught a full and picturesque view of the castle's front; the next moment it was hidden from the sight, and an uninterrupted view of wood, valley, and rivulet, alone presented itself before you. At the end of the avenue was a drawbridge, so skilfully constructed, and of such fine and exquisite workmanship, that one would have thought that fairies' hands could alone have perfected such an ornamental acquisition in so felicitous a spot.

After a long summer's day, the party were returning, many of them weary and worn out by the day's sport, when they unexpectedly came before the drawbridge. The Lady Christina patted her foaming courser, as if to encourage him for some heroic deed, and, drawing tightly the reins, and spurring her steed, she dashingly leaped her horse across the bridge, leaving her party in consternation behind, for not one amongst them would dare to make so venturesome an attempt. The applauses she received for her extraordinary courage and skill, together with a desire of excelling all others, made her reckless, and in repeating this great feat of horsemanship, unmindful of the necessary precautions, her horse fell, and she was violently thrown; and upon being raised from the ground, it was discovered that her leg was broken in the fall. Doctors of all grades and classes were instantly in attendance, and every art used to allay the pangs of the sufferer; but fever set in, and for some time the life of the Lady de la Garraze was in imminent danger.

THE VISION.

Whilst enduring all the agonizing sufferings of bodily pain, the mental anguish of the young countess was also considerable. For the first time for many years, she reflected upon the uncertainty of this world's happiness, and thought with alarm of her total disregard of the good counsel she had received from a dying and devoted parent. Her young and innocent days passed in review before her, when happy and hopeful they glided peacefully by at the Benedictine Convent, where her mother had placed her. Her fervent friendships and innocent pastimes—her mind full of fervor, and her heart full of love. Her faithful observance of all the duties her holy religion had inculcated—her daily attendance at the holy Sacrifice of the Mass—her constant and fervent approach to the most sacred mystery of our faith—her close and holy communion with God, telling Him of her weaknesses, and beseeching strength from Him; and the heavenly consolation those acts produced in her mind—all, all recurred with painful precision to her stricken thoughts—those days, those happy, peaceful, calm, and innocent days, when naught was around or about her but smiles and blessings. And then she mused on after times, when she had lost her virtuous and vigilant protector—when that dear mother, who so faithfully discharged her duty, was called to receive the reward of her fidelity, and she, young, and scarcely sensible of the extent of her loss, was left to the care and guardianship of an aunt, the very reverse of that sainted mother. Her mind next turned to her removal from the convent to a fashionable Parisian boarding-school, where manners took the lead of morals, and affectation laughed simplicity to shame. By nature, proud and arrogant, and possessing more than an ordinary share of beauty, with considerable wealth, the young Christina became the leading belle of the school. Her faults were lauded, and her virtues ridiculed, until at length her religious principles were subverted, and she became the thoughtless votary of fashion and self gratification. All that wealth could purchase was at her command; and she unsparingly revelled in fashionable gaities. Her attendance on divine worship became less regular; her approaches to the sacraments were rare; till year succeeding year, and irregularity awakening tepidity, the practice of religion became forgotten, and duty remembered but as a childish dream.

These thoughts, and many more, passed through the sufferer's mind, till at length thought became painful.

She closed her eyes, and sought for sleep. Presently a sort of torpor came over her mind; she was not asleep, but in that dreamy condition between waking and sleeping; and, whilst in this state, she fancied she saw one of the tenants who had lately died beckoning to her to follow him. She did so, and he led her through dark and thorny paths, until at length they reached a deep and dismal abyss, where nought was heard but groans and lamentations, yells and shrieks; flames were around and about her, and she turned for aid to her conductor, but he had disappeared with a wild laugh. She felt as if she would momentarily catch fire, and saw that her garments were blackened by the burning masses which threatened to bury her in their raging flames. Her agony was fearful as the conviction that she was standing on the brink of hell flashed across her mind. She tried to raise her hand to make the sign of the cross, but she appeared to be pinioned by little ragged and wild-looking children, who seemed to gloat over her sufferings. The earth was giving way under her feet, and, looking down, she saw herself upheld by the arm of a man, who was in the midst of the raging flames. Upon looking again, she discovered that this man was her own and only brother, who had been suddenly called from this world, in the midst of a wild and reckless course of dissipation. She gazed upon him until her eyes ached, and appeared starting from their sockets. Their eyes met, and no pen could describe the mournful misery of that gaze; there was an utter hopelessness of woe, combined with the most agonizing torture, in the expression of that countenance, as in hollow accents he articulated—"Christina, look upon thy brother, thy unfortunate, suffering brother, who is doomed for all eternity to suffer the agonizing pains of hell. I thought not during life of my duties to God and my fellow-creatures, and madly argued in the strength of youth and health, that when these had passed away I should have time enough to repent. Consequently I drained passion's cup to the dregs, and behold me now and take warning. Return—but lead not the life you have done. Serve God faithfully and vigorously—benefit your neighbour—'tis to do those things you were created." A loud shriek brought the countess's attendants to her bedside. She spoke not of what she had seen, but she treasured it in her inmost heart; and her first act was contritely and humbly to beg God's forgiveness for the many years she had lived unmindful of her duty to Him, and solemnly to promise, if it was His blessed will that she should recover, that she would devote all the years of her future life, and all the energies of her mind, to His honor and glory, and her own sanctification. After this heartfelt prayer, her mind felt soothed, and she became tranquil. She calmly but bitterly reflected upon the ruin and devastation she had brought upon her unsuspecting tenants—of the rude and ragged children that it was her duty to have clothed and taught—and, as if by magic, the veil of self-gratification, which had for years blinded her, fell from her eyes, and she saw her conduct in all its innate depravity.

THE RECOVERY.

The invalid recovered, and her first act was to order the noble range of stabling we have before described to be converted into a spacious hospital for the afflicted poor, whom she attended night and day herself. She next had a beautiful chapel built, where the Holy Sacrifice was daily offered up. In addition to this, she had poor-schools built, in which she herself educated and clothed sixty orphan children. In fine, from the moment of her recovery, her whole life was devoted to God's service—attending the sick, clothing and feeding the destitute, and instructing the ignorant. The velvets and costly silks gave place to the coarse and humble stuff dress; and the bounding steed was exchanged for the strong and graceless boots of the poor peasantry; and in how incredibly short a time, what a change was to be seen around and about her—nothing but happy looks, and cheerful, well-fed children, and heart-felt blessings. But it were vain to endeavour to describe the bliss that the Lady Christina enjoyed in these acts of mercy. Suffice it to say, that even in this world they yielded a rich reward.

Years rolled on, yet still was the Lady Christina untiringly pursuing her works of charity. Her zeal increased with her years, her fervour ripened with her hopes, and, after a long life, spent in the exercise of every Christian virtue, she calmly yielded up her soul to her merciful Creator, amidst the heart-rending anguish of those whom she tended with her own hands, whom she taught with her own lips, and whom she hourly edified by her saintly example.

At the time of the French Revolution, the Chateau de la Garraye was besieged and taken possession of, and the chapel was converted into a store for hay, but tradition avers, that the light which burnt before the Blessed Sacrament would never be extinguished, and that the hay which was put in in the evening was always consumed before the morning.

Reader, if you are disposed to doubt the truth of my tale, by going to the little church-yard of St. Lehon, in Dinan, you will there see a tomb erected to the Countess de la Garraye, and hear from the simple peasantry the recital of the foregoing facts.

A Spanish Inquisition.

THE LYNCHES OF GALWAY.

It has become so fashionable to ridicule the Irish of the middle ages, their wars and miserable feuds—their want of all the great virtues which reflect lustre on a nation—that very few ever dream of looking back to these ages for models of genuine patriotism. Some credit is allowed for their martial spirit, and that vigour which never despaired in the darkest hours of defeat; but the peaceful genius of modern times, robed in scarlet mantles, and cushioned in the glittering state coaches of civic authorities, would blush to receive a lesson in the arts of peace, in public beneficence and literary taste, from their rude, old predecessors in the Anglo-Irish towns. At some other time, a sketch may be given of the general history of those towns. It would exhibit many proofs of private munificence, which shame the degeneracy of modern burghers. It might, perhaps, suggest some useful reflections, some long views and generous aspirations, in those modern days, when the Irish towns and cities, for the first time in our history, can be strictly said to belong to the Irish people. From 1172 to 1600, the towns were literally English garrisons, inhabited by the descendants of the English, with purely English sympathies, and of course vehemently opposed, not only to the mere Irish, but also to the degenerate English. From 1600 to 1641, was a period of transition. There was then a slight infusion of new

English Protestant blood on the one hand; and on the other, the mass of the citizens, being Catholics, began, under the pressure of persecution, to merge their anti-Irish hereditary prejudices in the more powerful religious sympathy towards their Catholic mere Irish brethren. From 1641 to 1650, a period of war, the towns belonged exclusively either to Catholic or Protestant. From 1650 to the Irish Corporation Reform, 1834, the towns and cities, that is the life of them—corporations—were the property (a few years, and occasional instances, excepted) of Protestants alone. Now, in law, they belong neither to Catholic or Protestant, but to Ireland; except perhaps Dublin, where a crippled dwarf—the spawn of British wrong and Irish discord—a corporation, shorn by the Imperial Parliament of the best rights of the old municipalities, presides in the second city of the greatest empire in the world. Perhaps, at some distant day, citizens of all creeds and parties may at length discover that, where the rights of a city are concerned, the interest and honour of all are the interest of each. But, passing from such a dreamy possibility as Irish national union, it may be stated as a fact that now, for the first time in our history, the Irish corporations are integral elements of Irish nationality, vested with great influence, for good and evil, over the principles and tastes of the people at large, and accountable to posterity for the use they make of their power. Surely it is unnecessary to adduce school-boy proofs of the wonderful influence of municipalities on the destinies of Europe. The free cities of Germany—the petty republics of Italy in the middle ages—and the glorious states of ancient Greece!—what a brilliant page in the history of the world—and what were they but towns? To illustrate briefly these observations, let us take the town of Galway. It is fortunate, beyond other Irish towns, in having such an historian as Mr. Hardiman, who has edited, for the Irish Archæological Society, several interesting documents connected with the history of the capital of the West. To a very late period, it ranked as the second town in Ireland, immediately after Dublin. “Indeed,” says Dr. Molyneux, who visited it in 1709, “Dublin excepted, this is the largest town, taken altogether, I have seen in Ireland. The houses are all built of stone; of a coarse kind of marble; all like one another; like castles—from their arched doors and strong walls, windows and floors—and seem to have been all built about the same time, after the model, I hear, of some town in Flanders. The inhabitants are most Roman Catholics, and the trade is wholly in their hands. Here are two nunneries, who, keeping somewhat private are connived at by the governor and mayor. The inhabitants, I find, are all what they call English-Irish, that is, families that came over at or soon after the Conquest, and were here settled in this strong town as a colony against the natural Irish of those parts, and whose posterity still live here, and with their old religion, enjoy also their old possessions.”* Neither religion nor possessions, however, were enjoyed at this time, except under such restrictions, as paying to the soldier at the gate two sods of turf or two herrings, from every horse that entered the gate, and occasional expulsions of the whole population out of the gates. But our object is not to exhibit the magnanimity of those worthy burghers in adhering to their old faith, when it was under a cloud; but to propose as a model to our degenerate days some of those old English-Irish, who erected “the marble houses, like castles, with their arched doors, and strong walls and windows;” colonists who, unlike the immigrants of later times, felt themselves at home in Ireland, and built like men that felt so; leaving marble houses like castles as the imperishable monuments of glory, which neither the cannon of the Puritan, nor the more withering hand of penal law, could destroy. Pre-eminent among all those Galway English-Irish, like the Titans of old, in Catholic munificence, stands the family of Lynch.

From the many proofs of their burgher munificence, let one be selected, for which we are indebted to Mr. Hardiman and the Archæological Society. It is amusing in many of its details; and is doubly interesting, because it justified to the noble and generous Spaniard in 1674, the open hand which he extended to the fallen Irish, exiled for their faith. It proved to him that the ancestors of those exiles, if they had the means, would have bequeathed to Ireland monuments as noble as his own Cathedral at Seville, or the proudest erections of Spanish genius. But, leaving to others to dream what they might have done, let us see what they actually did with Irish resources alone—and the aboos of their terrible neighbours, the O’Flaherties, ringing in their ears.

To understand this amusing document, published by Mr. Hardiman, the reader must bear in mind the singular importance attached to nobility in Spain. To be everything that a Spaniard would wish, you should be a son of somebody—“an Hidalgo.” Dominic Lynch might have been prudent and pious, and so learned as to compose great tomes, and shine as a bright star of the Dominican order, but to grace with due dignity the Regent’s chair of a Spanish College, to which his other merits entitled him, and to which he was actually elected, it was most desirable, said the Spaniard, that something should be known of his family. It was dangerous, no doubt, for a Spanish monk to visit Galway in 1674, to hold a court of inquiry on the subject, these being the penal days, so feelingly bemoaned by Davis; but it should be done. Dominic does not, if he dared, decline the inquiry; and forthwith, in the fair city of Seville, on the 13th of May, 1674, witnesses and notary public, and all legal Alcades, are summoned to the hall of the Dominican college of St. Thomas of Aquin, in said city, and with all the punctilious gravity of the Spaniard, a document is drawn up to the effect, that Dominic Lynch has been elected to the dignity of Regent of the Dominican college in Seville; but that Michel de Mendoza, Doctor and Rector, Fra. Gabriel Vaguerito, Fra. Petro Barrero, Fra. Francis Ximenes, Fra. Francis Torregrona, and others, in the name of all the brethren, do appoint the Rev. Father Francis de Ayora, Collegial of the said College, to go into the kingdoms of Ireland, England, and Scotland, and take due information on the pedigree, life, and behaviour of said Dr. Dominic Lynch; examine witnesses of approved fidelity, and bring home to Spain the depositions, signed and sealed. No expense deters them. And for the better security of Father Ayora in discharging this great trust, “we hereby engage the goods and rents of this college, present and to come.” Truly imposing inquisition into the ancestral merits of a man, who could not count a lord or a sir in all his line, or at least did not rest his claim upon them, but on the industrious and enterprising burghers, who made their wealth by the people, and dispensed it munificently for the good of the people, and did not, from silly pride, stand aloof from the municipal council of the people, but made the general good of their town the ruling passion of their lives.

On the second of September, 1674, Fra. Francis de Ayora is sitting in the good old town of Galway, armed with the authority of the Dominican College of Seville. But how changed was Galway then? The Catholics, that is, all the inhabitants had been driven outside the walls by Cromwell in 1652. They received letters patent for their restoration from Charles II., in 1660, in compliment to their having been the last town that held out for him against the Parliament. But these letters never had their full effect; and Galway was subjected to the "new rules for corporations" of 1672, which made the cities of Ireland what they were within our memory. Yet, Fra. Francis holds his court, and collects his evidence. But what evidence does he need, save the monuments around him? One hundred years ago, Elizabeth and the Reformation had dried up the well-spring of charity and munificence; the Cromwellian troopers had, during nearly ten years, patrolled the grass-grown streets of Galway, and revelled in its tenantless mansions; but the Lynches had never worshipped with either Elizabeth or Cromwell—the monuments of their fathers forbade the change. Even now, these monuments speak to Fra. Francis de Ayora more eloquently than any genealogist. "I do testify," he says, "that, in the church of St. Nicholas, in Galway, there is, in the chief place of the great chappel of said church, a window with glass of divers colours, whereon are painted different arms, and on the upper part of said window, the arms of the Lynches; in the same great chappel, at the Epistle's side, there is a stone, a yard long and high, on which are escutcheons, the arms of the Lynches alone: in a 'bigg chappel, sideways to the great chappel,' a tomb of black marble, five feet high, stretched across the whole breadth of the chapel, 14 or 15 yards, and bore the arms of the Lynches. On the chief doors of the church, in several places inside and without, appeared the same arms, and no other." On the bridge, on the walls of the town, on public places and private houses, Fra. Francis de Ayora is greeted by the same arms, and is proud of the choice of his brethren of Seville. Happy Dominic Lynch, Regent elect of the College of St. Thomas of Aquin!—thy fathers were unacquainted with gingerbread brick, barn-walls, or gothic hunting-lodges. Such churches could not survive a century's neglect; but those coloured windows and gigantic tombs, the city walls and public places, had an eloquence then for the Spaniard, which they have not, we fear, now for all the countrymen of the Lynches.

In executing his commission, Fra. Francis examined the records of the city. A manuscript folio, four fingers thick, which belonged to the chapter, and recorded the antiquities and remarkable events that happened in Galway, was interrogated, and it gave glorious evidence of the magnificence of the Lynches. In 1312, Nicholas Lynch, the Black Marshal, erected the first work near the great gate built by himself. In 1442, Edmond Lynch Fitzthomas erected, at his own cost and charges, the large and beautiful bridge of Galway, "on the river of Lockcorb." In 1485, Dominic Lynch, commonly called black Dominic, obtained letters patent from Henry VII., authorizing the citizens of Galway to elect out of their corporation a mayor every year. Peter Lynch, brother to Dominic, was first mayor: the thirty following mayors, four excepted, were Lynches—and altogether, down to the day on which Fra. Francis inspected the registers, nearly half the mayors of Galway had been Lynches. And well had they merited their civic honours.—Black Dominic, and his son Stephen, obtained a Bull from the Pope constituting St. Nicholas' Church a Collegiate Church. He also founded the college, and bestowed upon it three stately houses of marble within the walls of the town. He built the east door of the church of pure marble, and its south wing near the chapel of the Blessed Virgin. And what would he not build, were he living in our days, if the Head of his Church, the great Municipal reformer, invited the Irish Prelates to erect for themselves an independent University—a centre for Catholic intellect—in that place where such a bulwark is most required? Dominic's purse would have poured out its glittering treasures to aid the great work. These so called "dark ages!" how far are we from comprehending, much less imitating, their noble generosity. In 1493, James Lynch Fitz Stephen built, at his own cost, the choir of our Lady's Church in the west of the town, and adorned St. Nicholas' Church with "sumptuous glass windows." It was he that was generally believed to have hanged his own son, for having broken trust with a stranger. In 1500, Margaret Athey, wife of Stephen Lynch Fitz-Dominic, commenced the erection of the convent of St. Augustin, on Fort-hill, and endowed it with houses and lands. Four years later, Stephen founded an hospital in Galway. In 1510, James Lynch erected, at his own cost, the Chapel of St. James, in the new Fort near the city. In 1513, Walter Lynch granted a house near St. Nicholas' Church, for poor and religious women. The ignorance and immorality that paved the way for the rebellion of Luther and Cranmer had not affected the great public virtues of this wonderful family. In 1541, Thomas Lynch founded the Chapel of St. Bridget, in the east suburbs of the town, and near it an hospital for the maintenance of reduced citizens, for whom a general collection was made every Sunday. In 1557, James Lynch, mayor, built the east part of the town-house, at his own cost and charges. Even when the withering blight of the Reformation had set in, in 1561, the Lynches still build, as if in the conviction that the church of their fathers would survive the tempests that were gathering around her. In that year, Nicholas More Lynch made, at his own cost, a sumptuous work, near that of his grandfather, in the church of Galway; and also a belfry on the south side, with a pair of organs and a great bell, whose key was always in his own custody. In 1580, when Catholics were not allowed to have public chapels, Dominic Lynch builds, at his own cost, the west side of the town-house, and a free-school, in a commodious place, near the sea side. Two copies of the great folio book were duly collated; the preceding extracts authenticated in presence of Fra. Francis, and formally signed in his name as Notary Apostolic.

Now comes the examination of witnesses.—Fra. Francis was ordered by his convent to propose seven demands regarding Dominic Lynch, Regent elect, and his family—whether he was born in lawful wedlock, celebrated according to the rites of the Catholic Church? whether any of his ancestors were Turks, Jews, public penitents, or new converts? whether they had been citizens of Galway, and had not, during at least four generations, any base employment, or vile office, which could disqualify them from holding stations in the corporation of the town. These, and a few other points regarding the character of the witnesses themselves, and the public belief in the munificence of the Lynches, were proposed by Fra. Francis. Among other witnesses, Dr. James Lynch, Archbishop of Tuam and Metropolitan of Connaught deposes—

That he is a relation of father Dominic Lynch, but says only what he knows to be truth before God and his conscience. He was present at the thesis sustained by Dominic for the Master of Arts in the royal convent of St. Paul, of Seville. Peter Lynch, father of Dominic,

“Lived in the country at Sruell, with much splendour, honour, and repute of hospitality—how great soever were the persons that passed by, receiving and treating them with all manner of courtesy and hospitality, both the noble and the meaner sort, whether ecclesiastic or lay, as Marquises, Earls, Viscounts, Barons, Knights, Lawyers, and the Lords Judges, whom he treated twice a-year most splendidly; as also the now Duke of Ormond. All this he attests as known by public report.”

Philip O'Sullivan was a bitter enemy of the Anglo-Irish. Had they united, he says, with the Milesian Irish, at the close of Elizabeth's reign, they would have extorted from that wicked woman the liberty of their church and the security of their properties. But how his heart warms to them, when he describes them rivalling his own old Irish in attachment to the Catholic faith. Many of the best defenders of that faith, by pen and sword, were the English-Irish. What a host of brilliant names these English Lynches gave to the Irish Church—Archbishop Lynch deposes that he knew three Lynches bishops “of this town;” Bishop Kirwan, of Killala, exiled in 1652 for the faith; Walter Lynch, Dean, and afterwards Vicar Apostolic of Tuam, D.D., LL.D., and finally Bishop of Clonfert; the Dean and Archdeacon of Tuam, before the present, both Lynches; James Fallon, Vicar Apostolic, and Charles Fallon, Provost of the Cathedral of Killala; Michael Lynch, Vicar Apostolic of Kilmacduagh; Stephen Lynch, Provincial O. S. A., well known in France, Spain, and Rome, and Vicar Apostolic of Scotland; Richard Lynch, S. J., Professor of Divinity in Salamanca; Stephen Lynch, Guardian, Irish Franciscan Convent, Rome; Andrew Lynch, Bishop of Kilfenora; Nicholas Skeret, Archbishop of Tuam—all these, with Richard Martin and Patrick Darcy, Chief Justices, Sir Richard Blake and Geoffrey Brown, Councillors of this Kingdom—were all relations to Dominic Lynch, Regent elect of the College of Seville. Well might deponent feel proud of the fidelity of his blood to the faith of Rome.

The Lynches, it was also found, had married into the most noble families of the kingdom—Elizabeth Lynch was married to the O'Shaughnessy; another to the Earl of Clanrickard; another to Sir Terence O'Brien, son of the Earl of Thomond; and a fourth to the head of the O'Flaherties. These, together with Sir Henry Lynch, who married the eldest daughter of the Lord Mayo, were relations to Father Dominic Lynch. To the fourth demand, the Archbishop answered—

“That Father Dominick Lynch, his parents and forefathers, are ancient Catholics, pure and unspotted, and that never any of said race forsook the Roman Catholic religion ever since the reign of Henry VIII., in the year of our Lord 1532. And in proof of their constancy, the Lynches, as well as several other families of Galway, together with the loss of their goods and rents, were content to quit the very town they founded themselves, having surrounded it with great walls, and embellished it with churches and stately houses, upon their own cost and charges. In like manner they were forced to forfeit their privileges and liberties of freemen and natives of the town, and to have only right to be members of the senate or town-house, of the chapter and magistrate. All which they suffer for not entering into communication of the Protestant religion with those that govern at present. The last mayor of the town who was a Lynch has been deprived of his office with much ignominy, although he took it as a great honour to be so persecuted for the love of Jesus. He was also deprived of his whole revenues, goods, and houses in that town in 1652, when the Rump Parliament became masters of it, after a whole year's siege, at the cost and charge of the townsmen, who never surrendered themselves until they had express orders from their prince and king to surrender. At which time the parents of Dominic Lynch lost all that they had, and were excluded (as all the rest of the inhabitants were) from all manner of employments, both in the town and throughout the kingdom, for being Catholics; forced for to see others possess their ancient estates and goods or embrace the new religion, which they would never do; so that it cannot be at all doubted of said persons but that they are most pure and unspotted, and most firm and constant in the Catholic faith.

Temper sic duro est inspicienda fides.”

Here was enough to entitle Father Dominic to raise his head in any assembly of Spanish grandees. But the Notary Apostolic extends his inquisition, and examines several ancient wills, in Latin and parchment, made by the ancestors of Father Dominic. One of these wills was approved in a provincial council of seven bishops in 1520; another, of 1482, ordains that Martin Lynch should be buried in the chapel of the Blessed Virgin, in St. Nicholas' Church, to which he had bequeathed three houses. He had also left legacies to the wardens and clergy of the town, to every convent and religious in the same, to young women of birth, and to seventy-two convents throughout Ireland. For the perusal of these wills, still preserved in the college library, Galway, Mr. Hardiman is indebted to Dr. O'Donnell, Bishop of Galway. They are published as an appendix to Fra. Ayora's inquisition, in the valuable miscellany of the Irish Archaeological Society. One of them, made in 1496, by John Lynch Fitz John, merchant of the city of Galway, after providing liberally for all his family, bequeathed a stone house to Nicholas Lynch, on condition that Nicholas and his heirs should celebrate the anniversary of testator and his wife. To the college he bequeathed two marks; to the convent of St. Mary, a chasuble and stole; to the convents of Clare, Kilconlyn, Rorryalla, Mayne, Rosherk, Sligo, Rayhanna, and seven others, two ounces; to the convents of Roba, Rorysturra, and others, xxd., all to be paid in merchandize.

The will approved of by the seven bishops in provincial council, was copied by Mr. Hardiman from the Rolls' Office, Dublin; but unfortunately the enrolment was carelessly made. Enough, however, is legible to prove the wealth and charity of the testator. Dominic Lynch, merchant and burgess of the town of Galway. Fra. Francis could read therein legacies to rich and poor; to the college, and churches, and public buildings of the town; and to all the convents in Ireland of all orders—an act of charity more comprehensive than strikes the modern eye at first sight, for, in 1508, when the will was made, the Irish and Anglo-Irish convents even of the same order, sympathised but too deeply with the rival feelings of the two races, and were, in many instances, governed by different Provincials.

Mr. Hardiman closes his ancient evidences of the public munificence of the Lynch family, with a document of Martin Lynch, who founded an hospital, called “the poor men's house,” in Galway, in 1567. A significant date! Well may it have been the last, for, next year, 1568, public mass was first prohibited in Galway, though all the inhabitants were Catholic. Who can measure the debt of justice due to this country from England?

The result of the inquisition is briefly told. Father Dominic Lynch lived long to enjoy his honours in the University of Seville. He died in 1697, leaving behind him the reputation of a good son of St. Dominic, and of a profound scholar. He had been successively Lecturer of the Arts and Philosophy, and Professor of Divinity; and held a high place among the writers of Spain and of his order.*

Mr. Hardiman closes his learned notices with an expression of his acknowledgments to an amiable member of the Lynch family, for the use of a document so honourable to her house. It were well that other families would avail themselves of the intimation made, we believe, by the Archæological Society, to publish similar documents; especially if, like the present, they would prove to our wealthy citizens, that the nineteenth century, with all its boasted civilization, has still many lessons to learn from the disinterested munificence of ruder ages.

* Dr. Burke, Hib. Dom. p. 545, says, he heard from some Spaniards, that Father Dominic wrote an entire course of theology, which was, unfortunately, lost at sea, when going to be printed in France. He certainly wrote four volumes of philosophy, printed successively in 1666, 1667, 1670, and 1686; but these, like hundreds of others composed by Irishmen, are now unknown in Ireland by even name.

Life and Labours of a Catholic Curate.

CHAPTER III.

ONE circumstance still, however, continued to gratify his parents, and this was, that during the whole time of his attendance at Shannon's school, with the exception of the first two or three months, they could observe that he frequently made efforts, and very often successful ones, at curbing the hasty ebullitions of temper to which he was subject. In this respect, his mother's occasional remonstrances were invaluable; especially when her son saw with what singular beauty her advice and example uniformly harmonized together. Neither was the example of his father at all lost upon him—on the contrary, we question but the triumph, so to speak, which the latter had gained over a disposition prone to resentment, was of much value to him, if not more, than that of his mother herself. At all events they saw, with sincere satisfaction, that he was labouring in secret to establish for himself such a system of self-control, as might enable him to imitate the examples that shone so brightly before his eyes.

After the lapse of a few months, another schoolmaster was procured—a man named Molloy—but of a very different disposition, indeed, from that of his predecessor; he was a mild, amiable man, of a kind, but, at the same time, independent character, and an excellent scholar besides—a want of scholarship having been, by the way, one of the hidden blemishes of worthy Shannon.

We have mentioned the parish priest, whose name was O'Brien. He was a small man, but of easy and gentlemanly deportment; he had been educated in France, and narrowly escaped with his life during the sanguinary tumults of the French Revolution. At that time he had but one curate, named Brady, who lived in the house with him, and to whom he paid the enormous sum of fifteen pounds a-year. It is true he boarded and lodged him, and allowed him the keep of a horse, and it is also true that the good-natured and contented curate did not seem to possess a single wish beyond the comforts of an office, whose duties were sufficient to kill about half a dozen men. How they met the severe and incessant demands that were, night and day, made upon their exertions, is a mystery which we are not able to solve—and the less so, as we know that at this moment, when the parish in question is depopulated of half its inhabitants by disease, emigration and the consolidation of farms, it requires four clergymen to discharge its duties effectually.

Father O'Brien, we have said, was a man of easy and urbane manners; he was also said to be a scholar, and an elegant one; but of this the writer is not competent to judge. His conversation, however, was not only easy and cheerful, but, whenever he wished, replete with humour that was sometimes bland, natural, and harmless, but occasionally pregnant with the bitterest satire. His curate, the Rev. Peter Brady, was a man of great simplicity of character, benevolent, when his miserable means were considered, even to that point at which the ridiculous becomes blended with the good and the charitable; he was unassuming also, full of quiet and unostentatious piety, and took a singular delight in speaking Latin, which he spoke with considerable fluency. Many a time do we remember to have seen him and Father O'Brien jogging on, on their two sober hacks, at day-break of a bleak winter's morning, to hold a station, perhaps in some wild, uncultivated district, that was distant eight or ten miles from their place of residence. Father O'Brien, though plainly dressed was yet possessed of taste enough and knowledge of the world to have something in his costume that was quite sufficient to determine his character as that of a gentleman, whilst Father Peter, whose means probably limited the extent and value of his wardrobe, was contented with a very plain black coat, made loosely and not of the most costly fabric, a black double-breasted waistcoat, and black velvet breeches, with cloth gaiters of the same colour. We really believe that neither the one nor the other entertained a wish beyond the hard and laborious station of life in which their lot was cast.

Father O'Brien was by far the older and feebler man; and Father Peter had but one wish—that he might live to see the day when his salary should be raised to twenty—or, heavens, could the thing be possible! maybe to twenty-five; for then he could be able to pay up many of the little bills for which he had made himself accountable, in order to relieve several of his poor but struggling and industrious parishioners.

As Father O'Brien and his curate were in the habit of holding a station, mostly every year, in Tom O'Donovan's house, they consequently became aware of the object for which his parents had placed their son at Shannon's school. This circumstance threw him into occasional conversation with them, and was the means, besides, of eliciting some plain but excellent advice from both; but especially from Father Peter, as to the state of mind with which he ought to prosecute his studies, and the solicitude with which he should watch the development of every passion and propensity in himself, that was likely to obstruct his progress in the paths of virtue and religious advancement.

"Look at our lives," said Father Peter, "and what do you see, or can you see, in them, but care and unceasing labour, the endurance of hardship, meals often limited and hasty—nights of abridged rest, when we must, in a state of exhaustion and fatigue, forego the comfort of a repose that the previous day's toil had rendered so necessary? This is what you see, and let me ask you is there any thing that could tempt even the humblest ambition in this? that is, in this severe routine of endless fatigue and hardships? Yet, let me tell you," he added, "that whilst we ride through wind and sleet and snow, to perform the sublime mysteries of our holy religion—probably on the road side, or under the scanty shelter of a hedge, or in some rudely-constructed shed, which can only shelter us when the wind blows from one direction; when you see all this, and know that the elements are beating against our unprotected heads, whilst in the act of God's solemn worship—I say, my dear boy, that we then enjoy an inward sustainment and an elevating support—arising from the consciousness of having discharged duties fraught with such happiness to our fellow-creatures, according to the best light of our conscience and our knowledge—that we would not exchange for the highest secular honours of this world's ambition."

Now, in order to render much of Father Peter's language intelligible at the present day, it becomes absolutely necessary that we should pause a little in our narrative, and give our readers a sketch of the wretched condition in which the people and their Clergy were placed with respect to church accommodation and the other external means of administering the ordinances of religion.

We have already stated, that in the large parish which was native to the subject of our memoir, there was, at that period, a population nearly double what it is at present. The consequence naturally is, that the religious accommodation and the general demand for the administration of its rites and sacraments, must have been double what they are at this moment. This, to be sure, is reasonable enough—for it ought to have been the case, although it was not. In the first place, the demands for the duties of religion were much more than could be met by those who were educated in Maynooth, then only in its infancy, and by no means adequate to afford the necessary supply of clergymen to the growing population.

We must observe here, by the way, that the circumstances of diminished population alluded to in this parish, are of a peculiar nature, and somewhat at variance with those of the country at large.

Be this as it may, the situation of the parish of Mullanabrogue, with respect to church accommodation, was exactly as follows:—In the lower part of it there was one chapel, built at the foot of a range of mountainous hills, at which the inhabitants of the adjoining mountain and hill-ranges attended, as did those of the wealthier inland for miles around. This was the only chapel then standing in this immense and populous parish. Another place of worship consisted in a small shed, somewhat longer, but not higher, than a sentry-box, which was open in front, and partially roofed in. It was placed under shelter of some fine whitethorn trees, of great growth, and stood at the extremity of a green circle of close grass, which circle was itself enclosed by rows of whitethorn similar in size and beauty to those which covered the altar. To this simple and strikingly solemn-looking place of worship the people flocked in thousands; and although the accommodation was wretched—in fact there was none at all during the winter months—yet we must confess, that to witness the devoted multitude prostrate in the bending attitude of devotion, the priest in his robes celebrating the rites of religion, whilst the sound of the storm, as it swept through the surrounding trees, seemed to add its solemn diapason to the sacrifice which was offered up;—these, we say, were calculated to give more impressiveness to religion than probably the most highly ornamented cathedral in the world. This, however, is only one view of it—but to complete the truth of the picture, we must fancy to ourselves the rain, and the hail, and the snow, beating strongly, by the force of the blast, upon the defenceless and unsheltered congregation, as they knelt in the now plashing clay, or upon the hard snow, with probably a stone, or wisp of straw or hay, by way of luxury, under their knees. The other two places of worship were precisely of a similar description. One of them was a little stone shed, built upon a roadside, so simple and primitive in its construction, that, to such as knew not the purpose for which it was built, it possessed all the mystery of an Egyptian symbol. The third resembled the first, being a little round garden, enclosed by a shallow ditch, which, in point of fact, was no protection to it from the neighbouring cattle, whenever they took a fancy to taste the grass within its little circle.

Here, upon a Sunday, were to be seen the aforesaid priests, each having his two altars—for they were literally such, and nothing more—to attend to; each altar being, at least, from four to five miles distant from the other. They rode pretty briskly from altar to altar, as may be supposed; each priest with a pair of leathern saddle-bags behind him, in which it was necessary to carry the vestments, books, chalice, &c., and whatever was requisite for performing the ceremony of Mass.

And yet these two men were cheerful, and full of that harmless mirth which is so frequently associated with great piety and simplicity of character. In society, when they happened to be together, no man laughed so heartily at Father O'Brien's jokes as Father Peter, nor did any man enjoy Father Peter's pleasantries with half the zest that was manifested by Father O'Brien. If you happened to sit beside the latter, he would whisper to you that there never lived a parish priest so fortunate in a curate as he was; whilst, on the other hand, if you chanced to have a private chat with Father Peter, he would tell you that no curate ever was blessed with such a parish priest as was Father O'Brien. In point of fact, they were as perfect a picture of harmony and unambitious happiness as this world, in any of its many phases of life, either private or professional, could possibly present.

It is, indeed, a delightful thing to look back upon these men—their piety, their simplicity, their incessant labour, and their singular zeal—and to think upon those houseless congregations where there were evident such humble but fervent devotion to a religion which had so little of this world or its spirit either to support or diminish its influence.

The change in that parish is now, indeed, as gratifying as it is striking. Principally, upon the very sites of the primitive old altars we have described, stand at the present time, four large, but plain and commodious, chapels, in which we are certain there is no diminution of the piety that characterized those who worshipped on their once unsheltered foundations.

We have stated, however, that the population of this fine parish has been much reduced, and that the causes of it were, in some degree, peculiar and distinct from many that have operated in other instances. In order, however, that our readers may more clearly understand what we are about to relate, and enter more fully into our feelings, we shall give them, without any straining whatsoever after effect, the precise impressions that were made upon us in revisiting it, after an absence of twenty-seven years.

When we left it, we may indeed say, that the whole parish was literally teeming with a light hearted, industrious, and happy population.—Go where you might, the voice of laughter and of song was sure to be heard, either enlivening the darkness of the winter night, as you passed along the road, or stirring into greater mirth the pleasant hearth, now lit up by the bright and cheerful blaze of the warm turf-fire, whose ruddy light danced in the bright pewter, or delf, that, in due order, graced the shelves of the white and well-scoured dresser. Nor can our description end here. In spring, in summer, and in autumn, the same voices of mirth and glee and good humoured banter met you in all directions, as you passed through the country—nor could your heart fail to be touched into sorrow, or stirred into mirth, by the old songs, whether of melancholy or joy, that streamed in untaught melody through the meadows and fields on every hand. Every fair-day was then a day of festive delight, in anticipation of which, there were made, by both young and old, the most agreeable and anxious preparations, even for weeks before it arrived. And even when it did arrive, like Christmas, and Easter, and other festivals of those happy days, how few eyes, especially young ones like ours, were closed during the night preceding it. On that morning early, how delightful were the sounds which greeted our ears, even long before we were up, from such a busy din as now assailed us from every part of the road which led to it. The neighing of horses, the wild and startled lowing of cows, the bleating of sheep, and the melancholy baaing of the affrighted lambs, joined to the grunting or ear-piercing squeal of the swine, whilst the eager, or angry, or good humoured voices of those who owned them, when taken into account, all formed a chorus that was indeed music to our young and happy heart.

Then the fair itself! What a living mass of beings, rational and irrational, all moving by the several impulses of pleasure or business—each face animated by the peculiar interest by which its owner was moved in this great hum of life! What a variety of tents, each known by its characteristic sign! What an infinity of amusement! What a tempting array of cakes, fruits, and other wonderful description of refreshments, all meet the eye, and set the teeth a watering! Indeed, it is no wonder that the eye and ear should both be confounded by the endless and indescribable variety of sounds and sights which all press upon them at once; and if it were not that some particular circumstance, more striking than any of those about you, is certain to arrest one's particular attention, from time to time, we should not feel surprised if one were to fall into a kind of somnambulism by the stunning effect of the whole scene. For instance—Take care! take care!—get out of the way!—a cow has got wild by the din, and broke away, followed by her owner, calling, in a state of distraction, upon the affrighted crowd to stop her, or to leave the way, if she happens to be dangerous. There, again, is a row in another direction, and lo! a rush is made from all parts, to know what it is, or who the parties are that are fighting. In another place is a drunken man, staggering about, or some individual with his head cut and bleeding; whilst, most awful case of all, comes some comfortable farmer's wife, in a state of wild despair, who has been robbed of six pounds, the price of her butter, and she is now proclaiming her loss to the whole fair. Then, the bargaining—the huxtering—the disputing—the wrangling about matters of little value, when compared with the din and tumult that are made about them! Look, for instance—to turn to another and more pleasing image—look at that sweet and innocent country girl, who stands with her bright but longing eyes fixed upon that showy pattern of cotton, that hangs in tempting folds from a shelf in that tent. Ah! what a gown that would make, and how handsome! and to what advantage would I look in it, she thinks to herself. That and a pair of stays—and wid Peggy Boyle to make the gown—would show my figure all to pieces!

Lowly ambition! one may exclaim—but not the more innocent that it is lowly! Is not that the squire's profligate son, who stands, with keen but falcon eye, observing the force of this same lowly ambition, and calculating upon the certainty of success with which he may administer the temptation, now that he knows what it is?

We find we must check ourselves, however, and leave to the imagination of our readers fifty other sights and sounds with which, we presume, they are as well acquainted as ourselves. We have not time to show them the dancing in the tents—the festive and neighbourly computations, nor the family courtships, which are going on in the inns and public-houses. We must pause, therefore, and say, that such as a fair was then, in our native parish, it is not now. Far from it—the old mirth, the rustic abundance, and the commercial spirit, which formerly prevailed in our fairs, are all nearly gone; and little else remains, but a cold and feeble parody upon the joyous and healthy spirit with which those good old times animated them.

We shall now proceed to show the causes which have, in a great measure, if not altogether, produced this melancholy and painful change; and, in order to do it with more effect, we shall proceed with an account of our return home, after such a protracted absence.

We arrived at our native place, in the month of October, about the hour of ten o'clock at night. There had been a dim and dreamy moonlight, which we hoped might have continued until we should reach home, in order that we might catch even a faint glimpse of the beautiful scenery with which our nightly visions had been haunted for many a long year. It continued until we had reached a town distant about eight miles from the place of our destination. On we proceeded, however, at as rapid a pace as the unfortunate horses could accomplish, and had just arrived near an elevation on the road which commanded a view of the greater part of the magnificent valley in which our native parish lies, when we found, to our bitter disappointment, that the last faint glimpse had disappeared, leaving all that we so much desired to look upon shrouded in the most impenetrable obscurity. This, however, was an event for which we had no remedy but patience, and accordingly we reached the inn, and, after taking some refreshment went to bed; but, in consequence of the tumultuous state of our feelings, we found it impossible for a considerable time to sleep.

The next morning found us up by the very dawn of day; and as soon as we were dressed we proceeded to a beautiful spot, immediately adjoining the town, called Castle Hill. From this spot we commanded a magnificent view of the whole parish. However the actual change there may be for the worse, we at once perceived that the aspect of the whole country was much improved—just as a poor man with a good suit of clothes on him may look wealthier than a rich man badly clothed. This apparent change for the better was the mere result of time, and the spontaneous efforts of nature. It proceeded, in this instance, from the growth of the trees that had been planted about the dwelling-houses and in some few barren patches of the country—a circumstance which gave to the landscape a warmth and richness of colouring that had a fine effect, and seemed to tell well for the prosperity of the people. This appearance, however, was deceitful, and reminds one of those females who, on perceiving that their charms are beginning to fail them, have recourse to artificial colouring, and the creation of a false complexion to repair them.

After breakfast, we resolved to go and see the old places which were so long embalmed by early and happy associations in our memory; and with this purpose we started across the fields, until we came out upon a beloved old road, which led to the spot where we were born, and along which, fleet as a deer, had our young feet often danced in the happy and sportive exultation of youth.

Now this village which we approached had been a sweet and delightful little village—full of life and humble happiness, and having the green hills and picturesque streams about it made vocal with the voices of cheerfulness and mirth. There was one white house in it that stood on the road side, belonging to a respectable and wealthy miller, opposite to which was the grey warm-looking mill. As we turned the bend of the road which led down to this sweet picture of wealth and cleanliness, judge of our surprise and grief, when, on surveying this once comfortable looking scene, we found that all was desolate. The white house we have spoken of—well stored with abundant and well-filled meal chests, from whose ample bins many a poor and hungry creature was largely relieved—this white house, we say, which, in fact, stood as the abode of charity in the country—was now lying a heap of ugly and melancholy ruins—its walls levelled to the ground—its floors covered with grass, and its once hospitable hearth the abode of utter desolation.

From this, however, we passed over to the mill we have spoken of, and here again did a similar sight and as miserable a scene await us. The mill was unroofed—its machinery gone—its lofts removed—and the dreary impress of utter ruin upon it, even to the rank grass which grew in its window sills and along its crumbling walls. The dam and race by which water was supplied to it were long since dry, and had their bottoms covered with grass; and, in short, as before, all was solitude, silence, and desolation. Leaving the mill, we proceeded to the village, called Milltown, and here again we were met by desolation, or rather by obliteration—for, in fact, there was not a single house of the whole village visible. All had disappeared—extermination had done its work. But, what had become of the inhabitants? Where they had dispersed themselves, or been dispersed to, it is impossible now to tell. A fine house, belonging to a decent farmer, remarkable for the skill and success with which he cultivated flowers—in fact, a botanist by nature—had also shared the same fate. Not a vestige of it remained, or of the beautiful flower-garden which had so often arrested our attention when a schoolboy, excited our admiration, and, in fact, filled our young hearts with pure and singular pleasure when we passed it.

A visit to Hugh O'Neill,

EARL OF TYRONE.

[If there were a prospect of having the following, and similar documents, collected and published in a volume, it would not be given here. We present it now as a specimen of what may be found even in printed books—though hardly ever opened by our historians. In the work from which we transcribe it,* there are several other original papers on Irish affairs, at the close of Elizabeth's reign.]

MANY of our readers are familiar with the beautiful vignette to the fourth volume of "Moore's History of Ireland," representing the meeting between Hugh O'Neill and the Earl of Essex. That meeting was arranged by Sir William Warren and Sir John Harrington, who visited the great chieftain, and enjoyed his Irish hospitality. Sir John sketched the following picture of his host, family, and attendants:—The two boys dressed like noblemen's sons, with short jerkins and gold lace; the beardless, devoted body-guards, who waded like spaniels over frozen rivers; Father Nangle, the family tutor; the fern tables and fern forms, laid out under the canopy of heaven; these, if well grouped by the genius of a poet, would make interesting items in the proudest day of O'Neill's life. His glory was then culminating. Never had he ventured to ask conditions so favourable as those which he now proposed to the representative of Elizabeth. They are given in detail by Primate Lombard. Harrington was one of the very few Englishmen who showed any kind feeling to Irishmen in those days. "The Irishrie," he says, "do appeare in the upper sorte very kind and hospitable to all new comers, as I did well experience in this countrie, even so much as if my own lands were here I would hazard my dwelling with them for life. I was often well entertained, and in some sorte got ill will for speakeinge in praise of their civil usage among our own commanders, whom I often told that though I was sent out to fight with some there did appear no reason for my not eatinge with others. I was well used, and therefore am in duty bounde to speak well of the Irishrie.† For his interview with Elizabeth, and his reception by that foul-mouthed woman, see Mitchell's admirable "Life of Hugh O'Neill."

"REPORT OF A JOURNEY INTO THE NORTH OF IRELAND, WRITTEN TO JUSTICE CARY, BY SIR JOHN HARRINGTON, 1599.

"Having expected shipping till the 8th of this month, and meeting with none convenient, in respect that all were taken up with sick soldiers, or with my lord lieutenant's horses, I was desirous to make some use of the time that I should stay here, and therefore was easily persuaded to go with Sir William Warren, my learn'd friend, with whom I had formerly been acquainted in England, and to see some part of the realm northward, and the arch-rebel himself, with whom Sir William was to treat. But staying at Dundalk till the 15th of this month, and no news certain of the earl's coming, I went to see the Newry, and from thence to D(C)ar-lingford by the Narrow Water, and was hindered by waters, that I could not come back to Sir William Warren before his first meeting with the Earl of Tyrone, which was on the 17th day; what time, how far they proceeded, I know not, but it appears the earl was left in good disposition, because he kept his hour so well the next morning. And, as I found after, Sir William had told him of me, and given such a report of me, above my desert, that next day, when I came, the earl used far greater respect to me than I expected, and began debasing his own manner of hard life, comparing himself to wolves, that fill their bellies sometimes, and fast as long for it: then excused himself to me that he could not better call to mind myself, and some of my friends, that had done him courtesy in England, and been off in his company at my Lord of Ormond's, saying, those troubles had made him forget almost all his friends.

"After this, he fell to private communication with Sir William, to the effecting of the matters begun the day before, to which I thought it not fit to intrude myself, but took occasion the while to entertain his two sons, by proving them in their learning, and their tutors, which were one fryar Nangle, a Franciscan, and a younger scholar, whose name I know not; and finding the children of good, manly spirit, their age between thirteen and fifteen, in English cloths, like a nobleman's sons; with short gerkins, and gold lace; of a good, cheerful aspect, freckle-faced, not tall of stature, but strong and well set, both of them their English tongue.

"I gave them, not without the advice of Sir William Warren, my English translation of Ariosto, which I got at Dublin; which their teachers took very thankfully, and soon after showed it to the earl, who called to see it openly, and would needs hear some part of it read. I turned, as if it had been by chance, to the beginning of the 45th canto, and some other passages, which he seemed to like so well, that he solemnly swore his boys should read all the book over to him.

"Then they fell to communication again, and calling me to him, he said that I should witness and tell my lord lieutenant how, against all his confederates' wills, Sir William had drawn him to a longer cessation, which he would never have agreed to, but in confidence of my lord's honourable dealing with him; for, saith he, now is my harvest-time, now have my men their six weeks' pay aforehand, that they may have nothing to do but fight, and if I omit this opportunity, and then you shall prepare to fight me in the meantime, I may be condemned for a fool.

"Also one pretty thing I noted, that the paper being drawn for him to sign, and his signing it with O'Neill, Sir William (though with very great difficulty) made him to new-write it, and subscribe Hugh Tyrone. Then we broke our fasts with him, and at his meat he was very merry, and it was my hap to thwart one of his priests in argument, to which he gave reasonable good ear, and some approbation. He drank to my lord's health, and bade me tell him that he loved him, and acknowledged his cessation had been very honourably kept. He made likewise solemn protestation that he was not ambitious, but sought only safety of his life, and pardon of his conscience—without which he would not live, though the queen should give him Ireland.

"Then he asked of Sir Henry Harington, and said he heard he had much wrong, to have an imputation of want of courage for the last defeat at Arklow; protesting that himself had known Sir Henry serve as valiantly as ever any man did, naming the time, place, and persons, all known to Sir William Warren. Other pleasant and idle tales were needless and impertinent; or to describe his fern table, fern forms, spread under the stately canopy of heaven. His guard, for the most part were beardless boys without shirts, who, in the frost, wade as familiarly through rivers as water-spaniels. With what charm such a master makes them love him I know not, but if he bid come, they come; if go, they do go; if he say do this, they do it. He makes apparent show to be inclinable to peace, and some of his nearest followers have it buzzed amongst them that some league of England with Spain or Scotland, or, I know not where, may endanger them. But himself, no doubt, waits only to hear what my lord-lieutenant intends, and according to that will bend his course.

"Fryar Nangle swears all oaths that he will do all the good he can, and that he is guiltless of the heinous crimes he is indicted of; for if he had his pardon there might be made good use of him. This is all I remember any way worthy the writing to you; not doubting but Sir William Warren, that hath the sole charge of this business, will give you much better account of the mightier affairs than I, that only went to see their manner of parting.

"I remain, in much duty,

"JOHN HARINGTON."

VOL. II.

FEBRUARY, 1848.

Present State of Switzerland.

LORD PALMERSTON AND THE JESUITS.

SWITZERLAND consists at present — or did consist, until within the last few months — of twenty-two independent states, confederated together for mutual protection and mutual assistance. The government is administered by a General Diet, the president of which is styled the Landamman, but the sovereign independence of each of the cantons is the fundamental principle on which the whole confederation rests. The federal Pact was concluded on the 16th August, 1814, and solemnly guaranteed at Vienna by England, France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia in the following year. About this there can be no cavil, it is distinctly acknowledged by all parties, including the Radicals of Switzerland and even Lord Palmerston himself. In the debate on the affairs of Switzerland, which took place in the French Chamber of Peers, during the last month, M. Guizot read a despatch of Lord Palmerston, dated June 9, 1842, and addressed to Mr. Percy, then the representative of the Court of St. James in Switzerland, in which he expressly declares that the sovereign independence of each of the cantons is the fundamental principle of the Swiss Confederation—that it has been guaranteed by the treaties of 1814 and 1815, and that it must not be infringed without the consent of all the cantons. It is manifest, therefore, that no one State can be robbed of its sovereignty by a vote even of all the others, for it entered the Confederation with the express stipulation that it was to remain an independent State, and nothing but its own free act can deprive it of this character. To constitute all the confederated cantons into one independent republic—which the radicals openly proclaim to be their intention—would be as great an invasion of the rights of the non-consenting states, as if Austria were to force Saxony or Hanover or Wurtemberg to incorporate themselves in her empire. If the continental powers have the least regard for their own safety they will not suffer this last consummation of radical iniquity on any pretext whatever: for it is impossible that the minority can speak their sentiments freely or truly whilst the present “reign of terror” continues in the republic. We would rather hope that, laying aside their petty jealousies, they will yet check the growth of religious infidelity and social disorder in the bud, and force the Swiss robbers to fulfil the seventh commandment if they cannot induce them to believe it.

It will be within the recollection of our readers, that a body of troops, called the “free corps,” was assembled in Switzerland, within the last few years, under the leadership of a fellow called Ochsenbein, and that without the authority even of the General Diet, they attempted to take, by storm, the town of Lucerne, which at that time had not given them the pretext of the Jesuits. They strove to overturn the government simply because it was Catholic, or, rather, because it was Christian; but on that occasion they were signally defeated. In any other country in Europe Ochsenbein would have been hanged, but the bloody revolution in Geneva, and other circumstances, enabled the radicals to send such representatives to the General Diet as chose this man for their president. Seven of the Catholic cantons—Friburg, Zug, Uri, Unterwalden, Lucerne, Schytz, and the Valais—found it necessary to enter into a separate alliance for mutual protection, which was called the Sunderabund. The General Diet demanded that this separate confederation should be dissolved, and that each of the cantons in which there were Jesuits, should expel them from their territories. As the year 1847 advanced, the Diet became more urgent; it dismissed from the army such officers as held any post under the Sunderabund, and declared its resolution of imposing its decree on the refractory cantons by force of arms. It must be observed that the question at issue was a constitutional one—whether the General Diet had a right to interfere in the purely internal affairs of the separate states—for the Catholics were prepared to dissolve their confederation the moment they received a sufficient guarantee that their cantonal independence would be respected. It must be sufficiently obvious, that to say to the sovereign states of Friburg or Lucerne, “though you wish to have your children educated by the Jesuits, we will not allow you to do so, but will make war upon you if you do not expel them from your territories,” was an invasion of its civil rights and of religious liberty. So thought the Protestant state of Neuchatel, which declared that the principle for which the Catholic cantons were leagued was the very principle for which the Swiss of old so nobly fought, until they were declared free and independent states by the treaty of Westphalia in 1648; so M. Guizot unanswerably proved in his despatch to M. Bois-le-Comte, of the 2nd July, 1847. “It is pretended,” he says, “that not to recognize in the Federal Diet the right of enforcing its decisions on the minority, is to strike a blow at the principle of the independence of the people. To show the total falsehood of this assertion it is sufficient to reply, that by the terms of its constitutional Pact, as well as by virtue of its entire history, Switzerland is not one state, but a confederation of states, which, in delegating to the General Diet certain powers recognized as necessary for the common weal, have reserved to themselves, with regard to their internal regimen, the essential rights of their sovereignty. This is the Switzerland which the treaties have recognized, and it is in consideration of this organization of Switzerland, that the treaties have been concluded. If the Diet, yielding to deplorable excitement, should make an attempt on the rights which are the basis of the federal Pact and of the treaties; if, under the pretext of watching over the security of the confederation, it should pretend to prescribe or to interdict to the cantonal governments every measure which it might please to consider as being capable of affecting this security, some time or other; so extravagant an interpretation of the Pact—an interpretation analogous to that which the ministers of Charles X. gave to the fourteenth article of the charter—would evidently be nothing else than the first step towards the destruction of the individual existence of the cantons; that is to say, towards the abolition of the Pact itself, and, consequently, towards the annulling of the treaties concluded in virtue of that Pact.

Yet the Diet proceeded to prepare for a violent invasion of the Catholic cantons. The whole male population of the country is placed under arms, on one side or other, and war appears with all its pride, pomp, and circumstance. The radicals—those lovers of liberty, suppress, wherever they have the power, every newspaper that is not in their interest. Yet all Europe looks on with folded arms, and M. Guizot's next despatch is dated in November, four months after the one just quoted was written, and when the civil war had already commenced in Switzerland. The Catholic cantons had done everything in their power to avert this calamity; they even went so far as to consent to the withdrawal of the Jesuits after two years, provided the suppressed convents of other religious orders, which the radicals had plundered in Argau, would be restored. But the radicals were inexorable, and some of their deputies declared openly, that as they had now an overwhelming force at their command, they would trample on the weaker party. The Sunderabund had not quite twenty thousand troops to oppose to nearly a hundred thousand; they could not, therefore, act on the offensive, and as each canton would require most of its troops to protect its own soil, it was quite evident that only a section of their small army could be brought together to oppose the overwhelming force of their enemies. Under these circumstances, they appealed to the protection of the five powers, which in 1815 had solemnly guaranteed their cantonal independence. It was clearly the duty of those powers to fulfil their engagements, by interfering to protect the rights of the weaker party. Only words would have been necessary, for the radicals would not have dared to oppose their wishes. Yet it was so managed, that their collective note was not agreed upon until the Sunderabund was crushed, and then Lord Palmerston declared that there were no two parties in Switzerland! Thus, according to this liberal and constitutional statesman, a free state loses all its rights, and in fact ceases to exist as such, the moment it is robbed of its independence by brute force. No Russian Ukase ever proclaimed a doctrine more false, more despotic, or more subversive of liberty. The Czar naturally took part with the English foreign secretary, and after all M. Guizot's efforts, only France, Austria, and Prussia presented the collective note to the Swiss Diet.

From the very first we suspected that Lord Palmerston, who is the most unprincipled statesman of the age (and God knows that is saying a great deal), would be the patron and protector of the infidels, or, as he chooses, by a diplomatic fiction to call them, the Protestants of Switzerland. We knew him to be the consistent, though, perhaps, the unwitting enemy of Christianity—we will not say of Catholicity, except in those places where the two names are identical. We do not speak of his intentions, but we say that such is the tendency of his acts. In Syria the Christians enjoyed perfect liberty, under the mild but firm rule of Mehemet Ali. Lord Palmerston interfered for the sole purpose, one would almost imagine, and certainly with the sole effect of creating anarchy, and leaving the Mahomedans at liberty to persecute the Christians. In Spain he interfered to help an infidel party to execute the unjust will of Ferdinand VII., by which a monarch assumed to himself alone the absurd power of changing the succession to the throne, without consulting the nation, and of bequeating a kingdom to his own daughter, as if it were his personal property. The result both in Spain and in Portugal, where a similar game was played, has been that pitiable anarchy which has reigned ever since, and has ruined both; and the preparation of the former country to receive its sovereigns from the family of the king of the French. This is a meet reward of the Palmerstonian iniquity in the Peninsula. All these facts led us to believe, long before we had it under his own hand, that he would prove himself the fast friend of the Swiss infidels. And it must be acknowledged that he managed the matter dexterously; for had he candidly refused to interfere from the first, the other powers would most probably have done it without him—but by feigning a desire to settle matters, by inventing excuses and raising objections, he managed to delay all interference until the Sunderabund was vanquished, and then he triumphantly exclaimed that there were no two parties, and that consequently there could be no mediation. That this was his object, is manifest, for from the time of Sir Stratford Canning's departure from London, it must have been obvious that he could not reach Switzerland before the fall of Lucerne, and the consequent submission of the Sunderabund, in which case he was instructed by Lord Palmerston, to treat the radical party as if it alone constituted the whole of Switzerland, and as if the other party no longer existed, but was a pure fiction. These are his words, as quoted in a despatch of the Duke de Broglie to M. Guizot, dated London, December 2nd, 1847—"Our mediation, I fear, will be anticipated by events. Behold, nevertheless, the instructions which I have given to Sir Stratford Canning. He is to go directly to Berne, and if he find the Sunderabund still on foot, he shall present the note agreed upon in concert with the other powers. . . . If the Sunderabund does not exist, mediation is at an end. He shall then address himself to the Diet alone." Thus he temporizes and deceives, until the weaker party are trampled on, and then he declares that there shall be no mediation.

We must now direct attention to a previous despatch of Lord Palmerston, which is dated 16th November, 1847. It is a reply to the invitation of France to join with the other four powers, which had guaranteed the cantonal independence of the Swiss confederation in 1815, for the purpose of terminating the civil war in Switzerland. He says, "her majesty's government are of opinion, that the objections of the Diet to the continuance of the Jesuits in Switzerland, can be justified by excellent reasons. The society of the Jesuits should be regarded in a religious and political point of view." He then attempts to prove, that in both these points of view the Diet had just reasons to insist on their expulsion from Switzerland. It will be observed, from his lordship's reasons, which we shall presently transcribe, that he alleges no particular crime against the Swiss Jesuits. They are not accused of having interfered in any of the cantons which had not freely demanded their services, nor of having applied themselves, even in these, to any other object than the instruction of the youth whom their parents and guardians committed to their care. It is quite evident, without descending to any analysis of his lordship's religious and political excuses, that to invade a free state, for the purpose of forcing it to expel persons who were charged with no crime, and whom that state wished to retain, was, to use the language of M. Guizot, "an extravagant interpretation of the Pact, and the first step towards the destruction of the individual existence of the cantons, and the cancelling of the treaties concluded by virtue of that Pact." But let us now take a glance at the Jesuits from a Palmerstonian point of view. And first as to their political delinquencies.

"In a political point of view, the society of the Jesuits," says his lordship, "has always been known as favourable to arbitrary power, and hostile to the rights of the people." Now this is simply false. The Jesuits are always on the side of legitimately constituted authority, but they are now, and ever have been, the best friends of the rights of the people. The celebrated Spanish Jesuit, Francis Suarez, was among the very first who, in modern times, combatted the "divine right of kings," for which he was honoured with the enmity of that pedantic despot James I. of England. We are prepared to prove, that the writings of the Jesuits have done as much for popular liberty as they have done for literature and science. But, in the first place, the Swiss Jesuits are not specially accused, much less convicted of this crime; and, in the next place, Lord Palmerston lays down the monstrous doctrine, that if an independent state has amongst its subjects, persons, whose views are supposed to be favourable to despotic power, its neighbours have a right to invade it, and to expel these individuals by force of arms. According to this principle England ought to invade Austria and Prussia, and Naples and Russia, because, doubtless, Lord Palmerston considers that their sovereigns and ministers are horribly despotic. On the same principle, England herself ought to be invaded by America, and, in this case, his lordship would doubtless get the benefit of his own sound and statesmanlike principle. But, not to speak of one state enforcing this principle against another, only imagine, for a moment, that it was carried into effect in England herself; the Radicals would expel Whig and Tory, the Chartists would expel the Radicals, and, doubtless, these would be expelled in their turn by some other sons of liberty, who would call their principles by the name of despotism. No; there cannot be any true liberty in a country where any body of men, unconvicted of crime, are expelled merely on account of their principles, provided they do not lead to anarchy. How much more heinous a violation of liberty must it be when these principles are not proved against them, but only imputed to them vicariously, and even thus by their open and avowed enemies.

But his lordship's religious objections are still more singular. "In a religious point of view," he says, "it is a Society, instituted with the avowed object of making war upon Protestantism; what then is there astonishing in the fact, that in a small country like Switzerland, where two-thirds of the population are Protestants, the introduction of such a society should cause dissension between Catholics and Protestants, and should be viewed with aversion by the majority of the nation." This is truly one of the most pregnant sentences we have ever read. The society of the Jesuits firmly believes and openly professes that the Catholic religion alone is true, and this is the only war it has ever made on Protestantism. In Switzerland the Jesuits are not even accused of having vindicated their faith with any peculiar warmth or acrimony of language; they did not argue with cannon, and powder and ball, like the radicals, and it is some consolation to know that these were the only arguments by which the radicals could effectually oppose the truths of Christianity as propounded by the Jesuits. But let us apply Lord Palmerston's argument to Ireland. In this country not a third, as in Switzerland, but not one-eighth are Church of England Protestants; yet these Protestants were sent to this country to found an establishment antagonistic to the religion of the great majority of the nation. They are not, as in Switzerland, confined to sovereign independent states, in which the vast majority of the people are Catholics and supported by them alone; but, on the contrary, they are a small, miserable minority in the midst of a Catholic people, who are obliged to support them in affluence whilst they themselves are starving. They have, moreover, always been the enemies of the civil and religious liberty of the people amongst whom they dwell, and have manifested their hostility, not only by words but by long and bloody persecutions. His lordship's religious argument for the expulsion of the Jesuits from Switzerland by force of arms would, therefore, apply a fortiori to the Protestants of Ireland. We wonder does the Foreign Secretary admit the inference.

But the good Protestant Lord Palmerston justifies the expulsion of the Jesuits from Switzerland, on account of their antagonism to the equally good Protestants of that country. The Swiss infidels Protestants! No! no more than we are Turks. It is long since the Quarterly Review declared German Protestantism generally to have become a mere minstrelsy of the border. Mr. Rose, a Protestant divine, thus speaks in his sermons of the German Protestant Rationalists:—"I do them no injustice in saying that the general inclination and tendency of their opinions (more or less forcibly acted on) is this—that in the New Testament we shall find only the opinions of Christ and the Apostles adapted to the age in which they lived, and not eternal truths; that Christ himself had neither the design nor the power of teaching any system which was to endure; that when he taught any enduring truth, as he occasionally did, it was without being aware of its nature; that the Apostles understood still less of real religion; that the whole doctrine both of Christ and his Apostles, as it is directed to the Jews alone, so it was gathered in fact from no other source than the Jewish philosophy, and that Christ himself erred, and his Apostles spread his errors."

The German Rationalists, amongst whom the Swiss Protestants now occupy the first place, deride the doctrine of inspiration as an absurd fiction, and jeeringly call those who profess it Supernaturalists. Not content with this, they even deny the authenticity of those books which the Jesuits, or as they used to be called in old-fashioned times Christians, believed to be inspired. Thus, Fulda, Hasse, De Wette, Berthold, and many others quoted by Rosenmüller in the Prolegomena to the Pentateuch, hold that the five books of Moses were not written until after the Babylonish captivity. Herder, Eckermann, Gieseler, Sartorius, and Paulus contend that the Gospels were not written by those whose names they bear, but by some unknown persons. Michaelis and Kunoel say that the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke were taken from some old Syrochaldaic affair; whilst Vogelius ascribes that of St. John to some Jewish Christian; and Balenstadius and Hortius to some unknown Alexandrine, who wrote about the end of the first, or the beginning of the second century.

They say that true religion should be distinguished from ecclesiastical religion. True religion is that of reason, which alone should be admitted; ecclesiastical religion is made up of faith in positive revelation. Revealed religion neither can nor ought to be any thing else than the vehicle of reason; and the false doctrines of the former disappear as the truths of the latter are discovered by each individual in his own mind. In one word, the dogmas of reason are true; whilst those of positive revelation are positively false, and contain only the errors of the vulgar at the time the Scriptures were written, or at most the private and erroneous opinions of the writer of the book. They explain away all mysteries and miracles as so many allegories or myths. In this system Moses and the Prophets, and even Christ, are made out to be a kind of Indian jugglers who imposed on the credulity of the people. Scherer, a Protestant clergyman, has written a book to prove this. A Prussian Rationalist has published a work, the title of which is—"Was Jesus Christ anything but a simple Jewish Rabbi?" And De Wette says that the Apostles were not only imbued with various superstitions and falsehoods, but so stupid and indocile withal, that if Jesus spoke a little more obscurely than usual, they could not understand him. But Dr. Strauss has surpassed all the others in his "Life of Christ," in which he explains everything by the myths or allegories, and endeavours to set aside every supernatural thing and every miracle in the Gospel. Yet this man was chosen, about six years ago, by the Protestant Grand Council of Zurich, in Switzerland, to fill a chair of Theology! The Protestant Ministers rose against him at the head of their flocks, and overthrew the Government. A Conservative Government succeeded; but as the principles of Lord Palmerston's Protestants gained ground previously to the civil war of last year, a party very much akin to that which invited Strauss was again installed in power. The truth is, that the Evangelical Protestants, and such as profess anything like the doctrines of the early Reformers, are as much hated and persecuted by the Palmerstonian Protestants, as the Catholics or the Jesuits. Thus, in the canton of Vaud the Protestant ministers have been forbidden to preach, and their churches have been closed by the radicals. The present is a purely infidel movement in Switzerland; and, as it has assumed a propagandist character, it is impossible to say how far or how rapidly its baneful influence may spread amongst the neighbouring nations. Its abettors fully understand its character, as is evident from the following scene which took place in the French Chamber of Peers, on the 10th of January, 1848. The speaker, Count D'Alton Shee is quite a disciple of Lord Palmerston's on Swiss affairs.

After praising the Radicals, he exclaims—"We, who are neither Catholics nor Christians"—(murmurs.) The Chancellor rising—"Let us see! Let us see!" M. D'Alton Shee—"We, who are neither Catholics nor Christians." The Chancellor—"What you say wounds the feelings of the Chamber, and of all France." M. D'Alton Shee—"What I say, I have a right to say by the 5th Article of the Charter." Several voices—"Do not say we." M. D'Alton Shee—"It is an expression which escaped from me inadvertently. I say I, and not we. I say I, who am neither a Catholic nor a Christian." These are Lord Palmerston's allies, and the protectors and apologists of the Swiss Radicals. These are the men who wish for the expulsion of the Jesuits not only from Switzerland, but from every other country.

For so far the radicals are triumphant. Lord Palmerston now declares that no power has a right to interfere to assist the sovereign states which have been conquered, although the Duke de Broglie, in his despatch of the 2nd December, which we have already referred to, asserts that the foreign secretary agreed with him at that time "that the great cantons have no more right to conquer and subject the small ones, than one of the great states of Germany would have to do as much with respect to one of the small ones; consequently, if that were to happen, all the powers of Europe would have a right to arrange matters by mediation, or by force." On the 27th of the same month, however, Palmerston writes to Lord Normanby that all he admitted was, that if the Swiss attacked foreign powers, they would have a right to repel them. What a kind and considerate admission of the foreign secretary! Emboldened by the protection of England, the Diet, on the 7th of December, treated the notes of France, Austria, and Prussia—which had been presented on the 30th of November, offering their mediation and advice—with indignation, and almost with contempt, telling them that they were able to settle their own affairs without any intermeddling from strangers. Not only the Jesuits, but many of the other religious orders, have been expelled; large fines have been imposed on the religious houses which have not been suppressed; the federal troops still occupy the Catholic cantons, and their bayonets have proved the most efficient instruments for carrying the elections of the radicals. In some places the conservative candidates and electors have been seized on their way to the hustings, and thrust into gaol until the elections were over. In others, the mode of voting is by a show of hands, and in those the president frequently proposes himself, and declares himself to be duly elected. On one of those occasions an enemy of liberty—probably a Jesuit in disguise—ventured to suggest that the votes should be counted, whereupon he was instantly seized and ignominiously expelled from the canton. Hence we find Dr. Steiger and others, who have just escaped from the felon's cell, placed at the head of the civil government. In Friburg, where the Catholics are as ten to one, a furiously radical grand council has been elected. "They have drawn up a long decree," writes the Times correspondent, who is their friend, "which declares an amnesty for all political offences, but with a mass of qualifications and exceptions which almost belie the old doctrine that 'exceptions form the rule.'" In the first, the principal authors of the separate alliance who are named, and thirty-one in number, are deprived for six years of their public rights, and fifteen of them are during that period to be expelled from the canton, and, moreover, among them they are to pay 1,200,000*fr.* to the Government; secondly, a great number of others comprised in the decrees of the 29th November and 13th December last are to be deprived for five years of their political rights; thirdly, the convent of Past Diren to be suppressed, certain allowances being made to the members of it; fourthly, an extraordinary contribution of 460,000*fr.* to be imposed on the bishop and the religious houses designated, of which the bishop is to pay 20,000*fr.*, these sums to be paid half by the 20th of January, and the other half in March; fifthly, no ecclesiastic or religious person, whether foreigner or of the canton, shall be able to exercise his mission, or give public instruction or private in several families at a time without special authority from the council of state." Yet these are the friends of liberty! The radicals of the Valais were not ashamed to plunder the renowned hospitium of the monks of Mount St. Bernard, which has always been regarded as one of the most glorious monuments of Christian charity in Europe. No political accusation was ever preferred against this monastery, and yet it has been deprived of its ecclesiastical patronage by a decree of the 2nd of December, and sentenced to pay a fine of 80,000*fr.* On the 18th of December two federal commissioners, M. Delarageaze, of Vaud, and M. Frey, of Basle, presented themselves at the monastery, to take an inventory of the moveable and immoveable property of the house in the name of the confederation. They forced open the doors, placed sentinels there and at the windows, with loaded arms, who received orders to fire on any one who should attempt to remove anything from the building; and a garrison of forty Vandois has since then been kept in the monastery.

In the meantime the three Powers, France, Austria, and Prussia, which presented the note identique, offering their advice and mediation on the 30th of November, and to which the Swiss Diet replied on the 7th of December, have transmitted a second note to the radical assembly at Berne. This document asserts, first, that the cantonal independence of each of the states is the basis of the whole confederation, and that many of them were induced, by the recommendation and interference of the Great Powers only, to give their assent to the federal alliance; second, that this cantonal independence cannot be said to exist so long as certain cantons are in the military occupation of other cantons, with all the circumstances resulting from such occupation; and, thirdly, that Switzerland will not be restored to her regular condition until all the cantons shall have received the full and complete exercise of all their rights, upon which the fulfilment of the mutual engagements of the other powers towards the confederation is based.

Nothing could be more just and moderate than this note. It is not to be endured that the Diet, having expelled the Jesuits from the Catholic cantons, should continue their military occupation for the purpose of enabling a revolutionary minority to commit the most abominable acts of violence and injustice—that they should place a small and malignant faction in power at the point of the bayonet, and support every species of persecution which they can devise—that these malignants, who are not one-tenth of the population, should pass laws as in Friburg, to secure their power for nine years—that they should make it a crime punishable by fine and banishment to have aided the late Governments, which were at the time the recognised legal Governments of the country—that, finding this process too slow for their vengeance and cupidity, they should cut the matter short by publishing an amnesty, which is in reality a proscription and confiscation of all the principal citizens and of their property without any trial whatever—that they should seize all church property, and place it under the control of the State, and extend their confiscations to nine religious houses which had no connexion with the Jesuits, and even to the bishop of the diocese. The real question is not about the Jesuits nor about Catholicity, but it involves the toleration of any real Christianity, and the very existence of social order. The subversion of the Sunderbund may be as pleasing to the passions of many as the Avalanche on the Swiss mountains is to the eye of the traveller. But the principles of the Swiss radicals will no more confine themselves to Switzerland, than the Avalanche will cling for ever to its native Alps, and the fall of the latter cannot be more terrible and destructive to the peaceful vallies which lie beneath, than the progress of the former would be ruinous to the peace and to the institutions of Europe.

Lorica S. Patricii;

OR,

HYMN OF ST. PATRICK WHEN GOING TO PREACH
AT TARAH.

THE original Irish of this hymn was published eight years ago, by Dr. Petrie, in vol. xviii., "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy." It is in the Bearla Feine, the most ancient dialect of the Irish, the same in which the Brehon laws were written. It was printed from the "Liber Hymnorum," preserved in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, a manuscript, which, as Dr. Petrie proves by the authority of Usher and others, must be nearly 1250 years old. The manner in which it was edited reflects the highest credit on the learning and industry of the editor. The text is given in large letters, with interlinear literal Latin translation, an English translation at the close, and one hundred and fifty-five notes, telling what words of the hymn are still in use in their old or in a modified form, and authenticating by all the ancient glossaries, the meaning given by the translator to the obsolete words. That the hymn was popularly known in the seventh century, as the production of our apostle, is proved from the very ancient life of St. Patrick, by St. Evin, and also from the annotations of Tirechan, in the Book of Armagh, which, among other prescriptions, ordain that the "Irish Hymn of St. Patrick ought to be sung for ever."—"Canticum ejus Scotticum semper canere." "It was ever after," says St. Evin, "held in the highest esteem among the Irish; because it is believed and proved by manifold experience, that all who recite it piously are preserved from the dangers that threaten their body and soul." But if it were once a popular and national hymn, it may be safely stated that it is now generally unknown, "though," according to the editor, "the Luireach Phadruig (Lorica Patricii) is still remembered popularly in many parts of Ireland, and a portion of it is to this day repeated by the people usually at bed time, with the same confidence in its protecting powers, as, according to St. Evin, was placed in it previously to his time." With the exception of the closing part of strophe viii., we are ashamed to confess that we never heard anything, in our young days in the country, which bears any resemblance to St. Patrick's Hymn. The translation now presented to the public, is rigidly, wonderfully literal, the best substitute that can be had for the original, since it is not yet in our power to effect what ought to be one of the great objects of an IRISH CATHOLIC MAGAZINE—the publication, in their native dress, of every fragment of religious literature that ever made the Irish heart swell with the glories of the olden times, or scorn the threats of the tyrant in later ages.

The original is exclusively Irish, except the closing words, which are in Latin, namely, "Domini est salus, Domini est salus. Christi est salus, salus tua Domine sit semper nobiscum."

In the old "Liber Hymnorum" the hymn is prefaced by the following prose statement in Irish, which we give in the words of the learned translator:

"St. Patrick composed this hymn. In the time of Leogaire, the son of Nial, it was composed. The cause of its composition was to protect himself with his monks against the enemies unto death, who were in ambush against the clergy. And this is a religious armour to protect the body and soul against demons and men and vices. Every person who sings it every day with all his attention on God, shall not have demons appearing to his face. It will be a protection to him against every poison and envy. It will be a safeguard to him against sudden death. It will be an armour to his soul after death. Patrick sang this at the time that the snares were set for him by Leogaire, that he might not come to propagate the faith at Temur (Tarah)."—Ed.

St. Patrick's Hymn before Tarah.

[From the original Irish.]

I.

AT TARAH TO-DAY, in this awful hour,
I call on the holy Trinity!
Glory to Him who reigneth in power,
The God of the elements, Father, and Son,
And Paraclete Spirit, which Three are the One,
The ever-existing Divinity!

II.

AT TARAH TO-DAY I call on the Lord,
On Christ, the Omnipotent Word,
Who came to redeem from Death and Sin
Our fallen race;
And I put and I place
The virtue that lieth and liveth in His Incarnation lowly,
His Baptism pure and holy,
His life of toil, and tears, and affliction,
His dolorous Death—his Crucifixion,
His Burial, sacred and sad and lone,
His Resurrection to life again,
His glorious Ascension to Heaven's high Throne,
And, lastly, his future dread
And terrible coming to judge all men—
Both the Living and Dead

III.

AT TARAH TO-DAY I put and I place
The virtue that dwells in the Seraphim's love,
And the virtue and grace
That are in the obedience
And unshaken allegiance
Of all the Archangels and angels above,
And in the hope of the Resurrection
To everlasting reward and election,
And in the prayers of the Fathers of old,
And in the truths the Prophets foretold,

And in the Apostles' manifold preachings,
And in the Confessors' faith and teachings,
And in the purity ever dwelling
Within the immaculate virgins' breast,
And in the actions bright and excelling
Of all good men, the just and the blest

IV.

AT TARAH TO-DAY, in this fateful hour,
I place all Heaven with its power,
And the sun with its brightness,
And the snow with its whiteness,
And fire with all the strength it hath,
And lightning with its rapid wrath,
And the winds with their swiftness along their path,
And the Sea with its deepness,
And the rocks with their steepness,
And the earth with its starkness,*
All these I place,
By God's almighty help and grace,
Between myself and the Powers of Darkness.†

V.

AT TARAH TO-DAY
May God be my stay!
May the strength of God now nerve me!
May the power of God preserve me!
May God the Almighty be near me!
May God the Almighty espy me!
May God the Almighty hear me!
May God give me eloquent speech!
May the arm of God protect me!
May the wisdom of God direct me!
May God give me power to teach and to preach!

* Properly, "strength," "firmness," from the Anglo-Saxon, stark, "strong," "stiff."

† "Powers of Darkness."—It has been conjectured, we perceive, that this hymn would not be considered orthodox in the 17th century, and that no other reason can be assigned why Colgan, who certainly must have had a copy in his possession, did not publish or take farther notice of it. The conjecture we believe is groundless. There is nothing in the hymn inconsistent with sound doctrine, nothing that requires even an explanation, except, perhaps, the introduction of the "whiteness of the snow, the force of fire, the swiftness of the wind," &c. &c. in this verse, and the allusion to the spells of "woman, smiths, and Druids" in line thirteen, of strophe vi. The appeal to the elements of nature appears to us to be only a repetition, at least in spirit, of the words of the Psalmist, "Praise ye Him, O sun and moon; praise Him, all ye stars and light—praise the Lord from the earth—fire, hail, snow, ice, stormy winds, which fulfil his word."—Ps. 148. This appeal is, moreover, singularly appropriate on the lips of an apostle—a man who was going to dispel for ever the dark clouds of paganism from Ireland, for in Psalm 18, we read "the heavens show forth the glory of God, and the firmament declareth the work of his hands. Day to day uttereth speech, and night to night sheweth knowledge. There are no speeches or languages where their voices are not heard. Their sound hath gone forth into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world." This passage, which describes literally the glorious works of visible creation proclaiming the majesty of God, is applied by St. Paul to the Apostles: "Faith then cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ. But, I say, have they not heard? Yes, verily, 'their sound hath gone forth into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the whole world.'"—Rom. c. 10 v. 18. But if, moreover, we find in Scripture all creatures grieving over the fall of man, and indignant at their subjection to him, and sighing for his resurrection by grace in this life, and glory in the next, St. Patrick may have appealed to the glittering host of heaven, and all created nature as his allies in the war he was going to wage at Tarah against the powers of darkness which held man in slavery. Now read St. Paul, Rom. c. 8. "For the expectation of the creature (the creation) waiteth for the revelation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity not willingly, but by reason of Him that made it subject in hope: because the creature also itself shall be delivered from the servitude of corruption, into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. For we know that every creature groaneth and travaileth in pain even until now." The reader need not be reminded of the lines of Milton, after Adam had eaten the forbidden fruit:

"Earth trembled from her entrails, as again
In pangs, and Nature gave a second groan;
Sky lour'd, and muttering thunder, some sad drops
Wept at completing of the mortal sin
Original.

As to the prayer against the spells of Druids, &c. &c., it is sufficient to say that there has been always an order of exorcists in the Church—the "women" may have been the "bean-draoid" or sorceress: that one smith, at least, was reputed a magician, see note 126, p. 49.—Antiquities of Tarah Hill.—Ed.

May the shield of God defend me!
 May the host of God attend me,
 And ward me,
 And guard me,
 Against the wiles of demons and devils,
 Against the temptations of vices and evils,
 Against the bad passions and wrathful will
 Of the reckless mind and the wicked heart,
 Against every man who designs me ill,
 Whether leagued with others or plotting apart!

VI.

IN THIS HOUR OF HOURS
 I place all those powers
 Between myself and every foe
 Who threatens my body and soul
 With danger or dole,
 To protect me against the evils that flow
 From lying soothsayers' incantations,
 From the gloomy laws of the Gentile nations,
 From Heresy's hateful innovations,
 From Idolatry's rites and invocations,
 Be those my defenders
 My guards against every ban—
 And spell of smiths, and Druids, and women;
 In fine, against every knowledge that renders
 The light Heaven sends us dim in
 The spirit and soul of Man!

VII.

MAY CHRIST, I PRAY,
 Protect me to-day
 Against poison and fire,
 Against drowning and wounding,
 That so, in His grace abounding,
 I may earn the Preacher's hire!

VIII.

CHRIST, as a light,
 Illumine and guide me!
 CHRIST, as a shield, o'ershadow and cover me!
 CHRIST be under me! CHRIST be over me!
 CHRIST be beside me
 On left-hand and right!
 CHRIST be before me, behind me, about me!
 CHRIST this day be within and without me!

IX.

CHRIST, the lowly and meek,
 CHRIST, the All-Powerful, be
 In the heart of each to whom I speak,
 In the mouth of each who speaks to me!
 In all who draw near me,
 Or see me or hear me!

X.

AT TARAH TO-DAY, in this awful hour,
 I call on the Holy Trinity!
 Glory to Him who reigneth in power,
 The God of the Elements, Father, and Son,
 And Paraclete Spirit, which Three are the One,
 The ever-existing Divinity!

XI.

Salvation dwells with the Lord.
 With CHRIST, the Omnipotent Word.
 From generation to generation
 Grant us, O Lord, thy grace and salvation!

RECOLLECTIONS, CONFESSIONS, ADMISSIONS, AND AVOWALS
OF AN

Irish Parliamentary Reporter.

BY WM. B. MAC CABE, ESQ.,
 Author of "A Catholic History of England."

"Report me as I am."—Shakspeare.

CHAPTER I.

The Reporters introduced—much politeness and simulated respect for them—the duties of a Dublin Reporter—various classes of Reporters in London—the Penny-a-liner, the Law Reporters, the Parliamentary Reporters, various grades of—the good, the indifferent, the bad, and the odious Reporter. Why Reporters ought to be respected—why they are not—Irish pride—a Cook's definition of "a real Irish gentleman." The neglect of Reporters insures impartiality—the author claims this merit for himself, and makes great promises as to what may be expected in future chapters.

"CLEAR the way for the Reporters—make room for the gentlemen of the press—the gentlemen of the press MUST BE ACCOMMODATED."

Such was the cry, that for many a day, and many a long, long year saluted my appearance at a public meeting, when I ventured, in company with my old friends Christopher Hughes and William Dillon, and Joseph Leech and Charles O'Flaherty, to appear within its precincts. No matter what was the description of meeting—Catholic or Orange, Whig or Tory, ultra Liberal or fiery Brunswicker—the cry was still the same. There was the same extravagant politeness—the same superabundant attention—the self-same exaggerated demonstrations of respect, which might be sincere, but that were seldom felt to be so; for, no matter who might be the secretary of the meeting, and, therefore, discharging the duties of "the Chesterfield" of the day, there was, almost 'always, laid by him a most unlucky emphasis on the word "gentlemen," which sounded gratingly on the ear, and seemed to intimate to us that a very strong doubt existed in his mind, that we had any claim of pretension to the rank which he himself assigned to us.

I wish the reader to bear in mind, that I am describing what occurred in Ireland a great many years ago—so many, that of the reporters I have named above, not one, but worthy, honest Christopher Hughes is now living.

It was impossible not to feel, at that time, from the manner in which we were received—the space that was made for us—and the oft, too oft, repeated phrase of "gentlemen of the press," that we were regarded as nothing more than necessary evils—as persons whose presence was to be endured, because without us the meeting would be nothing. Its greatness would be unknown—its transcendent! eloquence unheard of—its orators might talk patriotism or treason, either would be, as far as the world in general was concerned, precisely in the same position, unspoken of and unthought of, and as absolutely lost as if never pronounced.

Respect was paid which was not felt—politeness exhibited, which was but a badly-acted mockery, because it was thought to be necessary (and here was the great mistake), that reporters should be coaxed into what was simply but the performance of their duty.

Without us "the winged words," the επεα πτερόεντα might fly to that "bourne, from whence no traveller returns;" but with our assistance, and ours only, could they be caught. We, alone, could bring them down with small-shot short-hand, cook them into a report, and serve them up in print, that orators, and orator's friends, and orator's friends' friends might feast upon the beauty of their tropes and the fatness of their statistics.

The truth is, that though orators can "discourse most excellent music" in a crowded meeting, and be there applauded "to the very echo," still if they do not get into print, their fame is but limited and the entirety of their glory unaccomplished. An orator cannot talk print—a reporter must do it for him. We are the bellows-blowers, they the players on the organ; and they, high and mighty as they were, seemed to labour under the conviction, that if they were not unduly civil and intrusively polite to us, the bellows-blowers, that they could not extract a puff out of us; and that, though they might run their fingers over the keys, still, if we were not conciliated, not one in a thousand could ever know anything of the brilliancy of their execution. Hence the civility, the over-acted civility, and the superabundant use of the designation of "gentlemen of the press" bestowed upon us—a designation which had become so hateful to me, that I remember, at one time, asking Mr. O'Connell, as a great favour, never to apply it to us, but simply and shortly to name those that he liked "the press-gang," a request with which he complied, and a desire which he ever afterwards fulfilled.

And here let me introduce the reader to the Reporters—to the various classes into which they may be grouped, and the different positions they occupy.

In Dublin, still a provincial town, as with us at other provincial towns in the empire, the same person may be seen in the police-office, in the law-courts, in public meetings, in the theatre, at concerts, at scientific meetings, at a clerical conclave in the Rotunda, and at a cattle-show in Smithfield. To be a perfectly accomplished reporter in Dublin, a man should be a walking cyclopedia and a first-rate stenographer—he should know everything, and do everything, and if he had a spare half-hour, write a leading article! He should be able to detect a flaw in a steam-engine, to discover a false quantity in Virgil, to prove Surgeon Corbet wrong when he lectures on botany, and be competent to demonstrate that Sir P. Crampton made an error in the manipulation of a broken-legged patient. He should,—long ago,—have had all these gifts, and, with these, be content with two other indispensable qualities—a low estimate of his own capabilities and a contented mind, with a very small salary. If he had not all those qualifications, gifts, and indispensable requisites, then there was a certainty that he was not a first-rate Dublin Reporter, nor—likely long to hold that position.

In London, the position of a reporter is somewhat different. The occurrences at the police-offices, as well as all events not of a political nature, are communicated to the offices by a class of persons, who being paid in accordance with the quantity of their contributions and the space they are permitted to occupy, are known as "penny-a-liners"—these form a totally distinct class from all others. The second class consists of the law-reporters—those who give an account of the different proceedings in the several courts, and they are, for the most part, young barristers, and, frequently, gentlemen who have been gallery reporters, but retain, in this position, their connexion with the papers with which they were formerly associated. The last class is that of the parliamentary reporters.

These are divided into two sections. 1st, Those who are engaged during the session of Parliament; and, 2nd, those who are permanently connected with the several newspapers; the latter constitute the working staff of the morning journals. Few men hold the position of permanent parliamentary reporters, who are not something more than mere short-hand writers; who are not master of some other science or branch of learning beyond that of the art of speech-writing, and who are not able to distinguish themselves as classical scholars, as writers, as persons versed in some peculiar art, or in the knowledge of modern languages, &c., &c. From them are commonly selected editors, and amongst them are almost universally found those, whose previous studies have fitted them to be correspondents in various parts of the globe. Parliamentary Reporters are very seldom seen at public meetings in London, but they were to be met with on the coast of Syria, when war was raging in that quarter of the world; they were in Oporto, and in Lisbon during the war in Portugal, in Berne, and in Friburg, and in Lucern, whilst the armies of "the Liberals" were marching to put down liberty, and fighting, with an unhallowed success, for the further persecution of religion; in Ireland a few of the parliamentary reporters were to be seen during "the monster" trial.

Such, readers, are the reporters—in their various classes, in provincial towns, and in London; but you must not suppose that when you go into a public meeting, and you see some fourteen or fifteen persons writing at a table, that all that you look upon as thus engaged are reporters—that all are competent to take down in their note-books every word that is said, and, afterwards, to transcribe it and put it in readable English, and in such a form that it is fitted for publication. To suppose any such thing would be to render yourself liable to fall into a very great and grievous mistake.

I remember that when I was connected with the Irish press I found it necessary to make a marked distinction between the various grades of those who appeared at public meetings as reporters.

The grades were four:—1st, a good reporter; 2nd, an indifferent reporter; 3rd, a bad reporter; 4th, an odious reporter.

The good reporter was competent to take down and transcribe every word that was said.

The indifferent reporter was capable of giving the half of what was said.

The bad reporter could give nothing of what was said.

The odious reporter always gave the very opposite of what was said.

And now in order that those who are ignorant of the craft of reporting may the better comprehend what is the distinction made, I shall take the liberty of opening the note-books of the four classes of reporters I have specified, in order that it may be seen how the following sentence—the first in Mr. O'Connell's speech in defence of John Magee—would read in each.

The good reporter would thus give it, as it had been spoken:—

"I consented to the adjournment yesterday, gentlemen of the jury, from that impulse of nature, which compels us to postpone pain: it is, indeed, painful to me to address you—it is a cheerless, a hopeless task, to address you—a task which would require all the animation and interest to be derived from the working of a mind fully fraught with resentment and disgust created in mine yesterday, by that farrago of helpless absurdity with which the Attorney-General regaled you.”*

The indifferent reporter would make Mr. O’Connell say, “that he consented to the adjournment of the preceding day, because he wished to postpone the pain of having to reply to the farrago of absurdity that had been spoken by the Attorney-General.”

The bad reporter would declare that Mr. O’Connell said he “consented to the adjournment of the previous day, because he had been so pained by listening to the Attorney-General.”

The odious reporter would make Mr. O’Connell declare, “that he had been opposed to the adjournment of the preceding day; because, so far from being pained by anything the Attorney-General had said, he rather liked it.”

Take them, however, in their various grades—good, indifferent, bad, and even odious, I never knew but one (and that one presumed on his extraordinary abilities) who did not desire to give conscientiously, and to the best of his capacity, that which had been spoken in his hearing. I have known numbers to fail; but it has always been from their incompetency—never from a wilful distortion of the meaning of the speaker.

To be a good reporter is to be a good and useful member of society—it is to discharge duties which, in the present state of the world, are indispensable for the promotion of justice, the advancement of right, the prevention of wrong, the exposure of oppression, and the punishment of the wicked. There is no life which requires in its fulfilment such constant care, such watchful anxiety, and such laborious exertion. Those who are competent to perform all that is required from them as reporters, ought to be respected. There was a time in Ireland when it was not so, and the cause, rather than the reason for its not being so, I shall attempt simply, plainly, and candidly to explain.

There are few persons so stupidly, or so malevolently hostile to the Irish people as to deny that the Irish are possessed of many virtues. Much abused as they are, and they are so overmuch, still there are few, if any, who will be disposed to speak of them, even for the sake of a shabby antithesis, or of a miserable pun, in the terms once applied to them by Giraldus Cambrensis.† On the other hand, it is not to be denied that they have their faults, and one of these, I am sure, is a fault engrafted upon their character, and not indigenous to it, and that is a senseless contempt for the exercise of any art, science, or profession, which is emolumentary to him who devotes himself to it.

It is a feeling that is neither Irish nor Catholic; for in “Old Ireland” the bard and the poet were respected, and the man who distinguished himself by his learning and his science was honoured; and as to Catholicity, there will be found amongst its saints those who exercised even the humblest of trades—such as the shoemakers, SS. Crispin and Crispinian, and St. Bonavita, the blacksmith.

No matter how the feeling originated, nor whence it was derived, it would be in vain to deny that it has existed, and still continues to influence social life, and that it was and is so prevalent as to win for itself a peculiar designation; and that is, “Irish pride.”

That this “Irish pride” is an exceedingly inconvenient ingredient in social life, and that it by no means tends to promote social happiness, I can aver from my own experience; for I remember that in one of the very first newspaper controversies in which I ever was engaged, that my opponent, failing in argument, began to call me the worst names he could think of, and one of them was “a hireling”—not meaning thereby that I wrote anything that was opposed to my principles, but simply that I was paid for writing in a newspaper which was not my own; and that, in fact, there was something very like impertinence in my presuming to contradict one who was the proprietor of a newspaper!—that newspaper being at the time so particular and select in the number of its readers, that the aforesaid proprietor used to carry the stamps for an entire publication in one of the pockets of his big coat!

There is nothing in which this Irish pride delighted so much as “a real Irish gentleman,” and what “a real Irish gentleman” is, was thus defined by a woman, who wished to be engaged as a cook in the family of Dr. Boyton, once a very eminent physician in Dublin.

This woman had proved her qualifications to the satisfaction of Mrs. Boyton, had stated the terms on which she had been engaged in the family of Lady — and the Countess of —, but stated that she must receive some five or six guineas more if she entered the family of Dr. Boyton, because, as she said, she had never before served in any family except that of “a real Irish gentleman.”

“Oh, that may be,” answered the cook, “he may be a purty, civil, well-behaved, genteel man enough—but I never served any but a real Irish gentleman.”

“And do you mean to say that my husband is not a real Irish gentleman?” inquired Mrs. Boyton.

“In troth I do, ma’am, for a doctor never could be a real Irish gentleman.”

“Then pray, my good woman, what is a real Irish gentleman?”

“Why, then, ma’am, as you insist on knowin’, I’ll tell you—a real Irish gentleman is a gentleman that never earned the price of a meal for himself, nor for any one belonging to him.”

When duly analyzed, this Irish pride will be found to result in this—an idolization of idleness—although the motive from which it has sprung may be of a far more commendable description. It is, in its purest form, “a respect for antiquity of family;” and Adam Smith justly remarks, that “antiquity of family means, everywhere, the antiquity either of wealth, or of that greatness which is commonly either founded upon wealth or accompanied with it.”*

In Ireland, the struggle has been since the first relaxation of the Penal Laws, to recover back by industry, by talent, by trade, and by labour, that wealth which was the accompaniment of antiquity of family, and that baleful ingredient in Irish society—“Irish pride”—has been the impediment, the draw-back, and the dead weight upon that most laudable struggle. It is the upas tree of Irish society, poisoning every thing that comes within the circle of its noxious influence; and never is it more fatal, nor more dangerous, than when the inactivity and the slothfulness it engenders

* “Wealth of Nations,” Book v. ch. 1, p. 529, (Harrison’s edition.)

* Omitting all arbitraries, the sentence would thus proceed in short-hand:—“I consnd t th djrmnt ystrdy—gentlmn f th jry—fem th impls f ntr wh cnpls s t pstpn pn . &c.

† “Nationis subdolæ longe fortius timenda est ars, quam mars; pax quam fax; mel quam fel; malitia quam militia; proditio quam expeditio; amicitia præfata, quam inimicitia despiciata.”—Giraldus Cambrensis, Hibernia Expugnata, Lib. ii., c. 97.

can discover a consolation for themselves in sneers, or sarcasms, or bad jokes, and worn witticisms, upon exertions they will not imitate, struggles that they would not dare to rival, and toils which they would shrink from undergoing.

The worst form of Irish pride is that in which it aims not at exalting itself to a level with that which is truly great, but seeks to obtain a fictitious elevation for itself upon the ruined character, the blighted hopes, on the ineffectual exertions of those who have failed in their struggles to rise in the world.

Fatal—most fatal have been its effects upon Ireland. It has seduced men into expenses which they could not afford—has induced them to assume the possession of a wealth that they did not possess, and has left them in the mid career of their course, with a ruined reputation and a bankrupt fortune.

This “Irish pride” which would not condescend to notice, “as a gentleman,” a young barrister, if he had not a fortune, nor to bestow attention on a young physician if he were labouring to acquire a practice, would not, of course, condescend to look down upon the Irish reporters, nor suppose that their useful labours, and never-ending toil were conferring greater benefits upon the community, than its insipidity, its inefficiency, its idleness, and its practise of the dolce far niente.

One good result to the reporters from this was, that it made us perfect citizens of the world. No party recognized us as bound up with its politics, and each party seemed to conceive that we were only made to forward its objects. We were the heralds of opposing armies—with all the privileges and disadvantages of non-combatants; and no matter what our private opinions, or our fixed principles might be, nor how much we might have done to promote them, it was, has been, and is, a settled rule, not less in London than in Dublin, that the services of a reporter never should be recognized—that he is not, and cannot be a citizen of the state, that though he may vote for a party, work for a party, write for a party, yet though there be gratitude, and even prizes for “the whole camp, pioneers, and all,” he is never to look for the expression of the one nor the benefit of the other.

It is wonderful, how exceedingly impartial the enforcement of this principle has made the reporters; and with what perfect indifference they have seen Lord John Russell sitting on the right of the chair, and succeeded there by Sir Robert Peel—and the same place again resumed by Lord John. No matter what can be said, and no matter what may be done—the repeal of a corn law, the enforcement of a coercion bill, the concession of a tariff, or the revision of the pension list, as far as the reporter is concerned, in consequence is the same—it brings down upon him a day of toil and a night of labour.

We “live, move, and have our being” in politics, but, as reporters, do not participate in them. We are, in politics, as the witches in Macbeth,

“Not like the inhabitants o’ th’ earth,
And yet are on’t.”

To the orators in Ireland we were known. By the great body of the meeting we were unthought of and unrecognized. The persons who read the proceedings of the meeting never dreamt of those who gave it to them, unless some pet subject was treated with the brevity it merited, and then we were remembered, with no complimentary expression of opinion as to the discretion we had exercised.

Holding, as we did, the scale in society I have described, and which the gentry, or would-be gentry assigned to us—placed in what I may term “the debatable land” of social life—between those who delivered speeches, and the mobility who read over reports of them, it was not likely that we should be unfairly warped by party prejudices, nor improperly biased by personal partialities.

These merits I claim for myself in my “Recollections,” and if the reader shall not be dissatisfied with this gossiping specimen of them, I may venture in future chapters to state what I witnessed, as a reporter, of events that occurred in a most important portion of Irish history. I cannot promise that I shall be brief; but I do promise that I will be impartial. I have no resentments to gratify, and no obligations to repay.

I do believe that I have in Ireland many sincere friends, and not one personal enemy. The reader, therefore, may feel assured, that in what I do write, malevolence will not find even an inuendo on which it may hope to gratify its evil spirit.

And thus, reader, for the present I bid thee farewell, hoping that I may be able to state some incidents which will interest, and others that may amuse you; for in the life of a reporter the scenes are multitudinous and various, and his “exits and his entrances” innumerable.

Life and Labours of a Catholic Curate.

PASSING, with a disappointed and heavy spirit, from this ruinous solitude, we proceeded across the fields, with a full and beating heart, to take a long look at the humble house which gave us birth. But, alas! here again the desolating sweep of ruin had been before us. There had not one stone of it been left upon another; nor any thing remaining by which a single vestige of it could be traced. We enquired in what precise spot it had stood—but we enquired in vain. Those who could have told us—the ancient inhabitants—who owned the old familiar faces, had been removed either by the fell hand of the consolidator, death, or by emigration.

Having failed here to acquire the information for which our heart yearned so earnestly, we passed up towards another village, to which our family had removed during our early youth—we should say childhood. We approached that; but, although there was here no trace of absolute ruin, yet there was a painful and melancholy change—need we add for the worse? It did not contain by any means as many houses, nor anything like the population of our early days. At the end of this village stands a Rath—or, as they are called in that part of the country, Forth—which had been the scene of many a youthful sport and pastime to us and our companions. On ascending this, however, a sight awaited us to which anything we had yet seen bore no comparison whatsoever. About five or six hundred yards to the south-west of this Forth was formerly another village, inhabited by very wealthy farmers, who lived in great comfort and independence. Some of them were the descendants of the Scotch settlers in James’s time, and were remarkable for extreme civility towards their neighbours, as well as for those neat and antiquated habits of domestic comfort, and precise judicious modes of agriculture, that were so much overlooked as examples in the country by those who ought to have had more sense than to neglect them. Here had been several two or three storied houses, great old ancestral trees, trim and well-cultivated gardens, out-offices in good repair, and even the very pigsties roofed in and made both clean and comfortable. The first things we, in the adjoining village, usually saw and heard in the morning were the lively smoke from those wealthy farmers' houses dancing in the air, and the busy sounds of cheerful and prosperous, because skilful, industry. On the present occasion, we looked and rubbed our eyes—then rubbed our eyes and looked again. Could it be? Were we in a dream, or had we gone back to Aladdin's palace, and the time of the good Haroun Alraschid? We looked, we repeat, but neither house nor smoking chimney, nor large ancestral trees, nor trim well-managed gardens, nor comfortable office-houses, nor pig nor pigsties were there. The site of that happy village was now a level naked field of stubble, on which we could scarcely force ourselves to look.

Having left the Forth, we proceeded towards the site of this obliterated village, and on our way passed the beautiful spring well from which the villagers of the Forth brought their water; and this, in fact, was the only object we had seen that was altogether unchanged. There it was, in its pure and crystal depths, just as we had seen it a thousand times in our boyhood. The broad stone on which we stood to lift the water lay exactly in the same place as usual—the superabundant stream trickled into the soft little morass, covered with water-cresses, as it ever did, and in no discernable circumstance was it different from what it had been. This, then, was the first object connected with our early life that we had yet seen unchanged—its face seemed to us like that of a friend who was faithful and true. In that light we contemplated it, and for that reason it was the first object that touched us into tears. We stooped down—filled our hollowed hand with its dear old water—we drank it, and could no longer restrain our grief. We stood alone looking upon it—we remembered all we had suffered since last we had tasted these waters. We then were young and bounding with happiness—now care-worn and grey. We could not proceed with this painful parallel, but stood over it, and fairly wept like a child. As yet we had not proceeded,—commencing from our first scene of ruin at the mill, to the second, or stubble-field alluded to,—more than at least a mile and a half; but still we must proceed, for on every hand there are ruined and depopulated hamlets and villages around us. About a mile further on, and up the stream which runs by the land that once belonged to these “settlers,” we found a third instance, still as melancholy as those we had yet met. We went on, therefore, along the old road, and turned up to another mill, connected with which had been a village containing at least sixty or seventy houses. Here, as before, the destroyer had been. In this village there remained not a single house. All had been levelled to the earth; and the only appearance of life that remained was to be found in the solitary house which had been built for the miller and his family. An old castle—a magnificent ruin by the way—to which access had ever been given, was now surrounded to its very walls by a field of newly-sown wheat, over which we were obliged to proceed to examine it once more. In every quarter these melancholy signs were visible.

From this we turned our steps to another sweetly situated village, in which we had spent some of the happiest of our school-boy days. We went up by “the old road,” for indeed the whole country has been very well intersected with new lines since we left it, and, on turning round the angle which brought us in front of it, we found not a habitable house standing. There was nothing but a barn, which stood cold and chimneyless amidst the solitude which stretched around us. The house, however, in which we had spent so many happy days, stood about a hundred yards below this, in a sweet little spot—or what had once been so—and, perhaps, thought we, it may have escaped. Alas! no. Nothing but a portion of its naked walls were standing. Its floors were covered with rubbish and chicken-weed—the out-houses were all down. The beautiful green that stretched before the door was no longer either green or smooth—and the well, equal in beauty to that which we have already described, and far surpassing it in situation and picturesque effect, had gone dry, and was filled with dank weeds and rotten brushwood. But, indeed, we have observed that few wells will remain open, unless they are frequented by the foot of man.

Our readers may judge of what we felt on following this track of ruin, as it led us from one depopulated village to another. But how, they will first enquire, were these melancholy scenes of desolation occasioned? To this we are about to proceed. One individual—an agent, whose policy is execrable—by being transferred from Scotland, his native place—for, thank God! our country has to answer for neither the sin nor the disgrace of having produced him—has established in this locality a principle which, however it may be applicable in a thinly inhabited country, is totally unsuitable to one that is thickly peopled like this. The principle we speak of is that of consolidation, or the casting out of their small farms, no matter whether by foul or fair means, those who have held them, and throwing their tenements into one—held, of course, by an individual tenant. It is useless to deny that the application of such a principle to a country whose habits, usages, social advantages, miserable standard of food and comfort—all render it unsuitable to our general circumstances, must operate only as a cruel and unfeeling scourge upon the people. It is utterly impossible to consolidate farms without, in various instances, having recourse to extermination—without availing yourself of the law to disperse the people, and to leave them houseless and homeless, or destitute of any fixed or permanent mode of subsistence.

If those changes are to be effected, let them be brought about gradually, and with every humane consideration for the lives and possibility of living of the unhappy people. Let the circumstances be so managed as that the introduction of a principle repugnant to the spirit and condition of the country, may bring out no evil to our population, who are not to be treated like slaves, or turned out like wild beasts to the elements, without any other object than a desire to banish them off the soil. The system of consolidation, however, is one which never ought to be introduced into this country. It is not merely at variance with, but strongly and fearfully opposed to, the genius of our people, as well as to the nature and undulating surface of our soil, and those thousand other circumstances which render its cold and selfish spirit incompatible with all our notions, impressions, and capacities for enjoying social happiness.

We may, it is true, be asked why, in writing the "Life of an Irish Curate," we introduce such topics as this?—to which we reply, that, in doing so, we cannot forget the interest—the deep and earnest interest—he always felt in the happiness of his neglected countrymen; and, further, we cannot forget that it was under his eyes, and everywhere around him, that the circumstances we are describing took place—and as these circumstances, besides being of deep importance in themselves, were the first means of working into his heart those impressions of sympathy and affection which raised to such a moral height the tone of his pastoral duties, and mingled together, so greatly and so nobly, the love of his country with that of his religion and his God;—we say, then, for these reasons alone, we hold ourselves justified in detailing them, and in painting, with truth and accuracy, the state and condition of the country in which he was brought up.

The man to whom we have alluded, who forced those unnatural changes and principles upon the people, was, as we have said, no Irishman; neither was he capable of one generous feeling in the interest or welfare of those whose destinies were placed in his hands. Low-bred, uneducated, hard-hearted and cunning—without one generous emotion, or the power even of conceiving one, he was, as every illiterate upstart like him usually is, a most ready and willing slave in the hands of his employers, to promote whose interests—without any enlightened views of those mutual duties which render the welfare of landlord and tenant identical, and, as they ought to be, mutual—he was always active and sedulous, and never so much so as when he could do it at the expense or injury of the tenant. He was, in fact, one of those supple servants who, if he can anticipate his employer in anything that may prove injurious to him with whom the said employer may happen to be on but indifferent terms, will take a singular delight in becoming the vile instrument of his vengeance or resentment upon him. The man is consequently destitute of general capacity, vulgar, arrogant, replete with the insolence of office, and devoted, heart and soul—that is, according to the narrow measure of each which he possesses—to the class interests of those landed proprietors who are blind and ignorant enough to employ him. In a word, when he finds that he has a wealthy and independent tenant to deal with, he is plausible, and even friendly to him; but, on the other hand, he is uniformly the harassing scourge and enemy to the struggling man. Such is this vulgar, oppressive, and impudent Scotch adventurer, who has done more to injure a large portion of the property and the population of the parish we are describing, than any man who ever resided there in the same capacity.

As a further proof of his iniquitous practices in the capacity of agent, we are bound to state that, whilst he depopulated, or, as it is more fashionably termed, consolidated, the farms we described, he took care to send over to Scotland for men—whether of his own blood or not we cannot say, because we wish to state nothing at random—whom he placed in the consolidations, for his object was to banish the old occupiers, whether Protestant or Catholic—but especially the latter—altogether and completely from the soil, which he has been attempting to place in the possession of a new class of "settlers."

The consequences of this man's principles and practices in his character of agent have been deeply detrimental to the interests of every class, without exception, in that portion of the country where he is felt. From a not unnatural fear of coming under his resentment, many families in the neighbourhood have, even at a considerable sacrifice of convenience, property, and feeling, made it a point to emigrate to America, so that now the country, which we have already described to our readers as teeming with life, cheerfulness, and happiness, has been, for many years past, almost the reverse of what it was. If the reader were to stand upon one of the hills which in this glorious valley command such a beautiful and extensive prospect, he would see nothing in comparison to what it has been, and, with reference to its population—but a dull and hopeless solitude; the hamlets and villages gone—the large, newly-built farm-houses "like angels' visits, few and far between;" and on a Sabbath, or fair day, or festival, a population dwindled down to one-half its former numbers—dead, heartless, solemn, and evidently labouring under the depressing and ruinous principles which this bad agent has brought into operation in the country.

It was very fortunate that the father of our hero, to both of whom we must now return, did not live under this man's influence, especially as we are inclined to think that a knowledge of his practices would, to a warm and generous mind like that of Thomas O'Donovan, have completely undone all that his invaluable wife had effected.

The new master who replaced Shannon, was a mild rational man, whom no consciousness of scholastic authority could harden into tyranny. His influence over young O'Donovan removed from him all those evil consequences which party feeling and personal animosity, joined to a growing facility in tampering with truth, all occasioned by the master's injustice and undue severity, had left behind them. Owen had reached his fifteenth year when this change of masters took place, and by degrees it was observed that the capricious resolutions of the boy were beginning gradually to show themselves under a manlier and more rational guise. Many of his observations now were of a deeper and more solid cast of thought; but, on the other hand, although he was capable of reflecting with more clearness and accuracy, he was swayed, when they did occur, by fiercer outbursts of resentment and darker gusts of passion—so true is it that no earthly good can be found in this life without some corresponding evil to balance our lot, and enable us to take a high and courageous part in the battle of good and evil which is going on around us, and by which it often happens that our moral position in this world is to be determined.

Owen's mother observed, with something like alarm, that whilst his intellect and general powers of thought and observation were expanding, his passions were all but keeping pace with them. To enable him, or rather to assist in enabling him, as far as in her lay, to subdue those passions, was the great task which she had imposed upon herself during her whole life.

His new master possessed one faculty which, although the most necessary, is yet the most rare in a teacher—we mean the power of making the acquisition of scholastic knowledge an agreeable task rather than a painful one. Owen soon perceived this, and, indeed, we are not wrong in saying that the consciousness of it by degrees established in him a habit of application and a spirit of industry which probably he might never otherwise have possessed so eminently as he did.

Owing to this application, and the remarkable success which followed it, he began not merely to feel the preparation of his lessons as a pleasure, but, what was of still more importance, to experience larger, more solemn, and more becoming views upon the subject of his future duties. In forming these views he was aided considerably by his own clergymen, who now began to feel a deep interest in his life and studies.

He himself saw many things in operation about him which, to a mind naturally reflective, led him to feel what an enlarged sphere of duty presented itself like this in a country where the people had been neglected so long, and where, in consequence of the ban that had been placed upon both religion and education, there was yet much to do in forming, or rather in reforming, our national character in many points as a people.

One branch of study—at that time a very unusual one, and even still one that is very much neglected—he himself, urged by the state and condition of the country, and the existence of many circumstances for which he could not account, made a point to become acquainted with, that is as well as the imperfect sources then within his reach could enable him to do so. A willing mind, however, joined to industry and determination, will do much, and if Owen O'Donovan did not make himself a profound Irish historian, he had learned enough to teach him the principles on which the country had been uniformly governed. But it taught him more—that, after all, the whole weight of offence had not been confined to the one side; and that although the national mind had been degraded by a course of sanguinary oppression and crying injustice, yet that there still existed great faults for which it was difficult to account except upon principles not quite creditable to ourselves.

In acquiring a knowledge of Irish history he found it absolutely necessary, if he wished to reach the pure, original sources, often corrupted in their course, to make himself acquainted with the Irish language also. This, to him, was no great difficulty. He spoke it fluently, as did both his parents, and it is never difficult to master a living language in books when one can speak it with ease.

One great advantage, to which we have already alluded, lay in the piety of his mother—not simply as a personal influence, but as creative of habits of domestic happiness. Night and morning they prayed together: and it was utterly impossible that those acts of family devotion should not solemnize the day, and the whole circle of their feelings. This not only kept the living principle of religion alive and practical, but it did more, it expanded and enlarged its influence so powerfully, that, towards the close of his school career, it was a perfectly delightful thing for a stranger to spend a few days and nights in this truly Christian little fold.

We have already said, that Owen O'Donovan was generous and affectionate. These, it is true, are merely natural qualities, and are possessed by many whose lives reflect anything but credit upon religion, or even morality itself. The country around him, however, was pretty frequently visited by those periods of distress and suffering which carry destitution and sickness, in so many shapes, to the habitations of the poor and struggling. Now, we say, that Owen, in addition to generosity and affection, was also in possession of charity towards his fellow-creatures in an unusual degree. This virtue, resulting as it did from a spiritual feeling, added to a strong sense of duty, solemnized his other qualities, and gave them a religious tone which purified and elevated them. His father was now a wealthy man; and Owen, during the seasons of sickness and sufferings to which we have alluded, hearing necessarily of many individual cases of destitution and death in the neighbourhood, not only cast aside the fear of contagion, but did all that lay in his power, and in that of his kind-hearted family, to soothe, relieve, and support all those on whom the hand of God had been laid. It often happened that, during these pious visits to the sick beds of the poor, he met his clerical friends, who had now an opportunity of witnessing the first exhibition of those virtues which afterwards shone so conspicuously in his life.

His name now began to be on the lips of his neighbours, with that warm and enthusiastic feeling of gratitude which so well becomes the poor man who has experienced kindness and relief at the hands of his fellow-creatures. In his own family, too, where they had an opportunity of knowing him best, he was loved with inexpressible affection. Still, notwithstanding all that we have written, he would occasionally—but rarely, however, did he suffer such occasions to come—still, we say, that occasionally the ebullition of sudden resentment would make its appearance, and, in spite of all his efforts to suppress it, would carry him away for the moment.

He was now on the eve of his eighteenth year, and one day, about a week before he closed it, one of his father's servants, named Tommy Tracy, on being spoken to and remonstrated with by his next brother, John, retorted in a manner that did not seem to Owen to be sufficiently respectful. Tracy had been taxed with neglecting to mend a gap in a ditch behind the garden, when he replied that his master, who was then at the mill, had desired him to defer it until the next day, in order that he might bring one of the horses to be shod, as the animal stood in need of it very badly.

"Aye, aye," replied John, "that's a very good way to get out of it."

"I'm tellin' you nothing but the truth," replied Tracy, "and if you don't believe me I can't help it—nor, what's more, I don't care."

"I don't think there's a word of truth in what you say," replied John; "my father's not a man to ordher one thing and then make you do another."

"Isn't he?" returned the other; "aye, as much as any one I know; I have often known him to do it—for that matter," he proceeded, rather disposed to give the matter a good-humoured turn, especially as he saw the young man rather serious upon it—"I tell you that for the matter o' that he's a perfect weathercock."

"That's a lie," said the other, warmly, "and you know it is."

"No," returned the other, "but it's you that dales the lie out—and that, too, you have from the ould chap—sure divil such a liar in Europe as he is—and when he goes to a fair or market they make him always dale on his book oath, bekaise they couldn't believe him otherwise."

Owen, who was present during this slight altercation, felt his heart and spirit inflamed with resentment, and laying down a book which he held in his hand, he rushed at Tracy, whom he struck several times, until John interfered.

"Aisy, Owen dear," said he—"don't you see he's only jokin'—humbuggin' me—I didn't see at first, myself, but I did this moment."

Owen's passion was up, however, and it required all his brother's strength to keep him from Tracy, and perhaps he might not have succeeded after all, had not his father, at the moment, made his appearance, his mother having gone to market.

"What is this?" asked his father, alarmed, and a good deal surprised at the excitement and deep passion in which he found Owen—"what's the matter? In the name of goodness, Owen, how did you get into this state?"

"It was his—that impertinent scoundrel's fault—his impudence."

PAPERS ABOUT

Irish Missions and Missionaries.

NO. II.

ABOUT the middle of January, just twelve o'clock at night, three knocks, like blows from a carbine, announced a muscular visiter. The door of the missionary opened, and a figure presented itself—one every way worthy of the notice which had been given. The man was six feet high. A huge homespun overcoat surmounted an apparent accumulation of heavy underclothes. Long red hose covered him from toe to hip. His nose—and only his nose—peeped over a "comforter" of ample and numerous folds. A black hairy-cap, covering head and ears and brow, completed his costume—only, that he was covered beside with half-frozen masses of snow. The Missionary grew colder, as he surveyed this impersonation of a North American winter.

"Pardon, Sir!" spoke a strong Tipperary accent, "but I came to your reverence for a sick call."

This was delivered far away in the depths of the red cashmere, but it was sufficiently intelligible to arouse one, when the thermometer was twenty-two degrees below zero, and the water-jug on the hearth was covered with ice.

"Where do you come from?"

"Some thirty miles beyond —— river."

"You belong to another district."

"Yes; but the clergyman is thirty or forty miles further off than you, and the man is dying."

There was no use in reasoning or advising—the journey must be made. Accordingly the Tipperary man takes a seat, the clergyman begins to prepare, and the sweep of the sleet against the window, with an occasional howl of the norther', give notice that the outgoers shall have a reception "worthy of the time."

God can never be sufficiently praised for the true spirit of faith with which he has imbued the masses of our countrymen. It makes them a "priesthood" in zeal, and heroes in self-sacrifice. At home, 'twould appear that circumstances prevent, or, at least, lessen, its manifestations; in a foreign country each deems himself a guardian of the "deposit," and nothing possessed or hoped for is esteemed so much as the preservation of its integrity and the extension of its influence. This may be readily explained. In Ireland Catholicity is "in tuto." Hostility may assail, and ignorance asperse her doctrines and practices; but, we feel that we are the millions, and that the old sentinels on the watch-towers are sufficiently numerous and powerful to do battle. It is not so abroad. There we find ourselves the few. The many are leagued to oppose our progress, and prepared to misconceive our dogmas. In the sympathy created by her loneliness, her beauty, and the unmerited enmity of prejudice, we circle around faith. Then, the religion of home is almost all that remains to the exile. Its pride, too, frequently quails beneath the contempt of the stranger, who has learned to identify Ireland with ignorance and rags. Its memories are hidden in the heart of the only one who will appreciate them; its misfortunes are attributed by those who create them—and they are believed—to causes which are not calculated to elevate the estimate of our national character. And thus the Irishman's arms twine around his religion as the last heirloom of the heart which fate has left him. Long, very long, may the hallowed spirit continue. The moment which makes religion the agent, any other thing the end; the moment which beholds a national feeling constituting religion secondary to anything, however dignified or honourable—the moment which shuts out God from the causes of social amelioration, and deifies the self-sufficiency of such creatures as we—such a moment is the shadow of a coming eclipse which Ireland has not yet experienced.

The Irishman who, as we have already stated, called upon the Missionary Priest, was an illustration of the feelings and principles to which we have just referred. He had travelled some fifty miles in the depth of a North American winter. He had subjected himself to the thousand contingencies of sleigh-riding through half-made roads in the back woods; through the badly made roads of the country—over lochs, and lakes, and ruts, and swamps; and yet Mulrenan, that, we believe, was his name, scarcely knew the individual for whom he toiled—had never before seen him, and after he would have saved him, was unlikely to behold him again. The fact was, that the dying man, as well as a large family, had lived without the profession of any religion, and, we believe, with very limited knowledge of any. Mulrenan had been passing by the settlement and saw the man on the verge of judgment. No clergyman was in the vicinity—or no clergyman, we mean among the sectarians, would inconvenience himself by a lengthened journey; and hence our countryman succeeded in inducing the invalid to call for a Catholic Priest. 'Twas a weary journey, that of Mulrenan; but we remember the poor fellow's consolation—

"What harm, Sir, if the light of glory shine on the poor soul, and we bring him into the brave old Church? O, may God send it! Amen."

It was an awful night even for North America. Drift, dash, and sweep of snow saluted the travellers immediately on their egress from the house. Only an occasional glance could be taken at the path; the eye, on being raised, was instantaneously filled with snow. Then the cold—it crawled into the very marrow; the question continually reverted to the mind—"how long can this be borne?" Mulrenan clove his way, like a lord of the mist—the priest was not either so powerful or so fortunate; but he clung to his companion's side. It was inspiring to any fervour, and should stimulate any zeal, to follow the large Catholic heart, that so loved the glory of his father's house as to become its apostle in such circumstances.

"Boat a hoy!" cried the Irishman, as himself and the clergyman now approached the dock or wharf, for they had to cross an arm of the sea.

"Aye, aye!" was the reply. "All right; now, boys, stretch to your oars! the four last and greatest things depend upon haste—pull out, then! Well done!"

Off flew the boat, and, for life and limb, the men could not ply the oar more laboriously. The snow-storm increased, however, and an oar's length could not be seen ahead. The way was made, and the time wore, and wonder began to grow that the shore-light did not appear on the opposite side. They began to persuade themselves that they had not been so long on the water. "Now, then!" and a still more vigorous pull. The vessel flew with the impulse of excited energy—'twas vain. Still and still they laboured, and no shore presented itself.

"Lord, have mercy on us!" cried Mulrenan, "where can we be?"

The men paused. Fortunately the sea was not rough, and the snow-storm had partially abated. It was obvious that they had turned out to sea, and that the most imminent danger full stared them. "Lord, have mercy on us!" fell from every lip.

But a light on the lee bow gave them, after some time, a knowledge of their position. They found that they had been sailing for the light-house, and had, indeed, most providentially escaped. A squall—a gust of wind, or even a heavy sea, might have made poor Mulrenan only have secured a confessor for himself.

An hour and a-half had been lost in the peregrination sea-ward; and the process of disembarkation was as brief as might be. The tinkling of the sleigh-bell sounded sharply in the darkness, and told the wayfarers that the horse was impatient for his journey homeward. A moment, and they were seated in a species of tax-cart, with its iron-shod shafts upon the snow. They tucked their rug about feet and knees, touched the spirited animal, and started at the rate of nine miles or ten in the hour.

There is something exhilarating in the sleigh-drive by the broad day light, when a cloudless sun glances from the boundless field of white; the country is ringing round, with the bells which announce the rapid movements of industry or pleasure; and one is conscious of the almost airy sweep over surface of ice and snow, by the rapid transition of the landscape with its countless objects passing by. Then there is the sweet security of the sunshine, and the knowledge that a "spill" or a "break down" will engage sympathy and secure succour. Not so at night. On, on—jingling in loneliness—you feel as if you were some spirit on its tour of expiation, and that your night-bells gave warning of the penance to which you had been condemned. Now, rushing under a shelving rock—again, hurrying precipitously down some descent, of which heaven only knows what is to be the end or the incidents—then, caught in some land-snap, which centrifugally sends you off to describe epicicloids, from which you recover by a miracle; in truth, we would—although by no means given to heroism, or learned in the sword exercise—prefer a battle-field by day to a snow ice and rocky field in the back woods by night. Mulrenan had a singular specific to tranquillize his mind, amid the dangers to which the night-route exposed himself and his companion. First it was a signal blessing of God, he said, that they could not view half the dangers through which they were passing; and secondly, as a man was aware that by going to sleep he was likely to awake in the other world, it prevented him from yielding to the solicitations which the god of drowsiness so constantly employed. "Nevertheless, father," said the honest, good-natured fellow, "if anything does happen, I shall be sure to prepare, and you will not forget to raise a hand over me."

Through hissing and splashing, and many a long-drawn sigh, that followed, recovered, and unexpected equilibrium, the travellers arrived, about four A.M., at a kind of inn by the way side. The horse had certainly an ardent desire to complete the journey homewards, but his ability had not been improved by a hard trot of thirty miles. He made an instinctive detour as he approached the solitary light of the rude hostelry, stopped short, and shook himself, like one who felt that he had done his duty. The light of the candle showed that the creature was half cased in ice—so were his two companions cased; and if we must admit Mulrenan to have been so rude, we must record that he perpetrated the saying, 'twas "a hard case."

Two men, each holding a rifle, and an Indian girl, were in the house. The former were talking about "Sam Slick;" the latter had only just entered as the travellers alighted at the door. We mention the incident to introduce to the reader a singular phase in human destiny, and a singular illustration of human and religious feeling. Noemi, for such we discovered to be the Indian girl's name, was shaking the snow from her shawl of blue cloth, and had laid by the witch-like conical hat or cap, so favoured by the squaw and so frightfully unbecoming. Her mocassins were cut—her frock considerably torn—the long black rich hair fell about her neck and face in Indian profusion, and her eyes shot forth that calm yet brilliant beam which so peculiarly marks the Micmac race. The girl seemed quite unconscious of the presence of any one, and, in truth, was quite indifferent to it. The truest lady in bearing and address, whom we ever recollect, was an undegenerate Indian woman. Mulrenan knew and soon spoke to her. She turned towards him with a familiarity and dignity all her own. The Indian was beautiful, and she knew it; but her sweetest smile was accompanied by a look so self-possessed and so decisive, that "noli me tangere" repressed even more than kindness wooed confidence.

"And where does Noemi go so early, this blessed morning?" inquired Mulrenan.

"Ah!"—said the girl, in that soft complaining tone, which gives to the Indian woman's address the interest of very childhood, "Noemi go town to see Padlias (Priest); Indians want to have mass for Noemi's mother;"—and she began to gather together her baskets, mats, and other Indian work which she was bringing to town for sale, and in the manufacture of which, these Indians, considering their resources, are quite unrivalled.

"But isn't Noemi afraid to travel all the way by night and alone?"

"'Fraid!" and she tossed her head carelessly; "no, no—Noemi love her mother . . . and God," she added in a low tremulous tone. And she was right—no one would dare to harm the gentle and firm Indian maiden. A tear rose to the Missionary's eye, and he blest her filial love and heavenly confidence.

"Do you know, Sir," said Mulrenan, when they had proceeded on the road, "do you know that Noemi is no Indian?"

"You do not say so?"

"I do, Sir; Noemi is an Irish girl."

"An Irish girl! Why, what do you mean? you amaze me."

"It is most true, Sir. Poor Noemi! A soldier's wife, Sir, an Irish woman, young and fair and unfortunate, had followed her husband to America, I know not how, and had travelled after him, I know not where. They say, Sir, that she must have seen better days, for her hands were small and delicate as those of the Indian women, and that something, you know, which only early comfort and command can bestow, she had it. She had walked hundreds of miles in a state of pregnancy; and sixty miles from this place, by the road side, she was seized with the pangs of young motherhood. Providentially an Indian camp was located in the neighbourhood, and the unfortunate was discovered by a woman of her own age, a widow. You saw the crucifix and beads about Noemi's neck—no Indian goes without them. Well, the poor Irishwoman's eye, they say, rested upon the blessed cross, Sir, and a ray of heaven was in the smile she gave her deliverer, then. In the wigwam of the savage, Sir, she became a mother and a corpse. The poor Indians did what they could to procure a priest in sufficient time, but in vain. In such company, and in such a spot, she died, who had played by the fields and rivers of Ireland. When they softly laid her in her baby cradle, how little could they dream of the rude hands that should place her in the coffin."

"Well, and Noemi is the child of our poor country-woman."

"Yes. The husband had died even before the wife, and Noemi was left an early orphan. She has been reared and fondled, and almost spoiled by the Indians; she is their little queen. 'Twould delight you to see Noemi of a holiday going to mass, her adopted mother and brother by her side. The shadow of an early evil was upon her face, to be sure, but then she looked religiously happy. For the first time, I have heard of the good squaw's death—it is a sad blow to the 'flower of the wigwam.'"

"But the foster brother?"

"Is dead, Sir. The officers of the neighbouring garrison, with whom debauchery is almost the sole employment, made him the companion of their hunting excursions, and, in their more than savage brutality, made him drink to death. He lost his way on a lake of ice, over which, it is said, Noemi went to meet him. She saw him directing his steps towards his doom, and hurried towards him shrieking. He was drunk—he heeded or heard her not—and he sunk in the view of his sister and betrothed."

"God, have mercy on him, 'twas a sad fate! and the girl?"

"O, probably she had gone after him, had not some fleet Micmac overtaken and brought her back by force."

"The mother had not then died?"

"No; and, Sir, you would have wept to see the gentle fondness of Noemi for the childless widow. Well has she said, 'Noemi loved her mother.' A glorious day's devotion it will be, Sir, and delightful for them who will be present, while the Indians sing the dead mass."

"In truth it is delightful to hear them," said the priest.

A long silence followed.

It is a disgrace to the British uniform and citizenship that the inhuman practices of commissioned officers are permitted in the Colonies. Hospitality, though great for the number of the inhabitants in garrison towns, is not sufficiently extensive; duty is not very engrossing; there is no intellectual taste whatever among these gentlemen by regal impress; and the consequence is, that blighting ruin and wretchedness are spread over many a homestead, and the seeds of eternal hate sown in many a colonial soul. We have known fathers and mothers lie down and die of broken hearts; and young girls—in one instance, two from the same hearth—abandoned to misery and dishonour, while the unprincipled vagabondism which rioted in their destruction, was feted and loved, and honoured by the great of the world! May God in his mercy save us from such greatness! Why will not the horse-guards take prudent cognizance of disgrace, with which it must be perfectly acquainted? Why not render intellectual engagement or military exercises imperative, which may have some influence in preparing these gentlemen for active service? The authorities must know, that the young men who fill the list of subalterns have, in general, had no education beyond the shooting grounds or the race course; that for any intelligent display of their profession, they are as incapable as idiots; and that their pursuits are not only calculated to engender contempt of the English army, hatred of English rule, and public insecurity, but to render it impossible that they shall ever be worthy of their position. Let his Grace the Duke feel assured, that if the projected defences are manned by coxcombry and sensuality, we may as well call in Prince Joinville at once. There is no regimental library, no lecture, no study. And the young men themselves are too frequently the victims of the system. We have known a young fellow, leaving his college pure and high-minded and active—an exalted idea of his professional relations, and a virtuous though limited education made every eye turn towards him with interest. . . . In two years he almost ruined his family, broke his constitution—and he had followed to the grave the first victim of his passion. He was called home, and we hope he has become a better man. If this page meet his eye, he will recognize the writer, and feel assured that he has his prayers. While upon this subject, we may say that we would wish to be able to reach the hearts of our fair and humble countrywomen, who sacrifice home and friends and hope, for the imaginary bliss of a barrack square, and the competency of a shilling a-day and a washing-tub. On the earth, as a general rule, there is nothing to approach the unmitigated hardship of a soldier's wife. Filth and want, and, often, insult, are her wretched portion; while the licentious habits of the barrack room efface every religious impression, blunt all feeling, and lay the foundation of future ruin. Present unhappiness is almost inevitable—the happiness which religion promises is almost as certainly lost.

We laughed a good deal—forgive us the irreverence—the other day, when noble peers and wise commoners vended their folly for English fame, and gave us a dissertation on the confessional. It was delectable to behold with what sagacity they would make an alliance between penance and the powers that be, and aid the executive by the perjury of the priesthood. It looked, however excessively like the man who put his head out of his window to announce that he was "not at home." We have some small experience of the Colonies—Lord Stanley was once their minister. Along the coast from Cape Sable to the Labrador, there are thousands of Scotch, Irish, aye, and English soldiers, within an easy journey of freedom, affection, and affluence. The Irishman and the Scotchman, in particular, have there their connexions by blood and the friends of their childhood. They have labour's ready reward, and thronged and thronging mart. Home—for the Irishman—has ceased to be his. His relatives are dead—have starved—or, ejected, have made the great new world his heart's anchorage. Why does he not desert? Paley would give rise to fallacies, which would lighten his estimate of his oath. The scene of disorder, irreligion, blasphemy, obscenity of a barrack room, is not fascinating to a moral man, is irremediable, and nearly intolerable. Few good men would cast their lot with our armies could they anticipate such scenes of abomination. Why do the Irish and Scotch Catholics remain? A word with you, my Lord! May we assure you, that we have known numbers—the events were spread through years—hundreds stayed and fixed firm in their allegiance, by the influence of the priest and the confessional? The clergy knew the commanders—good, bad, and indifferent they were. Had the men imagined that their projected desertion was a topic of conversation, between their pastor and their major, how many would consult the priest on the morality of their journey to Massachusetts or New York? Are men to be supposed fools, my Lord, while legislators bark in session? You might destroy the confessional if we could make your dictum canon law, but you could not serve the government. Some people, indeed, think you too wise to have been sincere in any thing which you spoke on this subject, and think that in operating upon the gullability of your hearers, you only “treated a fool according to his folly.”

The bright daylight lit up the woods, “nive candida”—the rocks, ditto, ditto—and the travellers and their horse, composing part of the same fair view, before the sleigh and its freight arrived at the home in the back settlements. The scenery we cannot describe. There were patches burned in the woods—blackened trunks half fallen, like a drunken toper steadying himself—great huge rocks on and beside the way—not road—an occasional peeping out of a distant lake, with a shanty here and there upon its brim; a sky above, which, from the road, generally looked like a race-course for the young stars; they cleared off in the morning, and then—woods, woods, woods! Well, this is very nearly all that can be said. Though we fall under Quinetillian's curse, “Miser ille orator qui nullum potest detrudere verbum,” we have given all.

It was neither brief nor moderate labour to get to the “home in the woods.” Whoever made the song on this subject was a fool, and, we'll swear, never saw what he sang. The immediate approach was “an entertainment for man and horse;” but had not the brute very much the advantage of the man, we should have much preferred to be far away from the vehicle. The animal, however, stepped like a minuet dancer of the old times. What by balancing, pirouetting, pausing, and prancing, he at length came to his own door, the most satisfied of the whole three. The farm yard had a barn like a rope-walk; sheep without number chorussed within; an axle of a cart, with one wheel, lay in the middle; a stake-hedge ran along the side; pigs snored like sleepy sentinels along this frontier, and the house appeared, by one end of it which came into the yard, to give the cold shoulder to all the afore-said. The “one end” of the house was on a rising ground, and the remainder was, consequently, sustained by a right-angled-triangle stone-wall, behind which, the interior of the house showed you, there was a cellar. The welcome was not warm. The patient appeared to be dying. The room in which he lay was low, dirty and small. A woman, the young man's youngest sister, wept by his side, and five brothers and four sisters-in-law stood in the long passage, talking in under-tones, apparently about the clergyman, his journey and his charge.

Only among our clerical readers can be felt the hours which followed the long night, the hours employed in preparing an unbaptised and dying adult for his long home. Instruction, explanation, exhortation, the foundation of the “rationabile obsequium.” Well, they had been at length concluded. The unsophisticated backwoodsman had become a man of religion and a penitent. The baptismal grace seemed to be actively and overtly miraculous; for the young man's conversation and advice brought tears to the missionary's eyes. The latter had partaken of a large loaf, a herring, a bowl of boiled bohea, and the contents of a broken teapot which had upset into his lap. He shook hands with his penitent and convert, gave him the kiss of peace, and said “farewell.”

“I say, Sir!” said one of the huge brothers in the long entry.

Looking round, the clergyman perceived one on a loft, a second peeped from the cellar, a third stood at the door, and one, the interrogator, stood just by.

“Well, my friend,” replied the Missionary.

“You've had a cold night's work, I guess?”

“Why, rather. My patient is your brother.”

While the Missionary spoke, the backwoodsman looked very earnest while he unrolled a large goatskin purse, from which he carefully drew five provincial pound notes.

“Will this pay you for your trouble?”

“Oh, much more than pay me—I shall not accept of any money.”

The backwoodsman looked at the Priest, then round at the young men, then at the clergyman again.

“Do you mean to say that you travel all night to see my brother, and won't take no pay?”

“Yes.”

“Well, that is queer,” said the backwoodsman, restoring the money to its former place in the goatskin bag. He shook hands with the clergyman, but said not another word.

The young man recovered, and the whole family soon knelt before the same altar. Mulrenan was a proud man on that day. “Glory be to God,” said he, “isn't it a fine thought that I had a hand in saving so many souls, by bringing them back to the old faith!”

It is melancholy, were it not necessary, that such immense districts should be committed to one Missionary in our colonies. Whilst a clergyman proceeds to one extremity of his peculiar charge, his services are sometimes deeply demanded in the other; and many, in their isolation, can neither have the hope of visiting him or of being visited. The consequence must frequently be, unprepared souls appearing before God—defections from faith, and uncorrected scandals. We have sometimes thought that the case might obtain partial remedy by appointing Missionaries to the duty of continued travel for a month—these to be succeeded by others, or another, during the succeeding one; and thus a series of travelling clergymen would impose the duty, perhaps not more than once in a year on each, while many and great exigencies might be met. These things, however, we say with all humility—praying pardon if our ignorance may have rendered our zeal indiscreet.

We had intended, in this place, to examine the interesting question of the progress of Catholicism in America. Men of every creed, religious or political, have spoken and written on the subject, and, were we only to bring their opinions together, for mutual illustration, we should, we imagine, accomplish a work useful to religion and agreeable to our readers. We find, however, that in our present number we cannot indulge our desire. We have already trespassed beyond our limits, and, perhaps, your patience. Craving favour, then, we shall suspend the inquiry until March.

But we may be permitted to express our astonishment at the fatuity of our government—that, looking abroad at the Catholic Church in this empire—contemplating her Irish citizens in the East and the West, in the North and the South—viewing Catholicism—Irish Catholicism—standing on every soil—the very depository of the kingdom's life's treasure—we may be permitted to express our astonishment that England does not awake to the necessity of cherishing Irish and Irish Catholic good feeling; nay, that she is the patroness of bigotry and the active cause of division among her children. Why is there no enlarged effort to supply the population with the ministers of their confidence? Why is it ever to be work—work—work—for the purpose of enriching and ennobling a state which contemns and oppresses them? The spectacle of millions upon millions of men, whose interests are identical in one regard, and whose fidelity is a nation's only safety—many of whom are patronised by our foes, and who may be said to hold the keys of our most gigantic possessions—such a people, oppressed in peace, might be dangerous in war. Troubles at home might make them foreign foes; and troubles abroad might make them hostile subsidies. Why not unite them?

Look on our Canadian possessions—they are held by the loyalty of Irishmen. We should be very unwilling to depreciate the attachment of the French Clergy; just as unwilling to impugn the morality of the French laity; but it is not in the nature of things that men of different language, habits, historic recollections, and whose living parentage is our “natural enemy,” should be attached to our connexion. We speak the sentiments of reason, and the results of an experience which no English minister can ever possess, that Irishmen are the surest guardians of England's power over the American frontier. The Orangeman of Upper Canada hates England—many a Frenchman sympathises with him; all these have their eye and their wishes over the St. Laurence; Ireland is the only country from which the traveller in Upper Canada cannot find a disaffected citizen. Yet, may we reprint from Lord Durham's report:

“The Catholics constitute at least one-fifth of the whole population of Upper Canada. Their loyalty was most generally and unequivocally exhibited at the late outbreak. Nevertheless, it is said they are wholly excluded from all share in the government of the country and the patronage at its disposal.”

“In Upper Canada,” says Mr. Manahan, “there never was one Irish Roman Catholic an executive or legislative councillor; nor has one been ever appointed to any public situation of emolument and profit in the colony.”

“The Irish Catholics complain very loudly and justly of the existence of Orangeism in this colony. They are justly indignant that, in a province which their loyalty and bravery have materially contributed to save, their feelings are outraged by the symbols and processions of this association.”

And this is the country whose soldiers, two years ago, were compelled to stand, for hours, bareheaded under a West Indian sun, because they could not violate their conscience by worshipping in the Church of England. This is the country from whose Priests we have before us, at this moment, letters from many parts of the earth complaining of official tyranny, sordid bigotry, irreligious aggression, relentless persecution of almost every kind—while England encourages, by not improving her minions! Well—let it be.

The Celtic Society.

“THE BOOK OF RIGHTS.” Edited by JOHN O'DONOVAN, Esq., M.R.I.A.

THERE is a French proverb, that “Time spares nothing which has been done without his co-operation;” and, if the destroying monarch awards a durability to the works of man, proportionate to the space consumed in their growth and perfection, we may fairly augur a long reign for the Celtic Society, and permanent influence on Irish literature from the publication of the “Book of Rights.” That book is now before us. It is the first-born of a society founded two years and a half ago, and it ought to be as good as the acquirements of its distinguished editor could make it, in order to compensate the many disappointments and satisfy the legitimate expectations of those members who have been enrolled “paid” on the lists of the society in the first months of 1846. We know that no blame can be attached to the learned editor; we do not take upon ourselves to censure the printer, or the council, or the secretaries, or the working members of the Society, but it were treason in a public journalist to attempt to deny that the primitive members had arrived at the conclusion, that blame should rest somewhere, and that the very great delay had induced many to believe that their subscriptions were embarked in a South Sea scheme.

Knowing that the object of the Society is good—fervently hoping, therefore, that it may succeed—confident that it must succeed under proper management, we have assiduously collected, as far as was in our power, every excuse that could palliate the extreme delay. The beautiful illustrated title-page and exquisite topography of the associates' copy, must disarm the censure of all who believe there is anything worth preserving in ancient Irish literature. Such persons will ask no explanation of the delay; but, for such as may require it, it will be answered by some, that the young Society combines Irishmen of all parties for a national object, and union never having been the characteristic of Irishmen, misunderstandings, rivalry, compromise, fickleness, disgust, secession, were naturally to be expected, and must have wofully retarded the advent of the first book. If this excuse were true, which it is not (so far, at least, as to cause the secession of any of the original members), the Society was incapable of profiting by the example of a similar society, which has been steadily doing its work since Patrick's Day, 1840. The Archæological Society is not exclusive, and yet it has worked harmoniously. Its younger brother, not rival, the Celtic, would have long since produced a book, if last year had not been the ever-memorable 1847, the year of famine and pestilence—of every woe which the chastening hand of God can send down on an afflicted people. It would have been inhuman, in such a year, to ask men to give their money for any object, however national, when famine was devouring its victims by tens of thousands. Far better was it for the founders to bide their time. Every subscription given in during such a year was an earnest of the enthusiastic and persevering support of the subscriber. The founders saw with delight that subscriptions came in slowly but steadily, they adapted their own progress to these indications, and now, without any extraordinary exertion, hardly even a single puff in journal or periodical, they are able to say that if the Society fall, it will not be from want of support, but of men to use it.

The founders tread dangerous ground, and they know it; the prospectus details, very honestly, the various attempts to establish similar societies—all, with one exception, ending in nothing. It is well that this danger of failure is known. Those who are indifferent to Irish history, either from ignorance or contempt, who believe that there is nothing worth preserving, or that there is not spirit to preserve it, say, like the messengers sent into the promised land, "no, let us not go up there, the land which we have viewed devourerth its inhabitants;" and, truly, neither high names nor friendly combinations could save preceding Celtic Societies from ruin. Examine the roll of the Ibero Celtic Society, founded in 1820, Patron, His Excellency Earl Talbot; President, the Duke of Leinster; Vice-presidents, the Marquis of Sligo and Thomond, Earl O'Neil, Viscounts Montmorency and Monk. Among the members you read, the Earls of Rosse and Mount Charles, Lords Viscount de Vesci, Carberry, Castlecoote, Clonbrock, and Garvagh, Dr. Murphy, late Bishop of Cork, and Dr. M'Nicholas, Bishop of Achonry, Dr. Crotty, President, and Rev. Paul O'Brien, Professor, Maynooth College, Rev. F. Sadlier, F. T. C. D., Rev. J. Singer, F. T. C. D., Rev. W. Phelan, F. T. C. D. And yet, with this imposing array of titles and dignities—those omens of general support—the work which records their names was the first and last of the Ibero Celtic Society. There is, however, one marked difference between the Celtic and its defunct namesake, that the former has not merely noble names and friendly combinations, but a stout phalanx of enrolled members to support it, with scholars, who, in the Irish language at least, may, without any offence, safely be pronounced far superior to their predecessors. The learned works which Mr. O'Donovan has edited for the Archæological Society, his intimate acquaintance with the manuscripts extant in our libraries, his connexion with the Ordnance Survey, which, to the amusement and wonder of the rising generation, raised its flags and cast its net of chains over the country, marking down old churches and holy wells with as much diligence as if her majesty's title depended on them—all these have given to him such an Irish education, as no man living can be expected to acquire. All the historic scenes in our land, the churches of SS. Kevin and Columba and St. Patrick, the battle-fields of the Strongbowman, and the succeeding colonists, together with the localities mentioned in our ancient martyrologies, which baffled the industry even of Colgan, all are familiar to our editor as the scenes of their boyhood are to ordinary scholars.

This profound knowledge of topography has enabled him to detect many serious errors of preceding writers, which often perplexed and confounded their narratives. Who, that studied in Maynooth, forgets Laraghbrine?

the venerable old church, with its crumbling tower and ivy-clad walls, shaded by the graceful lime-trees, and looking down, from its gentle eminence, on the college-ranges and the old fortress of the Geraldines? Its very name reminds us of days, when, with the buoyant heart of youth, we tripped happily on the "walk-day" along the Royal Canal or the road to Killock; for the seniors in the church it possesses more solemn and endearing associations, because, for many years after 1795 it was the burial-place of the students and professors who died in the College.* Surely there could have been no mistake regarding the locality of Laraghbrine, no erring topographer could have robbed it of any of its legitimate claims to veneration; yet Dr. Lanigan, on whose "extensive knowledge, deep research, and accurate criticism" Dr. Doyle pronounced an eulogium which has been ratified by all succeeding scholars, even he, with one touch of his pen, transports Laraghbrine to the Desies, or present county of Waterford. Colgan (A. A. S.S., p. 360) records, from the Irish Annals, A. D. 854, the death of Cormac, an author and Bishop of Lathrigh Briuin; Dr. Lanigan (vol. iii., p. 324), relating the same event, places Lathrigh Briuin in the country of the O'Féolans, or County Waterford; and, in proof of his assertion, refers to Colgan (A. A. S.S., p. 541), where we read of the death of St. Senanus, contemporary of St. Columba and patron saint of Lathrigh Briuin, in Hy Féolain. But Mr. O'Donovan restores Cormac, author and Bishop, and St. Senanus to their true home—the Laraghbrine of Maynooth. In a note to that part of the "Book of Rights," which treats of the tributes and territories of the King of Leinster, we read:

"Ui Féelain.—This was the name of a tribe and territory, containing about the northern half of the present County of Kildare. It comprised the Baronies of "Clane" and "Salt," and the greater part, if not the entire, of those of "Ikeathy" and "Oughteranny," the town of Nas (Naas), and the churches of Claneadh (Clane), Lathreach Bruin (Laraghbrine, near Maynooth), Donaghmore Muighe Luadhat (Donaghmore), Cluaine Conaire (Cloncurry), and Fiodh-Chuillin (Feighcullen), were in it. See the "Feilire Énglais" and the "Irish Calendar" of the O'Cleries, at 18th May, 8th June, 8th August, 2nd and 16th of September, and 27th of October. After the establishment of surnames, the chiefs of this territory took that of Mac Féelain, and, soon after, that of O'Brain (anglice, O'Byrne), but they were driven from this level and fertile territory about the year 1202, by Meyler Fitzhenry and his followers, when they retired into the mountains of Wicklow, where they acquired new settlements, and, in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, they were possessed of more than the southern half of the now County Wicklow."

The writer then refers for detailed proofs of his statement to his splendid edition of the "Four Masters," published by Messrs. Hodges and Smith. Thus Laraghbrine, which was one of the first churches plun-

* Maurice Ahearne, Priest of the diocese of Kerry, Licentiate of the Faculty of Theology, Paris, Fellow of the College of Navarre, Professor of Philosophy in the University, Paris, Canon and Vicar-General of the Cathedral Church of Chartres, Professor of Theology in St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, died in February, 1801, aged 66 years. Augustine C. McCormick, Priest of the diocese of Down (last Abbot of Bangor), died in St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, May 7th, 1807, aged 70 years. Edmund Ferris, Priest of the diocese of Kerry, Head Coadjutor of the Society of Missionaries in France, Vicar-General of the diocese of Amiens, Master of the Sacred Faculty, and Professor, Maynooth, died in December, 1809, aged 72. The epitaphs, from which these notices are extracted, are still legible (we hear) in the ruined church of Laraghbrine. Portions of the walls of that church are falling every year, though it is better protected than most of our rural churchyards. Edmund Ferris was so generally beloved that his funeral service was celebrated in several parts of Ireland. One of the members of the Council of the Celtic Society was selected by the alumni of Maynooth to preach his funeral oration in the city of Kilkenny, in the year 1810.

dered by Strongbow, and which holds the ashes of several of the Geraldines, recovers its historic name, which carries us back to its patron saint Senanus, and his contemporary, St. Columba, Apostle of the Piets.

To appreciate the value of the editor's notes, the reader will bear in mind that as "The Book of Rights" records the political relations of all the Irish Provincial kings to the head King of Ireland, before the English invasion, it was necessary to survey the whole island and define the precise limits of its ancient principalities. So perfect is this topography, that a map of ancient Ireland could be easily constructed, and is, we hear, in an advanced state of preparation for the members of the Celtic Society. It is generally, and perhaps truly, believed that the ancient Irish attached too much importance to genealogy and topography—but can the ecclesiastic, at least, censure a diligence which enables him to identify the venerable ruin, and associate it with those great ages when Ireland was the light of western Europe and the Island of Saints? Is there no solemnity imparted to the 2nd of September by the discovery that it is the festival of St. Senanus, whose church is almost within the walls of the great nursery of the Irish priesthood?

As another example of the historical value of these copious topographical notes, let us take the native country of St. Laurence O'Toole, patron saint of the archbishopric of Dublin. Mr. O'Donovan proves that the southern half of the county of Kildare, not Wicklow, was the ancient patrimony of the O'Tooles.

"Soon after the death of the celebrated Saint Lorchan O'Tuathail (Anglice Laurence O'Toole), the family of the Mc Tuathail (O'Tooles) were driven from this level and fertile district by the great Baron Walter de Riddlesford, or Gualterus de Ridsfordia, who, according to Giraldus (Hibernia Expugnata, lib. ii. c. 21), had his castle at Tristerdermott (now Castledermott). Dr. Lanigan (His. Ecc., vol. iv. p. 174), and Mr. Moore, in his history of Ireland (vol. ii. p. 308), and all subsequent writers state that Muirheartach O'Tuathail, the father of St. Laurence, was prince of "Imaile;" but this is a great mistake, for Ui Mail (Imaile), into which the tribe of O'Tuathail migrated, had been, before the English invasion, the patrimonial inheritance of the O'Tadhg (Anglice, formerly O'Teige, now Tighe). Equally erroneous is the statement in the life of "St. Laurence," published by Messingham, in his Florilegium, that St. Laurence's father was the king of all Leinster, for we know, from the best authorities, that though he was of the royal family of Leinster, and next in superiority of that province, he never became king of it."—p. 210.

These two examples—Laraghbrine, and the royal home of St. Laurence—are taken at random from a single county. Similar proofs of topographical knowledge could be culled from the notes on every province, and county, and barony, and townland in the island. If the ancient glory of Ireland be not a monster humbug, concocted by the writers of every country in mediæval Europe, this "Book of Rights" is a valuable accession to ecclesiastical literature.

In admitting that the tendency of Irish literature to mere topography appeared excessive, we do not wish to be understood as condemning the reflection of Dr. Johnson, among the ruins of Iona: "that whatever raised our thoughts above the present, and stirred an association of the invisible past, or future, elevates and refines the soul." Now Irish topography is eminently suggestive. It is the reflection of the history of the country, natural, political, religious.—Even the wells have a language for the initiated. On the summit of Sliev-bloom is "Hugh O'Neil's" well; in Wicklow there are twenty-five, in Dublin thirty-five, in Carlow ten, and in Wexford eighty wells called by the name of the Blessed Virgin, or the saints.

This is not the fashion of the present day, and if Ireland were now colonised from England or France, the nomenclature would assuredly be very different, as different as the present stiff botanical names are from those of ancient ages, when the flower bore the name of a saint, or a friend, or suggested some other moral association; as different, in a word, as St. Mary's and St. Kevin's-street are from Camden-street and Bedford-row. It is that suggestive character in Irish topography which relieves the dull monotony of a mere dictionary of places, and lends a charm to the comprehensive notes of the "Book of Rights."

We have hitherto confined our attention to the notes. The body of the work we leave to the members of the Society, which, there is some reason to believe, will soon include all who buy books, or subscribe to literary institutions in Ireland. In a learned introduction of sixty-six pages, the editor gives a valuable dissertation on the authenticity and date of the work, and various important questions on the ancient history of Ireland. Here we find him correcting generally-received errors, adding to our stock of general knowledge, and plucking with stern, but scholarlike hand, the pretenders who decked themselves with the well-earned fame of others, and were not ashamed to claim the labour of their neighbours as their own.

"An abstract of the Book of Rights," says our author, "is given by Dr. John O'Brien, Roman Catholic bishop of Cloyne, in his Dissertations on the Laws of the Ancient Irish—a work which was published by Vallancey in 1774, in the third number of the "Collectanea de Rebus Hibernicæ," where this abstract occupied from p. 274, to p. 389. The suppression of O'Brien's name in the publication of this has caused some confusion. Thus, where the author says "in my copy of the Annales Innisfallenses, I find," &c., all subsequent writers took for granted that this referred to Vallancey's copy of these Annals, whereas the fact turns out to be that "my copy of the Annales Innisfallenses," throughout this work (the Dissertation on the laws the Ancient Irish) refers to a compilation of Annals made for Dr. John O'Brien, by John Coury, in 1760, at Paris, from all accessible Irish, Anglo-Irish, and English sources, of which the autograph is now preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, with various marginal condemnatory notes in the hand-writing of Charles O'Connor, of Belanagare. In consequence of the suppression of O'Brien's name in connexion with that work, it has been quoted as Vallancey's, even by all those who have since treated of the subject, but more particularly by Mr. Moore, who frequently quotes Vallancey's Dissertation on the Laws of Tanistry, in his History of Ireland, as a work of authority."—p. ii. Introd.

It must not be supposed that the editor is one of those who take a malicious pleasure in exposing the errors of their predecessors. His theme extends over a very wide range, comprehending not only topography, but the political, and religious, and social state of the ancient Irish, together with the fragments of their literary history which have come down to our times. In a subject so ample, it was but natural to expect that the disagreeable duty of emendation and censure should frequently devolve on him, but neither in the introduction, which comprises dissertations on the Psalter of Cashel, the roads and chariots of the Irish, their chessmen, their computation of the year, and also on the colonies of Dublin Danes, nor in any part of the work do we find him stepping out of his way to parade his knowledge, or pick a quarrel with his predecessors. Above all, there is no straining after hypothesis or conjecture; authorities, where they can be had, are given circumstantially; where they cannot be had, to clear up a point, the point is always left for future investigation. This is a canon of the utmost importance in publishing a literature of which the greater part yet remains in manuscript. How often have the most plausible and consistent theories been laid in the dust by the discovery of a few unfortunate lines in some hitherto unnoticed manuscript, which substitutes fact for theory.

The "Book of Rights" was generally attributed to St. Benen, or Benignus, disciple and successor of St. Patrick, but the editor proves that though such a work was certainly drawn up and sanctioned by Benignus, immediately after the establishment of Christianity, it cannot be said "that any part of the work, in its present form, was written by that bishop.

"It gives an account of the rights of the monarchs of all Ireland, and the revenues payable to them by the principal kings of the other provinces, and of the stipends paid by the monarchs to the inferior kings for their services. It also treats of the rights of each of the provincial kings, and the revenues payable to them from the inferior kings of the districts, or tribes subsidiary to them, and of the stipends paid by the superior to the inferior provincial kings for their services.

"These accounts are authoritatively delivered in verse, each poem being introduced by a prose statement; and of those joint pieces, twenty-one in number, seven are devoted to Munster, and the rights of the monarch of all Ireland are treated of under this head, for it first supposes the king of Munster to be the monarch, and then subjoins an account of his rights, when he is not king over all Ireland. Two pieces are then devoted to the province of Connaught, two to each of the three divisions of Ulster, two to Midhe, or Meath, and two to Leinster, with an additional poem on the Galls, or foreigners of Dublin, and a concluding piece on the rights of the kings of Teamhair, or Tara. The prose usually purports to be a short statement, or summary of the poem which follows, and which it treats as a pre-existing document. Those prose introductions almost uniformly conclude with an allegation that Benen said or sang as follows, de quibus Benen dixit."

As a specimen of the translation, which is, as it ought to be, rigidly literal, we give a few quatrains from the rights of the king at Tara.

"Teamhair, the house in which resided the son of Con,
The seat of the heroes in Liath-druim, (a name of Tara)
I have in memory
Their stipends to the chieftains.

Every king who occupies strong Teamhair,
And possesses the land of Eire,
He is the noblest among all
The hosts of Banba, the fertile.

If he be a rightful king of Teamhair,
It is right for the chiefs
To make, each of them, submission, even at his house,
To the just, and justly-judging king.

Teamhair is not due to him
Unless he be a very intelligent historian,
So that he may tell his chieftains
The stipend of every person."

Among the merits of the book, a very high place must be assigned to the copious index of nearly thirty-three pages, in which all the chief places in Ireland, and many of her most celebrated names are found. Judging from the productions of some of our literary societies, one would be inclined to think that our literati were a sect of semi-Pythagoreans, who, though not observing in all its rigour the discipline of the secret, yet contrived to make their works of the least possible use to the public, by either giving no index, or one so scanty that it rather perplexes than aids the reader. There is also another feature in the work which has, at least, novelty to recommend it—some persons may question its general utility, but there can be no question that it will save future scholars a vast amount of labour, and enable them to devote their time, not to emendations of their predecessors, but to making original accessions to an already perfect capital—it is nothing less than a compilation of "various readings," on the principle, we presume, of the "variae lectiones" of the classic authors of antiquity. The "Book of Rights" was printed from two vellum manuscripts of great antiquity, the Book of Lecan and the Book of Ballymote, and from the collation it was discovered that there were 900 "various readings," generally differing only in one word, all of which are subjoined to the volume. They take up nearly twenty-four pages. Not withholding the meed of our wondering applause from this singular diligence, and the almost luxurious niceties of typography, we cannot help remembering with apprehension that one of the literary exquisites of antiquity was in the end strangled, we believe, by a grape.

Time will soon tell the fate of the Celtic Society. If it deserve success, it will assuredly obtain it. It is already out of danger, having received pledges of general and enthusiastic support.* But we would take the liberty of offering a word of advice to two classes of Irishmen, and the advice is applicable to some in every party which owns that denomination—To one we would say, your expectations are too enthusiastic and visionary; you will not get for your money an Irish Demosthenes, or an Irish Homer, simply because such treasures really are not found in our manuscripts. To the other party we would say, you despise Irish literature, because you are ignorant of the contemporary literature of other countries, you have adopted the slang of our transmarine fellow-subjects, or of that class which has been so appropriately denominated "shoneens" in this country, because they aped the language of "big brother John" at the other side of the water. You talk of the meagreness of our annals, and you will not aid in publishing the auxiliary pieces, which are the flesh, and complexion, and breathing spirit of history. You appear to forget that there are such unexplored repositories of Irish manuscripts as the Burgundian Library, Brussels, and the Roman archives of St. Isidore's, and above all, that to the disgrace of Ireland, there are lying unpublished this moment in some of our Irish libraries, great, and undoubtedly authentic and coeval monuments of Ireland's fame, when the annals of all Europe proclaimed that she was not a country without a history.†

"The Council of the Celtic Society having intrusted me with the superintendence of this volume in its progress through the press, I hereby certify that it is in all respects conformable to the rules of the Society. I also take this opportunity of expressing, upon the part of the Council, their thanks to the Royal Irish Academy, for the permission to print this work from their most valuable MSS.: to the Provost and Board of Trinity College, for access to their manuscript library: and to the Rev. Dr. Todd, for facilities in the consultation of it, which he was kind enough to afford. To John O'Donovan, Esq., our thanks are pre-eminently due, for the learning and zeal he has exhibited in the editing and general arrangement of the work. In it will be recognized a further proof of the critical and profound knowledge which he possesses of the language of our country, as well as of its topography and history. The services of Mr. Eugene Curry have been invaluable, and I am happy to record that his intimate knowledge of our ancient literature has throughout the work been made available.

† It will be not a little remarkable if, in these awful times, the foundations have been laid of a genuine Irish Historical and Literary Association, which will carry out its motto: "Truth is the life of History." But such an origin, in such times, would not be without a precedent. During the last thirty years, the press has been teeming with books of all sizes, proving to us that the "dark ages" were not so black as people generally imagined. But where did that good work commence? Who gave it its most vigorous impulse, and when? M. de la Porte du Theil, in the coming gloom of the French Revolution, 1791, published his "Recueil des chartes, &c. relatifs à l'histoire de France," and among them many inedited letters of Innocent III.—whose life is the key-stone of the middle ages. In l'an IX. of the French era, he vindicated that pope. In the ninth vol. of the "Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale, publiés par l'Institut National de France" he laid the foundation of all that has been since accomplished, and gave, even then, a fairer view of that pope's pontificate than has been since given by some of our Catholic historians in England.

SKETCHES OF

The Lives of Great Christian Artists.

NO. III.—THE FAMILY OF VAN EYCK.

WE are so accustomed to dwell upon the memories of those men who have accomplished great works in art, or in science, that the more humble, yet not less useful characters who have, in opposing and depressing circumstances, travailed in the origination of ideas matured or perfected by their successors under favourable auspices, are frequently forgotten. Thus, while the world is filled with the fame justly awarded to a Raffaele, an Angelo, a Dominichino, or a Corregio, the merits of a Fra Bartolomeo, an Angelico, or a Lippi, are only known and appreciated by the few who penetrate beyond the vulgar gaze into the mysteries of art, and who love to trace the steps by which it progressed, from its humble beginnings to the greatest perfection which has been vouchsafed to it. Those who admire the classic elegance of Rubens, the "mystery and silence which hung upon the pencil" of Rembrandt, and the mysticism of the old, or Catholic feeling of the modern German schools, seldom, we fear, bestow a thought on the geniuses to whom all were so much indebted—"the family of Van Eyck." Be it our duty here to recall a few circumstances of their lives, and to take a hurried glance at some of their works; for indeed they were great productions for their times—Catholic in spirit and feeling, withal—and present beauties which it would be well for artists to study and imitate, and connoisseurs to admire.

About the middle of the fourteenth century there resided in Maaseyk, a German town situated on the borders of the river Meuse, a good man, named Van Eyck, who lived by the exercise of the pictorial art. His simple works pleased the simple tastes of his countrymen for whom he painted, and little is related of him personally but that he discharged the duties of a Christian and citizen with fidelity. His wife was also skilled in painting, and assisted her husband in his daily avocations. To these was born a son in 1366, to whom they gave the name Hubert; and four years later, another, whom they called John. These brothers were destined to exercise a powerful influence on the art which their parents practised after the conventional methods and simple fashions of former times.

At an early age, Hubert became the pupil and assistant of his father, and attained such proficiency in his art that he was enabled to take the sole direction of his younger brother's studies, when he had arrived at a suitable age. The brothers continued to practise their art in their native city, where they were much esteemed by their fellow-citizens, till their fame became so general that they were induced to remove to Bruges, then one of the most opulent and picturesque cities in Europe. Here they painted and taught publicly—laying the foundation of the subsequently flourishing Flemish school. It is not known precisely at what time they removed from the place of their birth; but in Bruges most of their great works were unquestionably accomplished, so that that city is intimately associated with their names and celebrity; John being often called in history "John of Bruges." They frequently visited Ghent, and were employed by Philip le Bon, Duke of Burgundy, to paint the celebrated picture of the "Adoration of the Lamb," for one of the churches of that city. Of this great work we shall have more to say hereafter. Margaretta, the sister of the Van Eycks, was also an eminent artist, and assisted her brothers in many of their works. She resolutely refused all solicitations to marriage, preferring to live in the study of religious subjects, and the exercise of her art—which to her was a religious occupation—than in the distractions of the world; and such of her works as yet remain, are evidences of the depth and sincerity of those devotional feelings.

The great advantage, however, derived by art from this family is the invention, or discovery of oil as a vehicle for colour, and on this account they are justly to be esteemed amongst the greatest benefactors of the art of painting. Most great discoveries have, in their origin, been the result of chance, if we may so speak; and the discovery of that vehicle which has given so much charm to modern painting may be ranked amongst the number of those fortuitous circumstances. The credit of this discovery has been entirely given to John Van Eyck, and it would appear that his brother or sister had no share in it. He painted with tempera till about the year 1410, when having finished a picture which he wished to have quickly dried, he varnished and set it to dry in the heat of the sun; with dismay he found that the colours had cracked, and that his work was entirely spoiled. This circumstance, at first sight so unfortunate, proved to be that from which a great part of his fame arose. His attention was thereby turned to the discovery of a varnish which would dry quickly in the shade, and so prevent the recurrence of similar accidents; and, after various experiments, he found that a mixture of the oil of nuts and linseed, proved the best for that purpose. This he intended merely to use as a varnish, while the old tempera vehicle remained untouched. Another step, and his important discovery was complete. The idea of using the varnish as a vehicle suggested itself. In this his experiments were satisfactory. He found that the oil, used as a vehicle, gave hardness and clearness, with force and brilliancy to his colours. The tempera, consequently, was abandoned, and oil became the vehicle in his future works.

It may easily be imagined that, in an age when the love of painting was almost a popular passion, the fame of this invention soon extended itself into France and Italy. But Van Eyck, careful of his life-interest in this fortunate discovery, was not eager for its revelation. On the contrary, he jealously guarded his secret. He was, however, overreached by a "worthy brother of the craft." Antonello De Messina, a painter of Sicily, had journeyed to Naples, to see a work of the now famous artist. He was so charmed with its beauty that he determined to procure, at almost any sacrifice, the precious secret of its excellence. Giving up all his other pursuits, he left his native country, and travelled to Bruges, where he found means of introducing himself to the inventor and keeper of this much-prized art. He at length succeeded in ingratiating himself with Van Eyck, and thereby became master of his secret. Antonello then imparted it to others; and Van Eyck, finding that it began to spread, revealed the entire mystery, with the occasion of its discovery, or invention. He lived long after this, still continuing to instruct great numbers of pupils, and died in the year 1441.

Hubert, who principally resided during the latter years of his life with his sister Margaretta, at Ghent, died there in 1426; and so high was his reputation, and the esteem in which he was held by the citizens, that he was buried in the family vault of the united families of the Vyds and Borlouts, the chief burghers of the city. Margaretta survived him but a short time, and was, according to the account given by Lucas Van Heere, buried with him, in the Vyd vault, under the church of St. John, now St. Bavon's.

The school of Van Eyck flourished long after the death of its first masters; amongst the most distinguished of whose scholars was Antonello de Messina, who combined the style of the Italian schools with that of his master. Petrus Christophorus was also a distinguished artist of this school, and the celebrated Johann Hemling retained much of its mannerism in his improved style.

There are but few remarkable circumstances known of the lives of the Van Eyck family. The life of an artist is the exercise of his art. The busy scenes which occupy the less thoughtful, or less imaginative portion of mankind are none of his. They interest him not. The natural tendency of his mind, and the different habits of his life lead him to that position from which he may calmly survey the occupations of his less fanciful, but, perchance, happier brethren. A world beyond theirs is his. The glorious orb of day rises and sets for them as a "matter of business," as it were, and in which they can see nothing beyond a natural and usual occurrence. To them the freshness of spring, or the solemnity of autumn brings no sweet emotions. The remains of the most venerable antiquity are neither sweet nor bitter to their thoughts, nor humiliating to their hearts. Not so the artist; he lives in a world of fancy, but no less real. The dawning of the day, or the opening of the spring-time, fills him with joyous hope and bright visions, haply extending beyond the span of this transitory life. The decline of autumn leads him to the solemn contemplation of that unerring destiny which involves decay on men and empires, and on "this great globe itself." The contemplation of the remains of an antique age recalls to his mind memories of men, and times, and civilization, which he fondly believes to have been braver, wiser, and more truthful than those of his own generation. A true artist's works are the reflexes of his emotions; his emotions are the great sum of his life; and so his works are the best memorials of his existence.

The works of the Van Eycks are scattered over nearly all the continent of Europe. There are few collections without one or more of them; and some have reached England—all attesting the wonderful industry, as well as genius, of their authors. The most remarkable, both as a work of art, and in the history of its fortunes, is the celebrated picture of the "Adoration of the Lamb." This, we have already said, was painted for Philippe le Bon, Duke of Burgundy, by the brothers Hubert and John. The Church of St. John, at Ghent, was built in the tenth century, and was consecrated by St. Transmare, Bishop of Noyon, in 941. It was rebuilt, with the exception of the crypt, in the thirteenth century, on a more extensive scale and in grander style. It was to decorate this church that the chef-d'œuvre of the Van Eycks was painted.

The style of painting in the middle ages harmonized with the architecture of the period. It was not the rival of the sister art, but her handmaid. No church was considered complete, without its suitable paintings; and no picture was consistent, except in its appropriate frame-work, the productions of the architectural art and its sculptured accessories. Thus, a beautiful harmony subsisted between the arts of architecture, painting, and sculpture, which were then esteemed as one, and not as three distinct arts. So that it was not unusual for one individual to exercise successfully the three arts, or, more strictly speaking, the branches of the one sublime Christian art. This union contributed to that severe, yet graceful, elegance which so peculiarly characterizes the style of the painters of the middle ages, by causing them to adapt the composition of their subjects to outlines and spaces less capricious than those which have been suggested by the unguided fancies of modern artists, or the influence of vitiated taste and fashions. This austere style of painting has been, like its corresponding architecture, called "Gothic"—an opprobrious name given to that which should be called CHRISTIAN, by those who were unable to appreciate its beauties or comprehend its spirit or its meaning. The picture of the "Adoration of the Lamb" was adapted to one of those Gothic forms,—the ancient tryptic. "The extent and profound aim of this composition," says a judicious critic, "render a clear comprehension of the subject, at first sight, difficult; and therefore an explanation is necessary. It may be said to embrace the most important mystery of the Christian religion; painted one hundred years previous to the Reformation, and, consequently, according to the conceptions and forms of the Catholic and Greek Churches. It is known under the name of "The Adoration of the Lamb," and intends to represent the mystery of the Redemption, taken from the seventh chapter of Revelations. It is divided into two principal compartments—the upper and lower pictures, both of which are subdivided into centre and wings. In the centre of the upper picture is represented God the Father, as supreme Pontiff of the Church, performing that part of the service called the Benediction, attended, on one side by the Blessed Virgin, and on the other by St. John the Baptist; on the two wings are seen St. Cecilia at the organ, with musicians, and opposite singing choristers, chanting the Benediction. On the extreme ends of the upper wings are represented Adam and Eve, as symbols of sin, and above them the sacrifice and murder of Abel, to show the depravity of the human race, and the necessity of Divine mediation—alluding at the same time to the prototype of the Messiah. The centre of the lower picture represents the confirmation of the Divine blessing from above, in the sacrifice of the Lamb on the ark of the covenant—the blood of the Lamb flowing into the chalice of the new Testament, surrounded by kneeling angels carrying the implements of crucifixion. Under the ark is the fountain of life, on the one side of which kneel the prophets, followed by 'multitudes, which no man could number, of all nations and tribes, and peoples, and tongues, standing before the throne, and in the sight of the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands.' On the other side, kneel the Apostles, followed by martyrs, 'they who are come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and have made them white in the blood of the Lamb.* From other parts of the landscape stream multitudes of saints, with palms in their hands, to approach the throne of the Lamb. One of the lower wings represents the gigantic St. Christopher, leading pious hermits to the group of martyrs; the other closes the procession, with the Duke of Brabant on horseback, with their whole retinue of men-at-arms and painters; among the latter, John and Hubert Van Eyck, and Antonella di Messina."

This great work contains upwards of three hundred figures, and was so highly prized at the time of its execution, that it was only exhibited on great festivals; the concourse of spectators being so great, that special police regulations were devised, in order to protect the painting from injury. Philip the First of Spain wished to purchase it at an enormous price; but, failing in obtaining it, he employed Michael Coxis to make a copy, for which he received the sum of four thousand florins, having spent two years in the execution of the task. The original remained in the church for which it was painted till Napoleon, in his vain ambition to make Paris the centre of the arts, as of political government, caused it to be removed to that city. After his downfall, the painting was restored to its original place in St. Bavon's Church,* where the upper portion of it yet remains in the Vyd Chapel. The lower part forms, at present, one of the principal attractions of the Berlin collection. It was sold for 6,000 francs to Newenhug, the picture-dealer, during the absence of the Bishop; and was re-sold in Aix-la-Chapelle, to M. Solly, with whom it remained until the king of Prussia purchased his entire collection for 500,000 Prussian dollars, when it was transferred to Berlin. Thus, through the cupidity of unfeeling men, the two essential parts of this harmonious work are separated. One part, in its present position, is an object of mere insensate connoisseurship; while the other is meaningless, deprived of its correlative. Verily, neither the Chapter of St. Bavon's, nor the virtuosi of Berlin are the true protectors of art, or they would not allow the object for which both profess regard, to be thus mutilated. There were several copies of this picture besides that made for Philip of Spain; but that which was in the collection of the late Mr. Aders, and which formerly had been the ornament of the chapel of the Hotel de Ville at Ghent, till the arrival of the French army under Pichegrew, is the only copy at present existing of the entire subject. In it, according to Passavant, the head of the Blessed Virgin is more lovely than in the original. Many excellent prints, from parts of this celebrated work, have been published in France and Germany; and Passavant, in his tour through England, has given an outline engraving of the entire subject, from the copy in the Aders Collection.

In the Duke of Devonshire's collection are two pictures attributed to John Van Eyck; one of which is very much obliterated. The subject of the injured picture is the "Consecration of St. Thomas A'Beckett, as Archbishop of Canterbury. Its date is supposed to be about 1422. It was presented to King Henry V. by his uncle, the Duke of Bedford, then Regent of France. The other picture represents the "Dedication of the Blessed Virgin in the Temple," and possesses great beauty. It represents the interior of the Temple, with our Blessed Lady standing before the altar, by the side of the High Priest, and surrounded by virgins. Over her is a dove, the symbol of the Holy Ghost, with two winged cherubs. Choristers kneel on each side of the Temple, and in the foreground are seen St. Anne, mother of the Blessed Virgin, and St. Joachim. Many of the heads in this beautiful composition are said to be portraits. Horace Walpole, in his "Anecdotes of Painting," says that figures of Lord De Clifford, his lady, and family, are amongst the number.

A beautiful tryptic, by Van Eyck, is in the collection of the Earl Shrewsbury, at Alton Towers. The centre contains Our Blessed Lady and her Divine Son. On the right wing is St. Agnes, St. John on the left.

In the National Gallery, London, is a small picture on wood by this master—a perfect specimen of his peculiar depth and brilliancy of colouring. It shows the interior of a room with two figures, supposed by some to be portraits of John Van Eyck and his sister Margaretta. In the collection of the British Museum, there is a beautifully-finished pen-and-ink drawing of a half-length figure of St. Barbara.

Mr. Spiker, in his "Tour in Wiltshire," speaks with enthusiasm of a Holy Family, in the collection of paintings at Corsham House, near Bath. He calls it the "star of the collection." In the centre is seated the Blessed Virgin, attired in a blue mantle, with our Saviour in her lap; St. Joseph stands behind the Blessed Virgin, and on her right is St. Anne; on her left, St. Catherine.

Turner, in his "Tour in Normandy," vol. 1. p. 219, describes a beautifully pathetic picture by Van Eyck, of the "Virgin Mother in her domestic retirement."

Our space prevents the possibility of giving any further details of the numerous works of these great artists. We cannot conclude, however, without taking especial notice of a charming picture by Margaretta, formerly in the Aders collection, which is best described in the words of that excellent artist and enlightened scholar and critic, M. Passavant:—"The picture is in three compartments, and about three feet high. In the centre and larger one, the Blessed Virgin is represented seated on a grass-plat, reading a book; while before her, and on a velvet cushion, sits the infant Jesus. He is turning towards St. Catherine, who kneels on the left, holding in her hand a ring with a sword, and a broken wheel by her side. Behind this holy group is another saint kneeling at a table, which is covered with roses and cherries. A third saint, seated on the right, is receiving white and red roses from another holy virgin, dressed in blue. Of singular beauty are the figures of angels standing behind, three of whom accompany this pleasing scene with musical instruments; while a fourth holds a dish of cherries beneath a stream flowing from a fountain in the centre. The facade of a church, dedicated to St. Michael, brilliantly lighted within, forms the chief background, and a thicket of trees, from among which tower some slender cypresses, throws a deep shadow on the surrounding scenery. In the wing on the right of the spectator is seen St. Agnes, wandering with another saint, upon grassy lawns, among orange trees. The other wing represents a kneeling figure of St. John the Evangelist, blessing the chalice which he holds in his hand; an angel is gathering roses behind him, and still further, among orange trees, is a boy plucking fruit, which a girl receives in her lap. This very delicious and poetical picture has a peculiar charm of composition, and is executed with the greatest delicacy and care. In colouring, it is rather tender than powerful, and the shadows are of a light brown. The various countenances are more singular than beautiful, the details being too large, and the eyes somewhat staring; but there is much that is graceful in the forms and attitudes to admire. I have never hitherto seen an authenticated picture by Margareta Van Eyck, but am the more inclined to consider this genuine, from its bearing indubitable characteristics of a feminine mind and touch."

NO. II.

CHAPTER I. STUDIES ABROAD—RETURN TO IRELAND —RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION AND PROSELYTISM— EVICTION OF PADDY SULLIVAN, AND DEATH OF HIS WIFE.

I HAD travelled far, over sea and land, in search of that learning which no one was allowed to teach in my own country. I had traversed the plains of beautiful France and of sunny Italy, and had gazed, with rapturous wonder, upon the mighty Alps, which seemed to realize the ambitious design which the children of men vainly attempted to execute on the plains of Senaar, and to reach even to the heavens. I beheld, with no cold or apathetic eye, the city of the Cæsars, from which all my youthful imaginings derived their gorgeous hues and their dazzling brilliancy. Here were centered the memories of the most matchless heroism and of undying song—it had never fallen as Athens and Constantinople fell, but, in its very ruins, it was still the "eternal city." When its temporal rule passed away it had not lost but exchanged its empire, and the new dominion was far more noble and extensive than the old. The tomb of Peter and Paul and Laurence, sanctified by the blood of innumerable martyrs, dignified by the presence of Christ's vicegerent upon earth, who holds in his hands the keys of the kingdom of Heaven, Rome has ever been the very sun of the Christian firmament, around which all the other parts, however distant, must be attracted and retained in their proper spheres, and from which they must derive all the light and beauty which they possess. If Rome had apostatized where would Christianity now be found? In almost all other places—with the exception of our own dear Island, which was ever faithful to the chair of Peter and was, therefore, saved—the Faith at one time or other has been obscured, but she has still remained immortal, unchanged, and, therefore, divine. Whenever any church has separated from the centre of unity, she has become the prey, at first, of the most wild and extravagant doctrines, and then, by a natural reaction, of the most daring and reckless scepticism; and a sincere enquirer, if he could be induced to make an impartial survey of the creeds of all the congregations which profess to be Christian, would necessarily acknowledge that the quantity of error in each became greater as it receded farther from the doctrines and the influence of the Roman Church. It would be impossible for a person, of a temperament far less sanguine and enthusiastic than mine, to behold, without deep emotion, the ruins of the proud queen of the earth everywhere crowned with the triumphant glories of Christianity; and that religion, which alone she despised and persecuted enthroned high above the Pantheon, in the noblest work which was ever conceived by the mind or executed by the hands of mortal man. I felt, but could not express, what was long afterwards said by a gifted but erring child of song:

"O Rome! my country, city of the soul,
The orphans of the earth must turn to thee!"

But not all the teeming glories of "imperial Rome," nor the serene majesty of the capital of the Christian world, nor the proud triumphs of genius and of art, which—Prometheus like—stole fire from heaven and gave life to the marble and the canvass; not the witchery of that fairy clime, whose sky is the cloudless dome of heaven; nor the beauty of those fields, where the fig, and the grape, and the melon, grow by the way-side, could steal away any portion of my heart or divide its love with the dear land of my nativity. I longed to look once more on its blue lakes, its green hills and its fertile vallies, and to embrace the dear friends from whom I had been so long separated.

I had not seen my native land for more than seven years; and, when I did return, few of my old friends remained to welcome me. My father and mother had both fallen victims to that terrible scourge of our country, typhus fever, and my grandmother and grandfather, full of years, had been gathered to their ancestors. Old Paddy was still living in the old house, which was now occupied by my brother; the body was indeed there, and in its usual condition, but so sombre, so changed that the spirit which animated it seemed to have fled and left the old trunk quite untenanted; the very walls seemed cold and altered, and in spite of all the kindness which was lavished on me, I felt uneasy and unhappy. The feeling was of that undefined kind, which we cannot assign to any particular cause, and which is, therefore, more painful because it is unattended by hope—the great comforter amid all the ills of human life. On Sunday morning, I celebrated mass at my brother's house, and then went to the chapel to greet my old friends. I arrived early, and the old chapel and yew tree seemed to welcome me as kindly as ever; but they were the only unchanged things my eyes fell upon. I looked in vain for my old friends—they did not come, and still I was afraid to ask for them. Of the children to whom I used to teach the catechism with such delight on Sunday evenings, I did not recognize one—they had all grown out of my recollection—those of my own age were almost all scattered and gone; some of them were dead, many had emigrated during the bad times, and those who remained were so altered by the cares of the world—light hearted boyhood was so completely lost in sober manhood, that I could scarcely believe them to be the same persons—I seemed to be the only one who had the least recollection of what we used to be

"When we were young, ah! woful when—Ah! what a change 'twixt now and then;"

and, though my heart was bursting with early memories, I did not dare to breathe them in this ungenial atmosphere. At length I summoned courage to ask for a dear old friend, of a young man who stood near me; the tears started to his eyes as he replied, "that was my father, Sir; he died of fever about a year ago, and almost at the same time with your own mother." This confirmed all my worst suspicions, and I could scarcely help weeping outright. There was a strange priest also on the altar when I entered the chapel—for Father John, though still living, had been appointed to a parish on the wild and beautiful coast of — The little choir, which used to sing in the chapel, was as changed as everything else, but I particularly noticed the absence of the boy and girl who sang the Christmas hymn, and who were by far its greatest ornaments. I did not dare to ask for them until I returned from chapel, and, though I took out old Paddy to walk, for the express purpose of being able to put the question to him whilst alone, I could scarcely force the words from my lips, lest I should receive the usual answer, “they are dead.” At length, after talking of a great many other things, I said, “do John Sullivan and Catherine M’Quillan not sing in the choir now?” “Oh, no!” he replied, “they are many a mile away from this, and a poor choir it is without them”—“They are married, then?”—“No; and they say they are not to be married at all.” “But why did they leave this country, Paddy; and are both the families gone?” “Aye, indeed, Sir, they an’ many another had to go, for whin the bad times an’ the sickness came on thim, the craters couldnt get the rint in time, and the new squire wouldnt give thim time to pay it—barrin’ they’d become Protestants, which they’d die of the hunger sooner nor do—so they and a great many more were put out, an’ had to take the wide world on their heads. Thim that had the manes wint to Amiriky, and thim that had not, had to beg their bit—the craters; but Father John, whin he hard it, was in great affliction all out about his owl frinds. So he came up, you see, and he towld them, that as they war all used to the say if they’d go up to his parish he wud help thim to get boats, and they could earn a livelihood by fishin’—more-be-token, he said, the owner of the place, though a Protestan’, was greatly agin the way the squire was gettin on, an’ that he’d give a house and garden to as many as Father John wud pass his word fur. So a great many wint, and they say they’re richer and happier than iver they wur at home. An’ troth, Sir, but for my fondness of the ould place an’ the childre here, I’d have gone with Father John myself, jist to farm his bit ov land for him.” “Well, Paddy, whatever may be said about the farming, you must come and take care of Father John and me, for I am going to him to be his curate.” “Oh! then, glory be to God, we will all be happy together agin—an’ I’ll come up every summer, whilst I live to see the owl place; an’, whin I die, you’ll have me buried near my dear master and mistress.” The poor old man’s eyes filled with bursting tears, and we both, without either communicating his intention to the other, turned our steps to the little graveyard, where our dear friends sleep in the hope of a glorious resurrection. We knelt down upon their graves and prayed fervently to God to admit them into his glorious kingdom. I quickly felt here that Christian charity is superior to death—that it carries our best feelings beyond the grave, connects the living with the dead in bonds the most holy, and that it reaches even from earth to heaven. I arose from my knees comforted, and was far happier than before I trod the consecrated earth which charitably covered, with its green mantle, the ashes of the dead and hid them from the gaze of day. Their spirits seemed to converse with me, not from the cold earth on which I knelt, but from the bright heaven on which I gazed, and to assure me that in a few short years I should be united with them in that happy country, where no friend is lost, no tear is shed, and where death shall be no more. I still, indeed, thought what a sad havoc seven years make amongst our earthly friends! but I also remembered that the virtuous are only separated for a time, and that death, however terrible it appears, is nevertheless — The golden key

That opes the portals of eternity.

When I returned home I could talk freely to my relations of our departed friends, and of the sad distress which had fallen on the country generally, and on this parish in particular. They confirmed all that Paddy had told me and communicated other intelligence still more distressing. The old landlord, who had lived on the most affectionate terms with his tenantry, was dead, and his heir returned from college a violent bigot, determined either to convert or to exterminate the Papists from his estate. He did not try to turn any man out of his farm merely because he was a Catholic, but whenever sickness in his family, death among his cattle, or any other misfortune rendered him unable to pay his rent on the very day on which it was due, he was ejected without mercy and “none but a Protestant need apply” was his motto. His wife was worse than himself, and, indeed, it was generally believed that she was his evil genius in all his persecution. She got up proselytizing schools for the benefit of the Catholics, and threats of extermination were used to force parents to send their children to them; she went about herself reading the bible, or, I should rather say, like a wasp extracting not honey but poison from God’s sweet word; she thus filled a peaceful parish with enmity, strife, and hatred.

A year of famine and fever afforded these evangelical Christians a splendid opportunity for exercising their religious zeal. There was mercy and forbearance for the Protestant tenant, and the utmost rigour of the law for the Catholic; there were Protestant clothes and Protestant meal, whilst the poor Catholic beggar was left to starve with cold and to die with hunger. But the converts—that is, a few bad characters, who, having no religion to lose, allowed themselves to be starved into Protestantism—were the chief favourites of this evangelical lady, and of the evangelical curate of the parish. The trade of being converted, as it was called, became so profitable, that several of the poorer Protestants declared that they could not be strong in the faith and weak with hunger at the same time—that their faith hereafter would be very much regulated by the state of their stomach; and to prove that this was no idle threat, some of them professed Catholicism gratuitously, in order to be bought back to Protestantism. As for the few miserable Catholics who became Protestants during the hard times, they generally relapsed into Popery as soon as the new potatoes became plenty. Indeed we never knew an instance of any person being permanently perverted by such means, when the priest discharged his duty with zeal and energy. We cannot either acquire or preserve faith naturally—it is a great, an inestimable, a supernatural gift of God, and the proud man who vainly trusts in the strength of his own weak mind, whose studies are unhallowed by prayer and unaided by God, whose intellect is perhaps clouded by passion and darkened by crime, is almost sure to be deprived of this divine lamp to the feet and heavenly light to the eyes, for the Lord “resisteth the proud and giveth his grace to the humble.” There were apostates in the time of St. Paul, "deserting the congregation" of the faithful, whom he warns, that they have nothing to expect but a "dreadful judgment, and the rage of a fire which shall consume the adversaries;" there are apostates now, and there will be, alas! until the end of time. But the instances are very rare—not one in a thousand—in which a good, a mild, and a zealous priest may not prevent the desertion or reclaim the deserter. When St. Gregory Thaumaturgus was dying, he asked how many infidels were left in the city of Neocæsarea; and being told that there were seventeen, "thank God," said he, "there were just so many faithful when I became bishop." In this way a really laborious and efficient priest will never allow to be diminished, and will almost always increase the number of the faithful committed to his care. There are some persons whose lives are irreproachable, who go through all their duties regularly, but at the same time in a cold and apathetic manner. If any one is lost, they say his blood be upon his own head, I have done my duty; but they do not think of pursuing him into the wilderness like the Saviour, and carrying him back to the fold upon their shoulders; they do not think of preaching penance, like St. Paul, from house to house, and of crying out with the same model of pastors—"who is weak and I am not weak, who is scandalized and I am not on fire."

When Father John was curate in my native parish, a system of perversion was attempted by a far more powerful person than the squire. A poor widow, with several children, was bought and "duly gazetted as a convert to Protestantism, and she and her little ones went to church in fine new clothes. Father John uttered not one harsh word concerning her, but he pitied her, and made the whole congregation join in public prayers for her conversion, on the next Sunday; "for God alone," he said, "could restore to her the priceless gift which she had cast away." As soon as the duties of the morning were over, and before even breaking his fast, he went to her cabin, now filled with many comforts. At first she would not speak to him, but when she found that instead of abusing her he addressed her in kind and soothing language, she freely entered into conversation, and said that her distress alone had made her a Protestant. He gathered the children, and knelt down with them to say the Rosary of the Holy Virgin, and asked the woman to join her innocent little ones in prayer. She knelt down, and before they had finished the first decade, she burst into tears, and starting to her feet, she tore off her new gown which she wore, and with her hands clasped, and streaming eyes, she exclaimed: "Oh! Father John, dear, will I be lost for ever; will God ever forgive me for denying Him?" The kind priest assured her of the Divine mercy, and the next Sunday she was at mass in her rags, whilst the new dresses of the mother and children were exhibited as the cheap price at which it was sought to purchase an immortal soul. A few days after this, Father John met, in the poor widow's house, one of the young ladies who had been the means of perverting her. At first she would not even speak to him, but his mild, kind, and gentlemanly manner so gained upon her, that she entered into conversation. He prevailed upon her to beg of God to enlighten her mind, as none of His creatures should be too proud to ask for light from Him. She promised, she prayed, she read, the scales fell from her eyes, her prejudices were dispelled, and before a month she was a member of the Catholic church. She suffered much persecution, but her firmness conquered all, and she now heaped more favours on the poor widow and her orphans, whom she regarded, under God, as the means of her conversion, than when she beheld in them the first fruits of her proselytism. It need scarcely be added, that this ended the new reformation whilst Father John remained in the parish.

The curate who succeeded Father John, was not less virtuous nor less anxious to promote the spiritual and temporal welfare of the people than his predecessor. He was loved also, as every good priest is sure to be, by his flock, but he lacked that burning zeal which no obstacle can withstand, and before which the most hardened iniquity is abashed and confounded. The most irreligious man in the parish feared Father John almost as much as the most religious man loved him. Father Peter was almost as much loved by the good, without being so great a terror to evil doers. During the season of hunger, pestilence, and persecution, day and night he spent with the sick and the afflicted; and strengthened by his exhortations and the grace of God, they suffered almost as much as martyrs. The few who had preferred Protestant meal to death by starvation, returned to the church. But there were two, in particular, who had abandoned the faith from the basest motives, and who seemed to be animated with the most deadly hatred of the church which they had deserted, and of its inoffensive minister, Father Peter. One of these was a young doctor, who thought that his perversion would get him into "genteel practice." The name of the other was Murtagh Devlin. His elder brother, Henry, was the boy whom I before mentioned, as having served mass on Christmas morning along with John Sullivan, his cousin. Murtagh—though his elder brother had generously agreed to divide the farm with him after their father's death—became a Protestant, and got a lease made out to himself alone of the whole farm. His old father was sitting at the table when he heard the news, and he instantly fell down and expired. His brother and sister took their father's body out of the house, and waked it in a neighbour's barn. After the funeral, they both left the parish, and after suffering great hardships, they made their way at last to Father John, and were the first of his old parishioners who settled near him. Murtagh knew before hand that his brother would leave him, and the thought made him glad; after the first shock, he felt relieved by his father's death, which left him at once in possession of the farm, but he was deeply mortified by the desertion of his sister Peggy, who was really good and amiable, and whom he knew to be the only one of his family who had ever loved him. He was, moreover, left quite alone, for his mother was long dead, and he had fully calculated on retaining Peggy for a housekeeper until he should get married. He thought, however, that the best thing he could now do, would be to marry at once; and as the bad times had set in, and he had got several new farms at a cheap rate, he was sure, as he expressed it himself, that "there was not a girl in the country that would not snap at him." He accordingly offered his hand to Catherine M'Quillan, who shrunk from him as she would from a serpent. That same evening he skulked behind a hedge that surrounded her father's garden, through which he saw her and her two little sisters, walking with John Sullivan. He heard her tell how that vile apostate, who had murdered his father, had dared to ask her to become his wife; and he heard Sullivan wish that he had been present, that he might have pounded the base villain into jelly. He heard the lovely girl, who now seemed to him more beautiful than she had ever before appeared, consent to become the wife of the fine manly youth who walked by her side; and as he rushed from the spot, filled with jealousy and with rage, he swore a terrible oath that their marriage should never be solemnized, even if he should be hanged for the murder of one of them.

Paddy Sullivan, the father of our humble hero, was what is called a man "well to do in the world." He had a good farm, well stocked and well tilled, and it was generally remarked that there was not a more comfortable family in the parish than the Sullivans, nor one which deserved its prosperity better, or divided more cheerfully with those who needed their assistance. John Sullivan was the only surviving child of his parents, and his manly beauty, as well as his deep religious feelings, his unblemished integrity, and his respect for his admirable parents who had trained him up in the fear and love of God, rendered him worthy of the great affection which they bore him. From the period, however, of the interview which we have mentioned, as having taken place in M'Quillan's garden, everything went wrong with the Sullivans. Every dog they got to watch about their house was invariably poisoned; three fine young horses, which they calculated on selling for a very high price, were stolen in one night, and no traces of them could ever be discovered; two valuable cows were found strangled in the cow-house, on the very night before they were to have been brought to a neighbouring fair, to be sold for the purpose of making up the rent. The very bee-hives were carried out of the garden and cast into a pond of water near the house. Yet, though they themselves, and all their neighbours, without exception, were watching for the perpetrators of these outrages, not the slightest vestige of them had ever been found. So many heavy misfortunes rendered the Sullivans unable to pay their rent. They were, however, so notoriously unmerited, that the landlord, though he set them all down to the account of Popery, consented to receive one-half the rent for the current year, but under the express stipulation, that unless the whole, including the arrears, should be paid on the next, they should give up their farm.

The second summer after that in which these transactions took place was what is called a dear summer in Ireland; that is, provisions were so very high that vast numbers of the people were unable to procure any, and were obliged to subsist partly on the charity of their neighbours—who were themselves scarcely beyond the reach of starvation—but chiefly on the young nettles, of which they made broth, and on the yellow flower of the prushoe, which they boiled and eat. It was really heartrending to behold the hollow eyes and sunken cheeks of these poor creatures, and to see the ravenous glare with which they looked upon the provisions which they could not touch. Many of the poor died of starvation, and the typhus fever, which by the month of June had become an epidemic, quickly extended its ravages to those who had not been touched by the famine. Mick M'Quillan, Catherine's father, was amongst those carried off by this terrible malady, and Mrs. Sullivan, with the characteristic charity of her class and country, went to the house of disease and of death to assist the afflicted family to prepare for the wake and funeral. Such kind offices are regarded as a sacred duty, and few, very few, shrink from their performance, even at the imminent risk of their lives. On the occasion of which we are speaking, Mrs. Sullivan had scarcely returned to her own house until she was seized with the fever. Though the family had laboured night and day, yet, in common with most of their neighbours, they found it impossible to pay the entire rent of the current year, not to speak of the half year's arrears which were hanging over them. The agent was inexorable, and when poor old Sullivan made a trembling appeal to the landlord, he became enraged, and ordered the servant to thrust him out like a dog. The ejectment had been regularly procured, and the bailiffs came to execute it whilst Mrs. Sullivan was ill in fever. She was lying in the kitchen, on a wad of straw, every article of furniture having been canted on account of the arrears due to the landlord. She told the bailiffs, with her dry and parched lips, that she had but a few days to live—that she felt death approaching—and entreated them, for the love of God, to allow her to die in the house where she had spent so many happy days. These hard men were so moved that they went to the agent and represented the case to him, but he ordered them to return instantly and do their duty. They came back, and announced to the afflicted family that there was no mercy for them; and having taken possession by pulling a handful of thatch out of the roof, and extinguishing the fire on the hearth, they ordered them to leave the house. The features of the young man were lighted up by a momentary flash of indignation, but the pious mother instantly checked it, and clasping her burning hands, piously exclaimed, "God's holy will be done." The father and son, with streaming eyes, and without uttering a word, carried her to widow M'Quillan's house; for Catherine insisted that as she had caught the fever there, so should she, now that she had no house of her own, be nursed and tended in it. She watched over her with the care and affection of a daughter, but the pious woman, having humbly confessed her sins, received the Adorable Sacrament, and been anointed with the holy oil, calmly resigned her soul to God, on the second day after her removal, amid the tears and prayers of her husband and son, and of the family, but for whose hospitable roof she should have expired by a ditch side.

After the funeral, the Sullivans returned to thank their benefactors, and to take leave of them for ever. They had about as much money as would pay their passage to America, and their determination was to go to Liverpool and to seek a passage in the first ship which was bound for the New World. John, taking Catherine's hand in his, said, "farewell, Catherine, I once thought to have called you mine, and to have brought you to a happy home, to live with her who loved you as her own child, and whose dearest wish was to have called you daughter. But God has willed it otherwise, and His will be done. Her hope, however, was fulfilled, that your hands should smooth her pillow in her last illness and close her eyes when she was dead. "And do you think, John," cried the generous girl, "that I could manely abandon you in your distress? No, rather let us hasten the time of our marriage, that we may all live together, and that I may comfort the afflicted old man, who so much needs a daughter's care." "And do you imagine," said John, "I could take advantage of your generosity, and wed you to a houseless wanderer. No, never. Come, father," he continued, and taking the old man by the arm, in spite of all entreaties, they both left the house.

THE BOLLANDISTS.

FOR such of our readers as have never entered a public library, it may be necessary to state in a few words who are these Bollandists who are so often quoted, and so seldom read, though appealed to with reverential respect by all who treat seriously the history of the Church of Christ. They are a body of men, who, during 250 years, have been writing the "Lives of the Saints," and have not yet advanced beyond the 16th day of October, in the Ecclesiastical Calendar. Alban Butler, and many like him in other countries, gave popular "Lives of the Saints" in twelve small octavos—not so the Bollandists. They sometimes devote a folio volume to the life of a single saint, and though they publish in their last volume the life of the Irish St. Gall, at October 16, Ireland shall very probably see a new generation, all of us shall be in our graves, before they have arrived at the feast of St. Malachy, on the 2nd of November.

The following critique is inserted at the suggestion of a distinguished foreign ecclesiastic, who has proved by deeds his interest in the Catholic history of Ireland. It is from the pen of a worthy living representative of that great branch of the Benedictine order, which, according to the infidel Gibbon himself, conferred more lasting benefit on true historical studies than all our British Universities. It will be received with favor, we trust, by the Irish ecclesiastic, as the Bollandists often appear in the pages of Dr. Lanigan, and, as it will be seen, that Irishmen, 250 years ago, bore a distinguished part in aiding this great work:

HAGIOGRAPHY IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

The original conception of the "Acta Sanctorum" belongs to the sixteenth century. Bellarmine, who was contemporary of St. Pius V., of St. Theresa, St. Charles Borromeo, St. Ignatius of Loyola, St. Philip Neri, and of the four SS. Francis, of Sales, of Borgia, Xavier, and Regis, styled his age the age of saints,* the heroic age, the cradle of a new world, in which, as in the youth of Time, the children of God encountered the Titans. The issue of the battle is well known.

* Apud Bolland, Acta S. S. Præf. Gener. p. xxi. Januar. tom. I.

The good triumphed, the abyss was closed for two centuries, and the monuments of the sixteenth century still survive the tempest* that swept over our fathers. The Council of Trent, the Polyglot of Ximenes, the Vulgate and Septuagint of Sixtus V., the Breviary of St. Pius V., the Annals of Baronius, the Summa of Suarez, the Controversies of Bellarmine, are monuments bequeathed to us by the sixteenth century. Even at the distance of three centuries, we behold them towering still, and at every new pace of time, rising higher over the horizon.

The controversy of a few casuists, on the subject of indulgences, rapidly extended itself to every point of religion; hermeneutics, the works of the Fathers, dogmas, history, liturgy, hagiography, the entire vast system of religion were drawn to an inevitable combat on the field of tradition—either the tradition of written documents, or living tradition as exhibited in facts and institutions, and especially in the lives of the saints.

But though the principle of "private judgment" was generally defeated in all the discussions both of law and fact, the best champions of authority acutely felt their deficiencies, on a few isolated points. A text had perhaps been corrupt, or facts were misrepresented. Bellarmine was afraid to handle the primitive monuments of tradition, though invited by the great names of SS. Clement and Ignatius.† Baronius, even after having delivered nine times his historical lectures on the sixteen ages of the church, and that in the city of Rome, under the scrutinizing control of a public chair, still invited additional information on every century of the Christian era. The lives of the saints, especially, disconcerted the most intrepid controversialists. Melchior Cano expressed himself on that subject in a tone almost of bitter discouragement: "I declare," said he, "with pain, but not with contempt,‡ that Laertes has written the lives of the philosophers more scrupulously than Christians the lives of the saints; and there is much more correctness and authenticity in Suetonius, the historian of the Cæsars, than in Catholics who have written the lives, not of emperors, but of martyrs, virgins, and confessors. They generally were swayed by prejudice or system, and published fictions which fill me with shame, or rather disgust; I am sure they are not useful, but very injurious to the Church." He mentions no names; he pardons the want of historic skill, but complains that he could not depend even on historic honesty, and appeals to Lewis Vivez,§ who makes the same complaint, "as if," he resumes, "the holy men of God, who performed such stupendous works for Christ, stood in need of such fables; as if the best concocted inventions were not, like cowardly soldiers, rather an incumbrance than an advantage. My opinion undoubtedly is, that the real lives of our heroes are great and stupendous, and far beyond their fame. But such exalted heroism found neither genius nor eloquence to celebrate it."||

* The French Revolution.

† The authentic text of St. Ignatius was first discovered in 1646, by Vossius in Florence. The 7th epistle to St. Polycarp was first published in 1680, by Dom. Ruinart, from a MS. in St. Germain de Prés. The Codex Alexandrinus of Cyril Lucar, brought to light the two epistles of St. Clement, published in 1633 by Patrick Young; and in 1745, Welstein accidentally discovered the Syriac text of two other epistles, unknown since the days of St. Jerome.

§ De tradendâ Disciplinâ, lib. v.

|| The reader must remember that in the infancy of the Church, there were many false gospels, and false acts and writings attributed to the Apostles.

This was an eloquent and severe condemnation of superficial hagiography, but it was unjust to the real lives of the saints of which Melchior Cano was ignorant. He continues long in the same strain, but softens down somewhat on a reminiscence of his stay in Trent. When he was there he heard that Aloysius Lipomani, Bishop of Verona, had resolved to cure this evil, by publishing the lives of the saints in a becoming and consecutive plan. That work he never saw, and, possibly, it would not have answered his expectations.

Lipomani, who had been successively Bishop of Modon, of Verona, and of Bergama, and, afterwards, Secretary of Julius III., Legate of the Holy See, and President of the Council of Trent, published between 1551 and 1560, in the few leisure hours of his exalted functions, six folio tomes. The lives of the saints are arranged according to the order in which they came to his hands, sometimes isolated biographies, sometimes in the order of the calendar, sometimes in long series, where Palladius and Gregory of Tours, Metaphrastes and John Moschus* walk hand in hand, but followed by some notes which were the germs of future hagiographical criticism.

These, however, were but the scattered stones; to make them a true sanctuary, a Pantheon of the Saints, a calmer hand and more skilful architect was required. In the solitude of his cell, a disciple of St. Bruno, commenced the work. Laurence Surius, fellow-disciple of P. Canisius, devoted his life to two undertakings. In the first place, he translated for the literary world of his day, and into exquisite Latin, the best masters of the spiritual life, such as Taulerus, Rusbrock, Holding de Melburg, Florence of Harlem, and Henry Suzo. Having completed the masters, he gave the models of sanctity in a new work—the Lives of the Saints in six volumes folio (1570, 1575), arranged in the order of the Roman Calendar. Besides the regularity of his plan, he made a selection moreover of the lives published by Lipomani; rejected a great number which were open to the criticism of the malevolent; but added, by way of compensation, several inedited documents, and imparted to all, through fear of the Erasmists and nice language-men, the gentle touch of his own elegant and pious Latinity. His fear carried him farther—he expurgated and suppressed deliberately: he returned on his task in a second edition, which he did not live to finish. A third time, some anonymous editors resumed this absurd restoration of original documents. The work in this repaired form extended to twelve volumes, but its originality,

* The first tome appeared in 1551 (Rome), in four books, containing 163 lives. The second in 1553, 225 lives. The third in 1554, containing, besides a new series of detached lives, Palladius, and the book of St. Gregory of Tours, de Miraculis Martyrum, S. Juliani, et S. Martini, Epis. The 4th volume, 270 lives, appeared in 1554. Metaphrastes commences the 5th, A.D. 1556, with the months of November, December, January, and February. Two vols. appeared in 1588, one containing the months of May, June, July, August, September, October; the other was divided into three parts: 1. The months of March and April; 2. Another collection of Metaphrastes, from a MS. of the Crypta Ferrata, and translated by Cardinal Sirlet; 3. The "Pratum Spirituale," of John Moschus. Lipomani was in a hurry, but death carried him off in 1560. His nephew, Hieronimo Lipomani, published an 8th posthumous tome, containing another series of "Lives of the Fathers," translated from the Greek by his uncle. This compilation was reprinted in Louvain in 1566, and translated into French by Gabriel de Payorbault, Paris, 1572. In the article in the Biographie Universelle on Lipomani, though signed by two honourable names, there are three errors: they give but six volumes—state that Metaphrastes fills the two last—and that all were published from 1551 to 1558.

Still, so great was its popularity, that editions were exhausted as soon as the volumes appeared. Each new Latin life was instantly translated into all the vulgar tongues:—Hondorfs, Vellers, Lœmmel, Engelgrave, Ribadeneira, André Duval, and Arnauld d'Andilly, by their combined exertions, composed for the people "those flowers of the saints," illustrated with gothic images—those fine old books, every page of which was familiar to every child; they were the sole library of the poor, the treasure of every family—their spiritual food during the long winter nights, and their relaxation on days when they could not work.

These works were but the tottering step of the child; still Surius commands our respect. That laborious monk had a profound sense of the great want of his day—the necessity of authenticating the written documents,† the facts of tradition. Together with his ascetical works, he published an universal collection of homilies, taken from the most respectable authors;‡ and even before his lives of the saints, he made the first attempt at a Collection of Councils,§ in four folio volumes, dedicated to Philip II., who was so delighted with them, that he ordered the Duke of Alba to present 500 florins to the humble monk.

Nevertheless, Surius was but one of a thousand others marching on the same track, with Baronius at their head. Notwithstanding the numerous editions given by Erasmus, Pamelius, Feuarent, Paul Manutius, Billius, the Aldes, Stephenses, and Louvanians—notwithstanding those editions of the Fathers, which followed each other in rapid succession, from the first modest "Antidotum" of twenty Fathers, published by Sichar, and enlarged successively in six editions, until it extended to nine folio volumes, in the hands of Margarin de la Bigne, before the close of the 16th century, yet that century had made but a very imperfect restoration of the monuments of Catholic tradition.|| There was too much noise, too much dust clouding the air, too much battling on the hot field of controversy, to allow the great works of ecclesiastical erudition to be executed in all their perfection.

But the foundations were laid wide and deep; and in the last year of that ever-memorable century, two

* Vita, S. S. ab Aloysio Lipomano olim conscripta, Colon. 1569—1575. Again, Colon. 1576—1580. Surius died in 1578. Father Mosander, a monk of the same Chartreux monastery, Cologne, finished this second edition in 12 tomes, or 6 volumes, and added a 7th vol. as supplement. The whole work was remodelled, revised, and enriched in the Paris edition, 1618, 12 vols. Two other Carthusian monks, Lippeloo, and Grassius, gave two portable editions, elegantly printed, Cologne, 1604—1616. Tom. i. Præf. General. p. xxii. But Father Canisius had already taken the start of all, perhaps, by his Predigern der Kirchen-Calende, published in 1562.

† A work which yet remains to be done for all the ecclesiastical monuments in the Irish language, of which there are far more than respectable Catholic scholars appear to imagine.

‡ There are MS. Irish homilies more than 800 years old—not published, nor likely to be so, in the present state of taste for Irish religious literature.

§ An edition of the Irish councils is a well-known desideratum. There are such documents as the Seancus beg, an old Brehon tract which gives the laws regarding the clergy, and also the Chanoin of SS. Patrick and Adamnan, never published, no more than the monastic rules of the great patriarchs of Irish monks.

|| Had there never been an ever-fatal 1641 in Ireland, her monuments would have been all restored by the Franciscans before 1700. But legal and peaceful agitation was unknown two centuries ago, and the landed property of Papists was then a tempting prize for the monopolists of loyalty.

During the college vacations of the year 1599, a student and a Jesuit professor set out, one from Pont a Mousson, and the other from Douai, to relax their minds from philosophical studies, by a visit to two neighbouring Abbeys. The young student took up his quarters in St. Vanne, where, under the name of Frere Didier de la Cour, he was to become the restorer of the Order of St. Benedict, and the founder of those two congregations of St. Vanne and St. Maur, destined, in the designs of God, for editing the works of the Fathers. The Jesuit was Father Heribert Rosweyde, who, according to his custom, was spending the leisure days of his professorship in exploring the neighbouring Abbeys of Douai, and especially the library of Lessies, one of the precious bequests of the venerable Louis de Blois. There, in addition to the hospitalities so generously lavished in all the old monasteries, he found a cordial and most affectionate reception. The Abbot D. Antony Wingham was his friend, his Mæcenas. Another Abbot, D. Thomas Luytens, afterwards became his disciple, and was to him as a devoted son. All the literary treasures of the abbey were unlocked to him without reserve; manuscripts were produced, and corps of copyists placed at his disposal. But the sole object of his search were some lives of forgotten saints; a taste as rare perhaps then, as it is to-day, when no publisher ventures to shake off the dust which has accumulated during fifty years on the old legends of the saints.

This, however, was not a mere passion in Father Rosweyde; it was far more serious and absorbing—it was a vocation. Driven on by an overwhelming instinct, which amazed his superiors, left at full liberty to obey all its impulses, he examined, one after another, all the libraries in Belgium. From every side he invited help, and enlarged the circle of his correspondents. He transcribed with his own hand as much as he could. By character, ardent and impetuous, he husbands neither his time, his strength, nor his exertions. He burns with indignant enthusiasm on discovering thousands of unknown documents and of forgotten saints. His heart swells, like St. Paul's, when discovering among the statues of Athens, the altar "to the unknown God."† The trophies of Miltiades deprived a Grecian hero of sleep; the triumphant records of the saints disturb the midnight dreams of Heribert Rosweyde. After twelve years' researches, the fire of enthusiasm still burns and gleams in the first page which reveals his grand project. In 1607, he published his preliminary work, the "Fasti Sanctorum,"‡ where he gives as specimens the proconsular and partly incited acts of the holy martyrs, Tharacus, Probus, and Andronicus. He announced seventeen folio volumes, two on the Life and Festivals of Christ and his Blessed Mother; one on the Solemn Festivals of the Saints; one on the non-solemnized Feasts of other Saints, or on their "Acta Liturgica;" twelve on the "Acta Sincera" of the Saints of every month; one on Martyrologies;* and, finally, the two last, for eight categories of notes and thirteen tables.

When this book was laid before Bellarmine—"how old is the author?" he asked; "about forty years," was the reply. "He intends to live about two hundred years, I suppose," said the veteran controversialist. The two hundred years are passed, and Rosweyde still survives in his work, which is now carried on by the New Bollandists, the heirs of his bicentenary conception, enlarged in the execution by Father Bollandus, who has justly given his name to the entire work—a blameless and successful supplanter of another Christopher Columbus.†

And, indeed, on reading the few pages of that little book, you think you see those charts which Columbus, before his embarkation, unrolled on the council-tables of kings. The proposal is, if we can so render the picturesque Latin of Rosweyde, to force together from all quarters,‡ the known and unknown lives of the saints; to collate them with other manuscripts and all old books—to restore their primitive style and their original integrity—to illustrate them with notes, to clear up their obscurities, and reconcile their contradictions; to give dissertations on the authors, the tortures of the saints, the types (or symbolism) of holy images; ceremonies sacred and profane; chronology, chorography and glossaries; all the lines and limits of this new world were plain to the eye of this ardent soul; during full twenty years he laboured, single-handed, to digest and execute his plan: and certainly he would have at last seen it in operation had he not lavished his energies on a thousand different cares. Heart and soul he was a child of the sixteenth century. Reared in the din of controversial conflicts, he slept in harness—the spear never left his hand. Many a time, to use his own expression, did he march from the "armarium" of the saints to their "arsenal."§ From 1607 to 1629 he published more than twenty opuscula;|| fired numerous pamphlets against Casaubon, Scaliger, Cappel, and some Calvinist ministers; broke several lances for Thomas a Kempis; projected an ascetical library of the Fathers, and a collection of the primitive apologists of the Church; promised to

* There are at least four ancient martyrologies in the Irish language never published: one of the 9th, another of the 10th, a third of the 12th, and a fourth, perhaps a fifth, of the 17th centuries. Colgan intended to publish them, but the pious duty is reserved for some other. When will the Irish clergy look to it?

† The learned reader knows that the same accident of fame occurred in the publication of our imperfect Irish Acta S.S. Ward had collected almost all the materials, and was really our Rosweyde, but dying on All Saints' Day, 1635, he was succeeded by Colgan, who by order of his superiors published the Acta in his own name. Ward's life of St. Rumold is not the life of a saint merely, but a most learned and very copious dissertation on the ancient history of Ireland.

‡ An Irish Jesuit, a native of Clonmel, was one of his most enthusiastic assistants. He drew up eight catalogues of the saints for Rosweyde, and wrote an excellent and copious refutation of Giraldus Cambrensis, while Dr. John Lynch was yet in his mother's arms, and Usher had hardly obtained his majority. A sketch of this Irish Jesuit's critique on Cambrensis has been promised to us for an early number of the IRISH CATHOLIC MAGAZINE.

* When there is a public taste for great works, Irish publishers have proved that they do not shrink from expense.

† It is amusing to listen to Father Rosweyde complaining of the mania of the antiquaries of his day, who, while manuscripts recording the triumphs of the saints became the prey of worms, or fire, or grocers, built what he calls lararia, or sanctuaries, where they arranged with reverential awe, the mutilated club of a Hercules, or the broken bow of a Cupid, or perforated cap of a Mercury. "Belli homines," he indignantly exclaims, "qui domi sue lararia statuunt.....et præclarè lucere putant."—Fasti Sanctorum, p. 4. This preference of the Pagan to Christian antiquities is not confined to the 17th century.

the Abbot of Lessies a Tertullian, an Arnobius, a Minutius Felix, a Lactantius; commenced an edition of SS. Eucherius and Paulinus of Nola; and published in Flemish the "Hermits of the Thebaid," the "Lives of Holy Virgins," and Ribadeneira's "Flowers of the Saints."* His most important work is the edition of the Vitæ Patrum, the best that has been ever given. In 1629, at the age of sixty, pressed by his society, harassed by the importunities of his friends, he at last commenced his great work. He asked twelve years only to finish it. He was to go to press in the month of October following; but news comes that Bois le Duc is taken by the Dutch, that the Jesuits are expelled by the Calvinists, and that all their books are huddled together in narrow boats. He rushes to those mouldering treasures—inhalas greedily their deleterious effluvia—falls sick, and in that state was called to attend a person in a contagious distemper. On the 5th of October, 1629, he was himself, after a few days' illness, carried off by a violent fever, a martyr of a new order. Well might they have given to him, as epitaph, his own adjuration, as if bequeathing to his brethren his noble conception. See how it becomes the monumental form in which we present it to our readers:

When the children of Israel returned from the captivity of Babylon, they held the sword in one hand, and with the other urged on the erection of the second Temple, while their doctors were gathering together and revising the remnants of their national and sacred literature. Ireland is now emerging from a worse than Babylonish captivity; during her long and peaceful struggle against the penal code, her churches, colleges, and convents have been slowly but steadily rising from their ruins. Surely men ought to be found who will complete the resurrection, by publishing the monuments of her ancient religious literature. That work is certainly expected from the present generation.

* This work (Antwerp, 1619), was illustrated with engravings, representing the types or symbols of the saints—such, for instance, as the serpents under the feet of St. Patrick, or the thrush perched on St. Kevin's hand. It was the favourite family-book of the Flemish.

Lochlan O'Daly,

ON THE SUPPRESSION OF THE MONASTERIES.

In England, the suppression of the monasteries was one brief act in the tragedy—Henry VIII. spoke, and it was done. But in Ireland, the Parliament of the Pale was powerless beyond the banks of the Barrow and Boyne, except in the towns; monasteries could not be suppressed, except at the point of the Lord Deputy's sword, and Henry was compelled to tempt (but generally in vain), the avarice of the Irish lords to assist him in his sacrilege. He ordered, says O'Sullivan Beare (His. Cath. p. 76), the Irish princes to seize the churches in their territories, and banish the monks; but hardly one of the old Irish, and very few of the old English—the Burkes, or Geraldines—thought that a king could justify the robbery of the church and the poor. The new English, who were needy and avaricious (inopes et avari), were the most efficient agents in appropriating the piety of past ages—the property of the many to the benefit of the few. It was believed that the vengeance of God fell upon some of the spoilers. Thus when Roland Fitzestace, Viscount Kilcullen, "a good man, and a Catholic," had seized, by the king's order, one of the abbeys of St. Bernard, he heard in a vision a figure announcing in Irish verse the awful fate, which O'Sullivan, who relates the story, has thus Latinized:

"Quæ jus Ecclesiæ pervasit avara cupido
Illa gravi pagos opprimet ære tuos
Et dabit ut subito soboles tua corruet omnis
Ut folia æerio præcipitata loco."

The fact is certain, at all events, that Jaimus, the son of Roland Fitzestace threw himself, with all the ardour of an Irishman, into the cause of the last Earl of Desmond, in 1575, and was torn up, root and branch, by the soldiers of Elizabeth.

These facts are given, that the reader may understand the allusion in strophe viii., to one monastery's surviving all its brethren. The truth is, the monasteries fell as the English power advanced; "new laws," say the Four Masters, "were enacted by the king and council, according to their own will. They ruined the orders which were permitted to hold worldly possessions: viz. monks, canons, nuns, and brethren of the cross, and the four mendicant orders: viz. the Minor order, the Dominicans, Carmelites, and Augustinians. They broke the monasteries; they sold their roofs and bells, so that there was not a monastery from Aran of the Saints, to the Iccian sea (the German Ocean), that was not destroyed, except a few only, in Ireland." The abbey of Multifarnham, or as it is called in the Latin annals, Mont Fernand, was one of the few. It was the meeting-place of the Anglo-Irish, when driven from Dublin, by Borlase and Parsons, in 1641. Wadding states that in his own time (1630–1641), it was supported principally by Nugent, the Earl of Westmeath. It then afforded a secure refuge, among its pleasant lakes and gentle slopes, to the superannuated friars, who wore their habits, and were not molested during the reign of Charles I. and in the closing years of his father. But it had not escaped the general wreck. In 1590, all the friars were carried off to Dublin, and thrown into prison, where some of them died. On the 1st of October, 1601, Francis Shean, at the head of a troop of soldiers, seized the provincial, and guardian, together with the Right Rev. Friar Richard Brady, bishop of Kilmore, and his dean, Bernard Moriarty. The convent was laid in ashes. It was burned again in 1604,* but we have not been able to ascertain to which of these robberies strophe iv., &c., alludes. O'Reilly's Irish writers place Lochlan O'Daly under the year 1552, but there are so many Irish poets of that name, that they may have been easily confounded. The original Irish has been copied from an old manuscript, and the translation is as literal as English idiom and rhythm allow:

I.

"Oh! lone, oh! lone, and most forlorn,
House of the Brotherhood, thou art!
Well may thy banished members weep and mourn,
An evil day, a dark, dark hour,
Was that which forced them to depart
From thee, coerced by ruffian Power.

II.

Yes! they are gone, are gone from thee,
Those poor, but truly noble men:
A choicest band, a pure fraternity,—
They wander guideless to and fro.
Movrone! movrone! what tongue or pen
Can tell, can paint my heart's deep woe!

III.

A kind, a loving tribe they were,
Grave, prudent, hospitable, just,
Who dwell in thee, O House of Hymn and Prayer.
Children of God, God's own elect,
Who still place in His power their trust,
Albeit their hopes awhile seem wrecked!

IV.

O Abbey of the lowly Friars,
Which hast thy name from Fernand's Hill,
Mourn for thy chief, the noblest of all Priors!
That saintly man, who knew not wrath,
Now suffereth grievous wrong and ill,
And persecution tracks his path.

* Wadding, ad ann. 1236, tom. 2. p. 423, last edit. The Abbey was visited in November, 1612, by Tichbourne, the sanguinary governor of Drogheda. "Not long after, I entered into the County of Westmeath, with a considerable party of horse and foot, took the town of Fore and another castle, and burned them, with several other places, and abundance of corn in store and stack, as far as Multifernham."—Siege of Lougheda.

V.

O chaste and holy Domicile !
 O spacious Pile all desolate !
 Pure-minded habitants were thine erewhile.
 Why art thou solitary now ?
 O woe is me for that sad fate,
 Whereto the Time hath made thee bow !

VI.

Changed art thou—and with what a change !
 From songful praise to silentness—
 From light to gloom !—all widowed, lorn, and strange !
 Thou mournest, O forsaken dome !
 Cold, lampless, chantless, incenseless,
 Thou servest but the owl for home !

VII.

Though now thy lone state so appals,
 Time was, when many a holy band
 Of white-haired monks would meet within thy walls,
 As never more they shall, alas !
 To solemnize with song, the grand
 And thrilling mysteries of the Mass.

VIII.

Yet long the Ancient Faith remained,
 Changeless in purity and worth,
 Among thy Brethren !—Banished or enchained,
 All Orders perished : Thou alone,
 When they were cruelly driven forth,
 Still sentest praise to God's high throne !

IX.

A bitter memory unto me,
 Is that of thy departed joy !
 Sharp are the pangs I suffer, as I see
 How thou, whose children, love-imbued,
 Found in God's praise their best employ,
 Now sittest mute in solitude !

X.

The raven and the fox are now
 Endenized in thy grass-grown aisles,
 My very bosom bleeds to witness how Thou hast in latter years become,
 O holiest of ancient Piles !
 A desert mansion, dark and dumb !

XI.

Upon thine altars, blank and bare,
 The chalice-cup no more appears,
 Thy silver bells no longer peal those rare
 Melodious tones that woke the soul.
 Oh ! how can I forbear from tears ?—
 How overcome my heart's deep dole ?

XII.

Through many a blessed year, within
 Thy walls the Penitent found peace ;
 The guilty soul, down-bowed by Grief and Sin,
 Sought thee, O House of Holiness !
 And ere long time obtained release
 From all its dolor and distress.

XIII.

Beneath that sacred roof of thine,
 The sons of Chiefs and Nobles oft
 Partook of joyous feasts, and gladdening wine,
 While, in a solemn, choral strain,
 The holy anthem rose aloft
 From thy celestial-minded train.

XIV.

Nor didst thou scorn, or slight the Poor—
 The way-worn wanderer ever found
 Best welcome at thy hospitable door.
 O House of Psalm and holy Mass !
 Where be thy sons ? I glance around,
 But see them now no more, alas !

XV.

O meek of heart ! O pure in mind !—
 Pure as the white swans on the wave,
 Were they ; those blameless men—devout and kind,
 Serene, untiring, patient, mild !
 Their hopes lay hid beyond the grave,
 For each of them was God's own child.

XVI.

Their days rolled o'er in peace and calm,
 Studying the sacred Word of Heaven,
 Praying night and morn, and chanting hymn and psalm,
 Yet where they roam to-day, none know,
 For they were doomed, and left bereaven
 By kingly power—the more's the woe !

XVII.

O shame to him who banished them !
 None dared arraign them of a crime.
 The Powers of Hell found nothing to condemn
 In their pure souls, that knew no guile ;
 They were, indeed, the salt of earth,
 The good, the gentle, yet sublime,
 The men of superhuman worth.

XVIII.

O may it please the God of Love !
 And may it prove His gracious will,
 To look down from His Throne of Grace above,
 And give back to this ruined spot,
 To-day so desolate and chill,
 Those who in exile mourn their lot !

XIX.

O Virgin Mother ! unto thee
 I offer up my fervent prayer,
 Restore to us this lost Fraternity !
 The children of Saint Francis—they
 Of truthful thought and tongue—O spare
 These just men yet another day !

XX.

And thou, O flower of chastest growth !
 O Francis, pray to CHRIST the Lord !
 Pray Him, and pray His Blessed Mother both,
 That he may look with pitying eye
 On these meek sufferers, and afford
 Them peace and comfort ere they die !

XXI.

Then shall that Dome, so long left sad,
 So many a year in mourning guise,
 Again look heavenward, hopeful, cheerful, glad,
 And casting off its weeds of gloom,
 Once more in glorious form arise,
 With tenfold glory from its tomb !

RECOLLECTIONS, CONFESSIONS, ADMISSIONS, AND AVOWALS

OF AN

Irish Parliamentary Reporter.

BY WM. B. MAC CABE, ESQ.,

Author of "A Catholic History of England."

"Perdendi simul et pereundi ardebat amore."

Silius Italicus, lib. vii.

CHAP. II.

THE College of Maynooth, as seen by a child—its Students, Professors, and awe-inspiring Dean !—the greatness of the Catholic Church in Ireland become a fixed idea with the author. His first and only political preceptor—the brave Paddy Quirk—Paddy's achievements in 1798—hopes to see "Boney" in College Green, a Gallic-Irish Republic established, and liberty and equality for every one. Peasant-politics in Ireland. Paddy Quirk as an instructor in military manoeuvres—the desire to witness feats of arms inspired by him. The South American Patriots—the Legion of General Devereux. The respect entertained for Irishmen in South America. Emigration recommended there in preference to any other part of the world. The Oriental Republic de Uruguay, and Buenos Ayres. The doleful narration of "Captain Kilkeely, of the Lancers" brings this chapter to an abrupt conclusion.

My first recollections as a child were, that the Catholic Church was a great, a paramount, nay, the pre-eminent power in Ireland ; for it was my good fortune to have been removed from Dublin to Maynooth when about six years of age, and to have remained in Maynooth until I must have been at least ten years old. As a child, I remember the impressions produced upon my mind, by comparing the ruined castle of the Geraldines which flanks one side of the College, and the finnikin-looking, sneaking-seeming, tiny Protestant church which hangs upon the opposite side of the College. Bigness is one of the elements of grandeur, in the mind of a child, and the size of Maynooth College—its long front—its multitudinous windows—the newness, the freshness, the whiteness of the building—its flower-plats—the sun-dial—to me a most marvellous thing, all these tended to demonstrate that the Catholic church was greater than the Geraldines, for they, it was plain, were not able to save their own house from being “blown about their ears,” whilst as to the Protestant establishment it seemed to be reduced to so low and so contemptible an ebb, that it could not afford to keep its solitary large window free from dirt, and dust, and cobwebs.

Then there was next the students in Maynooth College. Priam did not look with half the wonder and admiration, from the walls of Troy, upon the assembled leaders of the Greeks, as I did upon them. They were—although the bloom of youth was on their cheeks, to my childish apprehensions—great old men—such old men—the youngest of them could not, I thought, be less than twenty; and to the child of six, or seven, or eight, that seems to be “so very old!” and then their dark robes and their graceful caps (I never could endure the Dublin Trinity College caps, because of my love for that of Maynooth), and then their decorum and their gravity, and what amazed me most of all, the fear, the reverence, and the respect evinced by these old grown men, for other men so much older than themselves—for professors, for president, and for vice-president—and their awe of the Dean! Why, I used, as a child, to tremble even to hear that the Dean was in sight, even though I can remember his once presenting me with a most delicious rosy-cheeked apple. What was George III., on his throne of gold, in my apprehension, as compared with the Dean of Maynooth College? And then, there was the High Mass on Sundays, the lights, the vestments, the music, the censer, the pealing voices of thousands, as I thought, answering from the choirs. I remember kneeling from its commencement to the close, awe-struck with wonder and delight.

I have since then seen many grand sights, and among the rest the coronation of the Emperor of Austria in Milan, when forty mitred prelates conducted his imperial majesty to receive, from the hands of the Cardinal and Milanese Archbishop, the iron crown of Italy; but never have I beheld anything which filled me with a thousandth part of the awe, or inspired me with anything like the mingled feeling of rapture and wonder which used to fill my mind, when kneeling Sunday after Sunday at the corner of the rails fronting the high altar in the chapel of Maynooth College, during the celebration of High Mass.

As a child, I saw the Catholic Church in Ireland as it is only known to others, by reading of former times, when its monasteries overspread the land, and when men willingly acknowledged that their prelates and their priests were the wisest, and the most influential, because the most virtuous members of the community. To me it appeared in all the substantiality of its greatness, flourishing where the lords of land had been stricken down—great, and grand and magnificent, and overtopping by its majesty the new, little, intrusive foreign church which had sidled up so close to it, and that looked so glum and so woe-begone, that it seemed repentant and ashamed of the position it occupied.

This fixed idea of the greatness of the Catholic Church in Ireland, was one portion of my education; and although I did not again see Maynooth College, which first inspired it, until more than twenty years afterwards, that idea was not in the slightest degree impaired by the change I then perceived in what had been the object of my infantine wonder.

And now candour compels me to confess, that political ideas were inspired into my mind by a person who was, I believe, regarded by those who knew him best, as no very high authority on any subject, even that with which he might be supposed to be thoroughly acquainted. The individual to whom I refer, was designated Paddy Quirk, a servant to my grandmother, with whom I lived. Paddy Quirk was a short, sinewy, dark-haired, weazle-eyed little man, with a deep indentation in his left cheek, of which he was particularly proud; for its hollowness, and its triangular form attested to the truth of Paddy's asseveration, that it had been inflicted on him by the bayonet of a yeoman in the year 1798, and that Paddy returned the compliment to the self-same yeoman, by running four inches of a pike into him, which, to use Paddy's expression, had the desired effect, “of settling the vagabone's hash.”

Paddy Quirk, my political preceptor, had been “out” in '98—had fought at Kilcullen, and run from Kildare—had hid himself in a bog, and emerged when “the troubles” were over; but, as he declared—pointing to his cheek—he was “a marked man,” he did not trouble himself with a walk to Dublin on the night of “Emmet's business,” thinking that if it succeeded he might be “useful” in his own county, and if it did not, then he might save the government the trouble of being bothered any more about such a poor creature as himself.

Paddy Quirk (my political preceptor) was firmly convinced that he should live to see the day when “Bonaparte”—or “Boney,” I think he called him—would march at the head of a regiment of grenadiers, dressed all in bright green uniforms, into College-green for the purpose of pulling down the statue of King William, which was for the occasion to be dressed in Orange ribbons, and over its ruins proclaim that Ireland was thenceforward, and to the end of time, to be a republic, in which there was to be nothing at all at all seen but liberty and equality for everybody.

The politics which I imbibed from Paddy Quirk were, undoubtedly, those of the peasant class to which he belonged; for, although born of the middle class, and of a family which had never taken an active part in the insurrection, but yet had perilled life and property to save from destruction, by concealment in their homes, more than one of those for whose apprehension large rewards had been offered; I can truly affirm, that I never heard my father nor my uncles speak on the subject; whatever were their opinions they were too wise or too cautious to give utterance to them in presence of a boy. And hence, having a strong tendency to pick up information whenever I could procure it, I believe I acquired from Paddy Quirk all the political and historical information it was in his power to impart to me. The result was that I remember confounding together Cromwell and the Danes; Brian Borhoime and “Giniral Hoult;” my namesake, William Putman McCabe, and Sarsfield; William the Third and Lord Castlereagh; “Jimmy O'Brien” and Sir Thomas Wentworth; a hatred of all invaders, and a desire to see the French landed in the Bay of Dublin, and the firm conviction that Ireland would never be in a proper, peaceable, and respectable position, until it was a republic after the French pattern, with some great, fighting, Irish hero as its "First Consul."

These were the peasant politics in the early years of the present century, and I dwell on them for two reasons—one of which shall be speedily mentioned, and the second reason why they are introduced here is, that whilst they were animated with a burning desire to wreak vengeance on the Orange, armed yeomanry, for all the atrocities and inhuman cruelties which they had committed in 1798, there never was uttered (and if there had I should have recollected it) one single word against persons of a different creed from that professed by the great mass of the peasantry.

Paddy Quirk was grand in describing a charge of pikemen. He was fine as he stood opposite a haycock, armed with a pitchfork and supposed the inanimate object before him to be one of the North Cork Militia, or a mounted "Hussian," or one of Wardle's Welsh soldiers—how he fenced off all their blows! parried their strokes, and, at length, gave them the coup-de-grace by leaving his pitchfork sticking deep in the haycock, and finishing all off with capering round his defeated opponent, to the tune of "Terry High Ho! the grinder," and then permitted his excitement to evaporate in a gentle, soothing, and pacific blast of his du-deen!

Paddy Quirk's meadow-lectures and stable precepts were very near influencing my entire course of life; for they not only made me a theoretical republican, but actually inspired me with the military propensities of a young Norval, and "I longed to follow to the field some warlike lord;" so much so, that when childhood had passed away and boyhood was nearly completed, I was about giving up all that I held dear to become an officer in General Devereux's legion of "Patriots," which was then enrolling in all parts of Ireland, for the purpose of aiding the South American provinces of Spain in throwing off the yoke of the mother country and establishing an independent government for themselves.

Old Spain had certainly never done to me, to mine, nor to old Ireland any harm; on the contrary, we were under many obligations to the Spanish monarchy, which had ever afforded a hospitable home to exiled Irishmen; and what interest or rational motive we could then have had in fighting against its supremacy I cannot divine—unless it was that "the young blood of Ireland" had been under the preceptorship of the Paddy Quirks, and that as the opportunity was not afforded to it of fighting for a republic at home, it sought to establish one abroad—besides the green and gold uniform of the Devereux "Patriot" legion was, if not a consideration, a very great temptation.

How such an expedition came to be connived at by a "paternal" government is inexplicable; but if it were the object of the same government to get rid of some thousands of the fiery spirits of Ireland, and for ever, nothing could have been more fittingly contrived for such a purpose.

The formation of the "Patriot Legion" originated with an Irish gentleman, named Devereux, who was, at the time, in the service of General Bolivar. This gentleman arrived in Dublin late, I think, in the year 1818, and was so successful in inducing young persons, and, especially, of the middle classes, in purchasing commissions, that, in the year 1819, the streets of Dublin were crowded with young men in the most magnificent uniforms that ever yet were seen. My military ardour was inspired—my republican Paddy-Quirk notions were excited—and I asked one who loved me with the affection of a brother and the tenderness of a father to purchase a commission for me, because I was, I assured him, determined upon being—a South American Patriot!

The request I made was attended to; my dearest uncle—how I wish he were now living to read these lines—did go to purchase a commission. Fortunately the person he applied to was an old and trusty friend, and that gentleman's answer to the application was, that "if he wished to get rid of his nephew, to buy the commission; but, if he loved him, not to permit him to quit Ireland."

This answer decided my uncle's course, and converted me into a civilian for the remainder of my life.

Never was there a worse conceived project than that of General Devereux, nor one carried out with less care, less caution, and less forethought.

The plan of Devereux was—with the money received from the officers' commissions to enlist and equip soldiers. So far the plan was honestly adhered to; but then the place appointed for the rendezvous of the several regiments was the Island of Margarita, and there, when officers and men arrived, they found no preparations made to receive them. There were neither barracks, nor tents, nor rations, and, in a few weeks, hundreds were carried off by want and sickness. Those whose good fortune it was to reach the mainland and to arrive at the head-quarters of Bolivar, distinguished themselves in the service of the Republican States, and won for their native land so much of love, respect, and honor, that there is now no port of the world in which the Irish exile, or Irish emigrant, is so sure of a hearty welcome, and, with industry, of making out a prosperous livelihood as in the South American States.

The war of the various republics has not deadened this feeling. In Monte Video, of which state I have the high honour to be consul, as well as in Buenos Ayres, now at war with Monte Video, the feeling of regard for Irishmen is the same, and, was peace established between these states, there is not in the world a place where the Irish emigrant, with a few pounds in his pocket, could go with so perfect a certainty of acquiring, in the course of a few years, independence and fortune, as to the banks of the Parana, or the Uruguay.

As a proof of the feeling that exists towards the Irish Catholic people, both in Monte Video and Buenos Ayres, I may mention that, in the year 1829, General O'Brien, now the Consul-general to the Oriental Republic de Uruguay, originated the subscription list to "the Catholic Rent;" the first name signed to it was that of an Irish hero—the Nelson of Ireland—Admiral Browne, commander of the Buenos Ayres fleet, who put down his name for 500 dollars. In less than a week there were 3,000 dollars paid in, and had not the news of the Emancipation being carried put an end to the projected subscription, there would have been more than 100,000 dollars raised in the South American Republics for that Irish and Catholic object alone.

The brave young men who reached the army of Bolivar did good service to the cause in which they were engaged, and won fresh honour and a new glory for their native land.

Thus far the South American "Patriot" expedition was beneficial; but it entailed frightful calamities on those who were drafted to the Island of Margarita, and fancied they would find in it either a depot or a barrack.

In order that the reader may the better appreciate the sufferings of those brave young fellows, I must tell, in his own words, the narrative of his misfortunes, as they were recited to myself, by the son of one of the most respectable citizens in Dublin. I give this statement as I heard it, and I pray the reader to believe that every important circumstance mentioned in it is true, except the name I have given to its hero, and which, for obvious reasons, is a pure nom du guerre.

"And so my dear friend," said Captain Kilkeely, of General Devereux's Lancers, as he mixed, with a cunning and experienced hand, his third tumbler of steaming-hot punch, "you never heard of my adventures when I was in the Patriot service. Well, Sir, you must know I never had in all my life the slightest taste for the army—I would sooner any day play a game of ball than look at a review; and I don't know what in the world put it into my head to become a Lancer—except this, that there was an ugly-looking thief that lived next door to us—one Tim Conolly—and he should go and buy a lieutenancy in the Fusileers, and there he used to be walking up and down my father's door every day, as grand as a turkey-cock, all in green and gold, and beautifully clean white facings, and an iron sword rattling at his heels, and making as much clatter as if he were steeeling two or three tin pannikins after him; and then I'd hear all my sisters running to the windows, and, worst of all, my cousin Patrick's cousin by his first wife—my own pretty, little, smirking Susey—and they all crying out with one voice, as if they were paid for it, 'Oh! my dear Mary! Oh! my dear Nancy! Oh! my dear Susey, there's Lieutenant Conolly of the Fusileers. Oh! but isn't it he that's the beauty with that elegant grand uniform. Sure if the Duke of York saw him he'd make him a general, if it were only for the honour of the army. And then, look at his gold epaulette—why its as big as a nosegay. What a pity it is he has only got one of them! What a nagur his old father must be not to buy him two epaulettes—and then wouldn't he be grand—Captain Conolly of the Fusileers! Oh! sure she would be a queer girl that would refuse to be Mrs. Colonel Conolly; for once he was a Captain, he looks so very brave, sure he must soon be a Colonel.'

"Now I didn't mind my sister's saying this very much; but when my cousin Patrick's cousin by his first wife, when Miss Susey said something very like it one day, I could stand it no longer, and I determined to buy a commission—and I was resolved it should be a captain's commission.

It never occurred to me to inquire who were the colonels, or lieutenant-colonels, or majors, or captains of any one particular regiment; but what I did was to go off to the army-tailors of the different legion regiments, in order that I might see which was the grandest uniform. I looked at the infantry, they had a great deal of green, and a little gold, and, therefore, I wouldn't have anything to say to them. I next saw the fusileers, they had more gold than the infantry, but then they had too much of white facings, and I was resolved not to be a fusileer; then I looked at the dragoons, but the green of their coats was too dark—it was only fit for heavy work, and I made up my mind to stay at home all my life sooner than I'd be a dragoon: I knew well I never would look half handsome enough as a dragoon. At last they showed me the uniform of the lancers; it was almost all gold, scarcely a bit of green to be seen, and even that was the nicest, prettiest light-green ever you saw; whilst in full dress you could wear light pink tight pantaloons, with a great broad stripe of gold down the sides, and hessian-boots with gold tassels. 'Take my measure at once,' said I to the tailor, 'for a captain's uniform in that regiment, and if you ever hope to be paid for the clothes, have them home at six o'clock in the morning with me. You may bring a receipt with you, if you have them at that hour. Bring them at nine o'clock, or you might as well whistle jigs to a milestone as hope to see a tenpenny piece of my money in your pocket. I'm going now to buy my commission, and if I haven't the clothes home at the time I tell you, I'll sell it for half-nothing to-morrow and quit the country for ever after.'

"Sure enough, I had my commission that day—and at two o'clock the next day, I walked into the drawing-room in full uniform; and though Lieutenant Tim Conolly kept rattling with his huge sword against the rails in front of the house, not one of my sisters would run to the window to look at him, whilst as to my cousin Patrick's cousin by his first wife, the darling little Susey, I thought she never would take her eyes out of me.

"Well, Sir, that was all very well for one day; but the very next day I received orders to embark on board a vessel that was starting for Margarita, with the first detachment of the regiment. By dad, Sir, I never counted on this misfortune. For months upon months; at all events, for week after week—I had seen Tim Conolly walking about the streets in his uniform, and before I had time to show myself to my friends—aye, and even before I had time to let my moustachios grow—just as I had left off shaving, and when my upper lip was looking more dirty than fascinating, I had to make up my kit and be off with myself, and that in such a hurry, that I hadn't time to kiss my own sisters, and what I regretted more than that, to tender the same compliment to Miss Susan, my cousin Patrick's cousin by his first wife.

"'At all events,' said I to myself, as I took my last farewell of Howth, 'there is one in Ireland, that, I think, will sigh after the departure of Captain Kilkeely of the Lancers, and that is—my cousin Patrick's cousin by his first wife.'

"I won't trouble you with my sea-adventures in going to Margarita, nor all I suffered when I arrived there. It is sufficient to say, there was nobody there who knew anything about us, and none to give us a night's lodging, a morsel of meat, nor a bit of bread, unless we paid for it. I had a few pounds in my pocket, but between what I spent on myself, and what I lent to my brother officers, I was in the course of four months cleaned so completely out, that all my fine uniform was gone, and all I had on me was a battered hat with the crown out of it, a shirt that was more ragged than dirty, for I washed it in the sea-water every morning myself, and neither shoes nor stockings on me.

"That was the very state I was in when I was sitting lonely and disconsolate on the sea shore, and thinking what a fool I was to come out soldiering, merely that I might wear a grand uniform, and be called Captain Kilkeely of the Lancers for a day and a-half in Dublin. There I was, in the very height of a perplexity, as to how I was to make out my dinner, as I had dispensed with a breakfast, and had nothing to comfort me but a short pipe of tobacco, when what should I see landing but a whole batch of officers, and one of them was nearly as grandly dressed as myself when I had arrived.

"The chap who had just arrived seemed uncommonly pleased with himself; for he went along tapping his boots with a lady's riding whip, and he hardly condescended to look at the crowds about him until he perceived me, when he walks over to me, and says—

"I say, you dirty-looking fellow, can you speak English?"

"Oh! by dad, I can," I answered; "I speak it like a native—I speak it elegantly."

"And do you know this island well?"

"Tis I that do, your honour, to my sorrow and hardship."

"Are you aware, fellow, that a detachment of the Lancers landed here about four weeks ago?"

"I would swear to that as a fact, for I seen it myself."

"And you know all the officers, I suppose you mean to say?"

"I be bound I do, your honour."

"Hah! hum—do you know Captain Kilkeely, of the Lancers?"

"Do I know him?" I exclaimed, "why you might as well ask me do I know myself?"

"Come—come—fellow!" said the new comer, "do not be saucy. You cannot pretend to say that so highly respectable a gentleman as Captain Kilkeely of the Lancers ever spoke to you?"

"Well, your honour," I replied, "I will not say that he ever spoke to me; but I have heard him more times than I can mention speaking to other people."

"Oh! very well—and now can you tell me where he is at this moment?"

"Indeed, I can, Sir," I said; "I can show you the very spot he is standing in."

"Well, then, conduct me to him."

"What will you give me?" I asked.

"Why," said he, "if you bring me direct to him, I will give you five shillings."

"Hand it here," I cried out, jumping up, "and in less than a minute you'll be introduced to Captain Kilkeely of the Lancers."

"He placed the money in my hand—I immediately crammed it into my pocket, and, taking off my hat, said, 'And now, your honour, may I take the liberty of asking your name and rank in the army?'"

"I am," said he, quite pompously, "Captain Macmanus of the Lancers."

"Well, then," I answered, "Captain Macmanus of the Lancers, I have the honour of introducing myself to you as Captain Kilkeely of the Lancers! And all I can tell you is, that when you are here as long as I have been, you will be highly delighted to be able to earn five shillings as easily as I have done."

"It was true enough; for many weeks had not passed away until Captain Macmanus was as ragged as Captain Kilkeely, and we had actually to turn pirates to support ourselves. In one of these expeditions, I was made prisoner by a Liverpool vessel, and they were bringing me home to be tried as a pirate, when the Captain discovered he was a school-fellow of my own,* that we both had gone to Courtney's school in Aungier-street. He took care of me, provided me with clothes and passage-money; and when I arrived at home, I found that Lieutenant Tim Conolly, of the Fusileers, had been seized with a most convenient illness, as his regiment was about to be despatched—had staid at home, and—had proposed, was accepted, and married to my cousin—Patrick's cousin by his first wife—the fair-faced, dark-eyed, fickle-hearted Susan.

"Since then, the greatest comfort in life to me is—a tumbler of punch. I'll thank you to push over that decanter to me."

WE have rarely seen the beauty and truthfulness of Hugo so happily rendered as in the following. We hope our pages may be enriched by many future efforts of the talented and distinguished translator:

Espoir en Dieu.

"Espère, enfant! demain! et puis demain encore!
Et puis toujours demain! croyons dans l'avenir.
Espère! et chagne fois que se lève l'aurore,
Soyons là pour prier comme Dieu pour bénir!

Nos fautes, mon pauvre ange, ont causé nos souffrances:
Peut-être qu'en restant bien longtemps à genoux,
Quand il aura béni toutes les innocences,
Puis tous les repentirs, Dieu finira par nous!"

VICTOR HUGO.

Hope in God.

"Hope! to-morrow, and still with each morrow returning;
Child! ne'er let our faith in the future be less:
Hope! every new day, as ariseth the morning;
Be we there to pray, as God will be to bless!

'Tis sin, my poor angel, our souls is oppressing;
Perhaps, if our knees shall unceasingly bend,
When God hath the innocent cheered with His blessing,
And then the repentant—with us He may end."

PAPERS ABOUT

Irish Missions and Missionaries.

NO. III.

THERE are some over sanguine, and many, perhaps, over apprehensive of the proximate conversion of America. Strange as it may appear, the enemies of faith minister to the hopes of its friends; and its friends place their reliance on the clamorous fears which are expressed by opponents, to arouse the sluggish energy of sectarian rancour. We do not mean to say that all which has been said and written on the progress and expectations of Catholicism in the West has no better foundation than the fanaticism of one party and the zeal of the other; but, we feel assured, that many a weary spirit will lay him down to die in the vineyard before the weeds of heresy shall have been plucked out, and nothing grow there but what the "sun of justice" shall have fostered into being.

Assuredly, the tendencies of America are to Catholicity, but they are the tendencies of the planet to its period before it has yet travelled far upon its course.

God, in his miraculous mercy, may impart to the national mind another and a better direction; but at present the absorbing desire is the excitement of "advance" and accumulation. Religion of any description challenges attention, only when business cannot be decently transacted; and religion of every kind is, in these moments of disengagement, more acceptable than Catholicity.

He would deceive himself who should ascribe to America the religious liberality and tolerance which her constitution seems to guarantee. The really religious are insufferably bigoted; and even the indifferent retain bigotry by inherited sentiment when they have abandoned all principle. Through the weary pilgrimage of multiplied sects the sincere minority are, we apprehend, destined to travel, and to join the faithless majority, before, having been disgusted with the swine-husks, the prodigal will return to his Father's house. We recollect an occasion, when—who will believe it?—a minister, living by the "voluntary system," sacrificed his dinner sooner than sit down beside a Catholic Priest.

"Dinner, Sir," said the servant.

"Mr. ——— will take Mrs. ——— down stairs?" said Mr. Speaker.

"Gentlemen," again bowed our host. . . .

We all stood in our places.

"Mr. ——— will say grace Where is Mr. ———?" cried our entertainer.

But Mr. ——— had decamped, horror-stricken at the idea of having been within a yard of a Papist. Let us, however, quote Mr. Brownson, the editor of the ablest Quarterly in America:

"If religious liberty is, to a considerable extent, guaranteed to us, it is not owing to the liberality of any Protestant sect, but to the multiplicity of sects, which imposes on each the necessity of tolerating the others as the condition of being itself tolerated, and to the prevalence, among the leading and distinguished statesmen and politicians, of infidelity and religious indifference. There was, at the epoch of the Revolution, no Protestant denomination that had sufficient vitality to be intolerant. Religion was not then the dominant passion. Men's minds were absorbed in the contest for national independence, and were more intent on winning earth than heaven. Since then, the energy of the nation has taken an industrial, not a religious direction, and men have been more concerned about the conditions of making money than of serving God. The religious liberty we enjoy we do not owe to Protestantism, and if the Protestant sects could but unite and act in concert, we, as Catholics, would, before the year came round, have no longer a political or civil existence in the land of our birth."

It is difficult for a stranger to comprehend the furious hatred of Catholicism and the occasional appearance of liberality which are manifested by the States. We firmly believe that both qualities may be found in the same individual; and that to burn a convent or go to a sermon—to fete a clergyman or to tear down his residence would, to many, be an equally acceptable employment. It is probable that the opposition to Catholics, as a class, arises from a mixed feeling of jealousy and early abhorrence; and that the liberality so often lauded proceeds from the utter disregard of faith to which we above referred. Selfishness and instinctive bigotry lay the church in ruins—indifference prays in it. St. Augustine's, destroyed by the mob of Philadelphia, three or four years ago, is thus noticed by a Protestant:

"With confusion of face, yet with impartial justice before men and angels, the writer will state that in the season of the above terrible scourge, the Rev. Mr. Hurley, Priest of St. Augustine's, converted the rectory, then in his occupancy into a cholera hospital, and placed it under the control of the proper authorities. The doors of his quiet home were thrown wide open; and unmindful of the inconvenience to which such an act subjected him, he not only invited the guardians of the city's health to deposit the victims of the pestilence in his house, but himself was employed, without intermission, in seeking out the wretched creatures upon whom the dreadful disease had fallen! Every room in his mansion was appropriated to this divine work; his own chamber was given to the dying, and that study, where he had learned his Master's will, was made the practical commentary of the judgment he had formed of it. Out of three hundred and sixty-seven patients which had been received in this private asylum of a heavenly charity, forty-eight only were Roman Catholics—the remainder were professing Protestants."

We neither write nor quote in an angry spirit. The bigotry of America, like her slavery, is attributable to the past. And hence—though we lament that not a month since "Catholic soldiers, at Governor's Island, New York, were told that if they did not go to the Protestant chapel they should be sent to the guard-house"—we hope for the day when the quickening spirit of Catholicity shall brood over her social chaos, and produce that majestic greatness which seems to be the destiny of the West. We have, however, glanced at some of the causes which must delay that consummation; there are many others, to which we feel it a duty to refer; and we hope that prayer and exertion shall be offered and continued, until faith encircle her in "one arch of peace."

We have said and we have proved that the national tendency is almost entirely industrial. In the restless activity of manufacture and commerce; amid the din and confusion of political broils and schemes of acquisition, religion becomes only a pastime, and its ministers only actors hebdomadally employed. To think of the responsibility of a man's profession—its influence upon an eternity of woe or weal—is a labour rarely assumed. Men live as their fathers lived, and die as their fathers died; probably enough, a ledger and a pile of papers their last vision and their last solicitude.

It must be something very uncommon, and uncommonly influential, that shall change this direction. New motives must be implanted, new objects created or pointed out—a "new creature" must be produced, unfurnished by the selfishness which debases the present one. And all this must be operative not in a locality, nor a state, but through the world-wide union, which will yet comprehend every foot of earth which is bathed by the Western Atlantic.

We are confident it will come; and to "Irish Missions and Missionaries" shall the glory be ascribed. But the time, and labour, and difficulty cannot be denied.

Earnest men have been captivated by the unwavering confidence and fidelity of our poor countrymen, and many, by their example, have been brought to the fold. Many will continue to follow. But America is not only educated—she is educationally-proud. Her fourteen hundred newspapers in New York, and the Ladies' Magazine, by the factory-girls of Lowell, indicate an extension of education on which European legislators ought to ponder. In truth, the Yankees are a quarter of a century before us in the "march of mind;" and much of their excessive vanity may be attributable to the contrast which they themselves make with annual depositories, from the ocean of eastern poverty and ignorance.

We had a rather disagreeable rencontre at one period, all owing to our want of taste. Ever proud of our country, we were in the corner of a huge stage-coach, dreaming of that legendary lady who travelled Ireland, formerly, and

A bright gold ring on her hand she bore.

We were to leeward, and safe from the dust, which occasionally gathered up in spiral life and peeped in at the windows.

* New York Freeman's Journal, January, 1848.

"Beg your pardon, Sir," said a lady, just about nineteen, who stood up from her place in the opposite side, "you will take my place, the dust is very annoying?"

"Ahem!" said we, half to ourselves, for we knew the decree was inexorable; "of course," we added, which was perfectly true; "and most happy," which, God forgive us, was perfectly untrue.

Ensnconced in the villanous place to windward, and having swallowed a mouthful of dust in honour of American perfect obedience to ladies, my companion looked at me, rather pleased; in proof of which, she requested me "to take a basket on my knee, because it required care," she added: and then, having so placed me that my centre of gravity was just where a recruit's should be, she continued:

"Pray, do you know anything of the latest improvement on the steam engine?"

"I am not so fortunate."

"Oh, you are not—well."

After a moment:

"Don't you think there is much power lost—pray, keep the basket more erect—don't you think there is much power lost by the present direction of the forces?"

"I really cannot say."

"Oh! no."

Another pause.

"Well, perhaps you know something about aqueducts? You have seen our'n—the greatest and most perfect in the universal world. 'Tis constructed on the true principles. The water is purer, the repairs less frequent, and the stability much greater, than where the pipes are carried along under ground, according to the English style."

"Merciful Providence!" we exclaimed to ourselves, "is it to be thus for one hundred miles?"

And so it was. We soon became accustomed to it, and had finally very nearly enjoyed it. 'Twas a study. A young girl, alone, travelling hundreds of miles, inexhaustible as a lecturer on natural philosophy, and irresistible in every demand upon man's patience or labour. Next day we were to travel by a railway.

"Happy to meet you to-morrow, Sir. I travel by the nine o'clock train."

"You do? Very good!"

We were off by the seven o'clock; and should have been off by the four o'clock, had we been rich enough to order a special train.

This educational pride we believe to be the most dangerous opponent to the diffusion of true faith. It is not because the American cannot examine, but because he will not. His prejudices against our Church are active—his self-sufficiency is strengthened by his political institutions and the form of his belief. The professors of Catholicism are as they were in the time of St. Paul, "neither the wise nor the great." The ignorance and the poverty of the thousands who gather from our own land—they are faith's great heralds—steel him in contemptuous folly; and "can anything good come from Nazareth?" is practically effective in enveloping him in error. Two-thirds, it is said, of the States profess no religion. The whole population must be very nearly nineteen millions.* On this mass has Irish faith and charity to operate.

* The population of the United States was, in 1810, 7,239,903; in 1820, 9,638,166; in 1830, 12,858,670; thus making an in-

The Catholics of America are now little under a million and a-half; and they are ministered to by 919 clergymen. This gives to every Roman Catholic Priest a congregation of 2,000 souls. If we consider the immense extent of territory over which their congregations are scattered, we must feel convinced of the utter inadequacy of the number to the demands for pastoral charge; and, in the universal spirit of Christian charity, we should, according to our circumstances, endeavour to aid our brethren in their wants. It is such necessities as this that ALL HALLOWS' Missionary College might be made to relieve; and may we once again express a hope that public sympathy will be commensurate with the importance of that great establishment. The reader will be surprised to learn, that, while for their own population of one million and a-half, and to extend the blessings of religious information to seventeen millions and a-half beside, our Catholic brethren have only 919 priests; the Baptists of the United States have, for a half-a-million, a ministry of eight thousand clergymen, active and zealous in the discharge of whatever duties they are permitted to perform.* Thus, while the religious principle is rendered active by this widely-diffused teaching in one case, Catholicism feels herself circumscribed by the fewness of her authorised fathers; and, while the multitude who claim the orthodox clergyman's offices leave him little time to follow the sheep who have strayed from the fold, the heterodox have every opportunity of aggression which they can desire. We need not add the absorption of time and anxiety consequent upon our peculiar tenets, practices, and practical earnestness; and how, in this respect of America, the Catholic Clergyman must labour under ever-recurring disadvantages. We have named only one sect, and that not the most important: what would be the reader's feelings should we sum up the countless other bodies of clergymen with which the Republic abounds?

But, although we thus state the obstacles which impede its path, we have no doubt of the ultimate triumph of the Faith. Our education, our poverty, our paucity of number, the tendency of the minority to conform to the mass, and the consequent adoption of an alien spirit—all these will fling obstacles in the road of truth; but, nevertheless, we are not sceptical regarding its progress. Every sect in America has sent its contribution to Indifferentism. We are sure that their statistics would show a fearful defalcation in communicants. Only THE FAITH has been firm, and, as through all the world, grasping, day after day, a new dominion of soul. Catholicism has nearly doubled its numbers in twenty years.† The whole United crease of 33·4 per cent. every ten years. It is now estimated—and ought to be—at nearly what we have stated. Boston has, since 1820, risen from 43,000 to nearly 119,000 souls!

* There are in the United States—Regular Baptist Churches, 7883; Ordained Ministers, 6751; Licensed Preachers, 1065; Communicants, 655,536; Colleges, 14; Theological Schools, 8; Religious Newspapers, 20; other Periodicals, 14.—Bap. Magazine.

States' population has done precisely the same. So that, while infidelity has enfolded in its clouds, it is stated, so many millions of the people, the faith of Rome is the only one which, by the "Armour of light," protected, saved, and multiplied its children. This progress must continue—and whenever it shall please the ALMIGHTY to infuse the spirit of apprehension, and inquiry into that heterogeneous collection of American religionists, every return to Christianity will be a return to the Catholic Church.

The "voluntary principle" is the most disastrous that can assail Protestantism. It unfixes all belief, and destroys the influence of every ministry. In the Catholic Church it is very different. The Priest is the exponent of a creed which can never vary—the representative of a power which can never, never deceive. Every understanding must bow to the "captivity of faith," having, once, reasonably acknowledged its rule. Hence, however his hearers may question his prudence or his ability, none will question his doctrine. Whilst he does his fixed duty, or as long as his Bishop connects him with a district, his people's obligation to support him is undoubted and recognised. But the poor Sectarian Minister!—if his congregation disapprove of his theological expositions—or if a majority dissent, or can be brought to dissent, from his commentary—if he produce a bad intonation, which might affect his flock in the estimation of "strangers"—or say a word of reproof which might affect them in their own—alas! alas! then for the voluntary system! Debt, misery, and absquatulation are the poor minister's doom. The American clergyman must preach nothing but generalities—he must flatter, fawn, and deprecate—he must avoid all dogmatizing; and, then, he is fortunate if some rival shall not supplant him, and send him forth on the world to seek a flock. From this it arises that there is no fixed religious opinion—faith is varied as minds—and that the shadowy outlines which distinguish consistent heterodoxy from "nothingarianism" have so generally disappeared. We once knew a most estimable preacher; he had studied Scripture at the Sorbonne, and Hebrew at Vienna. He once endeavoured to rationalize the belief of his people in the authenticity of the Holy Scriptures; and he spoke of the "version used by the Western Church," and of the influence which the "Western Church" had exercised in preserving the "Sacred Records."

"Minister, what did you mean by the Western Church—eh?" said an old crusty octogenarian—'twas on the Monday morning after the discourse.

"I meant the Roman Church, of course."

"Oh! so, so, aye; I know."

Poor fellow—he had no congregation on the following Sunday; and in ten days he had disappeared.

The "individualism" which results from this dependence of Christian teachers—and from the principle of Protestantism itself—is melancholy to behold. The protean shapes conceived by every undisciplined 160,000; in Boston, at about 80,000. During the past year there has been an accession of 76 to the number of the priests; 20 have died, and 95 new churches have been erected. In the Mother House of the Sisters of Charity, at St. Joseph's, Emmetsburgh, there are 120 members, 80 of whom are professed sisters and 35 novices. In addition, there are 222 sisters in different parts of the United States, having under their care 33 establishments. In Mont St. Vincent—the Mother House of the same order in New York—there are 51 sisters, besides having 11 institutions attended by the sisters. In the Convent of the Visitation, at Georgetown, near Washington, there are 81 sisters.—Met. Directory.

fancy are dignified by the name of Eternal Truth, and the essence of the Divinity made to vary as caprice or ignorance is caught by a new vagary. Fanny Wright will inveigh against the "Judaism of Christianity," while approving thousands cheer her blasphemies; and Parker's crudities are swallowed, while he raises the rudest republican above the dignity of the Son of God. Most religious men will recollect to mourn over it,—the exhibition in New York in 1842 or '43, when the "friends of liberty," contrasted by their multitude with the "Convention of Bible Societies, and the enthusiasm of infidelity chilled the souls of those who felt what America might become, were the standard of universal charity to wave above her sons. Let the reader only imagine the state of society which extensively adopts language such as the following. It is from a leader in their Israel Parker:

"We believe the truths that Jesus uttered in no degree because of the miracles he wrought; we believe them because our mind recognizes their intrinsic truth, and this we hold to be good ground of faith for all men. . . . God has given to all men the power to attain to a religious faith that needs no external evidence to support it. . . . The deepest, truest religious faith is not capable of support from any outward evidence whatever. . . . Men have recourse to outward evidence through the weakness of their faith. . . . The most deeply religious minds never, in any stage of their progress, have anything to do with such gross outward helps to their belief. To tell them to believe on the evidence of signs and wonders, to offer to prop up their faith by argument and logic, is to do violence to all their deepest and most sacred feelings. With hearts overflowing with love, and reverence, and gratitude to God, seeing him in all that is glorious and beautiful around them, feeling him within and about them everywhere, walking in his presence daily, as with a 'father and a friend'—what care such men for logic and cunning reasoning—what care they for signs and wonders? All around them is wonderful, for they see God in all. . . . Tell them a deep religious truth, and they cannot but believe it, though all evidence were against it. For truth is native to their souls. God has made them of that nature that they cannot be deceived. Their minds are TOUCHSTONES whereon to try all words and thoughts."

"Jesus fell back on God, on absolute religion and morality—the truth its own authority; his works his witness. The early Christians fell back on the authority of Jesus; their successors, on the authority of the Bible—the work of the Apostles and Prophets; the next generation, on the Church—the work of the Apostles and Fathers. The world retreats this ground. Protestantism delivers us from the tyranny of the Church and carries us back to the Bible. Biblical criticism frees us from the thralldom of Scripture, and brings us to the authority of Jesus. Philosophical spiritualism liberates us from all personal and private authority, and restores us to God, the primeval fountain, whence the Church, the Scriptures, and Jesus drew all the water of life wherewith they filled their urns."

The very excess of these absurdities is a Catholic source of augury. The Irish people preach by their endurance, faith, and proverbial honesty—the Irish Priests by their devotedness, labour, and unselfishness. Progressing, so rapidly and numerous, to a negation of all faith, the beauty and the necessity of the Christian dispensation must soon strike and remodel the commonwealth. If multitudes have not hitherto embraced Catholicism, it is because "there is no one who thinketh in his heart," and that gold is the god of the state. When the great world has time to think of religion the glories of Rome shall shine in the West.

We have freely spoken our opinion of the state and prosperity of religion on the continent of America. We have done so—not without an influencing motive. However poor Ireland may be, she has the "zeal of God's house," and she has proved that she "loved its beauty." A glorious and untrodden field lies open to her confessors—a crown of ineffable beauty to her missionaries beyond the Atlantic. We would encourage the enterprise, enthusiasm and charity, which distinguished her of old. We would unveil her difficulties that she might prepare for them—describe the vantage ground of heresy, that she might know how to prepare for the assault. Home has its trials, and demands for its ministry qualities, moral and intellectual, of a character which every day requires to be still more exalted: but America—whether in our colonies or in the great republic—requires attributes of excellence, learning, piety, labour, and endurance, far transcending any which even for Ireland would be necessary. Arts are pursued—science is studied—reading is a passion—observation intuitively correct; and the man whose mental or whose religious qualities are not of a high order may accomplish much good in this country, when there his steps would be tracked by evils unknown.

Sam Slick is a well-known character—much admired in his books, more in his proper person. He writes a story well, but he is the only one in the world who should be allowed to tell one. We imagine he is before us now, his fine intellectual face beaming with the harmony of his soul, his noble forehead wrinkling up with the fancies which are working within, his light grey eye shooting forth that inimitable drollery, which, irresistible as electricity, thrills through your soul; and then the brow—the mouth—the whole face—why, before he has spoken a word your imagination is fired, and in two sentences he has you in a roar. We quarrelled with Justice Haliburton about the “Attache” and something else—no matter what. We wish, if he read these lines, to say, that we quote him and would see him with delight. The language is that of Mr. Hopewell, a minister, through whom Mr. Haliburton conveys his views:

“They gain constantly;—they gain more by emigration, more by natural increase in proportion to their numbers, more by intermarriages, adoption, and conversion, than the Protestants. With their exclusive views of salvation, and peculiar tenets, as soon as they have the majority this becomes a Catholic country, with a Catholic government, with the Catholic religion established by law. Is this a great change? A greater change has taken place among the British, the Medes and Persians of Europe, the nolumus leges mutari people. What, then, will the natural order and progress of events now in train here not produce? I only speak of this—I don’t dread it. I hope and trust and pray that it may be so; not because I think them right, for I don’t, but because they are a Christian church, an old church, a consistent church, and because it is a church, and any sect is better than the substitution of a cold, speculative philosophy for religion, as we see too frequently among us. We are too greedy to be moral, too self-sufficient to be pious, and too independent to be religious. United under one head, and obedient to that head, with the countenance and aid of the whole Catholic world, what can they not achieve? Yes, it is the only cure that time and a kind and merciful Providence has in store for us. We shall be a Catholic country.” (Vol. ii., page 240.)

Let us record Captain Maryatt’s opinion:

“That all America, west of the Alleghanies, will eventually be a Catholic country I have little doubt, as the Catholics are already in the majority; and there is nothing, as Mr. Cooper observes, to prevent any state from establishing that, or any other religion, as the religion of the state; and this is one of the dark clouds which hang over the destiny of the western hemisphere.”

Dr. Reid says:

“It should really seem that the Pope, in fear of expulsion from Europe, is anxious to find a reversion in this new world; the crowned heads of the continent having the same enmity to free political institutions which his holiness has to free religious institutions, willingly unite in the attempt to enthrall this people.”

The following, as indeed both the foregoing, from Protestant authority, will serve to illustrate and confirm our preceding remarks. ’Tis from the “Voice from America”:

“The Protestant cause in America is weak, from the evil effects of the voluntary system; particularly from its division into so many sects. A house divided against itself cannot stand long; and every year it will be found that the Catholic Church will increase its power; and it is a question, whether a hierarchy may not eventually be raised, which, so far from advocating the principles of equality, may serve as a check to the spirit of democracy becoming more powerful than the government, curbing public opinion, and reducing to better order the present chaotic state of society.”

We pass over De Tocqueville, because he is a Catholic, and Mrs. Maury, because she is an enthusiast. The shadow of coming events is seen, however, in some singular conversions and efforts which we shall hereafter note. The history of Brownson’s mind, during its progress from infidelity, shall probably engage a portion of our attention next month. Let us, meantime, pray himself and the Dublin Review, before they proceed further on “developments,” to give us some idea of what an orthodox and a heterodox “development” are, respectively.

Review.

SUNDAYS AT LOVELL AUDLEY; OR, STORIES FROM THE LIVES OF THE SAINTS FOR EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR. By Lawful Authority, and dedicated to Nicholas, Bishop of Melipotamus. DUFFY, Dublin, 1848.

SOME over-sensitive Irishman may, perhaps, denounce these “Sundays at Lovell Audley” as a kind of English invasion. They are by an English hand, and dedicated to an illustrious English prelate, and yet they seize upon one of the most interesting events in our ecclesiastical history—the life and labours of our Apostle St. Patrick. It is doubtful whether the fact of their being published in Dublin by our national publisher, can compensate, in the opinion of all, for this intrusion of an English sickle into the Irish harvest; but, for our own part, we look upon the work as a small instalment of the enormous restitution due to the Catholics of Ireland by their brethren beyond the channel. In truth, before the appearance of Lord Shrewsbury’s letters to Archbishop MacHale, a review of this work had been drawn up, which did not confine itself to the precise matter in hand, but gave a detailed view of the feelings of our English brethren towards Ireland, both in ancient and modern times, and especially as it had manifested itself in Digby, and the authors of the Lives of the Saxon Saints and in other new converts. The reviewer imagined he had discovered an inclination to cast off that contempt or constitutional English coldness which had too often characterised English Catholic views of Irish Catholic affairs; he thought he had discovered in those converts who have brought so much zeal and learning into the Church, a truer perception of the destiny of Ireland, and of her influence on the spiritual interests of the world-wide empire of Great Britain; he imagined, in his fond dream of a growing imperial Catholic connexion, that he heard them repeating with gratitude—“unless the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed ‘in Ireland’ we had been made as Sodom and we had been like unto Gomorrah.”* But Lord Shrewsbury must know the general feeling in England better than our reviewer, and yet he has written a letter which, if written in the old character of the fourteenth century, and deposited in some of our Irish libraries, with a slight change of names and dates, would have all the intrinsic marks of authenticity, and would infallibly pass the most rigid critic as the work of Lionel Duke of Clarence, under whose government it was enacted that the mere Irish should neither marry nor associate with the English in Ireland, nor enjoy stall, prebend, or mitre, in any monastery or church where an English Earl held sway. In rejecting the review of our kind contributor, we do not mean to say that he has not made out a promising case; but can he prove that Lord Shrewsbury did not write those letters? Until he can establish that impossible fact, we beg of him to remember that the English and Irish characters were cast in widely different moulds. "How different those English ladies from your countrywomen," said the superioress of a celebrated convent in Paris; "in one fortnight the Irish girl adapts herself perfectly to our manners, and, though never forgetting her country, becomes 'all French'; but that rugged nature of the English struggles at every step, and after years spent in our convent-schools departs 'all English.'" If that be a correct view (and it was the remark of a keen observer), and if, moreover, the social and political edifice is to continue so very different in England and Ireland, long years must pass before the Catholics of both countries can fully understand each other. The English Catholic lives at ease in the well-ordered old home of his fathers, while the Irish Catholics are burrowing in the ruins of a Cromwellian castle, battered, rent, and tottering—a chaos of broken columns and gaping arches, with hardly an invisible line connecting "the Corinthian capitals" with the sightless mass which they should support and adorn. When English Catholics understand these facts we shall be happy to receive the literary aid of our rejected contributor.*

To compensate, in some way, the loss to our readers of that interesting review, we give a brief notice of the beautiful work at the head of our paper. It is a first series of stories, from the "Lives of the Saints," for every Sunday in the year. The present volume includes the months of January, February, and March. It is a mother who instructs her children on the wonderful works of God in his saints. The object of the work and the manner of its execution can be best learned from an extract. A heavy fall of snow prevents the children from enjoying their usual sports, but the affectionate and religious mother provides for the amusement of her Francis and Clarie:

"Do you remember, Francis, what we were talking of when I said I had something interesting to tell you to-day?"

Francis considered for a moment. "Yes, mamma; you were speaking to Father Blundell about the miracle of the Roses in the Life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, and I wanted so much to read it, and he told me to look for it in the great Butler, in the library. I did look for it, but there were so many hard words in it, and it was such little, close print, that I did not go on reading it. I was disappointed to find the Saints' Lives so dull; but when I told Father Blundell so, he only laughed, and said, 'You must tell mamma that, my dear child.'"

"He told me of your disappointment himself, my dear boy; and it was a very natural one. You are too young yet to understand and rightly relish Butler's Lives, and there are many things in them which are above your comprehension now. But what I am going to propose to you is this: every Sunday afternoon that I have had no bad report of you from Father Blundell, you shall come to me, and I will choose for you the life of one of the saints of the month, and either read his life for you, or write it beforehand for you, so that you can understand it and take an interest in it; or tell you, in my own words, what he did; and you can always ask questions about it, when there is anything in it you do not quite understand the meaning of."

Clarie sprang off her stool at this proposal and clapped her hands. Francis only said, quietly, "Thank you, mamma." He knew that his mother always understood him perfectly.

"As this is the first Sunday of the year," continued she, "I wish to begin immediately, and I have therefore prepared for you our first story. Open the drawer next to you, Clarie, and you will see a paper book, full of writing. It is," she added, smiling at the eager eyes of the children, "the Life of St. Hilary." p. 3.

Coming now to St. Patrick, on the third Sunday in March, shall we complain that our work makes him a Roman Briton, and bequeathes his sacred body to Glastonbury? The former, we admit, is still an open question, and the latter has been rather sifted than settled by the researches of Mr. Petrie on the antiquities of Tarah Hill. Jocelyn is the main authority followed in all our work.

"We shall go back to the famous fourth century to-day," said Mrs. Lovell, putting away her desk and multitude of books which were always collected round her; "and while we do so, we shall still remain very near home. We are going to hear about St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland."

"Ireland!—dear Catholic Ireland!" said Francis. "I am so glad! What a saint St. Patrick must have been, to have made the Irish for ever such good Catholics!"

"Something, perhaps, is to be said for the character of the people," replied his mother, smiling, "as well as for St. Patrick's depth of zeal. Every nation has its peculiar characteristics, which are shown in its religious turn, as well as in every other point. Otherwise, we might as reasonable lay our English coldness at St. Augustine's or St. Anselm's door. It is very difficult to give exactly many of the circumstances in St. Patrick's life. The old chronicler, Jocelyn, the history of Glastonbury, and several other lives, give one account, while Tillemont, who is followed by Alban Butler, gives another, which is less wonderful, tells us fewer miracles, and perhaps has been sifted by a more precise and sceptical criticism. I have given you chiefly the version of the chroniclers, according to Father Alford's annals of England, although it is certainly a much more extraordinary account than the others."

"I am glad of that," said Francis; "and I feel as if it were more likely to be true, for it seems only natural that an apostle should work more miracles and do stranger things than anybody else."

"I agree with you," replied Mrs. Lovell, smiling at the unconscious faith, and correct instinct of the boy, "that such a number of miracles being recorded, is a great proof that St. Patrick worked more than usual." p. 249.

In illustrating the early life of St. Patrick, the work avails itself of the contrast between the old church system and that of modern societies. It also celebrates the mercy of God in preserving the Catholic faith in Ireland through ages of persecution; but here justice compels us to divide the grace with our good English friend, for nothing is more certain than that the descendants of the English colonists were, after the Reformation, as faithful as the native Irish, and that many of the most learned amongst them, such as Primate Lombard, Fitzsimon, Dr. French, and even Keatinge himself, rested their claims to toleration on the very grounds that they were English by descent.

"I should like to have seen a bishop's house then, mamma," said Francis, "how still and devout it must have been."

"Yes," replied his mother, "it would have astonished St. German and his quiet, modest acolyths and deacons, to have seen, some centuries hence, a schismatic community, whose bishops would have fashionable wives, and daughters, and sons, who would spend the patrimony of the true Church upon balls and concerts, fine horses, powdered footmen, and elegant country-houses."

"The Anglican bishops," said Francis, laughing; "yes, he would have thought it very funny! But then they have nothing to do with St. German, and they do not pretend to be saints at all; so it does not much matter. They are peers of the House of Lords."

* The Tablet, an English, or rather a Catholic Journal, does understand these facts.

"It matters so far as this, dear boy," replied Mrs. Lovell, mildly, "that the enormous wealth of the Church is spent for this world, instead of for God; the consequence of which is that England is reduced to such a point of hideous misery, as to have become a spectacle to all Christendom, while Ireland, of which I was thinking at the time, is the scene of every outrage and crime that can possibly be committed from the fruitless, and ever-to-be-fruitless effort to force upon her true-hearted children a belief, or rather an unbelief, which they abhor; for to an Irishman no evil that his country can ever be cursed with is so abhorrent as heresy."

"Honour be to him then," cried Francis, exultingly, "and 'good luck to old Ireland for that same!' as old dame Neill always says." p. 255.

Or, rather, glory be to Him "who holds the heart of man in his hands." If in the next extract any keen observer should detect an historic parallel, and be tempted to exclaim with the wise man, "there is nothing new under the sun; the things that have been, the same things shall be," the fault is not ours. Our object is to state facts, and review our book, whether the personage in question be a British prince or any other British title on the banks of the Severn.

"In the midst of Patrick's labours, he was distressed by a hand which ought to have helped and defended him. A British prince, Corotic, who was a Christian, made a descent upon Ireland, and carried off a great many of the inhabitants, whom he sold as slaves to the Picts and Scots. Now, it happened to be at Easter, and Patrick had just been giving confirmation to an immense band of neophytes, or newly-instructed Catholics, who were all still in their snow-white baptismal robes, according to the beautiful custom of that day. Among these pure troops of innocent children of Christ, the blood-thirsty Corotic came like a ravenous wolf; he killed some, and carried off a great number to be slaves. Patrick sent him a letter by a holy priest, who went about with him, and helped him in his labours, begging him to give up the Christian children at least, whom he had taken, and some of the cattle and food he had taken, otherwise many of his poor people would die of want; and he reminded him that he also was a Christian, and should have compassion upon his poor brethren. Corotic only answered by mocking the bishop, and said it was quite impossible that Irish Christians could be like other Christians, or indeed that the Irish barbarians could be Christians at all." p. 263.

From the sorrowful associations of this true narrative, we turn with pleasure to a happy specimen of solid argument, adapted to the capacity of a child. It is founded on the fact that St. Patrick was contemporary of the greatest doctors both in the Western and Eastern Church. St. Paulinus, that undisguised Papist, was proposed by St. Martin, the uncle of St. Patrick, as the great model of all perfect Christians.

"Ah!" said Clarie, "I am sure St. Patrick went to Rome!"

"He did. He went to get his orders from the successor of St. Peter, before he would venture to begin under him the work of feeding the lambs of Christ," replied Mrs. Lovell, "and as he recognised in himself the mission of an apostle, he went to lay his head upon the tombs of the great apostles, and to press his lips upon their sacred dust, that he might get from them a heart and a tongue of fire like their own. In going to Rome, Patrick may have visited St. Ambrose, who was then Archbishop of Milan, and may have spoken with him about the wonderful conversion of the young Manichee heretic, who was now beginning to delight the world by his reformation and fervent virtue, and who, soon after this time, was known throughout Christendom as the learned and saintly bishop of Hippo."

"St. Augustine, mamma?" exclaimed Francis in surprise, "was he once a Manichee?"

"He was indeed, and, while so, he led a life most displeasing to God. Patrick had thus, you see, familiar intercourse and interchange of sentiments with two of the great doctors of the fourth century, as well as with two celebrated saints and theologians, St. Martin and St. German, who taught him in all respects according to the tradition they had received from St. Peter's chair. This fact of itself is sufficient to disprove the silly assertion that Ireland, during the first ages of its Christianity, was independent of the successors of St. Peter, and had no communication with the Holy See. Such an assertion indeed could never have been made but under the profound ignorance of ecclesiastical history, and as a kind of forlorn hope, just as drowning men catch at straws. p. 257.

Truly, it is "catching at straws" to attempt to dis-sever the connexion which has existed between this island and Rome, from the day on which Patrick announced the faith to the princes at Tarah. The fanatical Saul was changed into a zealous apostle; the luxurious Augustine into the doctor of love; and may not the Almighty, in those ways which dispose all things sweetly, have selected (without any merit of theirs) the unyielding Celtic natures in the end of the earth, to exhibit in those latter ages, by his grace, an example of constancy when all northern nations had revolted from Rome. Without discussing what Father Suarez, in his congruist theories, would have thought of our hint, we give the fact of Irish fidelity, as recorded in "Lovell Audley:"

"St. Patrick sought, and would labour only for the glory of God and the good of those precious souls, which were his only wealth and joy on earth, and are now his glittering diadem in heaven. And there is one desire of his recorded in a prayer which he often repeated in the course of his enormous labours, which shows that his ardent desire for the glory of God has been richly heard, and royally rewarded. It was this:—'May my Lord grant that I may never lose His people, which he has gained in the ends of the earth!'"

"Oh, mamma, exclaimed Francis, "St. Patrick's zeal then is the great cause of the faith of the Irish after all! How beautiful it is to think that he has been so heard, and for so many years!"

"Yes," replied his mother, "it is indeed beautiful to think that fourteen hundred years have passed away since that prayer was breathed by an humble monk, born in the very 'ends of the earth,' and that it yet lives to bring a fruitful blessing from heaven upon the children among whom he laboured, and for whom he spent himself. Fourteen hundred years have rolled by, very nearly four centuries of which have been stained by every crime which unholy violence and a persecution that can only be called Satanic could raise to rob the Irish of the faith planted by their beloved apostle. The ground has been drenched with their blood, and the noise of battle has succeeded the chant of psalms, and the sweet voice of bells of prayer. But still that prayer is heard, and, as we may believe, it will never cease to be heard for wronged, oppressed, wearied, but still holy Ireland. The people whom the Lord gained to Himself in the ends of the earth, by St. Patrick, will not be lost to His saving hands.—'Thou wilt arise, O Lord, and wilt have mercy upon Zion!'" p. 267.

May He have mercy on Zion! Assuredly in his own good day He will come. If the author of this book (which is not a Life of St. Patrick, but Lives of the Saints) should complain that our notice has been either political or national, we disclaim such intention. We are Catholics, and disclaim nationalism in religion. Facts are given—no commentaries. The book itself proclaims (p. 266) that "the poor Irish might turn round upon the English for having lost the faith and sold themselves." "We turn round upon them" by inviting their aid in exploring the unreclaimed wastes of our ecclesiastical history, and thereby knitting more closely the bonds of Catholic, and even of earthly communion. With one regret, namely, that St. Evie had not been preferred as an authority (even for legends) to Jocelyn, we hope for the continuation of "Lovell Audley." Every Christian mother, whose eye has scanned our extracts, must be anxious for their continuation. It is an arduous task. St. Paulinus of Nola, as cited by the Irish Dungal, against Claude, the image-breaker, professes his inability to do justice to such a theme.

But when the author shall have arrived at the festival of St. Thomas of Canterbury, the martyr of Church-liberty, we hope to receive a stern and impartial verdict on the mode in which that saint's principles have been carried out in England. Was he a sign raised up to be contradicted? We should wish for a comparative view of the conduct of the Henrys and Edwards, of the Beaumonts, and Butlers, and Shrewsburys, because many believe that Erastianism was the root of all their perverse eccentricities. It is well known that a bad principle may exhibit itself in many different ways. Now, it is the constitutions of Clarendon; then it is an Edward the First, "ordering a search of all the monasteries in England, and carrying off their money to London," A.D. 1296; or an Edward III., "confiscating the property of the Cistercians and monks of Cluny throughout the whole kingdom," A.D. 1337; or, finally, a Henry VIII., carrying out the bad precedent to its natural conclusion. Charles Butler's vetoes against Dr. Milner; Beaumont's code of Joseph II., and Lord Shrewsbury's canons on the government of the Irish Church, are, in principle, the same; but that principle has been at all times odious to the Catholics of Ireland. In all their miseries, even when they were "the refuse of this world," and "the offscouring of all," they never were Erastian—they respected the lawful rights of the Church. That feeling was sometimes exhibited, doubtless, in a mode that would shock English propriety," though it was the only mode of keeping the Irish alive, and preventing the utter ruin of the kingdom. In fact, the Irish churches were—shall we say it?—converted during many ages to secular purposes—"they were public granaries." The custom among the Irish is, says Giraldus Cambrensis, "that no man shall dare to meddle with any goods, corn, or victuals kept in any church." "And this custom," says his Protestant commentator, in the reign of Elizabeth, "is still observed, and every church in the country is stuffed and filled with great chests full of corn, which the husbandmen do for safety keep therein, and this lieth safe at all times, even in the very wars among themselves." This was a deplorable, yet a necessary custom. Savage must that priest have been who barred his church door against such a secular concern as a "chest of wheat," without which his "oil for the sick" would soon be exhausted on his famished parishioners. But until English history is proved to be a historical novel, or English and Irish natures are changed, English views are an unsafe guide on the best means of preserving the faith in Ireland; nor can the favourable verdict of English opinion on an Irish ecclesiastic, afford him the slightest security before that great bar where the long accounts between both kingdoms shall be settled for ever.

As Lord Shrewsbury has defined "that we are a naturally vindictive people," it may not be out of place to protest, that if the instruction of the ignorant be not an act of revenge, we are not guilty of the crime. Against Lord Shrewsbury, personally, we can have no national antipathy, because he is Earl of Wexford and Waterford, and derives both titles from a grand-daughter of — M'MURROUGH.

NO. III.

CHAP. II. THE SULLIVANS COMMENCE THEIR JOURNEY—TRAVELLING IN IRELAND IN THE LATTER PART OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY—A GLORIOUS DAY, AND A MYSTERIOUS ADVENTURE BY NIGHT.

The father and son set out on their sad and weary journey; the former carrying a quantity of oaten bread and a mug of butter, which Catherine M'Quillan, having hastily tied up in a handkerchief and overtaken them when they were but a short distance from her mother's house, had forced them to accept; and the latter a small bundle of clothes. These, with a few pounds in money, constituted all their worldly wealth; their object was to reach a small town on the sea coast, which was about twenty-eight miles distant. They had lived quite near the sea themselves, but the town towards which they were proceeding was situated on a different part of the coast, and in the direction of Father John's parish, from which it was distant something more than twenty miles. At the time we write of, there were no public conveyances, except from a few of the principal towns to Dublin, and if the journey considerably exceeded thirty miles, even these invariably spent a night on the road, and took two days to accomplish the distance of fifty or sixty miles. The mail was carried to other places by a boy, mounted on some old garron which, being fit for nothing else, was purchased for about the value of the hide and pressed into this service, which it performed at an amazingly slow pace, except when it ran backwards into a ditch, which feat was always executed with great expedition. We scarcely ever knew one of these old horses that was not essentially vicious; some of them would come to a dead halt, and neither whip, nor spur, nor red-hot iron would force them to move an inch until it was their own proper pleasure. Others seemed to consider that they ought to follow their tails instead of their noses, and on this account were perpetually running backwards, and ultimately reached their destination as the snail got to the top of the May-pole, which, whenever it advanced eight feet always came back four. Others, again, amused themselves during the journey by occasionally using only two legs at a time, in effecting which they displayed a degree of agility for which no one would give them credit who did not actually see the performance. Finally, there were many which, as the riders expressed it, were so piously inclined, that they were continually falling on their knees during the journey. We recollect one of these animals, which had just been helped up after a fall, breaking, with a kick, a pipe which a countryman, who was standing a little behind it, was smoking at the time; he retreated for a short distance very precipitately, and then taking out of his mouth the fragment of the shank that remained there, exclaimed, "well you are an evil beast." "Ah!" said the owner, "what splendid hind-legs he has; if the other pair were only half as good he would be worth a mint of money." In consequence of these various peculiarities of their steeds, you might see a philosophic post-boy sitting smoking on a horse which was perfectly motionless and seeming to enjoy the thing exceedingly—or a passionate post-boy belabouring his steed with all his might, and applying to it the most opprobrious epithets; or an unlucky post-boy lying on the road, bags and all, bemoaning his misfortune; or a false, flattering post-boy who strove to persuade the refractory animal that he considered it the very pink of its kind, his compliments being interspersed, however, very liberally with muttered "asides," delivered in an undertone not intended for equine ears, which proved that these were the very opposite of his real sentiments. Thus he would say, in the most soothing tones, "go on my pet—that's a darling;" and then add, sotto voce, "and the devil's own darling you are." But, whether it was that the horse suspected his master's sincerity, or that he overheard the uncomplimentary part of his discourse, or that he despised flattery, it is certain that he was very seldom moved by the endearing epithets which were lavished on him. A clergyman bought one of these animals which had served its apprenticeship to the posting department, and, being a very placid old gentleman, he used to allow it to explore all the lanes and pathways in the country, to stand on the road for a long time at once, to graze by the road-sides, and to drink at every watering place, no matter how numerous they might be. One Sunday morning this horse stopped, and appearing to be in a more than usually meditative mood, his master, taking out his sermon, put on his spectacles and began to read it aloud; the steed, kicking up his heels suddenly, threw the rider into the ditch and broke his spectacles. The clergyman complained to the post-boy from whom he bought the horse, that he was very vicious. "Oh, Sir," he replied, "it must have been a moving discourse, indeed, when Roger could not stand it." But the mail was very commonly carried by persons who rode what they facetiously termed "shank's mare"—that is, their own proper feet. The roads also, with the exception of a few on which coaches ran (and even these were none of the best), were made for the most part over the very tops of the highest hills, and were, in general, so uneven and so narrow that no vehicle with springs could be drawn on them; the cars generally in use were what were called slide-cars, which were of a most primitive construction, consisting of two long shafts, across one end of which were nailed a few coarse boards; they came down hills splendidly, as the ends of the shafts which touched the ground were shod with iron, but to drag them up a hill with any kind of a load was quite impossible. The consequence was, that the manure had to be brought up the hills, and the produce to the market on the backs of the horses. To ride upon slide-cars was of course impossible: a few had cars with log-wheels, on which a quantity of straw being placed, covered over with a clean quilt, their families used to make short journeys, and to endure dreadful joltings without being absolutely shaken to pieces, heaven only knows how; but the general mode of travelling was on horseback—the women riding on pillions behind their fathers, brothers, husbands, or sons. How different are the present times from those when husbands used to write to their wives by the way, if they made a journey from Cork, or Limerick, or Belfast to Dublin, and when they made their wills before going to London! What a revolution has been wrought since then by means of steam in the mode of travelling by sea and land! We can go from Dublin to Paris now in as short a time, and with less fatigue, than we could then go to Cork. New York is almost as near us now as London was at the period of slide-cars and pillions. Vast advances have been made in science; the intercourse amongst nations has been increased a hundred-fold, and every facility of seeing the world is afforded to those who have the means. But the physical comforts of the poor have not been increased—but have greatly diminished since the "good old times." We speak not of the penal laws, which cruelly oppressed the Catholics, nor of instances of religious persecution which were even then too common, nor of the consequent ruin and misery which famine and disease inflicted on a particular district, but we speak of the state of the poor generally as it was then—and as it is now. The people then had, in general, food and clothes, and their food did not consist of "potatoes and d—n all," as a peasant pithily described his diet some time ago; on the contrary, they had bread and milk, and meal and bacon, or flesh meat of one kind or another; they had even a few shillings in their pockets to spend with a friend. Now they cannot even get the potato, or as much food as will keep them alive. What is the cause of this lamentable change? We unhesitatingly answer that it is LAND-LORDISM. The prices for grain were, on the average, a great deal higher then than they are now, and the land which was then let at ten shillings per Irish acre now pays two guineas.

There was no public conveyance from the village which the Sullivans left to the place of their destination, and of course they were obliged to make the journey on foot. At first they would undoubtedly have attempted, in every hypothesis, to travel in this way, but, as will presently be seen, circumstances would have forced them to avail themselves of a public vehicle, if such a thing had been possible. The affectionate eye of the old man quickly perceived that his son was ill, and he said to him, "John, dear, I fear you are unwell?" "Oh!" he replied, "it does not signify; my head is aching a little in consequence of the trouble that's come on us, but plase God it will soon go away." "Let me carry that bundle," said the father, "or maybe you wish to sit down for a little while until you get better?" He caught the old man's hand, and gently pressing it, answered, "no, no, we must leave this unhappy place and this miserable country altogether; I could not bear to remain here since the death of my darling mother, and, besides, the M'Quillans would force us to go back to their house. I could not endure to be supported by her whom I once hoped to have supported; and, besides, it would be a crying shame for a man who is able to work to eat the meat of idleness and beggary."

It was a glorious day, that on which they commenced their sad and weary journey, and the sun shone in the blue, unclouded sky, like a monarch who had gone forth to survey and to gladden with his glorious smile the vast realms over which he reigned. The narrow road along which they were travelling soon led them to the top of a considerable hill, from which they had a prospect of a large tract of fertile land, which was everywhere covered with rich corn that gave promise of an abundant harvest. The only unsightly object in the landscape was the village which they had just left, where the deserted farm-houses, the roofs of which had been torn away, or had fallen in of themselves, displaying the blackened and solitary walls of the interior, told how the heartless cruelty of man can mar the bountiful blessings of Heaven. They turned away from the sickening sight, and descending the opposite side of the hill it was lost to their view for ever. It was some time before the sad thoughts engendered by this painful sight allowed them to attend to the cheerfulness and beauty which everywhere surrounded them; the birds were singing in every tree and shrub, and the joyful note of the cuckoo and the deep melody of the dove were heard in the distance. The sides of the narrow road were adorned with the violet, the shamrock, and the daisy; and the wild rose, the honeysuckle, and the hawthorn covered the hedges with their beautiful flowers and filled the air with their rich perfumes. All, too, was instinct with life, from man down to the insect which eludes even the power of the microscope. The cattle were grazing on the rich pastures, the birds were serenading their mates, the bee and the butterfly were hanging on the flowers, the ant was busy on the earth, the air was full of humming insects, large balls of which kept up with the travellers, performing at the same time, to their own music, most wonderful evolutions—sometimes moving on in a tall and stately pyramid, and in an instant forming themselves into a globe, through which and around which they danced in such fantastic figures as would have puzzled Archimides himself. Besides these there were living things gambolling in the pure water—every leaf and every flower was a densely inhabited Lilliputian empire, and the gaudy sunbeam was a world in whose bright light countless nations and tribes of beings lived and died, and filled up the cycle of their years in a single hour. John Sullivan, the deep religious feelings of whose mind had been called forth by his sufferings, took the old man's hand, and said—"Dear father, I have been thinking how happy my darling mother must be with God; for how beautiful and powerful and good must He be who covers the fields and the trees with such beauty, and knows the proper food for every one of the infinite multitude of creatures which exist, and supplies them all every day! We are poor wanderers, it is true, but if we put our trust in Him, He will not desert us." The old man returned the pressure of his son's hand as he replied, "I, too, have been thinking of your mother; and that is not strange, for she was my guardian angel through life, and I know she still continues to be so in heaven. But your hand is burning hot and what would become of me if you, too, were taken from me? Oh! John, it would be worse than death that would part you and me." "No, father dear," said John, "I will not leave you; but you are now the only link which binds me to life; and, if that were broken, I would wish, if it were God's holy will, to be taken out of this world."

They had now travelled many hours without stopping, and, being wearied, they sat down under the shade of a large tree, past which there murmured a stream of bright water. The old man opened the little parcel which Catherine Sullivan had put into his hand—whilst the big tears coursed down her beautiful cheeks—and took out the sweet oaten-cake and the pure white butter. He commenced eating, himself, chiefly with the view of inducing his son to do the same. But all his efforts proved unavailing, for the young man only drank copiously, and bathed his face and hands in the water, after which they resumed their journey. When it was late in the evening they arrived at a small farmer's house, and the old man went to the door and rapped, for it was already closed and the family were about retiring to bed. The principal door was opened, but there still remained a half door, as was usual at that time, which served the double purpose of keeping in the children and keeping out the pigs. "God save all here," said the old man, leaning over the half door; "and you, likewise," the mistress of the house replied—"wont you come in?" "No, I thank you," said he, "but my son and I are travelling, and we would wish to know if we might sleep all night in the barn, on a lock of clean straw?" "'Deed and you may, and welcome," she answered; but sure there's room enough for you in the house, an' we'll soon make up a bed for you in the kitchen." "Oh, thank you," said he, "we would rather go to the barn." "But," she replied, after she had examined him a little more closely, "you must come into the house, and the young man, too, for it's seldom we're without givin' shelter to some creature who needs a roof to cover him, glory be to God, and there's room enough the night, for there's no body here before you." What this good woman said was perfectly true of herself and of the whole class to which she belonged. The small farmers, especially, never refused the shelter of their roof to those who had no home, because it was *sonsy to have them in the house, nor did they hesitate to divide their "meal's meat" with them; because, as they said, "no one was ever poorer for what he gave in charity." Even idiots and mad people—who had not then any other asylums—were fearlessly and unscrupulously lodged in the same manner. Sometimes, indeed, it became necessary to send them to the barn, either because they were dangerous or because they disturbed the family during the night. A case of this kind had lately occurred at Billy M'Loughlin's, for such is the name of the farmer to whose house we have just introduced the reader. An idiot, whose name was Dick Savage, used to sleep frequently in this house. He was generally placid enough, but very violent when excited. He entertained a mortal antipathy to dogs and women, for whose especial benefit he carried a huge pole with an iron spike in the end of it.

Old M'Loughlin used to take great delight in sitting by the kitchen fire, talking with Dick, after the rest of the family had retired to rest. One night, as they were seated as usual, Dick in front of the fire, and the old man in the chimney corner, one of the young urchins got up out of bed, bent upon mischief, and the door of the room in which he slept being open, and directly behind Dick, he hit him on the back of the head with a small potato. From the position in which they sat, it would have been physically impossible for old M'Loughlin to have committed the assault, but Dick seeing nobody else near, instantly set him down for the culprit, and crying out, "bad luck to you, for an old rascal, are you goin' to murder me!" seized the stool upon which he was sitting, and hurled it at the old man. The latter making a sudden inclination to elude the missile, lost his centre of gravity and fell on his back on the floor, where he was obliged to defend himself with his legs against Dick, who had renewed the attack more systematically, crying out at every new charge, "bad luck to you, for an old villain, but I'll make hawk's meat of you." The noise soon attracted the whole family to the scene of action, except the young mischief-maker, who feigned to be fast asleep during the whole of the uproar. No other person had the least suspicion of the real cause of the idiot's violence, and Dick himself had no other idea of the matter than that M'Loughlin had intended to murder him. Of course the young villain, who was at the bottom of the whole mischief, kept his own counsel. No one in the family would have been more deeply grieved if his father had sustained any real mischief; nor did he, for he was rescued before Dick made any progress in his benevolent design of reducing him to a proper state for hawks to feed on! He was, however, terribly frightened; "an'," said he, "amn't I as bad as Dick himself, to be sittin' up alone wid-a madman, not knowin' the minit the fit might come on him to murder me." The result of this scene was, that Dick was sentenced to sleep in the barn, and this was the reason why Mrs. M'Loughlin did not insist on Sullivan's entering the house until she had satisfied herself that he was "compos mentis." When, however, she made up her mind on this point, she peremptorily insisted that he and his son should stop in the house. She lit a rush-light after they had entered, and then went to her husband, who was in bed, and whispered to him that two decent men had come to the house seeking a night's lodging, and that she thought the young one looked sickly, and "maybe the crathers were hungry and needed a bit of supper." Her kind husband encouraged her to get them something to eat at once, and added, that he would put on his clothes and be down with them immediately. When she returned to the kitchen, she asked them if she would make some stir-about for their supper, which she said she could do instantly. But they declined, showing what still remained of the provisions which they had with them. "Well, then," said she, "you must take a posset, and I won't be refused. Anne," she continued, addressing a handsome young girl who had modestly stood back at the dresser ever since the strangers had entered, "get some milk and make a nice posset for this dacent man an' the poor boy, who does not appear to be quite well, and I'll get their bed ready." The posset was excellent, and the young man being parched with thirst, gratefully accepted it from the fair hands of Anne M'Loughlin. They were sixteen miles from home, and being entire strangers to the family by which they were treated so hospitably, they did not think it necessary to tell their names or their history, and old M'Loughlin who had got up to welcome them, perceiving their weariness, insisted on their going to bed.

The young man could not sleep, for he was racked by a burning headache and unquenchable thirst.—There was no moonlight, but still it was not dark, for the bright stars—the sentinels of the night—were shedding their dim mysterious light upon the earth. He was thinking of his mother, and wondering if the spirits of the dead ever returned to visit those whom they loved upon earth, when he distinctly saw a tall figure all dressed in white, standing between him and the window, and beckoning to him as if it wished him to rise and follow it. He was as brave where flesh and blood was concerned as any man could be—he even thought that he would have been glad that the spirit of his mother had appeared to him, as there were many things which he regretted not having asked her before she died, and many more which he would wish to ask her now, concerning her present state. He actually strove to rise, but whether it was owing to bodily weakness, or to the presence of a supernatural being, he could not move, and the very hair stood on his head with horror. The apparition came nearer—nearer—nearer still, beckoning him to rise, until it fairly leant over him. He could not see the features, but he heard it sobbing, and he felt the hot tears fall upon his face. Gracious Heaven, could his mother be in suffering! But, no; that was impossible. At length the apparition addressed him by his name—"John, will you not come with me. Indeed; I want to speak to you; and am I not your wedded wife? You will not come with me?" she added, after a pause. "Then, God forgive and bless you, for my heart is broken. There, I return you the only token of yours that I possess—it is that which you gave me on our wedding day." So saying, she laid a handkerchief on his pillow, and immediately disappeared. This could not be his mother, for the voice was not the same, and she called him by his name, which was different from his father's, and said he was her husband—yet he never was married. It must be all a delirious dream; but no, for there was the handkerchief beside him. He knew he could not sleep—he was too ill and excited for that; and, oh, how he longed for morning! He did not wish to disturb the old man who was sleeping soundly, although that night appeared to him an entire lifetime. At length morning came, and at the earliest dawn the blackbird began to whistle and the cock to crow; then some labourer, who had to travel a considerable distance to his daily toil, passed by, beguiling the way with a merry tune. In a little time the lowing of the kine was heard in the distance; the early milkmaid tripped past to ease them of their fragrant burthen; the purple light streamed in through the narrow window, and it was broad day. It was only then, and when he heard the inmates of the cottage preparing themselves for the toil of a new day, that he ventured to touch the mysterious handkerchief, though his eyes had been revitted on it since the earliest dawn. It was a white silk handkerchief, adorned with the most exquisitely executed flowers, and in one corner of it was written, with some red substance, and in elegant characters, the single word JOHN. He hastily put it aside, and then rousing the old man, who still slept, he endeavoured to get up and prepare for his journey. He was unable to do so, however, until he was assisted by his father. He persevered, notwithstanding, in dressing himself, although he felt extremely weak and ill, for he knew that the family only awaited his rising to come to the kitchen. When they saw how unwell he was, they pressed him earnestly to occupy one of the beds in the house, but he resolutely refused. They could not, however, prevail on the family to allow them to resume their journey until they had partaken of the breakfast, which was quickly prepared by the young girl we have previously mentioned. The travellers could not help being struck by her appearance. She was about nineteen years of age, tall, and exquisitely formed. But her face was deadly pale, and her whole appearance betrayed the deepest melancholy and dejection. She seldom spoke, but when she did, her voice was low and musical, and she seemed to be treated with tenderness, if not with pity, even by the youngest person in the house. The breakfast consisted of flummery and new milk, of which healthful meal every one partook heartily, but the young girl and John Sullivan. She, indeed, took a little, but he was obliged to desist, after a vain effort to swallow the first spoonfull, and to content himself with drinking a great deal. As soon as the meal was finished, the travellers took their leave and set out on their journey. They had gone but a short distance, when they saw the girl following them. "I beg your pardon," said she, "but I dropped a handkerchief somewhere, and I cannot find it. I thought, perhaps, it might have fallen near your bed, and that you might have tied it up amongst your clothes by mistake." The old man was about to deny all knowledge of it, when his son stopped him, and admitted that he had a handkerchief which was not his own, but that he came by it in so extraordinary a way, that he must get some particular mark before he would part with it. "It is," said she, "a white silk handkerchief, flowered, and John is written in one of the corners." He took her a little aside, and, drawing it from his breast, gave it to her. "You do not suspect me," he said, "of having intended to steal this handkerchief." "Oh, no, no!" she hastily replied, "but do not think badly of me on account of what happened last night." He was about to question her, but she hastily gave him her hand, and returned to the house.

The Caliph, the Learned Doctors, AND THE Old Man.

AN ARABIAN TALE.

THE celebrated Caliph, Abbasside Haroun el-Rachyd, was one day seated in his flowery cupola, and beside him was the illustrious Abou-Abdallah Malek el-Medeny, the doctor Abou Sayd el-Asmay, and Faddel ben-Yahya, the foster-brother and favourite of the prince. The conversation had ceased, and some time elapsed ere the silence was broken.

At length, the caliph arousing himself from this species of torpor, addressed them in the following words.

"Tell me," said he, "something which will not only be pleasing, but will be useful to me, and he who fulfils to my liking these two conditions, shall receive as a recompense one thousand dynars."*

Abou-Sayd having bowed respectfully before the caliph, commenced in these words: "Prince of true believers, may happiness accompany, cheer, and lengthen your glorious reign!"

"Abdallah ben-Mokannah has told me that he had read in the ancient Persian historians, that Kayoumarath and the dynasty of the Pichdadiens, of which he was the illustrious founder, owe their pre-eminence over all the contemporaneous princes, to ten rules of conduct which they scrupulously practised.

"The first was never to give their daughters in marriage to a foreign prince.

"The second, to make it a rule always to marry foreign princesses themselves.

"The third, to admit all to their table, but to be careful not to partake of the hospitality of others themselves.

"The fourth, never to take the advice of one who tenders it as an obligation.

"The fifth, to keep their word strictly, and never break a promise when once made.

"The sixth, to restore in gratification to their vassals the annual tribute which their subjects are obliged to pay them.

"The seventh, to give less time to leisure than to occupation.

"The eighth, although their religion permits the use of wine, never to drink sufficient to unsettle their reason.

"The ninth, never to punish an offence until the anger caused by it had passed away.

"The tenth and last, to fly the society of the ignorant, and take pleasure alone in that of the learned and the philosopher."

The caliph did not testify the least admiration or pleasure when this narration was terminated; and believing that he saw in it an allusion to his kindness for Malek, Faddel, and Abou-Sayd himself, he was silent, and ordered not the promised reward to be given.

A short time after he made a sign to Faddel, who, hoping to be more successful, began in his turn his narration: "Great Prince," said he, "the learned historians who have compared together the characters of the ancient kings of Persia, and the progress of their respective governments, have drawn therefrom the following remarks:

"In the first dynasty, that of the Pichdadians, Giam-schid, who was the fourth king, regarded an advanced age as the greatest title to honours and to public functions. Under his reign the old men were decorated with the most brilliant distinctions.

"Under his second successor, Afridoun, favour was attached not to great age, but to long services; and the older a man grew in a particular employment, the more sure was he of rising to an eminent post.

"Manougeher, successor and descendant of Afridoun, alone protected and watched over the nobility, and the illustrious descendants of an ancient race. A noble without merit could rise to the highest honours under his government.

"The system changed under the Kaynaides. Kay-Kaous, son of Kay-Kobad, and second king of this second dynasty, only patronized wit, judgment, and science. With him knowledge and learning were the indispensable titles to promotion.

"Under Kay-Khosrou, successor to Kay-Kaous, the palm was given to courage and daring in military exploits.

"Lohorasp, fourth prince of the same dynasty, and Kuschasp, his son, only sought in their turn for honesty and integrity. Their reign was that of the virtuous.

"Finally, Khosrou-Anouchirvan, son of Kobad, nineteenth prince of Sassanide, was the greatest monarch of this dynasty. Elected to the throne, he enacted that all these different qualities should be united. His favours were measured according to the degree in which these virtues were possessed. Wealth was the only title which obtained no honour from him."

Faddel had finished, and the caliph manifested as little satisfaction now as before. After a short silence, turning towards Malek, the caliph said, "'Tis now your turn, try if you can succeed."

Malek bowed respectfully, and commenced:

"Prince," said he, "they say that the caliph Abon-Giafar al-Mansour, towards the end of his life, finding himself one day amongst the most intimate members of his council, asked them if they saw any vice or essential fault in his son, Al-Mahady, whom he had declared the inheritor of his throne. They replied that they had not observed any, except that of not having gained the love of his future subjects.

"This declaration, which was unanimous, induced the most profound reflection in the caliph. The very next day he began the most iniquitous proceedings against his subjects, unjustly confiscating the property of one, and violently taking possession of the goods of another, without alledging any other motive than that of his tyrannical will. Having made out titles to all these immense properties, he presented them to his son, saying, 'I am terminating my days, after my death, as soon as you have succeeded me upon the throne, revoke all the acts by which I have so much displeased my subjects, destroy the deeds of property which I have assigned to you, and restore to the owners the wealth of which I have despoiled them, upon the condition that they will forgive me, and that they will pray that God will pardon me also.

"The caliph died. Al-Mahady executed the orders of his father. The first use which he made of his authority was to restore the property to those from whom the pretended tyranny of his father had wrenched it.

* Thousand dynars, or pieces of gold, is equal to about £560 of our money.

They joyfully pardoned Al-Mansour—they prayed for him, and Al-Mahady obtained in a moment the love of all his new subjects."

The caliph appeared still less satisfied with this recital than with the preceding. Al-Mahady and Al-Mansour, who had performed more prominent than reputable characters in this recital, were closely related to himself, one being his father and the other his grandfather; and the doctor had forgotten that the truth ought to be concealed or discovered according to the feelings or affinity of the listener.

Haroun, desirous of dissipating the ideas which this discourse had given birth to in his mind, conceived the surest mode of distraction was the chase, and Faddel accompanied him there.

The hunt had lasted some time, when the caliph found himself, owing to the superior speed of his horse, separated from the train that had accompanied him. Faddel alone remained near him. They stopped their horses and endeavoured to retrace their route.

After having vainly tried for some time to recognise the place in which they found themselves, they perceived in the distance an old man, who appeared busily employed in cultivating a field, and spurring their horses they directed their steps towards him.

The old man had a most venerable countenance, his beard and eyebrows were blanched with time, and his whole appearance denoted a very advanced age. He was occupied in sowing walnuts in his field. Haroun stopped his horse, admired for some time the laborious care which the old man gave to his plantation, and approaching him said—"My good old man, how many years have you already lived?"

"Four years only," replied the old man.

Faddel could not prevent himself from seriously reprimanding the old man. "Do you not see," said he to him, "that you are speaking to the Sovereign Emperor of the Faithful, to the successor of the apostle of God, to the upholder of Mahometanism, to the Sacred Pontiff of the true religion? How dare you, then, give utterance to so impudent a falsehood?"

"I do not tell a falsehood," said the old man; "I speak the truth."

"Nobody," continued he, "can doubtless disown that a good Mussulman ought not to call life the time which has passed away under the government of the heretical dynasty and usurpation of the Omniades. Under the fortunate reign of Abou-el Abbas Saffah, founder of the glorious dynasty of the Abbassides, now upon the throne, the cruel wars between the Mussulmen which had entirely occupied this unhappy period, never permitted a person, even for a single instant to breathe in peace, for, around and about, blood was flowing in torrents. Misfortune and terror reigned in all places, the fear which all had, of a fate almost certain, made their existence an anticipated death.

"I cannot, then count but four years of actual existence—that is to say, two years under the Caliph Al Mahady, your illustrious father, and two more years under the reign of your sublime Majesty, upon whom may God pour his benedictions and immortalize his empire."

This explanation pleased Haroun considerably. His followers now rejoined him, and he ordered his grand treasurer to pay the old man a thousand pieces of gold. "But," added he, "how is it, my good old man, that you take so much trouble, at your age, to cultivate this field, and to sow in it these walnuts, which cannot be useful or bear until they become large trees. It is difficult to believe that you could ever gather the fruit from them?"

"Prince of believers," replied the old man, "the trees, the fruits of which have nourished me, were planted by those who have gone before me, and those which I plant now will nourish those who will come after me."

The caliph, more satisfied still with this reply than with the previous one, ordered the treasurer to give a thousand more pieces to the old man.

The old man said, "trees of this description do not ordinarily yield fruit to the cultivator until twenty years after having been sown, no matter how favourable the temperature may be or how invigoratingly the fertilising sun may beam upon them. But I, on the contrary, who have but sowed to-day, here, even to-day, thanks to the sun of the benevolence of our illustrious caliph, whom may God protect, have already called forth more fruits than their harvest will ever produce."

Haroun ordered that the old man should receive again another thousand pieces of gold, and turning towards Faddel, he said to him, "let us away, for if I remain here conversing with this old man I will sooner exhaust my treasures than in listening to you Faddel, or Asmay, or Malek, or all the other doctors that may be found in my far-famed city of Bagdad."

Life and Labours of a Catholic Curate.

ON BEING EXAMINED FOR MAYNOOTH—IS SUCCESSFUL.

His brother John then related the circumstances as they occurred, and his father, turning to Owen, calmly, but affectionately, observed—"Now, Owen, you see, after all, how little a man gains by bein' rash or givin' way to passion. I know, indeed, it's not often you do it—but still you do of an odd time. You wor wrong to intherfere at all in this business—all we expect you to do is to mind your books, and take no part in the affairs of the house or farm. I know you do mind your books, but still, I say, you wor wrong here. Now, if you had only waited till I'd come home, and asked me whether what Tom said was true or not, I could tell you that the boy said nothing but the truth—that I did ordher him to mend the gap, but afterwards tould him not to mend it yestherday, but to bring the hollow-back mare in to Jem M'Quade's, and get her shod; so you see, after all, the boy was right."

Owen was about to vindicate himself, and place the assault upon Tracy to its right account, but, on reflecting that such a step would seem like a justification, he overmastered his inclination to do so, and was silent. In about an hour afterwards, however, he went out to the barn where Tracy was, and approaching him, said—"Tommy, I am sorry for my conduct to you this day. I ask your pardon—forgive me."

"Troth an' I won't," replied the good-natured young man—"the sorra forgive I'll forgive you this time."

"Why, Tommy?" asked the other, a good deal surprised.

"Why, faith, for the best raison in life—the divil a thing I have to forgive you for. Do you think, Mr. Owen, that I'd remember sich a hasty blow as that?"

or that I'd harbour ill will in my heart about it—an' especially to you."

"But it would gratify me, and ease my mind, if you said 'I forgive you.'"

"Well, then, if it would, and that you're frettin' about it, I will. God sees my heart, then I do forgive you, from the very bottom of it."

On that evening, when his mother returned from the market, he related the circumstances to her, expressing deep sorrow, not simply for that individual act of violence, but for the fact that his heart was yet so far from being purified from the dross of human passion and frailty. "But mother," he added, "there is one thing I have made my mind up to, with the aid of God's grace and support."

"What is it, Owen?" she asked, mildly.

"From this forward," he replied, "I will become a monthly communicant; for, mother, I see now that I stand in need of more discipline and spiritual support to make me what I ought to be, and what I hope I shall be."

"Well, dear," she replied, "I have no doubt but the Lord will assist you; but, then, Owen, you must be in earnest, as I hope and believe you are. There's a great many, I'm afeard in this world that impose even upon themselves—that take, one would think, all the outward manes of reachin' a state of grace, yet don't, after all, find out that they're not in airnest; but, however one may impose on themselves, there's no cheatin' God; on this account, then, my dear Owen, be sure to look closely into your own heart to satisfy yourself, above all things, that you are in earnest."

From this time forward he exercised a constant vigilance upon his own temper; for the truth is, that the sudden outbreak manifested towards Tracy filled him with serious alarm, lest he might, if subjected to anything like strong provocation or opposition, relapse into fits of similar excitement.

The progress which he made under his new master was rapid and satisfactory. On thinking over his mother's excellent advice, he came to a very admirable conclusion, and one which is almost self-evident—to wit, that what is good for one purpose is generally good for others. To be in earnest, for instance, was good for reformation of character, but it was also necessary in his studies, or whatever good or useful end he proposed. He accordingly devoted himself, with his whole undivided energies, to the course of education, which he knew lay before him. Nor did he deem this sufficient. He not only read with unusual application himself, but, in addition to this, he rendered every assistance in his power to such of his school-fellows as asked or stood in need of it. The consequence was that he became exceedingly popular and was beloved by all who knew him.

This, however, was not extraordinary. It was impossible to come in contact with him and not feel the influence of his conversation and manners acting favourably and agreeably upon you. The pride which we have before alluded to, and which resulted perhaps as much from his position as a kind of political and religious champion for his party, under Shannon, as from his natural disposition, had now altogether disappeared, and was replaced by a frank, unaffected deportment, that was as free from arrogance or pedantry, on the one hand, as it was from sheepishness or servility upon the other.

Among other qualities possessed by O'Donovan, was an excellent voice and a good ear for music. This caused him to make a suggestion to Father O'Brien, which was ultimately productive of much good in the parish. The suggestion we speak of was to establish a choir, so as that the worship of God might be accompanied by vocal music. With some difficulty a singing-master was induced to come to the parish, where, in a short time, he soon had a very flourishing school, in which Owen O'Donovan was one of the first and most promising pupils.

We believe we may safely assert that the period from seventeen, to that at which a young man enters college, is, beyond comparison, the most dangerous and important of his whole existence—at least we have his own authority for coming to this conclusion.

In a letter, written to a young friend of his, many years after he had entered upon the duties of his mission, he alludes to this very topic; and, as his observations are more forcible and striking than any we ourselves are capable of making upon it, we can have no hesitation whatsoever in placing an extract of it before our readers.

"I have always been of opinion," he proceeds, "that the period of life which extends from the sixteenth year to that in which the candidate for the priesthood commences his college studies, is by far the most dangerous, because it is the most difficult to pass through with the proper dispositions. It is, in point of fact, during that period that the young and newly-awakened passions possess the greatest ascendancy over our reason, the latter faculty not being yet sufficiently developed to aid in making the former subject to the law and will of God. The fascinations of pleasure are then most seductive, and the power of resisting its temptations are unquestionably at their weakest. If there be one thing beyond another within such a person's ability that can exclude the allurements peculiar to that season of life, it is the forming such habits of application and study as may completely fill up his time and leave him as little leisure or idleness as possible. By keeping the mind properly occupied you save it from much danger and temptation, and form it, besides, to such habits of industry and the acquisition of such knowledge, as may give it a satisfaction in the enjoyment of pleasures that are intellectual and legitimate. Early industry—assiduous and unabated—is one of the most promising indications of future usefulness. Whenever I see it in any young man designed for the priesthood, I generally take it for granted that it is accompanied by other virtues; but when I perceive idleness, negligence, and indifference to the proper occupation of time, I entertain great fears of that individual's fitness for the Church."

It is unnecessary for us to add anything to such self-evident truths as these, unless it be to say that his own early life was a striking and satisfactory comment upon them. As a proof that he had made these principles the rule of his whole conduct, we cannot omit stating here that he was by no means satisfied with such acquirements only as were considered sufficient for his fitness to enter Maynooth. So long as he had one half hour of unoccupied time upon his hands, so certain was he to devote it to something that might prove ultimately beneficial to him. An extensive acquaintance with mathematics, for instance, was no part of the course required for his entrance—yet, as he felt that he could devote a portion of his time to other branches than the classics, he commenced to read mathematics, for which he entertained a strong predilection. These he read under a hedge schoolmaster, who, possessing a high natural genius for the sciences, was gifted with a surprising knowledge of them; in this resembling a great number of that negligent and unfortunate class, many of whom, under proper training and encouragement, might have become distinguished men.

He had now reached his nineteenth year, and, as was evident to his parish priest and curate, might be pronounced perfectly well qualified for Maynooth. They had examined him three or four times, within the last two years—in fact, examined him until both of them declined the task altogether. His acquirements at this period, though far beyond those of young men designed for similar objects, yet were only such as every person possessing the same opportunities, may easily master. His knowledge, for instance, was not confined to either Latin, Greek, Irish, or Mathematics; on the contrary, he was well acquainted with Belles Lettres and the current literature of the day, having watched pretty closely the progress of scientific and mechanical discovery. He had sense enough, even then, to perceive, that a priest who knows nothing but the mere theology of the schools, can be acquainted with only half of what he ought to know. A knowledge of human nature, character, and the hidden springs that move the actions of men, constitutes that essential portion of his duty, which can be derived only from an acquaintance with works in which the motives and impulses of mankind can be traced and laid open to observation. No one will say that a clergyman, ignorant of these important principles of human life, can be perfectly adequate to discharge the various difficult duties involving the consequences of passion and the influences of the world in all their shapes and disguises as they fall within the sphere of his mission.

At length he felt satisfied with the progress he had made, and with the thorough knowledge he had acquired, not merely of all that was comprised in his necessary academic course, but in the still more extended one which he had marked out for himself. Fortunately enough, there happened to be two vacancies in Maynooth for the diocese to which he belonged, and, as there were a good number of candidates ready, and many of them well qualified to claim them, it was felt that the contest at the usual examination would be one of more than ordinary interest. Father O'Brien got intimation of the day appointed for this rather trying ordeal to the young men prepared for it, and lost no time in transmitting the communication to O'Donovan.

These events are not without their own influence on the hopes, and fears, and feelings of those who are interested, either directly or indirectly in them. It is true the subject of our memoir had the reputation of being admirably qualified for entrance, and, consequently, for ably sustaining any examination to which he might be subjected. But, notwithstanding this, it was impossible for his friends to divest themselves of the concern and apprehensions which the approaching contest rendered so natural. The boy himself felt confident without being presumptuous, and only smiled at the idea of being rejected.

"Wouldn't you feel very much cast down at being set aside by the bishop?" asked his father.

"Somewhat disappointed I would feel," he replied, "but I could console myself by reflecting that a person still better qualified had got the place."

the father, "have you dependence in your own knowledge now?"

"I think," he said, "that I have as good a chance as most of them—I have read the College course well and thoroughly—but I have not at all confined myself to that—I have read a much more comprehensive course, and I have a good deal of confidence in my success."

"I feel," said his mother, "that you will succeed, beaise you laboured for it so well and with such perseverance."

"But even if I don't, mother, I hope I'll bear the disappointment without murmuring or repining."

"We must all learn to bear it, Owen," she replied, "beaise it's our duty to do so—but what matter, dear? sure if you fail now I hope you'll succeed another time—we can't have everything according to our own way and wish."

It is unnecessary to detail the nature and character of the examination. Many a sheepish face and palpitating heart were there, and many, on the contrary, who even then gave indisputable proofs of manly bearing and intellectual vigour. The contest, in this instance, was both severe and protracted, but it is due to Owen O'Donovan to say, that in quickness and comprehensiveness of intellect, in independence yet modesty of manner, and in a masterly and mature knowledge of the business before them, he was, unquestionably, facile princeps. Both his mother's presentiment and his own unassuming confidence in his success were verified, and he experienced the pure and reasonable gratification of being able, with his own lips, to communicate to his family the gratifying result of his examination. By this result he was entitled to a vacancy upon the free foundation, in point of merit, whilst the other successful candidate was obliged to pay a portion of the expenses that were necessary to support himself, having only the privilege of participating, to a limited extent, in the advantages of the foundation.

Owen, having been made acquainted with these circumstances, and knowing that the other young man was the son of struggling parents, who were burthened with the support of a large family, spoke to his father as follows:

"Father," said he, "we have all a right to feel grateful to God for the measure of prosperity that has, for several years, attended our exertions. You are not merely an independent man, but, as the world goes, a wealthy one; now, that's more than we can say of Terence Boylan, whose son and I have succeeded in the examination a few days ago—I, in consequence of merit, am entitled to live free in Maynooth, whilst that fine young man, who is hardly able to do it, must pay an annual sum for his support."

"Well, Owen," said his father, "and what do you propose to do? how can you remedy that?"

"Why," replied the generous boy, "by asking the Bishop's sanction to exchange with him—that is if you and my mother will allow me—you are able to support me in Maynooth, and it would gratify me very much to give him the free place."

The father and mother, neither of whom was insensible to generous emotions, were both touched at this benevolent proposal, and, so far as they were concerned, at once consented to his wishes.

Evenings with the Poets.

NO. I.—THOMAS HOOD.

O Musa, tu, che di caduchi allori
Non circondi la fronte in Elicona,
Ma su nel cielo infra i beati cori
Hai di stelle immortali aurea corona.

WHAT a beautiful picture Tasso has given, in these lines, of the muse crowned with a diadem of immortal stars. It is not, however, equal to the glorious passage in which Shakspeare describes not the allegorical muse, but the true poet himself, in the "Midsummer Night's Dream :—"

"The poet's eye, in a fine phrenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven ;
And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shape, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."

We have ever loved poets, poetry, and music, and we shall ever continue to do so, because they sweeten the ills of human life, and, when they are not desecrated, promote happiness and virtue. They beguile the weary hours of solitude or of sickness, they promote the domestic virtues and the family affections, and afford a rational means of spending that time, which, but for them, would be devoted to the tavern, to drunkenness, and dissipation. It must be acknowledged that a taste for reading of this kind—and, indeed, the same may be said of all literary subjects—is by no means so general in this country as could be desired. With not very numerous exceptions, reading amongst all classes is almost exclusively confined to politics. We do not blame this, except for its exclusiveness; but, on the contrary, believe it to be the natural result of the past and present state of the country—but excess is bad in this as in everything else. By accustoming ourselves to political reading alone, we gradually and insensibly view everything through the narrow and contracted medium of party; in effect we degenerate into mere partizans, and adopt all the exaggerated views which are put forward in the newspapers, concerning the righteousness of our own opinions and the iniquity of all who oppose them. Our adversaries, naturally reciprocate these feelings—we mutually misunderstand and mistrust each other—a matter of no importance in itself is made the cause of heart-burnings and dissensions. We become more anxious to triumph over our natural friends than over our common enemy; and, whilst we are tearing each other's eyes out about "goat's hair," the people are dying of hunger and the country is ruined. Has not this been the cause of Ireland's misery for so many centuries that we are ashamed to name them? To this every one answers "yes; but why dont the other party do what is right? why dont they agree with me?" Ah! there is no madness greater, nor, alas! more incurable, than the madness of faction. And what renders the matter still more deplorable is, that persons who hound on honest men to vilify and abuse each other, are often mere traffickers in evil passions—who lie by wholesale to serve their own base ends and care not one farthing for either side. Even honest men look with a more lenient eye on a misrepresentation or a falsehood which serves the cause, which they sincerely believe to be the true one, and this is, perhaps, the worst of the demoralizing effects which are inflicted on the country. We do believe that, if literary reading became more general—if Irish history and the lives of those Irishmen who, both at home and from foreign lands, have shed an undying lustre on their country were studied, the crying evils which we have mentioned and the existence of which are universally admitted and deplored, would be in a great measure remedied. Such pursuits would enlarge our views, make us entertain strong doubts of our own infallibility, and, above all things, teach us that union, toleration, and truth, are absolutely necessary for the salvation of the country.

A taste for literature must be created by turning the attention to subjects of the kind, but it is a treasure, which when once acquired, will be esteemed so highly, it will be found to be an inexhaustible source of such pure and rational enjoyment, that, to use the words of Gibbon, we "would not exchange it for the riches of India." We know an excellent and intelligent gentleman, who, because he could not induce himself to read anything but a newspaper, was reduced to the sad necessity of going through the entire of the General Advertiser three times successively, although there were several interesting and amusing books on the table at which he sat. We have heard, indeed, that he read the gilded letters on the back of the "Pickwick Papers," of Shakspeare, and of some other volumes; he is said to have even opened a few—this is, however, a disputed point, but he certainly did not read one word of them, although he was obliged to remain alone in the place for nearly five hours. There is not a virtue in the inward world of the mind—there is not a tender thought of mercy or of charity, that does not appear more bright and loveable when it is adorned by the hands of true genius, nor is there anything so beautiful in all external nature, that it does not impart to it a brighter radiance and a more witching charm. As an example of the latter, take the following brief description from the "Merchant of Venice," of objects with which we are all familiar, and see how many new beauties are presented to the mind:

"How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!
Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears; soft stillness, and the night,
Becomes the touches of sweet harmony.
Sit, Jessica: look, how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold;
There's not the smallest orb, which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still chording to the young-eyed cherubims;
Such harmony is in immortal songs."

No one is so ignorant as to require a proof of the powerful aid which genius, when rightly directed, can lend to the cause of virtue, nor of the efficacy with which it can plead for the poor. It is a precious gift of God, given by Him to promote His glory, and He will require a strict and terrible account from those who desecrate and abuse it. This, as well as other blessings, and even His own holy word, are often used only to blaspheme the giver, and there is no poison more subtle and dangerous, none against which those who would preserve their soul's life should guard more cautiously, than against that which is contained in clever but immoral books. It is arsenic, although it be contained in a golden phial. Thomas Hood was the friend of mercy and of charity, and he pleaded the cause of the poor and of the distressed, with the most affecting eloquence. Mr. Henry Russell has made the song of the shirt familiar to almost every person. There are many other pieces in Hood's two posthumous poetic volumes, expressed in sentiments not less powerful, and whose moral is equally sublime. Take, for instance, the following brief extract, from the "Lay of the Labourer," which feelingly depicts the present condition of our own unhappy country, where, as he feelingly expresses it, the poor ask for work, and not for the workhouse or beggary:

Aye, only give me work,
And then you need not fear
That I shall snare his worship's hare,
Or kill his grace's deer;
Break into his lordship's house
To steal the plate so rich;
Or leave the yeoman who had a purse
To welter in a ditch.

Whenever nature needs—
Whenever nature calls,
No job I'll shirk of the hardest work,
To shun the workhouse walls;
Where savage laws begrudge
The pauper babe its breath,
And doom a wife to a widow's life,
Before her partner's death.

My only claim is this;
With labour stiff and stark,
By lawful turn, my living to earn,
Between the light and dark;
My daily bread, and nightly bed,
My bacon and drop of beer—
But all from the hand that holds the land,
And now from the overseer!

No parish money, or loaf,
No pauper badges for me—
A son of the soil by right of toil—
Entitled to my fee;
No alms I ask—give me my task:
Here are the arm, the leg,
The strength, the sinews of a man,
To work, and not to beg.

Still one of Adam's heirs,
Though doomed by chance of birth
To dress so mean, and to eat the lean
Instead of the fat of the earth;
To make such humble meals
As honest labour can,
A bone and a crust, with a grace to God,
And little thanks to man!

The "Lady's Dream" is a poem which does as much honour to the heart as to the genius of the author. It is a powerful appeal to the rich to divide their abundance with the poor. It deprecates, in the strongest and most touching language, the apathy or the culpable ignorance of those who, wallowing in wealth themselves, never attend to the squalid misery which dwells near them. It is so true and so beautiful, that we shall extract it entire:

The Lady's Dream.

The lady lay in her bed—
Her couch so warm and soft,
But her sleep was restless and broken still,
For turning often and oft,
From side to side, she mutter'd and moan'd,
And tossed her arms aloft.

At last she started up,
And gaz'd on the vacant air
With a look of awe, as if she saw
Some dreadful phantom there—
And then in the pillows she buried her face
From visions ill to bear.

The very curtain shook,
Her terror was so extreme;
And the light that fell on the broidered quilt
Kept a tremulous gleam;
And her voice was hollow, and shook as she cried:
"Oh me! that awful dream.

"That weary, weary walk
In the churchyard's dismal ground!
And those horrible things with shady wings,
That came and fitted round:
Death, Death, and nothing but Death.
In every sight and sound!

"And oh! those maidens young,
Who wrought in that dreary room,
With figures drooping and spectres thin,
And cheeks without a bloom;
And the voice that cried 'for the pomp of pride,'
We haste to an early tomb!

"For the pomp and pleasure of Pride,
We toil like Afric slaves—
And only to earn a home at last
Where yonder cypress waves;
And then they pointed—I never saw
A ground so full of graves.

"And still the coffins came,
With their sorrowful trains and slow;
Coffin after coffin still,
A sad and sickening show;
From grief exempt, I never had dreamt
Of such a world of woe!

"Of the hearts that daily break,
Of the tears that hourly fall,
Of the many, many troubles of life
That grieve this earthly ball—
Disease and hunger, and pain and want,
But now I dreamt of them all!

"For the blind and the cripple were there,
And the babe that pined for bread,
And the houseless man, and widow poor,
Who begged to bury the dead;
The naked, alas! that I might have clad,
The famish'd I might have fed!

"The sorrow I might have soothed,
And the unregarded tears;
For many a thronging shape was there,
From long-forgotten years;
Aye, even the poor neglected Moor,
Who raised my childish fears!

"Each pleading look, that long ago
I scanned with a heedless eye,
Each face was gazing as plainly then
As when I passed it by;
Woe, woe for me if the past should be
Thus present when I die!

"No need of sulphurous lake,
No need of fiery coal,
But only that crowd of human kind,
Who wanted pity and dole—
In everlasting retrospect—
Will wing my sinful soul.

"Alas! I have walked through life
Too heedless where I trod;
Nay, helping to trample my fellow worm,
And fill the burial sod—
Forgetting that even the sparrow falls
Not unmark'd of God!

"I drank the richest draughts;
And ate whatever was good—
Fish, and flesh, and fowl, and fruit,
Supplied my hungry mood;
But I never remember'd the wretched ones
That starve for want of food!

"I dressed as the nobles dress
In cloth of silver and gold,
With silk and satin and costly furs,
In many an ample fold;
But I never remember'd the naked limbs
That froze with winter's cold.

"The wounds I might have healed!
The human sorrow and smart!
And yet it never was in my soul
To play so ill a part:
But evil is wrought by want of thought
As well as want of heart!"

She clasped her fervent hands,
And the tears began to stream;
Large and bitter and fast they fell,
Remorse was so extreme;
And yet, oh! yet, that many a dame
Would dream the Lady's Dream!

Hood was not one of those who imagine that ill-nature and moroseness are essential to philanthropy. On the contrary, he was full of mirth, and the very soul of the society with which he mixed. It may be truly said of him in the words of Rosaline :

"A merrier man,
Within the limit of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk withal;
His eye begets occasion for his wit;
For every object that the one doth catch,
The other turns to a mirth-moving jest;
Which his fair tongue (conceit's expositor)
Delivers in such apt and gracious words
That aged ears play truant to his tales,
And younger hearings are quite ravished;
So sweet and voluble is his discourse."

His "Comic Annual" was read, admired, and furnished food for laughter wherever the English language is understood. His wit, however, was never seasoned with bitterness, except when "blue Calvinists" and "evangelical ranters" were concerned. These he never spared, because he considered that they made Christianity a pretence, and that whilst they professed the religion of universal love, they proclaimed universal intolerance, and practised it as far as they were able. The ode to Rea Wilson need not fear a comparison with the most polished satires of Horace, Juvenal, and Persius, in point, sarcasm, and elegance. The following are a few extracts :

"A wanderer, Wilson, from my native land,
Remote, O Rae, from godliness and thee,
Where rolls between us the eternal sea,
Besides some furlongs of a foreign sand—
Beyond the broadest Scotch of London wall;
Beyond the loudest Saint that has a call;
Across the wavy waste between us stretched,
A friendly missive warns me of a stricture,
Wherein my likeness you have darkly etch'd;
And tho' I have not seen the shadow sketched,
Thus I remark prophetic on the picture:
I guess the features—in a line to paint
Their moral ugliness, I'm not a saint,
Not one of those self-constituted saints,
Quacks—not physicians—in the cure of souls,
Censors who sniff out moral taints,
And call the devil over his own coals—
Those pseudo privy councillors of God,
Who write down judgments with a pen hard-nibbed;
Ushers of Beelzebub's black rod,
Commending sinners, not to ire thick-ribb'd,
But endless flames to scorch them up like flax—
Yet sure of heav'n themselves, as if they'd cribbed
Th' impression of St. Peter's keys in wax!
Of such a character no single trace
Exists, I know, in my fictitious face;
There wants a certain cast about the eye—
A certain lifting of the nose's tip—
A certain curling of the nether lip
In scorn of all that is beneath the sky;
In brief, it is an aspect deleterious,
A face decidedly not serious—
A face profane, that would not do at all
To make a face at Exeter Hall—
That Hall where bigots rant, and cant, and pray,
And laud each other face to face,
Till every farthing-candle ray (Rea)
Conceives itself a great gas-light of grace!

Well! be the graceless lineaments confest!
I do enjoy this bounteous, beauteous earth;
And doat upon a jest

"Within the limits of becoming mirth"—
No solemn, sanctimonious face I pull,
Nor think I'm pious when I'm only bilious—
Nor study in my sanctum supercilious
To frame a Sabbath Bill, or forge a bull.
I pray for grace—repent each sinful act—
Peruse, but underneath the rose, my Bible;
And love my neighbour far too well in fact,
To call and twit him with a godly tract
That's turned by application to a libel.
My heart ferments not with the bigots' leaven

All creeds I view with toleration through,
And have a horror of regarding heaven
As any body's rotten borough.

What else? No part I take in party fray,
With tropes from Billingsgate's slang-whanging tartars,
I fear no Pope—and let great Ernest play
At Fox and goose with Fox's Martyrs!
I own I laugh at over-righteous men,
I own I shake my sides at ranters,
And treat sham Abr'ham saints with wicked banter;
I even own that there are times—but then
It's when I've got my vine—I say d—canters!

He lacerates with the most cutting sarcasm the "modern saints" and "ranters," whose whole religion consists in quoting texts or carrying about a Bible:

For man may pious texts repeat
And yet religion have no inward seat;
Tis not so plain as the old Hill of Howth
A man has got his belly full of meat
Because he talks with victuals in his mouth.
Mere verbiage—it is not worth a carrot!
Why Socrates or Plato—where's the odds—
Once taught a jay to supplicate the gods,
And made a Polly-theist of a parrot!

The Sabbath-day ranters,

Who look on erring souls as straying pigs,
That must be lashed by law wherever found,
And driven to the church as to the parish pound,

Do not fare a whit better than their pious neighbours.
Addressing himself to one of these, he exclaims:

You say—Sir Andrew and his love of law,
And I—the Saviour and his law of love;

And then waxing wrath, he declares that those legislative saints who "frown upon St. Giles's sins, but blink the peccadillos of all Piccadilly, Might sit for hell and represent the devil."

In the same poem are the following beautiful reflections on a cross by the wayside:

Say was it to my spirits gain or loss,
One bright and balmy morning as I went,
From Lieges lovely environs to Ghent,
If hard by the wayside I found a cross
That made me breathe a prayer upon the spot—
While Nature of herself, as if to trace
The emblem's use, had trailed around its base
The blue, significant Forget-me-not!
Methought the claims of Charity to urge
More forcibly along with Faith and Hope,
The pious choice had pitched upon the verge

Of a delicious slope,
Giving the eye such variegated scope;
"Look round," it whispered, "on that prospect rare,
Those vales so verdant and those hills so blue;
Enjoy the sunny world so fresh and fair,
But—(how the simple legend pierced me through)
PRIEZ POUR LES MALHEUREUX."

Those who will not look upon the religious practices of Catholic countries in this spirit,

"Should stay at home in Protestant dominions
Not travel like male Mrs. Trollopes."

We have only room for one more extract, but that is full of sweetness and beauty:

The humble records of my life to search,
I have not herded with mere pagan beasts;
But sometimes I have "sat at good men's feasts,"
And I have been "where bells have knoll'd to church;"
Dear bells! how sweet the sounds of village bells
When on the undulating air they swim!
Now loud as welcomes! faint now as farewells!
And trembling all about the breezy dells,
As fluttered by the wings of cherubim.
Meanwhile the bees are chanting a low hymn;
And lost to sight the extatic lark above
Sings like a soul beatified of love.
O Pagans, Heathens, Infidels, and doubters,
If such sweet sounds can't woo you to religion
Will the harsh voices of church cads and touters?

Aspect of Affairs.

Is it be true "that coming events cast their shadows before," the aspect of the present times must fill the heart of every good man with anxiety and alarm; for never was the future heralded by darker and more ominous clouds than those which just now appear upon the horizon. The revolutionary fires which lately blazed in Spain and Portugal, and which have not been extinguished, but merely covered over for a time, have burst forth with more fierce intensity in Switzerland and in Naples. In Austrian Italy they have been extinguished as soon as they appeared, but the enormous army which is required to keep them down shows of how inflammable materials the great bulk of the population must be composed, and that the volcanic fire burns although its flame does not appear.

In France, the three days of July, 1830, have been eclipsed by the occurrences of the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th of February, 1848. The history of civilized nations does not present us with a single instance of a revolution so utterly unexpected, as that which has been just accomplished in France. Louis Philippe, with the prestige of being the ablest sovereign in the world, was hurled from his throne, almost without the shedding of blood, by the unanimous wish, as it would appear, of the entire people. The National Guards fraternized with the people, the soldiers of the line refused to fire on their countrymen, and the Municipal Guards seemed to be the only persons who were inclined to strike a blow in defence of a prince, who, but yesterday, appeared to be the mightiest in Europe. On the 22nd a slight disturbance took place, which seemed to be perfectly quelled on the same evening, by the resignation of the Guizot ministry. On the following day the fighting was renewed; Count Mole wisely declined the impossible task of forming a ministry acceptable to the people; and on the 24th, Thiers and O'Dillon Barrot, having been commissioned to form an administration, were rejected by the populace, who having broken into the Chamber of Deputies, declared that nothing short of the abdication of the king would satisfy them. Louis Philippe was forced to abdicate in favour of his grandson, the Count of Paris, and immediately left the capital under an escort of cuirassiers. The palace of the Tuilleries was sacked by the people, the tricolour was torn, and the blood-red flag of the Gironde erected in its place; the furniture and pictures were destroyed, and the throne was carried in derision through the streets. The Duchess of Orleans, with her two sons, and the Dukes of Nemours and Montpensier, repaired to the Chamber of Deputies, where M. Dupin announced the abdication of the king in favour of his grandson. A voice from the gallery declared "it is too late." The people crowded into the chamber—the president, the royal family, and most of the members retired. M. Dupont De l'Eure was carried to the chair, and a provisional government proclaimed amid the cries "vive la republique!" The new government is composed of the most violent, and (we are told) of the most incapable of the republican party, and it is therefore morally certain that it will be overthrown before long, probably by another revolution. Whether the present revolution will, like that which took place at the end of the last century, and kept the world in a blaze for more than twenty years, assume a propagandist character or not, it is quite certain that it will spread dismay and confusion through all Europe. Louis Philippe was the usurper of his cousin's throne, and some persons say the contriver of its overthrow. For seventeen years he laboured to destroy the principles which placed him on that throne; his enmity to liberty in fortifying Paris, in refusing to extend the franchise, in prohibiting the reform banquet, and in a thousand other ways was open and undisguised. We cannot, therefore, say that he did not deserve his fate. Still, we cannot pretend to predict whether the present revolution will be productive of good or evil. If it be based on the great and true principles of civil and religious liberty, it will serve France, and teach tyrants all over the world that they cannot, no matter how powerful they may appear, trample on the rights of the people; whereas, if it be based on infidelity, like the first revolution in France, and that which has just taken place in Switzerland, it will be the greatest enemy of true liberty, and after passing through many reigns of terror, and deluging Europe in blood, will ultimately end in a tyrannical despotism.

In the meantime it will make every sovereign, perhaps, in the civilized world sit uneasily on his throne, and teach their people to demand those concessions for which they heretofore only prayed at the hands of their masters.

The Sicilians and Neapolitans have extorted from their king the promise of a constitution, which, along with many minor privileges, will give them a chamber of peers and commons. How far these concessions, which have been extorted in Sicily by a successful appeal to arms, will now satisfy the people, remains to be seen.

The Swiss Radicals, far from showing any symptoms of moderation, have aggravated their tyrannical proceedings against the Catholic cantons. They have confiscated the property and destroyed the personal and political liberty of their chief citizens; they have plundered the churches, the monasteries, and the hospitals; they have openly proscribed the freedom of religion, and have avowed their determination of robbing sovereign states of their independence. England, or rather Lord Palmerston, is now the only supporter of these violent attacks upon civil and religious liberty—for Russia has joined with Austria, France, and Prussia in declaring that the Radicals shall not be allowed to consummate their iniquities.

From all these elements of confusion and strife, we look up with hopefulness to the illustrious sovereign and Pontiff, whose name has become the rallying cry of national liberty, not only in Europe but in America. He shows to the nations of the earth the glorious example of the head of the Catholic Church leading the van in the advance of freedom, whilst at the same time he denounces, as its worst enemies, the friends of anarchy and of irreligion. The regeneration of Rome—of the most renowned city and territory in the world—is a work worthy of the genius of any man; but the destiny of Pio Nono is still more noble, for he is already regarded by the whole world, by the Mahomedan as well as the Christian, as the bright star by whose light men will be able to discover true freedom. He has advanced with no timid or faltering step, for he has already granted an amnesty for political offences. He has instituted a municipal council in Rome, and a national council in the States of the Church; he has armed a national guard, increased his army, and placed it under experienced officers, in order to be able, if necessary, to protect himself and his kingdom from insult. He is, moreover, said to have just signified to his people his intention of granting them a constitution on the model of that of France, in conjunction with the King of Sardinia and the Grand Duke of Tuscany. At the same time, he has never forgotten for a moment what he owes to religion as the head of the Church; nor, ever temporised with its enemies, no matter how useful their political support might appear to him, in his glorious design of regenerating his noble country.

The subjoined documents, along with several others, were appended to the article on Switzerland, which appeared in our last number. We could not, however, make room for them at that time, and of the whole number we now insert only three, which appear to us to be peculiarly interesting. The first was written by the Regular Canons, and the other two by the Superior of the famous Hospice of the Great St. Bernard, and depict in glowing colours the atrocities practised by the Swiss Radicals against that asylum, which had been venerated and protected by men of different parties and religions and politics, for nearly a thousand years.

The first document is the protest of the Regular Canons of the Hospice of St. Bernard against the occupation of that asylum by the commissaries and troops of the federal government:

"The undersigned regular canons of the Hospice of St. Bernard, in chapter assembled, solemnly protest, in the face of Europe, against the occupation of their monastery by certain commissaries of the government, accompanied by thirty soldiers, with fixed bayonets.

"They regard this invasion—

"1st—As a violation of an abode and asylum open to all travellers.

"2nd—As a serious insult to their religious and civil character.

"3rd—As an unjust an illegal seizure of an establishment wholly devoted to the objects of beneficence for 850 years, constantly protected and supported by benefactors of all nations, by most of the Swiss cantons, by ancient and modern princes, who have all contributed to maintain the general hospitality of this house—of an establishment which Napoleon himself respected, notwithstanding the laws of the empire.

"They protest, in like manner, against the inventory which these commissaries have taken of the property, moveable and immoveable, of the hospice. They regard this action as a check upon the exercise of that complete and free hospitality they have always exercised, and on the contributions of the charitable. They regard the violent manner in which this inventory was taken, as an act of persecution which nothing can justify or excuse. They regard it as a step towards the inhuman and anti-social suppression of their establishment, and they, therefore, formally demand that the troops which occupy it be withdrawn, and that the monastery be restored to its true destination, and to the exercise of the duties of religion and hospitality. This protest shall be handed over to the commander of the picket of occupation, to be by him transmitted to the proper authorities. "Signed," &c.

The following is the protest of the Superior of the Great St. Bernard, addressed to the president and members of the provisional government of Valais:

"GENTLEMEN—

"Having taken cognizance of the decrees carried by the popular assembly which was held at Sion, on the 2nd of December, 1847, by which the ecclesiastical immunities are abolished; the property of the convents placed under the supreme controul of the state, which is to determine the purposes for which it is to be employed; the collation of benefices which belonged to the Great St. Bernard is taken from it; the expenses of the war, and of the political events which have taken place since 1844, and the reparation of the losses consequent upon them are, as far as possible, to be charged on the convents, &c.:

"Having taken cognizance of a letter of the provisional government (signed M. Barman, president, Baugin, assistant secretary), which notifies to us that the Hospice of the Great St. Bernard, of which we are superior, is mulcted in a contribution of 30,000 francs:

"Having the consciousness that the house of the Great St. Bernard has exactly fulfilled the duties imposed on it by the object of its institution, and that it has never given any cause for the violent and arbitrary measures which have been taken against it—measures which cannot endanger any of its rights;

"Considering that the 2nd, 4th, 5th, and 7th decrees of the popular assembly are contrary to the laws of the Church, to which we shall always be obedient;

"Considering that the property of the house of the Great St. Bernard, of whatever kind, and wherever situated, as well as the parochial benefices, are destined for the support of hospitality, and for the wants of the Catholic religion;

"We protest in the name of religion, of humanity, and of our benefactors, against these decrees, and against the consequences which may follow them. These decrees which have been already partially put into execution, by the armed invasion of the Great St. Bernard, if they should be fully carried out, would render it impossible for us to continue the general hospitality which we have exercised for nearly nine centuries, and would, in fact, suppress our establishment, hitherto always protected by the State of the Valais, supported by the beneficence of all nations—of Switzerland in particular—of princes, ancient and modern; an establishment respected by the French Revolution, and preserved by Napoleon, who granted it privileges which it alone enjoyed during the empire.

"We approve, in all their integrity, of the protest addressed in our absence to M. Barman, president of the provisional government, dated December 16; and also of the protest of the 17th December, of the claustral chapter (given above), against the invasion of the Hospice of the Great St. Bernard by the commissaries of the provisional government, and by an armed force on the 15th December, and against the inventory which they took of the property of the Hospice.

(Signed) "FRANCIS BENJAMIN FILLIEZ,
Superior of the Great St. Bernard.

"Dec. 18, 1847."

The next is the document addressed by the same gentleman to the Univiers:

"PERSECUTION PRACTISED AGAINST THE HOSPICE OF THE GREAT ST. BERNARD.

"Tradition and history teach that the mountain now called the Great St. Bernard, was, about nine centuries ago, the horrible abode of idolatry and of brigands. A true friend of mankind, a hero of Christian charity, went amongst these brigands, overturned the idols, destroyed the idolatry, and, almost on the ruins of the temple of Jupiter Pœnin, planted the cross, and founded a Hospice, to afford the numerous travellers a refuge from the tempests, and protection against the atrocious treatment of the inhabitants of the place. From the end of the tenth century—the epoch of its foundation—this admirable monument of the charity of Bernard of Menthon, has not for a moment interrupted its wonderful work; it has been always served by religious, according to the design of its institution, and the spirit of its sainted founder.—Empires have fallen, establishments which appeared to be eternal have disappeared, but the Hospice of the Great St. Bernard, notwithstanding the most violent storms, has always endured. Napoleon himself, under whose empire so many monastic institutions were destroyed, respected the Great St. Bernard, and allowed it to remain. Moreover, on the model of this Hospice, he caused two others to be built,—one on Simplon, the other on Mount Cenis. In fine, that persons might not be wanting to enter these institutions, this great man exempted from military service young persons who wished to devote themselves to the exercises of hospitality, which are practised in this house, towards all strangers, without distinction of condition, country, or creed.

"The Great St. Bernard is eulogised in every part of the world, in every clime, and by every tongue. The generous souls of every nation have considered it a duty and a glory to contribute to the maintenance of its hospitality, and to its aggrandisement. It was reserved for our times to see evils, perhaps irreparable, fall on this establishment. The provisional government of Valais, the offspring of the revolution, has imposed upon it a fine of 120,000 French francs, on the plea of expense, and by this means has rendered it impossible for it to continue its work fully and liberally as before. The same government invaded it by an armed force on the 15th of December; the greater part of the soldiers being Vaudois, conducted themselves honourably. But the four cantonal commissioners, MM. Antoine Dufay, de Monthey; Emmanuel Jarris, D'Orsieres, advocate; Tavernier, judge in Bourg-de-Martigny; and the notary Michellod, of the same place, followed them. These gentlemen were commissioned to make an exact and detailed inventory of all the property, moveable and immoveable, which the Hospice possesses, as well in Valais as elsewhere. The superiors having left the Hospice, the young religious had to treat with the commissioners. They refused to assist in this operation, and both viva voce and in writing energetically protested against this iniquitous measure. Disconcerted by this unexpected resistance of some ten young and simple religious, they knew not what to resolve upon, and not daring, so to speak, to take upon themselves so scandalous a responsibility, MM. Tavernier and Michellod departed, on the 16th, to obtain new orders from the government. On the 18th, at two o'clock in the morning, two federal commissioners, MM. Delarageaz of Vaud, and Frey of Bâle, arrived at the Great St. Bernard. M. Druey, chief commissioner, and M. Franchini of Tessino, not wishing to disturb the St. Bernard, remained at Bourg-Saint-Pierre, three leagues from the Hospice. Soon after his arrival, Delarageaz notified to the assembled religious his mission, with which he said he was charged by the confederation. He spoke in an obscure manner. It was perceived, however, that his discourse tended to get the religious to help to make the inventory, and to give an acknowledgment of the objects which had been removed for security—objects they were told they would be obliged to restore at the expense of the Hospice." According to these gentlemen, the goods of religious corporations are under the dominion of the confederation—the religious are only their administrators; they do not even enjoy their usus fructus, but are simply their dispensers. But the young religious were immoveable; they unanimously entrenched themselves behind the protest presented by their brethren to the government and to the cantonal delegates. M. Delarageaz then ordered M. Dufay to invite the religious, by three legal summonses, to open their doors, to declare the property of the Hospice, and to certify the inventory which they should make of it, declaring that if they persisted in their refusal, force should be employed. This means they were obliged to use. The doors, which could not be opened by false keys or master keys, were broken in by a hatchet: the federal commissaries had taken care to bring a locksmith with them to pick the locks. This odious measure had already taken place in a house which the Hospice possesses at Martigny; a house destined to serve as an asylum for the religious, whom the severe and murderous air of the great St. Bernard too often renders weak and diseased, and whither the old, who needed relief after a laborious life, also retired. This asylum of the old and infirm was no more spared than the great St. Bernard; it was invaded by an armed force, and they proceeded with rigour to take a minute inventory of its effects. The apartments of the superior were forcibly opened by the locksmith. At the great St. Bernard the commissioners seized all the keys they could find. They placed at the doors, and at each of the windows of the Hospice, sentinels with charged guns, to whom they gave orders to fire on all those, whether religious or others, who would carry away anything belonging to the establishment. They carried their vigilance so far as to rifle the bags of the travellers at their departure. The garrison lived at the expense of the Hospice. The most bitter jeers were added to persecution. The commissioners of the government were not ashamed to say to the religious that they did not wish to disturb them nor to put any constraint on their exercise of hospitality, and, in the meantime, they ruined the establishment by impositions in money and in provisions, and the religious are steeped in sorrow.

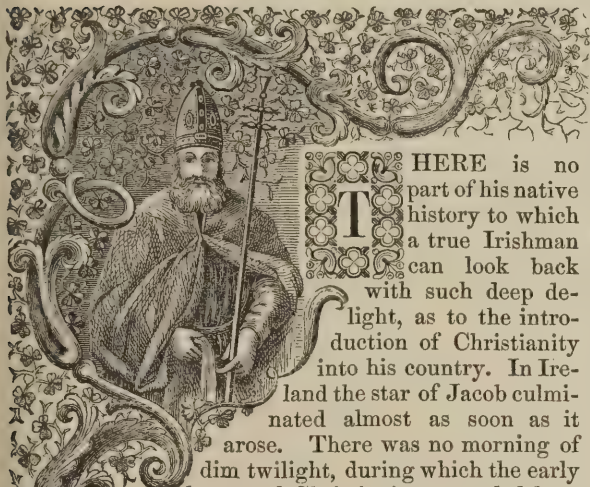

"We publish these acts of spoliation, that Europe may know, and appreciate at their just value, the men who now govern the Valais.

(Signed)

THE
Life and Death of Oliver Plunkett,
 PRIMATE OF IRELAND.

PART I.

THE THERE is no part of his native history to which a true Irishman can look back with such deep delight, as to the introduction of Christianity into his country. In Ireland the star of Jacob culminated almost as soon as it arose. There was no morning of dim twilight, during which the early beams of Christianity struggled long and doubtfully with the deep darkness of Paganism, for the unclouded sun of righteousness appeared at once in the meridian, and shed his blessed light over the whole island. Though the sanctity of our earliest Christians has been the admiration of the world, yet the first names upon our calendar are not those of martyrs, but of holy bishops and of spotless virgins. The blood of martyrs was not here as elsewhere, the seed of Christians, for the trophies of Paganism were at once laid at the foot of the cross, and the whole nation, from the poorest mendicant on the way-side to the mighty monarch who was enthroned in Tara, enrolled itself amongst the followers of our Lord Jesus Christ. Religion appeared not at first in Ireland as a timid and persecuted stranger, but was welcomed with that loud and universal acclamation with which a long-enslaved nation hails the sudden and unexpected advent of freedom. St. Patrick not only accomplished the rare task of converting an entire nation to Christianity, and of enthroning it for ever in the hearts of a great people, but he saw many of his children embracing the most arduous councils of the Gospel—the monastery and the convent were filled with multitudes of both sexes, who consecrated their virginity to God in the seclusion of the cloister—and he established a numerous hierarchy, the chief see being in Armagh, which has remained unbroken after the lapse of fourteen centuries.

It is the singular glory of the Irish nation that she never persecuted religion, not even when she was Pagan. The curse of religious persecution was, indeed, carried by the foreigner to her shores, but she never learned it, for the Irish Catholics, although most cruelly provoked, did not retaliate upon the Protestants when they had the power. Religious persecution was an exotic which would not take root in native Irish soil, although it was lavishly planted in it by strangers. These persecuted with the most persevering and unrelenting cruelty, but the Irish endured with a heroism and constancy which nothing could subdue, until their enemies were obliged to desist from very weariness. The calendar was now indeed filled with martyrs; countless multitudes had been swept away by the desolating flood of iniquity which rushed fiercely over our country, but religion, like the ark of old, rode triumphant and secure on the angry waters. Oliver Plunkett, the object of the present notice, and one of the most illustrious of the successors of St. Patrick, in the primatial see, is one of the innumerable martyrs who died for the faith in Ireland in a later age, and who, amid the general indifference and apathy of the degenerate times in which they were born, rivalled the constancy, the virtue, and the heroism of the primitive Christians. In other countries the faith was persecuted in its infancy, by the avowed enemies of the Christian name, whilst the first converts, dazzled by the glory which had just burst upon them, rather sought than shunned death for its sake. But as Ireland, at her conversion, presented the singularly glorious spectacle of a whole people at once abandoning their long-cherished errors, and embracing the truths and the austerities of the Gospel—as her children passed almost without any intermediate stage from neophytes into apostles, and spread the faith amid the surrounding nations—so also in the designs of heaven have her trials been reserved for later times, in order to present to the world the sublime example of a nation of confessors and martyrs, whose sufferings were aggravated by being inflicted not by the avowed enemies of their name, but by those who professed themselves to be their fellow Christians.

Oliver Plunkett was born at Loughcrew, in the county of Meath, about the year 1631. He was descended from one of the most ancient and illustrious families in Ireland, and was a near relative of the Earls of Fingal.* From his earliest youth he was equally distinguished by the purity of his morals and the excellence of his understanding. Without being of an age to take any active part in the scenes of blood which were enacted in his unhappy country, from 1641 to 1649, he was old enough to appreciate their horrors, and to remember the miserable dissensions which pa-

* The precise year in which he was born I have not been able to ascertain. He was, however, appointed Primate on the decease of Edmund O'Reilly, in 1669. "Ad dictam sedem," says De Burgo, Hibernia Dominicana, p. 499, "fuisse promotum anno 1669, in locum Edmundi O'Reilly." He taught divinity in the college of the Propaganda for twelve years after he had completed his studies in the Ludovician College, "Dum adolescens esset Romam se contulit, in Hibernorum Collegio Ludovisano receptus, ubi studiorum curriculum tanto perfectu successu, ut ad theologiam in Collegio urbano de Propaganda Fide publice profitendum admotus, munus illud per duodecim annorum seriem summa cum laude exercuerit."—Hibernia Dominicana, p. 130. The same fact is stated by Arsdale, his contemporary and friend, whom the Primate visited at Louvain in 1669, when he was on his way to Ireland, to assume the government of his see, "Studia in eo collegio (Ludovisano) tanto successu perfecit, ut doctoris in Theologia lauream adeptus fuerit, ac postea ad eandam facultatem publice profitendam in collegio de Propaganda Fide admotus, ubi munus illud duodecim annis summa cum laude exercuit."—Arsdale. "Vita et mors gloriosa Illustrissimi D. Oliveri Plunketti, archiepiscopi Armacani et primatis Hiberniæ extremo supplicio Londini nuper effecti."—Ad Calcem Theologiæ Tripartiti, p. 159, Dilingæ, A.D. 1687. Now as the full course of philosophy and theology alone in the Ludovician College occupied seven years, and if we suppose that he studied only one year's classics in Rome, the whole period of his sojourn there must have amounted to twenty years: consequently he went to Rome in 1649. Both De Burgo and Arsdale state that he went to Rome whilst he was a youth (dum adolescens esset) and if we allow him to have been eighteen, he was born in 1631. With regard to his family, the Hibernia Dominicana, note (t), p. 130, says: "Tres fuere simul suntque gentes Plunkettanæ, proceres, comes nimirum Fingallus atque Barones Dunjanus et Louthanus. Adeas, cap. i., num. xxii. Lit. R., p. 31. Cæterum antistes Oliverus prodiit è Domo Plunkettorum de Loughcrew in Midensi Agro Lageniæ Teste Lodgæo—vol. i. p. 156." Loughcrew is at present the residence of J. W. L. Naper, Esq., D. L.

ralyzed the efforts of the Irish nation, and left it a chained victim, unable to resist the arm which was raised to immolate it to the vengeance of its enemies. It was not, however, pusillanimity, nor want of affection for his native land, that induced him to seek knowledge in a foreign clime; but having resolved to embrace the ecclesiastical state, he determined to qualify himself for the discharge of its important duties, by acquiring in the capital of the Christian world that learning which the cruelty of penal laws and the turbulence of the times prevented him from finding in his own country. He left Ireland in 1649—the year of Cromwell's arrival—and the tales of woe which resounded through all Europe, and followed him to Rome, far exceeded the worst horrors which had occurred before his departure.

Sad, indeed, was the condition of the Church and people of Ireland at this period. The young and the old—the venerable bishop and the youthful priest—were torn from under the very altar; dragged from their holes in the earth, where they burrowed like vermin; or caught as they crept from them to administer the sacraments to some dying sinner, and instantly put to death. O'Brien, bishop of Emly, was, in 1651, bound in chains, and cast into prison in Limerick; and neither threats nor promises were spared in order to induce him to abandon the Catholic faith. These however proving unavailing, he was hanged, and his head being taken off, was placed on a pike, and raised on the citadel, where it remained until after the restoration.* About the same time, Egan, bishop of Ross, was tortured and put to death in that town. He had for a long time been concealed in a cavern of a neighbouring mountain; but, having left his retreat to visit a dying person, he was discovered on his return, and, on his refusing to renounce the faith, was given up to the fury of the Puritan soldiery. His arms were struck off his body on the spot, and he was then brought to a neighbouring tree, amid the jeers and scoffs of his tormentors, and there hanged on one of the branches, by the reins of his own horse.† Emir Mathew, bishop of Clogher, being loaded with irons, was cast into a dungeon in Enniskillen, where he was at length freed from his sufferings by being hanged. His bowels were afterwards torn out and burned, and his head was placed on a pole in the public market.‡ Arthur Maginnis, bishop of Down, being old and infirm, died at sea, endeavouring to escape his enemies. Of the other prelates, the celebrated Nicholas French, bishop of Ferns, escaped to Ghent, where he died on the 23rd of August, 1678. Walsh, archbishop of Cashel, after being hunted for a long time through the mountains of Tipperary, at length found an asylum at Compostella, in Spain. The bishops of Cork and Cloyne, and of Waterford and Lismore, fled to Nantz; the bishops of Limerick and Raphoe, to Brussels; the bishop of Clonfert to Hungary; the bishop of Leighlin, to Galicia; the bishop of Killaloe, to Rennes, in Brittany; the bishop of Kilfenora, to Normandy; and the bishop of Kilmaedua was screened by his friends in England.—(Elenchus Episcop. a Nichol. Fernensi, quoted at length in the Hibernia Dominicana, p. 489, and following.) Besides these, John Burke, archbishop of Tuam, Patrick Plunkett, bishop of Ardagh, and every other prelate in the kingdom, were forced to fly from it, with the exception of the Primate, Hugh O'Reilly, Geoghan, bishop of Meath, and M'Sweeny, bishop of Kilmore, who, however, was disqualified by age and infirmity from discharging any of the functions of his office.*

The second order of the clergy were treated, if possible, with still greater barbarity. Some of them were burned before a slow fire; some were put upon the rack, and tortured to death; whilst others, like Ambrose Cahill and James O'Reilly, were not only slain with the greatest cruelty, but their inanimate bodies were torn into fragments, and scattered before the winds.—(O'Daly, p. 214, 215, Hib. Dom. p. 566.) On the 5th of January, 1652, the commissioners appointed by the republican parliament published their first edict, by which they renewed the 27th of Elizabeth. Twenty-eight days were allowed for the departure of all priests out of the kingdom; but if, after that space, any one should be found in the country, the statute declares, that "He incurs the guilt of high treason—he is, therefore, to be hanged, cut down while alive, beheaded, quartered, bowelled, and burned; the head to be set on a pike, and exposed in the most public place—moreover, should any person entertain or harbour a priest, he shall suffer the confiscation of his property, and be put to death without the hope of mercy"—(O'Daly, p. 226-8). Every exercise of the Catholic religion, even in private, was declared to be a capital offence; the country swarmed with spies and informers, who not only got five pounds for the apprehension of each priest, and a third part of the property of the person in whose house he was discovered, but were also promoted to offices and dignities; and it was moreover declared that, "If any one shall know where a priest remains concealed, in caves, woods, or caverns; or, if by any chance he should meet a priest on the highway, and not immediately take him into custody, and present him before the next magistrate, such person is to be considered a traitor and an enemy to the republic. He is, accordingly, to be cast into prison, flogged through the public streets, and afterwards have his ears cut off. But, should it appear that he kept up any correspondence or friendship with a priest, he is to suffer death."—(Morrison, Threnodia.)

It was no ordinary zeal and heroism which filled, at this very period, the universities and colleges of Europe with the youth of Ireland; many of them, like Oliver Plunkett, being of her noblest families, who aspired to the priesthood, in order to preserve their country's faith—the last, the noblest, and the best remnant of

* According to Dr. French's account, out of twenty-six Irish bishops who were resident in their sees in 1649, nine had died at home, ten in exile, three suffered martyrdom, and four were still living in 1667, two of whom, Dr. Nicholas French, himself, bishop of Ferns, and Dr. Andrew Lynch, bishop of Kilfenora, were still in banishment; and only two, John Burke (De Burgo), archbishop of Tuam, who was so infirm that he might be numbered with the dead, and Patrick Plunkett, bishop of Ardagh, returned to Ireland. Of the former, Dr. French says—"D. Johannes De Burgo, archiepiscopus Tuamensis, S. Theologiæ Doctor, è carcere pulsus in exilium, dein reversus in Patriam, jacet in lecto langydis derepitis et incurvatus ita ut poni possit in numero mortuorum." And of the latter—"D. Fr. Patritius Plunquettus, Ordinis S. Benedicti Episcopus Ardachadensis, secreto latet in sylvis et montibus et pauperum domibus in Patria post decenne exilium."

her nationality.* They were for the most part eminently distinguished by their piety and learning; they were cherished on account of their virtues and of their misfortunes: but neither ease, affluence, nor honours, nor the fear of the persecutions which awaited them, could prevent them from returning to their own dear country, when she required their services, where, if they did not seek, they certainly did not shun the crown of martyrdom. When they were put to death, their example did not deter the Irish youth, but, on the contrary, inflamed them with a burning desire of imitating so noble an example, and of dying in so glorious a cause. Our nationality took refuge along with our faith, in the caverns of the earth, and on the tops of the mountains; they were hunted, but still lived; they increased and multiplied under persecution, and have again returned with the people, in whose hearts they flourished, and have spread themselves far and wide, in town and in village through the valleys and over the highlands.

The Irish Ludovician College, at Rome, was celebrated at this time for the excellence of its teachers, and the piety, modesty, and literary acquirements of its students. It was administered by the Jesuits, who were then in the zenith of their glory, and the most learned body in the world. This college had sent to Ireland many of her most accomplished ecclesiastics. To this place Oliver Plunkett was attracted by its fame in the summer of 1649. The sweetness of his disposition, and the excellence of his genius, soon made his preceptors predict that he would be an eminent man. Nor were their hopes disappointed; for, after studying the usual course, during which he distinguished himself in every department of science; and, having taken out his degree of doctor in divinity, he was appointed public professor of theology in the celebrated college "De Propaganda Fide." He filled this important office for twelve years, in a manner which gained him the highest reputation, and the esteem and admiration of the Sovereign Pontiff himself.

In the early part of the year 1669, the Primate, Edmund O'Reilly, died in Louvain, a persecuted exile. On his advancement to the primacy, he had been consecrated at Brussels, in 1657; and, notwithstanding the persecution which then raged against priest and bishop, he determined to return to Ireland. He was, however, arrested in London, at the instance of Father Peter Walsh, and sent back to France. After the restoration he solicited from the king, in the year 1665, leave to return to Ireland. At that time there were only three of the Irish bishops residing in the kingdom, John Burke, archbishop of Tuam, who was so decrepid according to De Burgo, in a passage already quoted, that he might be reckoned with the dead, and who had returned, as he himself expresses it, after sixteen years' exile, to have his ashes laid in the tomb of his fathers; Patrick Plunkett, bishop of Ardagh, who had also returned from exile; and the old bed-ridden bishop of Kilmore, Owen M'Sweeney.† The Primate's petition to be allowed to return was not rejected; and he accordingly arrived in Dublin on the evening of the 14th of June, 1666, and immediately presented himself before the synod, which was then assembled in one of the city parochial houses, to discuss the propriety of adopting the famous remonstrance of Father Peter Walsh. His personal authority, and the letters which he brought from the Internuncio, Rospigliosi, Martin, bishop of Upres, and others, had no small weight in procuring the rejection of the remonstrance, which took place on the 17th of the same month. On the 25th, the new remonstrance, which had been adopted by the meeting and presented to Ormonde, the lord lieutenant, was rejected, and the synod dissolved. Ormonde had, in fact, already written to the secretary of state on the 19th, that is, just two days after the rejection, by the synod, of the Valesian remonstrance, as follows—"There is hardly an hour in a day wherein I have not hot alarms of conspiracies ready to be executed by the Irish; I now really believe they are put into a disposition of rebelling by some employed out of France. I will, according to instructions, keep the Irish to the letter of the remonstrance or to a sense equivalent."* The work of persecution and robbery was now carried on with almost as much zeal as during the commonwealth. "A court of claims sat in Dublin, and were busy disposing of lands and houses by lot to the forty-nine officers, and in ordering reprisals."† On the 27th of September, the Primate was seized and brought prisoner to England, whence he was shortly afterwards banished the kingdom. All the other prelates fled, with the exception of two, who were decrepid, bed-ridden, and unable to escape from the country.‡

* "Adolescens cum esset, huic gloriæ præfulsit in immatura adhuc ætate, præmaturum veræ sapientiæ desiderium. Hanc ut acquireret securus extra patriæ suæ fines proficisci decrevit, ut solent illius gentis Adolescentes ingenui, qui quam domi adipisci nequeunt, apud exteros inquirunt sineræ doctrinæ institutionem, sapientiæ majus quam patriæ studiosi. Hos ut sacros latices purius hauriret Oliverus, non dubitavit Romam usque, ad ipsum sinceræ doctrinæ fontem proficisci."—Ardekin, ubi supra.

† "John Burke, bishop of Tuam, was decrepid, if not bed-ridden, in 1665. When he landed in Dublin, from St. Malo's, in the year 1662, he was not able to go otherwise to Connaught but in a litter.

During the Primate's exile, the persecution against the clergy who had opposed Walsh's remonstrance was still carried on by Ormonde with unabated rigour. These constituted almost all the clergy of the kingdom, for Walsh (p. 576) estimates the number of secular priests, then residing in Ireland, at about 1100, and the total number of regulars at one or two more than 780 (Walsh, p. 575.) Of these only sixty-nine had signed the remonstrance, so that to persecute the anti-remonstrants, was in effect to persecute all the Catholic clergy of the country. At such a time the exalted dignity of the primacy was sure to draw down vengeance on the person who possessed it. It was a matter of the last importance to the Church of Ireland, in this crisis of her fate, that the successor of St. Patrick should be a man of the most consummate prudence, and of the most heroic courage—a man who could neither be cajoled nor intimidated. The Irish Clergy and the

. Owen M'Sweeney, bishop of Kilmore, had been questionless for many years, before 1665, bed-ridden, and unable to exercise scarce any part of his functions. And yet, besides Tuam and Ardagh, he was the only bishop (of the Roman communion) then at home in Ireland."—Peter Walsh's History of the Remonstrance Second part of first treatise, pp. 573-4. The copy from which we quote was printed A.D. 1674. The place is not mentioned. There were only three other Irish bishops living at this time, namely, the primate, Edmund O'Reilly, who had been sent out of the kingdom in 1657, and was still in Belgium; Nicholas French, bishop of Ferns, who was in Gallicia, whither he had retired in 1650; and Andrew Lynch, bishop of Kilfenora, who was in Normandy, so that the whole hierarchy of Ireland, in 1665, numbered only six bishops, three of whom were in exile.—Hist. of Remon. p. 574-5.

Holy Father Clement IX. were alike sensible of the vital nature of the appointment. Various individuals were recommended to the high office by different sections of the clergy, and by persons at Rome. At length the Pope exclaimed—"Why are we discussing uncertainties, when certainty is before our eyes. Behold in the city of Rome, itself, Oliver Plunkett, a man of long experience, tried virtue, and consummate learning. Him, I, by my apostolic authority, appoint Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of Ireland.* If the Church of Ireland had not been persecuted at this time, the temper and pursuits of Oliver Plunkett would have, most probably, induced him to prefer the seclusion of his college to the government of the Irish Church. But to have hesitated for a moment in her present circumstances would have savoured of cowardice, and he, therefore, accepted the office instantly and with alacrity. Nor did he for a moment think of remaining abroad, and evading the perils with which he knew that he would be encompassed in Ireland, by entrusting the government of his diocese to a vicar-general; for immediately after his consecration he set out for Ireland, carrying with him particular instructions from the Pope, regarding the regulation of his own conduct and that of his clergy.† On his way he visited Louvain, where he saw his countryman, Arsdekin, and was one of the first who urged that eminent man to write a Theology which should be peculiarly adapted for the guidance of the apostolic missionaries in these persecuted countries.‡

The Duke of Ormonde, leaving the government of Ireland in the hands of his son, the Earl of Ossory, set out for England, on the 24th of April, and arrived in London on the 6th of May, 1663. After a violent struggle to retain the office of lord lieutenant, he was at last deprived of it by the king, on the 14th of February, 1669.§ The lord privy-seal—Lord Roberts—who had been appointed his successor, arrived in Ireland on the 13th of September, when he immediately received the sword of state from the Earl of Ossory.|| Carte says (vol. ii., p. 378), that he was very singular in his ways of proceeding—stiff, solemn, and formal, "and so uncomplaisant in his manner of receiving persons, as to make them think of resenting it." This agrees with the character of him which Burke quotes, in his "Extinct, dormant, and suspended Peerage of England," &c. He was "a staunch Presbyterian; sour and cynical; just in his administration, but vicious under the semblance of virtue; learned, above any of his quality; but stiff, obstinate, proud, and jealous, and every way intractable." Burke says, also, that he had, in early life, fought under the parliamentary banner, and certainly he carried with him to Ireland all the hatred which that party entertained towards the Catholics of this country. He, however, held the office of lord lieutenant for but a very short period, for Lord Berkley, of Stratton, was sworn in as his successor on the 21st of May, 1670.¶

* Arsdekin, Proseutio Dedicationum Prionum "ad calcem Theologie Tripartite."—p. 159. There is an absurd story told about the reasons which induced Clement IX. to appoint Dr. Plunkett to the Primacy, in Woods Athen. Oxon., vol. i., p. 221, but it is justly rejected as absurd in Harris's Ware, vol. ii., p. 194. We shall quote it in the progress of Dr. Plunkett's life.

Frances Brown, THE BLIND POETESS OF DONEGAL.

LYRICS AND MISCELLANEOUS POEMS. By FRANCES BROWN.
Edinburgh, 1848.

THE days of epics, of didactic poems, of poetical tales and romances, constructed on a regular plan and divided into books, parts, or cantos—in a word, of all the larger and more professedly elaborate forms of poetical composition—appear to have passed almost entirely away. Public taste, in this particular, has undergone a complete revolution. The poetical columns of a monthly magazine or weekly journal supply to us the reading for which our fathers had recourse to the stately octavo or cumbersome quarto; and the necessarily brief and fugitive character of the poetry which forms the staple of our periodical literature, and to which we have thus become habituated, has induced a prima facie disrelish for every more formal and lengthened poem, unless it be of that rare and privileged class which is entirely independent of external forms, and which forces the admiration of the public, no matter in what shape it is presented. The poets, proverbially unpliant and unpractical as they are, have followed, if indeed they have not led, this prejudice of their readers; and our best authors are content to eschew every more ambitious path, and to rest their reputation on lyrics, ballads, odes, fugitive pieces, miscellaneous poems, and the numberless other non-descript compositions, which are popular now, but to which it would have perilled the fame of a poet of the olden time to condescend.

The title of Miss Brown's pretty little volume will show that she has fallen in with the prevailing fashion; and when we recollect her former publication, we cannot but feel that she has acted wisely in avoiding the difficulties of a long and regular poem. The marked superiority evinced in the minor pieces, of which her first volume was principally made up, over "The Star of Atteghel"—the only regular tale which she introduced into it—seemed to indicate very clearly that her talent lay chiefly, if not altogether, in this more unpretending, but not less graceful and agreeable, walk of poetry.

Perhaps, indeed, Miss Brown's present publication may be regarded, by many readers, as inferior in interest to that by which she first became known as an authoress. The collection is a smaller one; it consists chiefly of scattered pieces which had already appeared in various journals; and there are a few of them which do not fully sustain the hopes which her first success had excited. The number of these, however, is very inconsiderable; the great majority, if they do not enhance, certainly do not detract from, the reputation which the early specimens of her poetry had earned; and, if some of them be deficient in the higher elements of poetic power, all, with hardly an exception, exhibit abundant evidence of the more graceful qualities by which the authoress had been chiefly characterised—freedom and facility of versification, tenderness of thought, vigour coupled with chasteness of imagination, and, better than all, genuine mastery of the affections, and warmth and purity of heart.

Independently, however, of the merit of our fair countrywoman's poetry, there is a charm about her simple and affecting story, which gives her a claim upon the sympathy of every lover of literature, and which a journal such as ours should be the last to ignore. Most of our readers, we dare say, must recollect the modest and touching personal narrative which, about four years ago, accompanied Miss Brown's first publication. It is one of the most interesting, and, indeed, instructive examples of "the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties," which we have ever read. Bereft of sight in early infancy—placed beyond the reach of those adventitious helps by which, for more favoured sufferers, the worst consequences of this privation are alleviated—without friends—without masters—for a long time almost without books—this young girl has battled, alone and unaided, "in this dark world and wide," with all the difficulties of her position. With rare energy of character and firmness of purpose, she has contrived not only to perfect herself in all the ordinary branches of popular education, but also to become acquainted with the best works in ancient and modern literature; and her prose, as well as her poetry, displays a degree of intellectual training, a soundness and propriety of judgment, and a purity and correctness of taste, which could only be the result of long and familiar study of the best models of composition, combined with careful and assiduous habits of self cultivation. It is difficult, indeed, not to sympathize with one so afflicted, and in so interesting a struggle. The blindness of the author is not the least among the circumstances which have made the reputation of Thierry's history; and we recollect the lively interest which was excited by the account which Mr. Prescott published, in his recent "History of the Conquest of Peru," of the difficulties under which, while suffering from almost total blindness, he composed his great historical work, the "Ferdinand and Isabella." But, to our mind, the struggle of our young countrywoman—poor and unfriended—in an obscure and distant village, with no "appliances and means" beyond those of a strong will and an ardent love of learning—is infinitely more interesting. We could linger for hours over her own simple narrative of the means by which, slowly and toilsomely, she wrought out her purpose—the efforts which it cost her to procure even the cheapest and most ordinary books—the devices which she employed in order to induce her young and volatile companions to submit to the drudgery of reading to her—the tasks which she undertook for them in return—the stories which she used to tell them in requital of their services—the painful and laborious processes by which she impressed upon her memory the knowledge thus precariously obtained: and our only regret, in looking through the pretty volume now before us, is occasioned by the disappointment of a hope which we had entertained, that it would contain some further particulars of the personal history of the authoress.

Interesting, however, as this history is, we cannot think of inflicting a twice-told tale upon our readers, by dwelling longer upon it; if there be any of them to whom the details are new, we must refer them to Miss Brown's former publication; and, for the present, we shall content ourselves with selecting a few of the most characteristic specimens of the poetry contained in the collection now before us.

It is difficult to discover in Miss Brown's poetry much intrinsic evidence of her unhappy bereavement. She seldom alludes to the circumstance; and, on the contrary, illustrations from external nature, and images borrowed from the phenomena of sight, are so numerous, and so freely introduced in her pages, as, at first sight at least, to appear incompatible with the supposition. We cannot help thinking, however, that it is to the analogy which the subject of the following exquisite little piece bears with her own condition, that we are indebted for the deep and touching pathos which breathes through every line:

The Mother of the Mute.

My Child, our home-fire's light is shed
On the curls of many a fair young head—
But none that glance in the ruddy beam
Like thine of the dark and jetty gleam;
And there are eyes with the cloudless light
Of life's spring morn, that shine
Upon our home—but none so bright
As that starry glance of thine;—
It hath shone on my soul through all the tears
And clouds of my sad and silent years.

Silent—though voices glad and young
Oft by our board and hearth have rung;—
Sad—though the smiles that young lips wear,
And the joy of unwearied hearts was there:
It rose through the light of summer's day—
Through the winter's twilight chill;
Each voice had part in the harmony—
But thine alone was still:—
And well might thy mother's heart deplore
The chord that was mute for evermore!

My child, there have been both prayer and tear,
One sound of that silent chord to hear;
But the hush was deep, and the prayer was vain,
And the tear will never fall again;—
For now thy part in the world of thought—
So early lost, is found—
In the blessed lore our Faith hath taught,
And the hope that knows no bound—
For its pinions cleave the clouds of time,
And its eye looks forth to the tearless clime.

Oh! blessed be the saving power
That won thee back that priceless dower,
And taught thine hand the silent art
That well can speak from heart to heart.
But, oh! the voices of my youth,
That were clear as sunlit streams—
They are lost in time, they are hush'd in death—
But they have not left my dreams;
I hear them blent on the midnight breeze
With the sounds of my childhood's streams and trees.

Though some have swept o'er my after-path
In tones of wo and in sounds of wrath—
And changed, and cheerless as they grew,
May grow mine own home-voices too:
But thine—it will never lose the tone
Of childhood, gushing clear
From the heart's free founts, that yet have known
No stain of time or tear;
For the seal'd-up spring may never blend
With the streams life's darker fountains send—
But rise to greet me on that shore
Where time and its losses come no more!

On the other hand, the impressions received through the sense of hearing are, for one like her, more vivid and more lasting. Never have the memories of such impressions been more touchingly recorded than in the following simple lines:

My Childhood's Tune.

And hast thou found my soul again,
Though many a shadowy year hath past
Across its chequer'd path, since when I heard thy low notes last!

They come with the old pleasant sound,
Long silent, but remember'd soon—
With all the fresh green memories wound
About my childhood's tune!

I left thee far among the flowers
My hand shall seek as wealth no more—
The lost light of those morning hours
No sunrise can restore.

And life hath many an early cloud
That darkens as it nears the noon—
But all their broken rainbows crowd
Back with my childhood's tune!
Thou hast the whisper of young leaves
That told my heart of spring begun,
The bird's song by our hamlet eaves
Pour'd to the setting sun—
And voices heard, how long ago,
By winter's hearth or autumn's moon!—
They have grown old and alter'd now—
All but my childhood's tune!
At our last meeting, Time had much
To teach and I to learn; for then Mine was a trusting wisdom—such
As will not come again.
I had not seen life's harvest fade
Before me in the days of June;
But thou—how hath the spring-time stay'd
With thee, my childhood's tune!
I had not learn'd that love, which seem'd
So priceless, might be poor and cold;
Nor found whom once I angels deem'd,
Of coarse and common mould.
I knew not that the world's hard gold
Could far outweigh the heart's best boon;
And yet, thou speakest as of old,
My childhood's pleasant tune!
I greet thee as the dove that cross'd
My path among Time's breaking waves,
With olive leaves of memory lost,
Or shed, perchance, on graves.
The tree hath grown up wild and rank,
With blighted boughs that time may prune—
But blessed were the dews it drank
From thee, my childhood's tune!
Where rose the stranger city's hum,
By many a princely mart and dome,
Thou comest—even as voices come
To hearts that have no home.
A simple strain to other ears,
And lost amid the tumult soon;
But dreams of love, and truth, and tears
Came with my childhood's tune!

The reader cannot fail to observe in these, and almost all Miss Brown's pieces, a striking similarity in sentiment and in general tone to the leading characteristics of the poetry of Mrs. Hemans, and especially to the deep and settled melancholy which pervades it. For the general imitation of this gifted poetess we should not have been unprepared, because it runs through the poetry of all the lady-writers in the language since her time. But this coincidence with Mrs. Hemans, in the uniform melancholy and unhoping character of her compositions, is more worthy of remark, because, in the case of Miss Brown, it is at variance with the received impressions regarding the habitual temperament of those who, like her, have been afflicted with blindness. Every one who has associated much with blind persons, will recollect the cheerful and contented look, the buoyant spirits, the happy expression of features, which almost invariably distinguishes them; but he will look in vain for any echo of this spirit in our blind poetess. There is nothing in the whole range of Mrs. Hemans' writing more profoundly gloomy, and we may add, there is nothing more exquisitely simple and touching than Miss Brown's lines, entitled—

The Violet's Welcome.

THE world hath a welcome yet for thee,
Thou earliest-born of flowers!—
Though many a golden hope was gone,
And dream that lighted her rosy dawn
Ere the toil of these latter days came on;
And her weary children's steps have stray'd
From their first green dwelling, in the shade
Of Eden's blessed bowers,

Too far to find on earth a track
That yet might guide the wanderers back.
But still from her bright youth's mem'ry comes
A voice to welcome thee:—
It sounds in the song of the early bird,
Through waking woods by the south wind stirr'd,
When the steps of the coming Spring are heard;
It bursts from the heart of childhood, clear
As a stream from its native fount, that ne'er
Was aught but bright and free,
And fear'd no future winter's frost,
Nor the sands where mightier waves were lost.
And we, who look from the lattice-pane
Or the lowly cottage door,
On lengthening eves and budding trees—
As comes thy breath on the day's last breeze,
Bringing its dew-like memories
To the heart of toil and the brow of care—
Through the clouds which Time hath gather'd there—
From green haunts sought no more,
But ever known by the light that lies
Upon them from life's morning skies.

We know thy home—where the waving fern
With the moss-clad fountain chimes;
But we greet thee not with the joy of yore,
When our souls went forth to meet thee, o'er
Far hills which the earliest verdure wore:—
We have hoped in many a Spring since then,
But they never brought to our hearts again
Those vanish'd violet times,
With their blooms which it seem'd no blight could mar—
The early shed and the scatter'd far!

Gather them back, ye mighty years
That bring the woods their leaves!—
Back from life's unreturning streams—
Back from the graves that haunt our dreams,
And the living lost, from whose lips our names
Have pass'd—as the songs of greener bowers
And the tones of happier years from ours—
From all the faith that cleaves
To the broken reeds of this changeful clime—
Gather them back, restoring Time!

Alas! the violets may return,
As in Springs remember'd long;
But for us Time's wing can only spread
The snows, that long on the heart are shed
Ere yet their whiteness reach the head!—
Thou comest to the waste and wold,
But not like us to grow sad and old—
Wild flower of hope and song!
We bless thee for our childhood's sake—
For the light of the eyes no more to wake—
For memories green as a laurel crown,
That link thee to dreams like stars gone down,
And the spots we loved when our love was free—
Each heart hath a welcome yet for thee!

We cannot refrain from adding one more extract, on a kindred subject:

Flowers in the City.

WELL we know them—as the blossoms
Of the green and glorious May
Life hath left so far away
In old woods and glens, whose bosoms
Wear the dew of summer's youth—
It hath pass'd from ours in sooth:
Yet how fresh on brow and spirit
Breathe through tumult, dust, and stone,
Buds the wide green wastes inherit,
Blooms in sunny gardens grown,
And some beside far rivers known—
With old summer memories round them,
Link'd with many a glance and tone—
The loved, but not the changed, we found them;—
Tones grow strange, and glances chill,
But the flowers are lovely still!

Lovely, by the piled-up volumes
Of the world's long-trusted lore—
Through the mart's throng'd toil and store,
And the temple's cold gray columns,
With a mightier wisdom fraught,
And a faith our years forgot;—

With a wealth of odours, bringing
 All the golden eves we met
 Since our first blue violets springing—
 Oh, the days that rise and set
 On Earth's green hills and valleys yet!—
 Oh, the springs our part was miss'd in!—
 We are far, and they forget—
 The hearts their hopes no more exist in
 But o'er many a winter's track;—
 Still the flowers come blooming back!
 Back to tell of dells and meadows,
 Where the blossom'd thorn breathes on
 Through the summer eve and dawn!
 Back to fill our dreams with shadows
 Of old trees and woodbine walls,
 Where the light on roses falls!
 Flowers of summer days, return ye
 With such silvan visions rife,
 To the bond-years of our journey
 Through this dusty throng of life,
 Only to wither in its strife?
 As the free thoughts perish early—
 Found with you by stream and cliff—
 Now our pathways reach them rarely;
 Yet from city homes like ours
 Comes a blessing for the flowers.

In taking leave of our interesting countrywoman, we cannot refrain from expressing a hope, that the present collection is but a small instalment of what we think we have a right to expect at her hands. Powers such as hers, directed by the energy and self-reliance which her early history displays, seemed to promise more abundant, if not richer fruits, than are offered to us in these pages, as the result of more than three years' gatherings; and while we gladly believe that the interval has been wisely and judiciously devoted to the labour of self-education, we look forward to the future with more of confidence. We will own, too, that, with the desire of renewing our acquaintance with the poetess, there is mixed up a feeling of curiosity as to the solution of the interesting and beautiful problem in self-education which her history presents; and we shall watch anxiously, in her next publication, for the results of the full development of a mind so peculiarly circumstanced, thrown so entirely upon its own internal resources, and so completely dependant, in its progress towards knowledge, upon "the light that burns within."

THE BOLLANDISTS.

II.

THE premature death of Father Rosweyde, who fell a victim to his charity and martyr-devotion for learning, was a touching appeal to the future Bollandists. It addressed them in the words of St. Basil, which had been adopted as the inspiring motto in the preface to the Fasti Sanctorum.

"Arise! O illustrious painters, you who can do justice to our victorious heroes; for my part, I shall retire, and shall rejoice that you surpass me in your eloquent picture of their triumphant combats."*

The real commencement of the "Acta Sanctorum" dates from the death of Rosweyde, and twenty years' preparations were still required before the laying of the foundation-stone of that enduring monument. It progressed with the slowness characteristic of religious societies, which think more of eternity than of time. The Jesuits watched over the inheritance of Rosweyde and the glory of the saints. The work could not fall into better hands. In less than three generations, the Jesuits had given nine new saints to the Church, and enrolled in various degrees of the sacred calendar more than ninety names, exclusive of the innumerable martyrs in China and Japan. The Society owed the conversion of its founder and its own establishment to the reading of a saint's life; and the recent acts of St. Francis Xavier had secured for her, among other conquests, Father Bollandus, the creator of the "Acta Sanctorum."*

Bollandus was born in 1596, in Tirlemont, duchy of Limburg. At ten years of age he was sent to school at Utrecht, where his gentle character won for him the affections of his masters and school-fellows. In five years he had completed the ordinary course of preparatory studies, and attained, by his extraordinary diligence, such a fund of varied information, especially in history, that he was familiarly known among his companions as Cornucopia Scientiarum. He had many rivals but no enemies, as he wore his honours modestly, and was ever ready to communicate his knowledge. When only thirteen years old, he had read Maffei's history of India, and was able to point out on the map, and trace in all their details the scenes of the first conquests of the Portuguese, and especially of the miraculous diffusion of the Gospel by St. Francis Xavier. Names, dates, topography, once treasured up in his memory, were never forgotten.

September 21, 1612, he entered the Society of the Jesuits; and, after passing through the ordinary course, professed rhetoric during six years. One of the professors under whom he studied theology in Louvain was Peter Wadding, a native of Waterford, who had embraced the institute of St. Ignatius, at Tournay, in 1601, in the fifteenth year of his age. To this circumstance perhaps, and to the friendship and literary correspondence which were afterwards maintained between pupil and teacher, may be attributed, in part, the zeal of Bollandus for the preservation of the literary monuments of Ireland, and his warm and effective sympathy for the sufferings of her sons.

At the death of Rosweyde, Bollandus, who was then at Mechlin, was ordered by the Society to execute the projected enterprise. "He went, he saw, he returned," in the words of Papebroch.† The books which had been purchased by Rosweyde, and which immediately after his death had been carried off to the public library, were placed at his disposal, and the "Acta" commenced. But in examining the materials collected by Rosweyde, he met with several disappointments. Of the seventeen volumes which had been announced, there were only the titles of the three first, the mere indigested texts of the following twelve, and almost nothing on the most important part, the annotations and criticism on the acts.

He changed, moreover, the whole plan of the work; instead of giving, separately, a mass of uninterrupted text, and reserving for the close those notes, which, perhaps, might be deferred indefinitely, he resolved to give a separate commentary on each life; the martyrology was his first work; he adopted the Roman, but changed its order, placing the saints, not according to their rank in the hierarchy, but according to their date; he also added all those who had been honoured in particular churches, and recorded in national calendars; he inserted, removed, and deferred many others; finally, he resolved to fill up the wants left by Rosweyde (who had examined the Belgian libraries only), and to extend his correspondence through the whole Christian world.

* Acta S.S. Præf. Gen. Cap. i. p. 16.

There was one striking difference between the plan of Bollandus and that adopted by our great Hagiologists. The former commenced with the martyrology, or calendar, as the basis of his labours, as it probably contained, though very briefly, the most ancient and authentic record of the saint. In his preface to the "Lives of the Saints of February," chap. iii., he informs us, that when he found Colgan engaged in the immense undertaking to publish all the lives of the Irish saints, from documents in the Irish language which were then totally unknown on the Continent, he strenuously advised him to publish the martyrologies first, especially those of Tallaght and of Marian Gorman—the former of the eighth, the latter of the eleventh century; next, to give the ancient councils and religious poems, which were of undoubted antiquity, together with the Irish annals, in order that the learned of other countries might be able to appreciate the credibility of Irish history and assist him in his labours. But Colgan, though resolved to publish the martyrologies, was obliged to reject the advice of his friend; his superiors and his countrymen insisted that the lives should come first; and, moreover, there were some things in the martyrologies which he feared he would not be able to clear up, as they appeared to have been added by a later hand, and others which might provoke the ridicule of the censorious. Thus the advice of Bollandus was rejected—and, to the great discredit of the Irish Catholics, those martyrologies are yet lying, unpublished, in the libraries of Rome, Brussels, and the Royal Irish Academy. Some of the difficulties which obstructed the path of the Bollandists, in treating of Irish saints, have been already removed by Messrs. Hodges and Smith's publication of the "Annals of the Four Masters," which can no longer be treated by the new Bollandists as a document of dubious authority.* Though the advice of Bollandus was rejected, he prayed fervently that Colgan might succeed in publishing his work, "Deo tamen supplicamur, ut ad opus de Sanctis, ut inchoavit perficiendum, vires ei subsidiaque alia largiatur." Many of those "additional helps" were contributed in money by himself.

Bollandus was not disheartened at his own gigantic project—the collection of the annals of the Universal Church. He relied on the innumerable sons of Ignatius who were dispersed over the four quarters of the globe; he invited others to help him in his work—it was the first example of the kind—which not only traced out a plan for future generations, but actually opened a grand field for the combined operations of all his contemporaries.

This active correspondence increased the original materials fourfold; legends, acts, proper-offices,† au-thentications of relics, acts of canonization and of translation, transcripts and originals, poured in from all quarters, and were stored up in two little rooms which had been allotted to Bollandus, in the Jesuit establishment at Antwerp. In this mass of materials there was an ideal order, but it was only in his tenacious memory. He inherited all the child-like and ingenuous confidence of Father Heribert; he took the whole twelve months to himself, and was quite satisfied that he would live to see them completed, nay, he was already preparing, as a supplement to the twelve months, the text of the Greek "Acta," to be published separately; general chronological, geographical tables, and an index of words for the whole work; collections of martyrologies, of moral precepts and examples, a catalogue raisonné of all the authors cited; a universal history of bishops, bishoprics, and monasteries. He complained that no regular record had been kept of the vast number of Catholics who had been put to death, in later times, for the faith, by Protestants—a complaint which is especially true of Ireland—but he resolved to supply the deficiency, by giving memoirs on all the victims of the Reformation, and on all the holy persons who had edified the Church, after the year 1500, though they had not been honoured by canonization or beatification. "When all this is completed," he says, "if I have time, I must cheer my old age by a collection of the ascetical doctrine taught by all the saints of the year."*

Who can read without a smile these lines which have been cited by the new Bollandists, in the fifty-seventh folio volume, which they have lately published. They do not believe the man is yet born, whose grandson will have the glory of concluding their work. The superiors of Bollandus evidently shared his sturdy confidence, for they never dispensed him from being the confessor and director of persons of all ranks and ages, the catechist of the poor, the father and beloved master of innumerable souls. Not more than one-third of his time was devoted to the Acta, and it was even understood that they should be the fruits of his leisure hours—"Horis successivis."†

But this ingenuous improvidence of man was an act of the providence of God. So at least thought Papebroch, who had the remark from Bollandus.‡ The latter often protested, towards the close of his life, that if he had imagined at first the real nature of his work, he would not have dared to undertake or even to think of it. And in truth, asks Papebroch, who without temerity or a special revelation, could bequeath his projects to a future age, and start a literary work which other generations are to complete. The literary world had as yet witnessed nothing of the kind. These words were penned one hundred and fifty years ago, "but what would he think," ask the new Bollandists, "had he foreseen the destiny of his work, which was almost annihilated by the suppression of the society, was then re-established and entrusted to the order of the Premonstratenses, in the Abbey of Tongerlo, and before a new volume had been fully prepared, was once more engulfed in the tempest that overthrew the whole fabric of ecclesiastical and civil society."§

During five years Bollandus worked single-handed,

† The proper masses of the patron saints of France and Ireland were published at Paris in 1734, by order of the Pope. Antoninus O'Kenney edited them. They were publicly celebrated both in Paris and Dublin, by order of Luke, archbishop of the latter, and and in peace, at his enterprise. But the impatient began to harass him; among others the old abbot of Lessies could not die in peace if he had not seen a volume appear. As soon as the first sheets of the month of January were ready for the press, additional help was required; but as the house at Antwerp was poor, Don Leytens came to its aid, by establishing a bourse of 800 florins for an additional hagiographer. But the generous patron, alas! did not live to read the elegant preface, where the Abbey of Lessies is complimented for "having four orders of saints, in paintings, in reliquaries, in the library, and in the stalls of the choir."*

Amongst the pupils of Bollandus, who were very numerous and affectionately attached to their master, more than thirty entered the Society; and from these he selected two, who were destined to bring his work to its final perfection—one was Father Godfrey Henschenius, distinguished for his mild and placid temper, and an eminently comprehensive and penetrating intellect, which gave the finishing touch to the plans of Bollandus. The second, who was yet in the lowest classes in the college, preserved during his whole life the ardour and vivacity of youth, a rich and luxuriant fund of genius, industry, and controversial fire, which the snows of eighty winters could not tame. Daniel Papebroch had concluded the first course of his studies at the age of fourteen; to occupy his time he read his rhetoric course again—no thought of the future ever clouded his brow—nothing ever troubled him, not even his vocation; though among all the visions careering through his fervid imaginations there was one thought fixed—that he would be nothing but a Jesuit.† Bollandus, however, often marked him out as one of his successors. In a private conversation he told him, that it was full time to deliberate on the choice of a state of life. Papebroch had often received a similar advice with his boyish petulance, but this admonition prevailed. He resigned himself to the direction of Father Bollandus, and, in some time after, entered the Society, with his three brothers; his two sisters, also, and his widowed mother, were influenced by his example to renounce the world.

Such were the three first fellow-labourers of the "Acta Sanctorum." Father Bollandus during thirty-four, Henschenius during forty-six, and Papebroch during fifty-five years. Those patriarchs of hagiography suggest to the mind of the learned reader another contemporary triumvirate, which gave the first impetus to the labours of the congregation of St. Maur, Dom. Luc. D'Achery, the founder of the "Acta Sanctorum," of the order of St. Benedict, is the counterpart of Bollandus; his eminent disciple, Mabillon, was the rival and friend of Henschenius, and there is more than one point of resemblance between the indefatigable Montfaucon (who was familiarly called Monsieur de Roc Taillade, in the monastery of St. Germain) and Father Papebroch, who was denominated, by one of his pamphleteering opponents, as "Papebrochius Bombardizans,"—the bombarding Father Papebroch.‡

In 1635, Father Henschenius commenced his la-

‡ A Carmelite wrote a pamphlet against Papebroch, with the following singular title: Novus Ismael cujus manus contra omnes et omnium manus contra eum sive P. Daniel Papebrochius, Jesuita omnes oppugnans, &c. &c. Some may attribute his pugnacity to the fact that he was born on St. Patrick's day—the title on which, as we shall see, he claimed Irish hagiography for himself.

bours with the "Acta of St. Amand," for the 6th of February. That work was an epoch in the history of the Bollandists. Henschenius gave full scope to his genius, and devoted twenty-two paragraphs to his Prolegomena on the life of the saint; he discussed the year of his birth—his native country—the order to which he belonged, and his apostolic labours; he followed him step by step, from north to south, through all the monasteries which he founded, or in which he resided. Elnone is a grand object of his researches, he examined its archives, started the questions on the three King Dagoberts, published the first "Charter of exemption," goes over every part of Flanders in which the saint had preached the Gospel—maintains that he was the apostle both of Antwerp and Ghent—accompanies him to Brabant and along the banks of the Rhine and Meuse—establishes beyond contradiction that he was a bishop—restores the bishopric of Maestricht—follows the travels of his apostle beyond the Rhine and Danube, and his three pilgrimages to Rome, accompanies him back to Strasbourg, where he discusses the question on the twenty-three bishops of that see—clears up his connexion with the palace of the Merovingian race—resumes and arranges in order the whole chronology of a life of sixty years, which was intimately connected with the lives of fourteen other saints, and of all the distinguished characters of the seventh century—the most perplexing epoch of French history—enumerates one by one; and often gives a full history of the foundation and progress of not less than thirty-seven monasteries, which the saint had either founded or suggested—discusses his will—the date of his death—his legends in different martyrologies—his festival days—his office—the translation of his relics—the different honours paid to him—and, finally, the foundations of which he was said, but not with certainty, to have been the author. After this comprehensive preface he gives the triple "Acta" in prose, the first of which was then, for the first time, published in a collection of twelve different copies, all divided into new chapters and sections, with the various readings in the margin and critical notes at the end of each chapter. Finally, he gave, as an appendix, two ancient hymns and a fragment of the chronicle of St. Amand. Through the entire course of this mass of learning, the reader is conducted in a few minutes, with a marvellous perspicuity, by a running commentary of marginal notes, which enable him, in a moment to find his way through eighty-eight closely-written folio pages in two columns, full of proper names, and dates, and names of places in many different countries.

When the pupil presented this first fruit of his genius to Bollandus, a new light, a revelation burst on the father of the "Acta." Never had he dreamed of anything so comprehensive, so precise, so perfect in all its details. Without a moment's hesitation he turned on his cherished labours, resolved to adopt the course pointed out by his young friend, recast the whole month of January which he had himself compiled, suppressed several sheets which had been already printed off; in a word, changed for the third and last time the plan of the "Acta Sanctorum."*

The plan of the work was now definitively arranged; but what was its object? Why, if we may be allowed to use the expression, it was nothing less than a preparatory process of canonization for all the saints of seventeen centuries. Several lawyers, on receiving the first paragraphs, expressed their amazement at the project of starting on every saint, all the refined discussions of the most intricate legal proceedings,* but Papebroch answered them, that in their courts the heaviest causes decided regarded only the property or character or life of a man, whereas he and his brethren were pronouncing on the glory of the saints. The judge is assisted by attorney-general and lawyers and juries; the facts are generally of recent date, ocular or contemporary evidence is at hand. The sentence is pronounced, the cause is over, a few persons only, very rarely a few generations are effected by it. But in the high court of the hagiologist, where the "Acta" of the saints are discussed, he is both judge, jury, lawyer, plaintiff, and defendant; he must summon to his tribunal witnesses from every age and country, hear and reconcile or object contradictory evidence; decipher and collate documents in various languages and of different dates, written law, traditional law, history, charters, archeology, chronology, geography, all are interrogated in this monster trial. The sentence once passed, it is neither secret nor irrevocable, nor exempt from criticism and censorship; it is pronounced publicly and fearlessly, and often against the fondest prejudices of a whole nation, or the universal opinions of the learned of the day.†

At another time it may be useful to show that Irish prejudices were not respected by Bollandus. For the present let us listen to the storm of indignation poured out against him by our great chronologist, O'Flaherty. "I cannot but be greatly astonished at the liberty of the Rev. Father Bolland, who has within our memory stigmatized the Irish, as totally ignorant of letters in the ages of Paganism, and has not hesitated to declare, that before St. Patrick's time, they, as well as the Iberians, Gauls, Britons, Belgians, and Germans, received the knowledge of them from the Romans. To support which he produces the testimony of Tacitus. But Julius Cæsar, prior to Tacitus, writes, that the Druids had the use of Greek letters in Gaul, and derived their discipline and knowledge from Britain; now the learning of the Druids flourished in Ireland, therefore the Gauls, Britons, and Irish were not ignorant of the Greek letters from the earliest ages, contrary to what Bolland has so confidently asserted." Pars iii. c. 30. This is a specimen of the national feelings which raised against the Bollandists, at different times, from many countries, an opposition which would have disheartened men who were not influenced by the conviction, that they were erecting a great monument to the Catholic church, where truth alone should preside, without distinction of Jew or Gentile, Greek or Barbarian.

But the contemporaries of Papebroch watched the great process of canonization with an interest and benevolence, suitable to the grandeur of the conception. In the space of twenty-five years, the 1170 acts of the saints of January, and the 1310 of February—among which the life of St. Bridget alone is a little volume—were welcomed with enthusiasm by the literary and religious world. Even the Protestants offered the homage of their gratitude and sincere admiration. Vossius, who had written against the "Acta" of St. Antony, and maintained that the use of the sign of the cross was not so ancient nor so frequent as it was there represented, promised to retract as soon as he saw the preface of the Bollandists to the "Acta," wherein they produce innumerable texts of the Fathers, referring to those very Acta. And he kept his word faithfully in the next work that he published,* and even stated that his great wish was realized, that men had now the means of deciding between truth and fable—"Ut certa a dubiis probabilia a manifestè falsis secernerentur." Even before Queen Christina of Sweden had renounced Lutheranism, the "Acta" of St. Anchar, the apostle of the north, were enthroned on her reading-desk, and beneath them she wrote with her own learned hand, and in her laconic style—"Legi et gratum fecit." It was the first gleam of Catholic faith that burst on her soul.† The abbot of St. Amand, who had been long vainly endeavouring to unravel the history of the patron of his abbey, was so delighted that he posted away instantly to Antwerp, to express his rapturous gratitude to the learned Father Henschenius.‡ The expectations of Germany and France had been already raised by two detached dissertations; one on the bishops of Maëstricht, a see which was not known to have ever existed,§ another on the three Dagoberts, which revealed for the first time to French historians, one of their kings who had reigned seventeen years. The birth of a dauphin could not have caused a greater sensation among the literati of France, than the resurrection of this new Merovingian, who, after a slumber of 1000 years, took his place once more among the things that were. Cardinal Bona congratulated Bollandus in the warmest terms, and wished him length of days proportionate to the grandeur of his design. Father Reynaud, though his prejudices as a Lyons man were hurt by the refutation of his new history of St. Chamond, surrendered at discretion, and generously acknowledged that the church would never see a second work on the theme selected by the Bollandists. This was not the mere compliment of a vanquished brother. The highest authority in the Catholic world spoke the same language. Rome referred to the Bollandists to decide who was patron saint of the kingdom of Navarre, some maintaining that it was St. Francis Xavier, others that it was St. Firmin of Amiens, on the grounds that he had first preached the faith there. A congregation of cardinals, by the advice of Bollandus, answered, that as the arguments on both sides were equally balanced, the question could not be decided; accordingly, Alexander VII. imposed silence on the disputants, and ordered that both saints should be honoured as patrons of the kingdom.|| The same Pope pronounced that pithy eulogium which expresses the general opinions of his day on the "Acta Sanctorum." "A work more glorious and more useful to the Church has never been attempted."¶ In 1670, when Henschenius and Papebroch, in their first literary tour travelled through the Rhenish provinces, Switzerland, Italy, and France, they were received in all quarters with the most flattering distinctions by the learned, both Protestant and Catholic. The honour derived all its value, in the eyes of the humble Bollandists, from the fact, that it was virtually a homage and reparation offered to the saints of God, and a protest against the blasphemies of the preceding century.

This great work was, moreover, a bulwark raised by the providence of God against the rising sect of sneering philosophers. It is impossible to look on those noble volumes, which must ever be the monarchs of the richest libraries, without thinking within yourself, how much more cordial would have been the co-operation of the seventeenth century, in erecting this noble monument, if a prophet had arisen in a circle of the hagiologists and their admirers, and said to them; "No time to be lost; the days are at hand, when saints shall be wanting, when truth shall be dimmed, and the stones of the sanctuary scattered at the heads of the streets."

But God foresaw the crisis. In the interval between two hurricanes—the rebellion of Luther and the French Revolution, the second of which was to sweep away all that had escaped the havoc of the first in the last days of peace—he raised up indefatigable labourers to record an inventory of the spiritual wealth of his church; to preserve and impart to it the immortality of type. The wrath of kings and nations may sweep along, overthrowing temples, cloisters, academies, archives, books, and vellums; these are but the light leaves carried off in the storm, the monument itself shall stand "ore perennius." When the dust is laid and the light returns, faith, honesty, candid and zealous learning will still read on its pedestal ratified by the approbation of ages, the inscription on the Roman obelisk:

Christus vincit
Christus regnat
Christus imperat.

How often has a similar compliment been paid to Colgan, by all who feels an interest in the history of our country. Examine our modern authors; whether they discuss history, or topography, or archæology, he is one of their principal lights. But the Catholic who does not fully admit the English opinion, that Ireland has no history, will not confine himself to barren laudation of Colgan. The best praise you can give him, is to endeavour to complete his work.

Dr. Lanigan's history is a noble production. It makes the best possible use of all printed materials, but, except in very few instances, it never cites a manuscript. Usher, Ware, the Benedictines, Colgan, Fleming, and the Bollandists, are turned to the best account. But how can it be a complete history? Colgan's "Acta," a goodly-sized folio, contains only the three first months. Had he lived to publish two other folios on the remaining months, Dr. Lanigan's history would require at least two additional volumes.

It is said that Colgan's unpublished works are lying in the College of St. Isidore; but on that, as well as on several other Irish literary matters, there is much more interest felt by the Royal Irish Academy than by any other body of men in our country.

There is another department in which the Bollandists were rich, but Colgan was deficient—the relics of ancient art, such as painting, sculpture, and architecture. The deficiency has been partly supplied for Ireland by several eminent Protestants, but from their hands the work of preservation is all that can be expected. If there was a society in Ireland, on the plan of the Dusseldorf, for the distribution of pious pictures, it might form the germ of a thoroughly national school of Irish art, by enlisting the practical doctrines of the Catholic Church to aid the enterprise. Religion is a fertile principle in Ireland—a fact to which our societies of Artists appear to be insensible. Irish Catholics must wish for the day when the images of St. Patrick, St. Bridget, and St. Columba, which they suspend in their Churches, Convents, or Oratories, will not be images, in genere, imported from other countries, much less images of home manufacture by artists who know neither old Irish costume nor symbolical art; but faithful representations, erected by men who, for the love of God and their country, have studied in all its details the religious history of Ireland, and especially the relics of her ecclesiastical art. More than two hundred years ago such a school of art was felt to be a desideratum, but the man who projected it had other cares to attend to in the troubles of 1641.

RECOLLECTIONS, CONFESSIONS, ADMISSIONS, AND AVOWALS
OF AN

Irish Parliamentary Reporter.

By WM. B. MAC CABB, ESQ.,
Author of "A Catholic History of England."

Mrs. Page.—Sir Hugh, my husband says, my son profits nothing in the world at his book; I pray you ask him some questions in his accidence.

Evans.—Come hither, William; hold up your head; come.

Mrs. Page.—Come on, sirrah: hold up your head; answer your master, be not afraid.

Evans.—William, how many numbers is in nouns?

William.—Two.

Mrs. Quicquity.—Truly, I thought there had been one number more; because they say, odd's nouns.

CHAP. III.

THE author determines on becoming an author—his earliest literary efforts consigned to the care of Paddy Quirk, who lights his pipe with them. His first preceptor, Mr. Mark Ussher, of Maynooth. The Latin grammar, and the inexplicable mystery in learning it; waste of time at school. The old system of education—its uselessness demonstrated. "A scholar" ignorant of punctuation. The value of a knowledge of modern languages illustrated. A knowledge of French elevates a poor clerk to the position of a member of parliament. A French professor in Ireland amazed that the people of France could not speak French like himself. The subject illustrated in the adventures of George Geoghegan, and most clearly demonstrated in the stupendous soliloquy of Mister Timothy O'Regan, Philomath.

MY infantine ambition was to be an author, and I commenced my labours in that capacity at an uncommonly early period in life, for I could not be more than seven years of age when I projected, and actually wrote out the two first pages of what I intended should be "A Spelling-book for Children!" I had the advantage of learning my letters under the superintendence of Mr. Mark Ussher, then professor of Belles Lettres in the Royal College of Maynooth, and who was induced to open a school for boys in the town, because he was at once to have as scholars my two elder brothers and myself, with Pat and Joe Langan, Edward Croker, and Kit Roberts—the last, the son of a man who held some government office in the town, and who was of course a Protestant, and hence a sort of prodigy in our little school.

Mr. Mark Ussher was himself an author. He had composed a grammar and spelling-book in the English language, and young as I was, I remarked that in pursuance of his plan, the words were divided into syllables according to their proper sound. I found it would be a great advantage to little boys, if their spelling-books were so divided, and I therefore determined on composing one for them. I laboured under one very great disadvantage as an author—I did not know how to write. It took me a fortnight to write two pages, like printed letters; and at the end of that time, my brother James, who had a much more accurate judgment of the value of my literary labours, than he was gifted with a sympathy for the author, or the object of his toil, ran away with them, and presented them to Paddy Quirk, with an earnest request he would light his pipe with them. And thus "at one fell swoop" were all my many hours' penmanship confiscated, and my first literary project literally "whiffed away" by Paddy Quirk, who had the most sovereign contempt for what he called "book-larning."

It is but justice to the memory of that good old man, Mark Ussher, to state that I acquired all the knowledge I ever possessed of arithmetic, and my slight skill in penmanship, to him, and him only. Under his superintendence I fought my way manfully through the mysteries of "Gough," and could read so plainly, and write so intelligibly, that I was declared fitted to begin my Latin grammar. I left him, to begin my Latin grammar—I really cannot tell how often. This was a remarkable fact, that I was always required at each new school I subsequently went to, no matter what progress I had made, nor how well I fancied I was acquainted with it, still the rule was always the same—each new preceptor seemed to have got a particular knack of his own for declining "musa," and was possessed of some secret in the conjugation of "amo," and therefore—"I must begin again with the Latin grammar:" sometimes I had got into Corde-rius—sometimes was with Cæsar battling with the Gauls—sometimes in the very heat and conflict of the Cataline conspiracy, when changing to a new school—I had to go back again and "begin my Latin grammar."

And thus year after year was wasted—with Latin grammar, Greek grammar, and a few authors both in languages, and with the perfect consciousness in my own mind, that I had been wasting my time, that I knew but little of the classics, and as far as school education went, absolutely nothing of any other language or science, or of that species of solid, useful information which could aid me in my progress through the world.

I saw my deficiencies—set myself to work—commenced studying—read at least ten hours a day, for three years—laboured so zealously and so untiringly, and took so little exercise, as to bring on a fever, from which I recovered, with the consolation that I had taught myself more in any one of the three months that had lately passed, than I had learned in the ten preceding years.

Let not those who may honour these pages with a perusal, fancy that any miserable feeling of egotism induces me to mention these facts. I deliberately introduce them for the purpose of referring to that deplorable waste of time which takes place in Ireland, under the name of "school education," and to which the victims are the sons of the middle classes. I do not know whether the remarks I have now to make are applicable or not, to the existing state of education in Ireland. I hope they are not; but if they be, then I trust, that what I do state may help to put an end to that which was once an established system in schools—namely, that once a boy commenced with Latin grammar, but little attention was paid to his progress as an English scholar. His writing was neglected—he was left to pick up a knowledge of English grammar out of the Latin! He was free to learn geography if he pleased—it was the same with book-keeping; not the slightest intimation was given to him of the study of English composition; and supposing he availed himself of the opportunities afforded to him, he might leave the "classical" school, a competent construer of Homer, an adept in prosody, a ready translator of such Latin books as he had been taught; perhaps he might be so far a mathematician as to have "gone through" Euclid, and to know algebra. But supposing he was not to be a member of the learned professions, and had not a fortune at his back to carry him through the world, he was—a useless member of society; unfitted for any situation in life but that of an usher of a school, and thus doomed to aid in carrying on the same system to which he himself had been a victim.

And how many victims of the same sort have I not known. I am aware of one person—he had been a scholar of Trinity College—that is, in other words, he was a first-rate classical scholar, and he was luckily enough to obtain the chance of being engaged as a parliamentary reporter. Upon the first trial made of his abilities, he sent in a report which, in length, would occupy about two of these pages, and it was all one sentence! From its commencement to its close there was not a single stop. The Trinity College scholar knew nothing of English composition, and he was as ignorant of punctuation as he was of the Koran.

Let no one suppose that I undervalue a knowledge—a thorough knowledge of Greek or Latin. I am not so utterly ignorant of either as to disparage that knowledge; but what I desire is, that an end should be put to that system by which it has been inculcated, that a knowledge of them should supersede every other—that they are sufficient for the general purposes of life; that they are applicable to all circumstances, and suited to all times; when they are, in fact, in dealing with the general affairs of mankind, but the large £100 and £1000 notes—very valuable per se—but for which it is difficult to procure a quantity of valuable things in exchange; whilst, on the other hand, caligraphy, book-keeping, composition, a knowledge of the modern languages, combined with industry, integrity, and perseverance, are the five-pound-notes and sovereigns, for which most people can give to their owner, "the current coin of the realm."

Why should not the young Irishman, without a fortune to sustain him, and with the good sense to see that he is in reality not equal to Byron as a poet, nor to Curran as an orator, and who has the determination of sustaining himself by his honest industry, if it is not his good fortune to have learned a trade, prepare himself for employment, by writing a good hand, by being a good accountant, by possessing a thorough knowledge of English grammar, and (if he have the opportunity) learning to speak and write with facility some one, two, or three of the modern languages. It is thus that Englishmen are now preparing themselves for situations, and it is necessary for them to do so, as well as Irishmen; for at this moment, the best situations in the richest mercantile establishments in Manchester, are filled by Germans, because the German young men almost universally know not only their own language and English, but two or three other of the Continental languages.

As a proof of the value of a knowledge even of our modern tongues, I may mention an instance which has come under my own observation. It is that of an eminent member of parliament, who came up to London a very humble lad—and who was engaged as an assistant in a large establishment, which had an extensive trade with France. The person who carried on the French correspondence for this house died suddenly. It was necessary to write off by that night's post to France. No one in the establishment was found capable of writing the letter but this lad, who had learned the French language from a refugee. He wrote—was permitted to retain the situation of corresponding clerk for a few weeks on trial; during these few weeks gave such satisfaction to his employers, that the post was conferred on him, and his salary raised at once from £40 to £300 a-year. He subsequently became a partner in the same house, acquired an immense fortune, retired from business to purchase a large estate in the neighbourhood of the village in which he was born. I have seen him in his own country as a landlord—loved by the poor for his kindness and his charities, respected by the rich for his independence and his virtues, and esteemed by all who know him for his talents and accurate information upon a vast variety of subjects. I have had the honour of being frequently in the society of this gentleman, and I refrain from mentioning his name, because I have not had the opportunity of asking his permission to do so.

This gentleman learned French from a Frenchman; and when I recommend young Irishmen to learn modern languages, I do so with the proviso, that they acquire them only from natives, for if not, they may discover when it is too late, that they have been wasting their time almost as completely as if they never had given an hour's study to the subject. A person with whom I am thoroughly well acquainted, assured me some years ago, that he had been at one time a professor of French in a large scholastic establishment in Ireland—because he had studied the language thoroughly, knew it in all its niceties, and considered himself a first-rate French scholar, until he went to France, when he found to his utter amazement that he and the natives differed so completely in their pronunciation, that they were as unintelligible to him, as he was incomprehensible to them. It required, he said, many months before he could listen to them with satisfaction, or speak to them with confidence. I may add that the person I now refer to, holds a situation, worth at the least £500 a-year, and the duties of which he could not discharge for one hour, if he were not a perfect master both of the French and Spanish languages.

Every inch of railway that is opened in England, in Ireland, or on the Continent, is an incentive, or should be regarded as such, to the industrious youth of Ireland, to acquire a perfect knowledge of English, of French, German, Spanish, and Italian. Such are the proper studies for those who have to work their way in the world. Let them struggle hard as they can, they will find abundance of able competitors in England. Let them not work—or let them continue to spend the years of their youth in schools, as when I was a boy, and they will be found, some of them perhaps at the bar, and—as I have known—exceedingly glad to get chance employment from a Parliamentary Reporter—or, they will be found, as I have known how many a noble, able, and clever young man—good classical scholars, too—shouldering a musket, and losing their lives in the service of the East India Company, which (according to its regulations) would never give them an ensign's commission, though they were gifted with the skill of a Wellington and the genius of a Napoleon.

This subject is an important one—and it is hoped that these observations will not be deemed out of place, when it is recollected that they come from an individual who was compelled, by the vile school-system of Ireland, to lose the most precious years of his life, and whose manhood has been passed in the endeavour to compensate—and it can do so but badly amid its many cares—for that species of knowledge which he sighed even when he was a boy, to possess, but that he never could attain.

If a young Irishman desire to “try his fortune” in London, even the most common every day acquirements will be found to aid him better than his classical knowledge, if he have nothing but that to depend upon; as the following anecdote will abundantly testify :—

My friend, George Geoghegan,* was as good a fellow as ever existed, but he was no genius; and had the merit of never fancying he was one: still for his misfortune, he became some how or other the proprietor of an Irish liberal paper; and for some article that appeared in his journal, and which was written (of course) “by a friend to the liberty of the press,” poor George was convicted of a libel. George was to be brought up to be sentenced, and, as he was not more than nineteen years of age at the time, I recommended him to appear in court with his shirt-collar turned down, and a ribbon round his neck, as if he were a little boy—an expedient which had been tried in the Irish rebellion prosecutions with great success. George followed my advice. He was in the traversers' box, and did not look to be more than seventeen years of age; but, unfortunately, at the moment that he was desired to stand up to hear the judgment of the court pronounced, a deaf old gentleman, who had no business there, but was anxious to hear what the judge was going to say, stood up at the same moment; and Judge Jebb, who was to pronounce the sentence, fixing his eye on this old gentleman, rated him soundly for his libellous propensities, declared it was scandalous to see one of his age sheltering an anonymous slanderer; and, getting disgusted with the old gentleman, at seeing how perfectly unmoved he was at such language being addressed to him, passed the severest sentence the court could inflict on him. The old gentleman sat down smiling. Judge Jebb looked daggers at him, and evidently regretted he had not committed a felony, in order that he might condemn such a hardened old brute to be hanged—but poor George Geoghegan was meanwhile walked off in his youthful habiliments to prison.

Three or four years afterwards I met George in London. He was then “connected with the press,” that is, he was “doing” for two or three papers, in two or three different ways—he was “doing” a Leinster paper with “a correspondence,” and “doing” a Connaught paper with “leading articles”—he was “doing” an English provincial paper with “Parliamentary intelligence,” and he was “doing” all the Morning and Evening papers he could induce to receive his copy with “the Reports of Parliamentary Committees.” In truth, a more hard-working, indefatigable creature than honest George there never existed. A better-natured being with limited means, I may add, there could not be. He was “making out the cause” as well as he could; and he was always ready to do a kindness to a friend in distress. Amongst such was Mr. O'Regan—and it is wonderful what numbers of O'Regans one will meet in London. The wealth of Cressus would not suffice to answer all their demands. Upon an Irishman settled in London, they have no pity. If he is not in a prison, they fancy he must be in a palace; and if he be in a palace, and comply with all their demands upon him, they will be sure soon to have him in a prison.

This was George's account of his transactions with Mr. O'Regan, and I wish I could convey to the reader

a particle of the fun, delight, and rich enjoyment with which George told anything that told against himself :

"When I met O'Regan," said George, "the poor devil was without a shilling, a bed, or a dinner. I was very hard up myself at the time, and I told him candidly that money I could not spare—a dinner I could not give him; but that I had a room and a bed unoccupied, and if he could wait for breakfast until two o'clock every day, he should have share of mine.

"I need not tell you that O'Regan jumped at my offer; but he was not twenty-four hours in my place until I repented of my generosity; for, whether it was that he was hungry for his breakfast or not, I do not know; but, utterly forgetful that I was often obliged to be up until two, three, four, or five o'clock in the morning, he used to bolt into my room about six, and kick up such a clatter with shaving himself—for there was but one looking-glass in the two rooms—that he was sure to rouse me out of bed before nine.

"One morning I was lying awake in bed, when I heard O'Regan starting out of his in the next room, and I resolved to pretend I was asleep, no matter what noise he should make; for I was actually so fatigued that I felt it necessary to remain in bed.

"In a few minutes afterwards, in darted O'Regan—rushed over to the window, and, in doing so, kicked one boot to one side of the room, and the other to the opposite; then dragged open the window blinds, so as to let the sun-light straight in on my eyes; and then, turning round, looked steadily at me.

"I did not stir a muscle, but imitated a snore most perfectly.

"'Well—' said O'Regan, drawing in his breath—'but that is the lazyist, stupidest, sleepiest—but no matter—here's at him again.'

And, with that, he pretended to stumble against a chair, and in the seeming effort to save himself, pulled a large trunk down on the floor, so as to give a very perceptible shake to the house, and to make the windows tremble for their safety.

"I only snored a little louder, and gave a slight turn in the bed.

"'Well, well, well,' piteously groaned out O'Regan; 'sure that was a noise that would waken the dead. And, by dad, may be he is dead. Halloo! George!' said the tender-hearted Mr. O'Regan, shaking me as hard as he could, 'is there anything the matter with you?'

"My only response was a snore, which might be mistaken for an angry grunt.

"'Oh! I give it up,' said O'Regan; he is as fast as a nail; so I may as well set to and shave myself.'

"With this observation, Mr. O'Regan commenced pulling and dragging about, and upsetting everything that was on the dressing-table; and, either fancying I was fast asleep, or utterly forgetful that he was speaking aloud what was passing in his mind, he thus went on—

"'Well, to be sure, of all the sleepy—lazy—stupid—good-for-nothing persons I ever saw—there is one of them, at any rate. And—what's this—the dickens a bit of Windsor soap there is to shave with. He used the last scran of it yesterday himself, and never thought I'd be wanting any of it this morning. Well, some people have a head, and so has a pin!

"'There's nothing left for me, but a dirty bit of yellow soap. What in the world could the omathaun be thinking of all day yesterday, that he never bought a cake of Windsor? Why, I saw them on Monday last marked up in a shop in a Middle-row, Holborn—four for a shilling. And just to save three pence—a dirty three pence!—he sets me here to shave with this odious yellow soap.

"'He'll use the same himself, to be sure. But what matter about him! Sure—he knows well enough, no one would be bothered looking at a little, scrooged-up, starved, little pinkeen like him.

"'But here goes to try if I can, by the hardest of hard work, make up a lather. And, then, how in the world can I do it without a sup of hot water?

"'Yes, Mister Timothy O'Regan—my learned Philomath—just you go and ring the bell—and call up the girl to bring you! hot water to shave yourself—and just see what a sasserarah you will be after getting. Cock you up, indeed, with hot water—brought up four pair of stairs by swivel-eyed Sarah! when she insists upon not brushing your coat, no, nor as much as cleaning your shoes, but makes you do everything for yourself. Well—when I'm leaving this place, and Lord knows! when that will be—I wont give that one as much as a sixpence—that is, if I have it to give. Oh! murder, murder; but this is a cruel case entirely.'

"Hearing," said George, "my guest thus indulging in a soliloquy with himself, I turned quietly round, so as to be able to get a complete view of him shaving.

"Mr. O'Regan had, amid sighs and groans, contrived to cover his face with a lather of soap, and he was on the point of taking up one of the razors, when he stopped suddenly short, looked fixedly at himself in the glass, and thus addressed himself.

"'Why then, Tim O'Regan, may I take the liberty of asking, what put it into your head to come to London?

"'Oh! you thought you'd make a fortune; that London streets were crowded with little boys, who all wanted to learn nothing in the world but Latin grammar, and Greek grammar, and Cordery, and Lucian, and Euclid.

"'Oh! you thought you had nothing to do but to walk up into London, and that everybody would know at once, by looking at you, that you were the man of men for teaching parsing and prosody, and propositions, and axioms, and spondees, and dactyls, and—oh! what a thundering big fool you are.

"'You thought that all you had to do was but to put on your Caroline hat, and that all the fathers in London would be running out of their houses to offer you forty pound a-year, a-piece, for each of their boys.

"'You thought that in London pupils were as plenty as paving-stones, and you'd have only to stoop down to pick one up that would be as heavy as gold in your empty pocket.

"'You thought—what right had you to think at all about anything, you born idiot.

"'A purty fellow indeed you are, to set up to teach Latin in London with a brogue upon your tongue that'd be the ruination of Virgil himself, if he went to recite a line of the Æneid with it. Didn't you know, or ought you not to have known, that if London was a large place there must be plenty of scholars in it, as good, aye and—I say it to your face, as nobody is listening, between ourselves—a great deal better than ever you can hope to be.

"'And oh! Tim Regan, what a pity it is that you hav'n't common sense. What is the reason, that instead of fancying that you were the greatest man in the town of Trim, because you knew a little bit of Latin, and a small scrap of Greek, that you didn't learn to talk English like a Christian, and to write it so that a common, low, vulgar vagabond shouldn't say that it was nothing better than pot-hooks-and-hangers.

"Oh! Tim, Tim, if ever there was an unreasonable beast of a man, sure you're that very one; but, Tim—my poor Tim—see all the lather is dried on your face, just persecute yourself again with the cold water and yellow soap, and shave yourself off-hand like a man."

"This advice, given to himself, was followed. Mr. O'Regan not only lathered himself very well again, but had shaved a portion of his upper lip, when he suddenly stopped and exclaimed:

"Tim O'Regan, you unfortunate youth, what are you to do at all, or what is to become of you! Here you are, with a great deal of learning and no small share of beauty, trapesing up and down the Strand, without as much copper in your pocket as would be change for a tenpenny-piece, and—what a world it is—there is that poor, ugly, sickly, sour-faced, little dwarf, with no more brains in his head than there is kernel in a blind nut, who could no more put the verb "tupto" through all its moods and tenses than I could dance on the tight-rope—there he is, snoring away comfortably in his own bed, with hot water to shave with whenever he chooses to call for it, and a pound to spend whenever he is disposed for a big drink—there he is, without face, or figure, mind or manners, learning or education, able to pay his way, and to have you living with him on the shaughrawn; and, instead of looking up to you, as he ought to do, it is you that are looking up to him as you ought not to do; aye, and you're so much afraid of him, that you hav'n't the spirit to go and pull him out of the bed and tell him to make breakfast for you.

"Oh! its you that were the brave fellow!—but now—you!—the scholar—a pretty scholar indeed, without as much as one little stupid boy for a pupil, to vent your spite upon—there you are now, afraid of an ignoramus, a nonentity, a born bosthoon of a dunce—no, Tim, you're fine spirit is so much broken that you daren't say boo to a goose; and, Lord, he knows but that poor George is a goose, for of all the dunderheaded, sleepy, stupid, know-nothing bosthoons that ever lived, George Geoghegan you are one—but, Tim, go on with your shaving."

"This operation was renewed. It was nearly completed, when again the operator paused to address himself.

"Well, Tim, what are you now to do with yourself? There's Mary Devine, she has ten acres of good land, just under the castle of Trim, and everybody says that she has a fortune of five hundred pounds.

"I dont think she has so much money.

"But take it that she has three hundred pounds.

"Well, what do you say to her, Tim?

"She used to look kindly at you once, when you wrote a dicolos distrophos ode upon her, beginning

"Maria, dic per omnes

Te Deos oro Timregan cur properes amando."

And she said—the darling—she couldn't understand it; but she was sure it was like yourself, uncommon handsome.

"Tim—

"Regan—

"Tim O'Regan, just try and borrow five pounds from that stupid, sleepy, ugly ignoramus, George Geoghegan, that's lying in bed before you, and trot back to Trim, your soul, and propose and marry Mary Devine, and lay your heavy curse upon Virgil, and Homer, and Euclid, and, if you find one of your children using them, beat the brains out of him.

"Tim O'Regan just do that, and it will be the only sensible thing you ever did in all your life."

"Here a long pause ensued. The shaving was commenced, and was brought nearly to a conclusion when again Mr. O'Regan burst forth.

"You to go back to Trim! you to propose for Mary Devine—you, that once thought yourself such a great scholar and such an Adonis, that the boys would be running after you for your larning and the girls for your beauty—you, that once turned up your nose at Mary Devine—you now to propose; by dad she has too much spirit for that—she wouldn't look the same side of the street you were walking; if your surtout was made of sovereigns and your waistcoat of five-pound notes, she wouldn't stoop to pick you out of the gutter.

"Tim O'Regan, you may as well stay where you are—that cock won't fight, I can tell you.

"Then, Tim O'Regan, what are you to do? You can't go on as you are—you can't be always living upon a brainless, little, nasty-faced hop-o'-my-thumb like that—a poor creature that is trying to live on his wits when he has no wits.

"I'll tell you what you'll do, Tim—go list. There are few finer-looking men than yourself in the Horse-Guards. Just go down to the East India Company's depôt. Maybe the recruiting sergeant won't jump for joy when he sees you.

"Go list—go list. Oh! murder, murder, Tim, and is it for this you're come to London.

"What else can you do?

"Nothing.

"Then I will be off and list; but, first of all, I'll show the spirit that's in me, by pulling that lazy beggar out of bed, and kicking swivel-eyed Susan down stairs, in order that she may never forget that she once had, as a lodger in the house, one of the greatest scholars that ever came from Ireland."

Thus did honest George conclude his narrative of his friend, Mr. O'Regan's, soliloquy. Mr. O'Regan kept his word, and was but one of the thousands of victims made by the system of education which was, formerly, prevalent in Ireland.

Review.

THE LITTLE RED BOOK OF THE HISTORY OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH IN IRELAND. By the REV. ROBERT KING, A. B. M^cGlashan, Dublin. 1848.

A most hopeful indication of Ireland's future, is the increasing respect for the monuments of her history. Here is a little Red-book, by an Anglican minister, which compresses, into a primer-like form, the annals of the Irish church during twelve hundred years. A difficult task! but the author was well prepared for it. During the last five or six years he has been writing ecclesiastical histories of Ireland in one volume, in two volumes, in second and third editions revised and enlarged, so that he can announce, with the great sons of Æsculapius, that the elixir of Irish historical truth may be had in packets of all sizes, from Messrs. Grant and Bolton, or Mr. M^cGlashan, booksellers, Dublin.

The Irish are a highly imaginative race; and the title, "the little Red-book," tickles the fancy, especially of children and innocents. But green, the national colour, would have been more eloquent and less suggestive of dolorous associations; for a Red-book, especially blood-red like the present, coming from Mr. King, is apt to stir the gorge of all who know the history of their country. Colour, however, is a matter of taste, about which we do not wish to quarrel; far better to encourage the Rev. Mr. King, and point out to him, in a truly national and conciliating spirit, a line in which his literary services can be most useful to his country and himself.

It must strike every person, then, as very mysterious, why our author cuts short his narrative at the year 1611. A primer of the holy Catholic Church in Ireland, by an Anglican clergyman, concluded at 1611!! Surely the subsequent period must have been much more interesting and familiar to him. It must have been a professional study, because his church had then acquired her legal fixture in the land. Then she had her line of Archbishops and Bishops, and Archdeacons and dignitaries: then "she raised her mitred front in courts and parliaments," and swayed at her beck the destinies of this land. To omit these two centuries in a history of Mr. King's Catholic Church in Ireland, is truly the play of "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out; it is as the Duke of Wellington commanding at Trafalgar, or Nelson at Waterloo.

For two good reasons we fear the plan was injudicious and fatal to his success; one was a sin of omission—the other of commission. He omitted to treat of a period with which he must have been familiar—one intimately connected with the present state of this country—and he has treated of a longer period, in which he could neither feel any great interest nor be trusted as a secure guide. One of the Anglican homilies declares, that during 800 years and more, before 1560, all Christendom, man, woman, and child, priest and layman, were plunged in gross and damnable idolatry; and yet Mr. King devotes many chapters to the history of those 800 years and more, but suppresses the history of the Anglican church in Ireland during the last 200 years. This, in an Anglican minister, looks, to say the least of it, wonderfully odd.

We shall first point out the great public utility of a history of the English church in Ireland, in the hope that Mr. King or some other may execute it; and next, we shall assign a few out of the many reasons which prove that Mr. King was not qualified to write on the 800 years and more, which he has sworn were grossly and damnably idolatrous.

Let us go back to the settlement of the tithe question, in 1834. Before that time, the Irish public appear generally convinced that the possession of one million sterling, annually, by the ministers of half-a-million of Anglicans was a national grievance, which should be removed at all hazards. It was believed impossible that the chaotic elements of Irish society could ever subside into harmonious union until that anomaly had been abolished. Agitation ran high—rebellion writs flew thick as hail through the country; the question was settled, and in such a way as left, in some of the southern counties, a rankling animosity even against the Liberator. From that hour to the present, with the exception of an occasional letter or speech, there has been no attempt to appropriate the national revenues to national good. Politicians of every grade, Whigs, Radicals, and Repealers, appear, by their silence, to acquiesce in the justice of paying £1,000,000 per an. to the pastors of 500,000 souls. Even while famine and pestilence have been destroying their tens of thousands, during the last three years, no resistance was concerted against the Establishment; and by one of the greatest mysteries, even in those days, there was hardly a complaint, when Dr. Plunket, of Tuam refused to pay poor-rates. This cannot be a sound state of public feeling, as Mr. King could easily prove, if he had given us a history of the Irish Establishment, and a true estimate of her present influence on the fortunes of Ireland. Should we be suspected of partiality, we beg the reader to suspend his judgment until he has heard our last quotation from Mr. King.

It is not the amount of the revenues he would principally complain of, for, though enormous sums have been hoarded up, much is spent in the country. But he could easily demonstrate the fatal political influence of this church-gold on the fortunes of every Irishman, the recipients themselves and their immediate connexions excepted. He could show how it denationalizes the aristocracy and all who expect to share its splendid prizes; he could say, after recording the history of his church, "the Establishment of which I am a minister is a political establishment—it is, and ever was, the enemy of the happiness and liberty of the people of Ireland—it is the creation and the slave of English power. From Bale of Ossory to Berkely of Cloyne, we never learned the only language through which the people, whose money we received, could be instructed, because English law prohibited it. We did not translate the New Testament into Irish until sixty, nor the Old Testament until a hundred years after the Reformation. We declared, in 1626, by the mouth of Dr. James Usher, that the religion of Rome was idolatry and apostacy, and yet we took no means, except the prison, the fire, and the gallows, to rescue the Irish from their idolatry. Henry VIII. bound us all, by a solemn oath, to build English schools in our parishes—we have not fulfilled the oath. When the estates of some thousands of innocent Irish Catholics were pending on a conflict between the Lords and Commons of Ireland, in 1661, our bishops, who had lately been consecrated, threw the weight of their votes into the scale and decided in favour of the regicides. When English fanaticism was to be maddened against the Irish Catholics, we had our Archbishop King to circulate his false statements on the state of the Protestants in Ireland; when faith was to be broken with Catholics, after the treaty of Limerick, we had Bishop Williams; and, not to go into greater details, point out, if you can, one solitary instance in which the establishment stood between the tyrant and his Irish slaves. Where were our bishops when the law passed to make eunuchs of the Irish priests? These laws were made for us, they were upheld by us, their repeal, at every step, was resisted by us; for us was emancipation delayed, and reform, electoral and municipal, delayed and curtailed. We have ever been the fast friends of English misgovernment; and, though England should defile our high places again with the nameless abominations of an Atterbury of Waterford, a Todd of Down and Connor, and a Jocelyn of Clogher, though we should beg, and beg in vain, to be allowed to support, at our own expense, a bishop of Kildare, fast friends we shall remain, as long as £1,000,000, annually, are distributed amongst us. No wonder! we do what any other body of men would do in our circumstances. Young enthusiasts may hope to conciliate us for national purposes; but they forget to calculate a problem in arithmetic—the proportion between £1,000,000 per annum, and 500,000 souls. The measure that can conciliate us is not Mr. Fagan's sliding scale for the gradual reduction of ministers' money, but an act which will arrange our revenues on the true basis—our Anglican population; or, what is still better, emancipate us altogether from the gold chains and the oppression of a political power, which, true to its instincts—uses us for political purposes. They call us the church of the aristocracy—we were so before the Union, but now our titled brethren are generally absentees. We are pastors of the nobility “in partibus infidelium.”

Views of this kind, illustrated by copious facts, and enforced by the eloquence of Mr. King, though disagreeable in themselves, and especially to us, would, in due time, make an impression, especially if he urged upon his readers the pretty well-known fact, that English statesmen are practical men. They are Protestants in England; Presbyterians in Scotland; Greeks in the Ionian Islands; Catholics in Malta, Canada, and Gibraltar; Hindoos in India. When an old political machine is worn out, and confessed on all hands to be an anomaly, they consider not the nature, but the efficiency, of the new one to be substituted in its place. If the Protestant establishment be now not sufficient to hold Ireland as a mere colony of the English aristocracy, the Catholic clergy will be subsidized for the purpose. A small party will be formed from among those who are called the moderate clergy, just strong enough to support English misgovernment, but not too strong. When that party is formed (if ever) all men not in Bedlam know two facts, that the revenues of the establishment will be divided between Anglican and Catholic; and that the division will be made on such a basis as may play off one party against the other, for the benefit of the English government, the political enslavement of both churches, and the perpetuation of the miseries of the country.

A singular passage in Edmund Burke's Tracts on the Popery Laws suggests ample matter for reflections to Mr. King. “When the Anglo-Norman invaders, by every expedient of force and policy, by a war of some centuries, by extirpating a number of the old, and by bringing in a number of new people, full of those opinions (on English discipline), and intending to propagate them, had fully compassed their object, they suddenly took another turn; commenced an opposite persecution, made heavy laws, carried on mighty wars, inflicted and suffered the worst evils, extirpated the mass of the old, brought in new inhabitants, and they continue at this day an oppressive system, and may for four hundred years to come, to eradicate opinions, which, by the same violent means, they had been four hundred years endeavouring by every means to establish. They compelled the people to submit, by the forfeiture of all their civil rights, to the Pope's authority, in its most extravagant and unbounded sense, as a giver of kingdoms; and now they refuse even to tolerate them in the most moderate and chastised sentiments concerning it.” This was written some sixty years ago, but the current is now changed: Catholics are not only tolerated but free, and, if we believe Mr. King, unduly favoured: a Papal legate may soon be enthroned in London, and farewell to all English protection of Irish Protestantism the moment the change meets government interests in Ireland.

If Mr. King had thus sketched the history of his establishment, he would probably be denounced by the English interest as a rebel, and by the patriots, of all orders, as a bigot, who marred the conciliation of Irishmen. But he could easily prove, that to speak the truth on all subjects, and believe in the eloquence of the poor law, bad as it is, are the only chances of uniting and conciliating those whom the thunders of heaven in three famines have not been able to unite or conciliate.

But whatever views Mr. King might give on the history of his church, his time would have been better employed than in writing on the Catholic history of the country. His errors are very numerous. A simple enumeration and refutation of some of them are all we can give: for instance, the following passages:—

1.—The ancient Irish respected Jerusalem as the mother Church of the whole world, and did not regard the Church of Rome, as having any title to be the mistress of all churches.—p. 41.

We answer—St. Columbanus, in his letter to Pope Boniface, declares that, though Rome was great and renowned for many things among other nations, in Ireland she was renowned for the chair of St. Peter alone—by that chair she was almost divine—she was the head of all the churches in the world. “Again, a canon of the Irish church decreed, “if any questions arise in this island, they must be referred to the Apostolic See.”

2.—The Pope nominated, appointed, or confirmed no Archbishop or Bishop in Ireland before 1132.

In the fifth century, Prosper declares that Palladius was ordained Bishop of the Scots, believing in Christ. The annotations of Tirechan, in the Book of Armagh, attest the same of St. Patrick. The hierarchy once established, the discipline of the church did not require either the nomination, or confirmation, or ordination of bishops by the Pope, provided they were appointed according to the discipline approved by him in founding the Irish church. Pope Pius IX. could, without changing the essential discipline of the church, allow Irish bishops to be elected, approved, and ordained under his law by the Irish Bishops and metropolitan.

3.—The Pope was not allowed to interfere with the concerns of the Church of this island until 1132.

The truth is, the Pope never interferes where there is no need. The very ancient life of St. Patrick, by St. Evin, declares that Rome is the mistress of our faith, the fountain of all apostleship. When a case did arise, several thousand of the Irish clergy diligently enquired into the tradition of the primitive fathers of the Irish church, and they, assembling at Leighlin, decreed and said—“Our predecessors have ordered us by trustworthy witnesses, some of whom are alive, and others who sleep in peace, that we should adopt humbly and without scruple the better and more salutary things sent to us with the approval of the fountain of our baptism and wisdom, and the successors of the Apostles of the Lord.” Accordingly they sent, like good children, deputies to Rome, their mother. If some in the North hesitated to conform, it proves that they went against the order of their seniors, or, as Bede says, that they did not know precisely what was required of them. The South at once obeyed on the admonition of the Apostolic See.

4.—The Irish did not pray to the saints.

If so, they neglected the advice of the friends or relations of St. Patrick. Sulpicius Severus, who was contemporary of St. Martin, and wrote his life, states in his letter to Aurelius (on the death of St. Martin), that his only principal consolation was that he might obtain, by the prayers of his dead friend, what he could not obtain by his own merits. Has Mr. King ever seen, or has he knowingly suppressed the hymn of Brogan of Ossory, or the hymn of Secundinus, or the life of St. Columba, by Adamnan? Brogan prays to St. Bridget, and even compares her to the Blessed Virgin: "I will pray to holy Bride, with the saints of Kildare, that she may stand between me and judgment, that my soul may not perish. The nun that roamed the Curragh is my shield against sharp arrows, except Mary, who can compare, in my judgment, with St. Bride. Two holy virgins are above—my guardians may they be—Holy Mary and St. Bride, on whose power all may depend." Brogan's hymns were written in the sixth, or early in the seventh century. It is the first Life of St. Bridget, published by Colgan. In the hymn of Secundinus, St. Patrick is invoked: "I will declare, at all times, the praises of Patrick, that God, with him, may protect us. All the boys of Ireland cry to thee, O Patrick! come St. Patrick and save us. May St. Patrick, the holy bishop, pray for us all, that the sins which we have committed may be totally forgiven." Now, this prayer is anterior to the year 600, at least. Finally, "Columba, on his death bed, promised his disciples that he would plead for them before the throne of God (vita cap. 17, lib. iii.); and among the last entries in the Book of Kells, he had recorded his own prayer to St. Patrick, begging all who read that book to pray for the writer." *And yet the ancient Irish did not pray to the saints. Mr. King must have wonderful power of face to make the assertions without laughing.

5.—The Irish did not pray for the dead.

St. Germanus, the preceptor of St. Patrick, prayed for the dead. In a certain part of Gaul, there was what would be called in modern times, a haunted house. When St. Germanus heard of it, he ordered prayers to be said for the departed. "Oratio intercessionis impenditur obtinetur pro defunctis requies"—(Surius Jom. iv. p. 432). Columba, as we have seen, begged all who should ever read the Book of Kells to pray for him. Among the canons of St. Patrick, there is one which treats expressly of the Mass for the dead—"De oblatione per defunctis"—and Mr. King must be very ignorant, indeed, of the valuable labours of members of his own church, to deny that many of the most ancient and touching inscriptions in Ireland are prayers for the dead.

6.—The Pope never canonized an Irishman before the 12th century, A. D. 1132.—p. 37.

As Mr. King does not know some of the plainest facts in Irish history, he could not be expected to know the various forms of canonization that prevailed at different times in the Roman church. St. Virgil of Saltsburgh, St. Cathaldus of Taretum, St. Columbanus of Bobbio, and hundreds of others, were canonized according to the form required by the Roman church in their day. They were patrons of churches, their names were in Roman Martyrologies, their festivals were celebrated, and if Mr. King had studied Dr. Lanigan, vol. iii. p. 106, he would find that at least one Irishman was canonized by Pope Leo IX. in 1052.

Enough has been now given, to prove that our author's zeal could find a far more profitable field than those ages which were buried "in gross and damnable idolatry." We could prove to him that the king was not head of the Irish church—that the Irish church used an unknown tongue in her liturgy—that she never translated the Scriptures into Irish—that she venerated relics and honoured images, and imposed very severe penances, such as pilgrimages and fasting and seclusion, all of which are "fond things" in the opinion of Mr. King; but enough has been done to prove that he must serve a long apprenticeship to Usher or some of his living representatives, before he can secure for himself a name in Irish history, which will survive the fleeting prejudices of the day. Mellifont, an English establishment!!—for shame, Mr. King!

But as he has selected a few truths, he shall have the benefit of them, in compliment to his zeal for the history of his country. They have been already given in the words of Edmund Burke, who was a greater man than Mr. King, and may therefore awaken both Irish Anglicans, and Catholics to this great truth, that English government has never viewed, and probably never can view religion in this country, except as a means to secure Ireland as a second-rate province of the British empire. The Catholics of Ireland, we fear, are not sufficiently acquainted with the political relations between England and Ireland, when both were Catholic—"Fas sit et ab hoste doceri."

CHAP. 33.—HOW ENGLAND AND ROME (i. e. CATHOLIC BISHOPS) AGREED IN PUTTING DOWN THE IRISH LANGUAGE, IRISH CUSTOMS, &c. &c.

A great many of the strangers who had settled in Ireland, began gradually to like their Irish neighbours, and to adopt their customs and manners, laws and language, forming intermarriages, also, and other connexions with the natives and their children. Such persons were known by the name of degenerate English. But their mode of life was very displeasing to some of their countrymen who were higher in influence and authority (imported like Anglican Bishops from England); for they were afraid that this mixture with the native Irish would greatly lessen the influence and respectability of the English settlers in this country. And, therefore very severe laws were made from time to time against the national manners, language, customs, and general peculiarities of the Irish. The statute of Kilkenny was a very famous act, a collection of acts, passed at a Parliament held in Kilkenny, in the year 1367. By this statute, marriage with the Irish, "Fosterage and Brehon law," were condemned as high treason. Irish language, names, or dress, were prohibited to the English in Ireland under penalties of loss of goods and imprisonment. Also none of the mere Irish were to be allowed to any office of honour or emolument in any cathedral, collegiate church, or religious house where the English influence prevailed. In the Parliament that passed these laws there were present the Archbishops of Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam, the Bishops of Waterford, Killaloe, Ossory, Leighlin, and Clon, who all agreed in denouncing excommunication against all who disobeyed that act—p. 68.

This is a statement in humble prose, of what has been already described by the magic pencil of Burke. Wide differences, however, there are between that Anglo-Catholic church and Mr. King's church. In one century alone, the former erected more monuments of their religious and national zeal, than have been bequeathed to Ireland by all the prelates and clergy of Mr. King's church, from the reign of Henry VIII. to the present day. The Anglo-Irish prelates were not a Cressus-church without a people; but they were generally of that class which are promoted in a province governed exclusively for the interest of the dominant nation; a class like those prelates imposed on the Sicilians by the Neapolitans, and such as would be imposed now by England on Ireland, if both were Catholic. Let us listen to Father Ventura, "On the pretence that Sicily was an eternal focus of sedition and rebellion, a system of police government was organized there, far more oppressive and revolting than martial law. A law, which enacted the eligibility of all subjects of the Neapolitan crown to all offices in the Sicilian dominions, was executed in such a way as to establish, in Sicily, a vast system of espionage—to watch and report to Naples all the movements of what the Imperial party called, ‘that ungrateful and turbulent Sicily.’ With a few honourable exceptions, the refuse of the Neapolitan clergy were appointed to bishoprics in the most disturbed parts of Sicily. Palermo, Catana, Trepani, Messina, Nota, and Syracuse are governed by bishops, whom the people regard as ‘mitred policemen,’ men who have done no good but infinite mischief.” Let Catholics, and Mr. King, reflect on this fact, thank Lord Palmerston for his Sicilian sympathies, and have a little patience until we give Father Ventura’s brochure, entire, in our next number.

The narrow prejudices of many of his brethren, obtrude themselves in every shape in the pages of Mr. King. After dealing his anathemas on seven millions of his Catholic countrymen, in a style which shocks the feelings of the learned of his own church, he pounces on the Presbyterians of the North. The confiscations of Ulster would have been a great national good, he assures us, “If those who profited by the seizures had cared more about religion and philanthropy, and less about selfish ends and private gains.” (p. 91). Now, disclaiming all intention of flattering the Presbyterians, every one knows that they have not been more careless of their own religion, or more selfish than their Anglican brethren, and as the world goes, they are destined, when they awake to their own interests, to play a more prominent part in the future history of Ireland, than Mr. King can ever expect for his church. They could decide the elections in many towns and counties of the North; but where could the Anglican church return a member except in Trinity College?

Irish Missions and Missionaries.

NO. IV.

THE unscrupulous character of trans-atlantic bigotry would render it a formidable antagonist, if its very excess did not considerably mar its influence. The whole history of Irish sectarianism is one long “age of inventions;” but unless in some solitary instances, fanaticism has had a method in its madness—it was too prudent to overtask credulity by lying, up to impossibility. It is not so in America. The thirteen millions of “Nothingarians” make a “good thing” of the silly prejudices which distinguish the “Communicants” among Baptists, Jumpers, and Moravians, et cetara; and American romances, for a time, are reverently placed beside the Bible. Authors laugh and eat their viands. Pious associations sing psalms of deprecation; and cunning leaders of revivals have a series of “startling facts” that frightens the money from old-young-ladies’ pockets.

We recollect an American reviewer who laboured with lengthened arguments and vast research, to prove that the democracy of the “Universal States” had not a strict right to comprehend every principle and thought which a philosophic mind might think proper to employ. He held that different grades of education, supposed a preparedness in some to understand that which would be unintelligible to others, and that these others had no indefeasible claim, that public writers should labour for them. Poor man! He narrowly escaped the bucket and feather-bag. It was treason against the majesty of the people to suppose them ignorant of anything. In truth they are a splendidly-educated people; but the aspirations after authorship are nearly numerous as human beings. Men whom the moral tie does not bind too strongly, and in the face of competition where facts are seized so rapidly, have great temptations to drive a trade in falsehood—and they do. The pity is, that excesses and excitements for which the constitution has little restraint, too frequently prove the parentage of the books.

A rather ludicrous illustration of the easy faith with which misrepresentations of Catholicism are received, may convey some notion of foreign prejudice, and at the same time, a lesson of prudence. Two gentlemen, in the year 1840, met in a stage-coach, and talked on a variety of topics; among the rest on the ultima ratio of American resources for the protection of life and property. One, apparently an Irishman, contended that neither had sufficient security. “Suppose,” he said, “that a dishonest man, or even an enthusiast, acquired an ascendancy over the populace, he can employ them for the perpetration of any wickedness—make them the agents of any personal enmity, caprice, or cupidity.”

“What do you suppose our magistrates to be doing in the mean time?”

“Your magistrates have no power.”

“Why, the militia?”

“Are the mob.”

“Oh, Sir, our militia will obey their magistrates.”

“What security have you for that?”

“Their virtues.”

“Sir!” said a young lady who sat opposite the fore-mentioned disputants, and who seemed to be engaged, to an extent of almost painful interest, “Sir, it’s not true!”

Both gentlemen turned their eyes upon the speaker. The full, dark, hazel eye, finely-chiselled mouth, hair simply wreathed, and the pale, delicate face, would have been strikingly handsome but for a certain decision, a firmness which may be desirable in women, but not desirable to be always seen. She was the ideal of an American lady.

“And what may not be true, madam?” asked the Irishman.

“That our people burned down the nunnery at Charleston.”

There was no heat—there might be temper—but you always imagine an American woman under the influence of temper.

“And pray who burned the convent?”

“Why, the nuns themselves!”

“Indeed!”

“Yes—Wretches were starving in the subterraneous dungeons; bodies of murdered persons were to be found in the cellars; and many awful discoveries were about to be made by the authorities, had the nuns not anticipated enquiry by burning the place.”

“And the mob?”

“Were merely hooting!”

It was obvious that the young person had not been in the vicinity of the dreadful event, and that her confidence had been abused for the benefit of religion.

We may mention, “en passant,” that on the fearful night on which the model-government of freedom was unable to protect defenceless women who had devoted their lives and strength to the education of the American people—the priests of Boston were closely besieged in their dwelling. A great and good man—who has a worthy successor—then presided over the church of Massachusetts. Never, perhaps, has there existed one who united, in a greater degree, the gentlest benevolence to the most indomitable courage, than did the late Bishop Fenwick. The vicious system of church government, which half uncatholicised the spirit of the people—the lay government in temporalities—was first assailed and crushed by him. Bishop Hughes has almost universalized what Doctor Fenwick begun. When the blood-shriek of the mob was fiercest, and, when the terrible success at Charleston had extended their appetite for vengeance, and taught them their power of satiating it, the Bishop and his priests were praying and taking counsel. Various was the advice and few the hopes of egress and escape.

"Come!"—said the Bishop, and he advanced towards the door.

A moment's pause, and all passively followed. The good man's step was firm—his form was majestic—his eye, a dark southern one, lit with the fire of a confessor. He led on, by a back passage familiar to his followers—'twas the private entrance to his cathedral; he arrived before the altar, and, turning to his clergy with an expression never to be forgotten, he said—"We shall here die together!" Glorious Bishop! He lived to see the aggressors shamed by the monuments of their own vile passions, though he never had the satisfaction of seeing his country make decent retribution.

The American gentleman, to whom we above referred, parted, "en rout," with his companions in the stage-coach. The young lady had discovered the remaining one to be a foreigner, and resolved to impress him deeply with the dangers and horrors of popery.

"You don't seem to credit the horrors attributed to convents!"

"I have seen no proof of them."

"Have you heard of a 'Priest Berne,' in these parts?"

"Yes."

"He could tell you more. He has a special mission to flog, starve, and flay the refractory."

"Have you ever seen him?"

"No; he is a brute!"

"What like person is he?"

"O hideous! tall, gaunt, with overhanging brows, dreadful eyes—an Ogre."

Many awful disclosures did the fair, young American make to our countryman. She seemed perfectly acquainted with the geography of trap-doors, sliding-panels, midnight-watchings, sin, and murder. Her companion had seen some years, and was not wanting in experience. If a sectarian, he was, undoubtedly, of the liberal school, and had had sufficient judgment to examine for himself, before he excluded from the circle of human sympathy all members of the religious life. He sounded the depths of his young companion's information, and, in exchange for her opinions, gave her an exposition of his knowledge and travel. She listened, and smiled at his apologies, and said, "She sometimes almost thought him a Catholic."

Thus, for a long summer's day and a-half, nearly for two, the travellers beguiled the way. The Irishman, as in duty bound, attending to the lady's luggage in every transition from boat to coach and to rail—and there were of such transitions no very convenient number. The parties became great friends. But "the greatest friends must part," and their cross-roads came at last.

"So! - - -" cried the captain of the steamer, as his ship snuggled herself by the quay, and the regular approaching and receding, with which a large vessel courts her berth, had been made—amid the shoutings of officers, the pause and puff of wheel and engine, and the gapings and gazings of those on board and on shore.

"So!" said he, "Heave up that luggage there!"

"Aye, aye!"

And up came, in glorious profusion, portmanteaus and cloaks, umbrellas and hat-boxes, bundles and bales. Nothing discovers your fellow-passenger so immediately as his travelling-gear. You will know a tidy, experienced, crusty-faced, embrowned portmanteau; so prettily tucked up for a journey—an able-to-fit-anywhere kind of article. Its master, rest assured, wears a blue cloth cap with a deep peak—his frock is small for his body—his collar is turned down, and—he smokes. Travelling is natural to that gentleman, and to his portmanteau; how vastly different from the plethoric, important-looking, accumulation of leather yonder, with its brass-plate of awful pretensions, and its countless straps, buckles, and so forth—a corpulent old stay-at-home, trussed up for security! 'Tis likely the owner rarely travels further than from New York to Saratoga: he is some one not American, and has made half a fortune. Then—but—

"I say, Ma'am, 's all your luggage here?"

Our young American acquaintance was coolly and curiously peering between packages and over trunks and boxes.

"Why do you fling that huge portmanteau down upon my basket?" cried the lady, "see, if you haven't broken the handle!"

She stooped to look after her property, and her eye was attracted to the inscription on the back of the offending leather. The most lasting virtue of woman, wise men pretend, is curiosity; we should like to hear the same philosophers' estimate of an American woman's in this regard. The lady has evidently met something very displeasing—at least confusing. She raised her head; the Irish gentleman, as he should be, was by her side.

"Sir," she said, and she smiled with the real joy of the heart—"Sir, we are about to part. I should be delighted to see you at our residence; and I cannot sufficiently thank you for your exceedingly polite attention."

The gentleman was about to reply, when a porter, seizing the portmanteau, which had been just undergoing his fair friend's scrutiny, said—

"This your's, Sir?"

"Yes."

"REV. MR. BERNE!" said the lady.

"The same," answered the gentleman, smiling, "May I hope that I have not justified all your hard preconceptions?"

The lady burst into tears.

* * * * *

A story has been recently going the rounds of the American papers, and exciting a most virtuous excess of horror against the nuns, monks, and religion of Mexico. A young officer of the "army of invasion" loitered in a Mexican church sufficiently long to arrest the attention of a religious, who picturesquely attired and dramatically spoken, as became her, sought and obtained an assignation at her cell. The hour was to be midnight. The signal from without—"Three knocks at the postern gate." The business was of life and death importance. The officer, of course, was punctual to his appointment. The lady was in readiness. They found themselves together and alone at the appointed place. Having taken wine with her guest, the nun stripped off the coverlet of her bed, and, horror of horrors! "nestled curiously therein," lay—not an infant, but a murdered monk. The nun turned out an Amazon, for she drew forth a pistol and compelled the gallant captain, under terror of his life—

"as Æneas

Did, from the walls of Troy, upon his shoulder,
The old Anchises bear"—

to carry forth the dead monk. In a few minutes afterwards he himself fell down. He had been poisoned.

Now, this was a pretty marvel, and had, probably, supplied grave meditation to some "Ladies' Benevolent" Societies, small "Sewing Parties" for the poor, and "Bible Lessons" of an evening—all of which re-unions are quite remarkable, as well for the very small share of charity they bestow, as for the large share of valuable experience they confer—an experience derived from a keen survey of the manifold vices of their neighbours. Just, however, when many additional subscriptions had been collected, for the laudable object of purchasing Bibles to illumine the wretched "Idolators" in Mexico, the whole affair turned out to be another humbug.

Infinitely more disastrous to social happiness, than even the bigotry of the United States, is the outrageous antagonism which prevails—nay, is encouraged—in some of our Colonies. The displays of Orangeism, which have been partly crushed in upper Canada, are of frequent occurrence at present in New Brunswick; and the same wretched results, which have ever distinguished this monstrous system, curse its manifestations there. Now, no part of the earth affords less plea for aggression than this particular colony. The Irish people are quiet and industrious—the bishop and priests most inoffensive, laborious, zealous and exemplary; and, so far from interfering with the appetite for emolument which ever accompanies Orange loyalty, the Catholics are almost proscribed on the very land which they have fertilized. Yet they are not allowed to live in peace.

The Right Rev. William Dollard, of New Brunswick, is one of the many who abandoned home for the Gospel of the Cross, and whose career has been a continued benediction to the Irish exile. For a period, we believe, considerably over thirty years, he has devoted himself to endurance and toil which would have been sufficient to destroy almost any man but himself; and he still continues his "labour of love" with the same energy which animated his earliest ministrations. The emigrant scenes of last summer—those awful reflections of bad government which England has scattered over the world, to show the impunity with which she can crush Ireland—brought out the chivalrous Christianity of Dr. Dollard and the clergymen of St. John's. His lordship, his vicar-general, Dr. Dunphy, and the other priests, were dismayed by no danger—stayed by no obstacle. From fever-bed to fever-bed, and from shed to shed, in Partridge Island, they were found, day by day, ready to "gain their life by losing it" for the "love of the brotherhood." It was the last sad duty of the Irish bishop and priests to their unfortunate countrymen and countrywomen, whose head-stones are monuments illustrating a legislation, which gave Ireland the alternative of ship-fever or starvation. God bless the "Irish missionaries," who mitigated the agonies of our poor people's departure, and who poured a blessing on their graves.

Is it not inexplicable, even with cunning malice as an exponent, that the government of England will not interfere to protect the wretched creatures whom bad laws or dark fate has expatriated? At home, the poor-house or death; abroad—at least so far as New Brunswick is concerned—pampered Orangeism grasps to exterminate them! Sanguinary ruffianism parades, unmolested, the insignia of violence and disorder; the brutal instincts of a barbarous era are reproduced, to legislate for social ruin; murder stalks in security over the island—the security of patronage or the security of inefficiency; and all the paltry passions which dishonoured and ruined this land, are evoked to curse the young soil. Six murders have been committed in New Brunswick within one year—every one a victim to the demon of Orangeism. In no single case have the laws been vindicated by the punishment, or even the apprehension, of the culprits.

Where, let us ask the government, are these things to end? We believe, that of the thousands of Irish Catholics in New Brunswick, few, if any, are in the commission of the peace—not one in the higher official departments; they have not even the educational security afforded by possessing a commissionership of the public schools. While thus defenceless, a truculent rabble is let loose upon them; "exclusive dealing" is decreed; "down with the Pope" shouted; "death to the Papists" acted, even in the view of the government. Is it wonderful that disorder and disorganization are rapidly progressing in New Brunswick? We take leave to warn the ministry, that such a state of things is very gravely compromising English dignity and English interests upon the continent of North America.

In our February number we stated, that Irish loyalty was the only tie of Canadian dependence.—We opine that our rulers begin to feel the declaration to be more than verified. With an overwhelming majority in the assembly, and a pressure from without to which the "emeute" of '38 was but a "sham battle," Papineau has addressed his countrymen to sever the last link of Anglican connexion. New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, may, in common with Canada, begin to contemplate new alliances and to cherish new hopes. Is it the time for feeding upon the blood and social peace of a people undone and expatriated by bad legislation, the spectre of an ascendancy which the age has entombed amid the execrations of religion and humanity? What is the governor—what the legislature—what the magistracy of New Brunswick—what are they doing?

We spoke of the laborious duties of the New Brunswick mission. We believe that for two hundred churches there are no more than twenty-seven priests; and the Catholic reader may form a tolerable estimate of the incessant activity supposed by such a state of things. We are proud to find that of the number of clergymen just named sixteen are Irishmen, and that fourteen ecclesiastical students, now preparing for the same arduous mission, will "claim kindred" with our soil. They have a noble vineyard in prospect, an active, unobtrusive, vigilant, and unostentatious prelate, whose memoirs are written in the glories of religion and the virtues of Catholics through his diocese. And though their labours must be severe, they will be sweetened by the nature of them, and by the noble example of those around who share them.

Yet, it is difficult to conceive how human beings can support the course of life to which missionary duty in North America, and particularly in New Brunswick, subjects the priest. Five, six, seven stations, every one claiming a day or two, and every one claiming a new journey. Hundreds of miles are thus travelled in a few days. And oftentimes, alas! life and utility are the sacrifice.

We speak not now of city and town missions, nor of rural missions without exception. We speak of the general complexion of the country; and faith has few manifestations of which she can be more justly proud, than the enduring martyrdom of her ministers there.

Let the reader imagine a ride of forty miles through unfrequented roads—woods—snow banks—over lakes, rocks, and moors. With limbs chilled and spirits exhausted, the missionary descends from his half-foundered horse. He is in the hamlet. A log cabin, that is to say, a story constructed of logs, much after the fashion of a bird-cage made of reeds or rods—this log cabin receives him. He sits by the wood fire until his frozen flesh thaws—fortunate, if the north wind from outside does not constantly pour in to renew its acquaintance. Wood fires will not burn all night; so the clergyman dares not take off his clothes lest he may be frozen. He lays him down on his hard bed, without undressing, to think of the labours of the following day. It is not impossible, that on awaking, he will find his breast covered with snow, drifted through the interstices of his frail hostelry. Rising up, fatigued rather than refreshed, he proceeds to the most arduous duties that can engage a reasonable man; again prepares for a similar night; proceeds next morning on a similar journey; re-enacts the same scene at its close—and thus, from day to day, his life wears apace, until far from his “own dear island of sorrow,” the “Irish missionary’s” ashes repose with the exiles whom he lived to love, and died to save. Heaven knows! it requires the folly and frenzy of Orangeism to assail such an order of men.

We would not be understood above as depicting a state of society—a fanatical bigotry in which all the colonies are sharers. By no means. Our memory carries us back to associations the most blissful and blessed of our life, in which men of every creed and clergymen of many creeds were sharers. We can remember how our spirits claimed affinity through the beauties of literature, and knelt together subdued at the mysteries of science. Many a time, priest and politician, minister, medical man, author, and judge, felt the happiness of forgetting profession—unless so far as it perfected the man, and that humanity has claims and duties to which no creed is a necessary obstruction. May such a state of society last eternally! Being fond of incognito, we shall not name the colony to which we refer. We congratulate it upon its recent success; and if in hard battles—“serere arbores quæ alteri seculo prosint”—we have ever spoken or written unkindly, or unwittingly acted, as we did not feel ungenerously, why—we are sorry.

This we intended to be a paper about converts, but circumstances changed our determination. We reserve the subject for a future number. We are much surprised if we shall not demonstrate that “truth is often stranger than fiction.”

The Little Cross.

Our life is short, but to extend that space
To vast eternity, is Virtue's work.—Shakspeare.

THE summer's sun had risen brightly and beamingly on the beautiful and picturesque town of Bath, as Lucy Palmer, full of joyous excitement, glided from her mother's house to that of an adjacent friend, where smilingly, entering, she exclaimed, half breathless, “Oh, Mrs. Vernon, I have such news for Charlotte; there are to be a succession of concerts here next week—the most celebrated of the Italian singers are to come down from London, Grisi and Lablache, and I do not know how many more delightful creatures. Oh! I am in an ecstasy of enjoyment at the very idea, for you know how fond I am of music; but all my hopes will be blighted if you, my dear Mrs. Vernon, will not accompany me, for 'tis out of the question for a moment thinking of mamma's going. Oh!” continued the girl, her eyes filling with tears, “I know you would not disappoint me, so do say yes, at once.”

“My dear girl,” said Mrs. Vernon, in her usual kind and affectionate manner, “I should be most happy to gratify you, but do you think your mamma will make no objection to your project?”

“Oh! I am sure not,” exclaimed Lucy; “I shall tell her that you will take Charlotte to the concerts, and ask her permission to accompany you.”

“Well, if you get her permission, I shall not have the least objection, as there is no entertainment half so attractive to me as a musical one, and I am sure Charlotte will also be delighted.”

Miss Vernon having, without much delay, signified her joy at the prospect, the matter was gaily discussed, and the most successful arguments selected for vanquishing the mamma's scruples, and the dresses the young ladies should wear were talked of, and the great advantages and encouragement they would derive from hearing such eminent vocalists were commented upon, and how their own future practice would be benefited by such an opportunity; all, all was discussed, until the young ladies felt that there would be a gross wrong done to them if such an occasion was allowed to pass, without their having an opportunity of profiting by it, till the usually pale cheeks of the gentle Lucy became suffused with a roseate glow.

Lucy Palmer was the only child of a widowed mother, and a very eccentric mother too had poor Lucy. Mrs. Palmer had, in early life, gone a step beneath her to select a husband, and after being about twelve years married to Major Palmer, was left a widow with an only child. Her means were ample for her mode of living, for she quite abjured the world—not from piety, but pride. She spent her whole time in her own room, utterly heedless of the charge of educating the mind of her child. Lucy was sent to a fashionable boarding school, where she learned all, save the truths which religion unfolds; and when this gentle girl attained the age of nineteen, at which period our tale opens, she was skilful in all lady-like accomplishments.

Lucy was beautiful, her complexion was transparent, and pale as alabaster. Her eyes were large, dark, and expressive of a profound melancholy, which is more attractive than the more usually mirthful character of youth; and her forehead and head were remarkable for their powerful and beautiful outlines. Her figure was of the middle size, fragile, but well formed, and she was sweet and gentle as she was beautiful and modest; but poor Lucy's mind was a perfect chaos—such a ruin and yet such cultivation. She had rioted in fashionable novels from her very childhood, and her brain was festering with the pestilence she had drawn from them. Of religion she had no distinct idea, and imagined that it was a mere garb assumed to betray the unwary. Of a nature fervent and enthusiastic, what ought to have been given to God, was bestowed upon his creatures. Utterly ignorant of the world, for she had never mixed with it, she imagined it as her favourite novels had represented; and the passing admiration she had met with made not the least impression on her high and naturally dignified mind. To do a mean action she would scorn—to tell a story she would blush, but these were the virtues which nature had planted in her heart, and the seeds of which her foul education had been unable to uproot.

At last the eventful evening arrived, and our interesting trio were well seated in the concert room. With Grisi they were enchanted—with Lablache delighted; at length a Signor Fioretta advanced to sing an Italian solo. Lucy gazed and listened, and tremblingly turning to her friend, exclaimed: "Charlotte, my destiny is interwoven with that man's."

"Well," returned Charlotte, laughing, "I certainly admire your taste, for I never in all my life saw any human being half so handsome."

"Oh! you may laugh," said Lucy, in a deep and serious tone of voice, "but I tell you that man is my fate."

This may appear strange, but when the ardent and enthusiastic nature of Lucy is considered, together with her education so light and fantastic, so inconsiderate and ill-governed, her mind stored with wild fancies and romantic imaginings, her heart with nought to love, and perverted from its true source, hope, faith, all lost in its worldly wanderings, her belief that destiny was inevitable, and free will impossible, it is scarce to be wondered at that the exalted, although ill-governed mind of the young enthusiast, would look around for some ideal love to fill up the chasm which the total want of religion had created in her heart.

Although instantly struck, and deeply enchained in admiration of the more than human exterior perfections of the Italian singer, yet there was a loftiness of feeling associated in her mind with every look and action of this man; and she blushed not at the sentiment that was instantaneously enkindled in her heart, and felt lighter and happier than she had done for years, for she was firmly convinced that fate had brought her there for the speedy fulfilment of her destiny.

If poor Lucy had received a virtuous education, what a bright ornament she would have been to religion; her high and lofty aspirations after all that was good and perfect, would have there found its haven; her entire truthfulness and simplicity of heart, would there have found perfect security; her ardent and enthusiastic nature would there have discovered its true spouse; but poor Lucy, apart from all the world, but the profane world of books, which were always open before her, read and thought with no one to direct and arrest her youthful thoughts, until fancy guided reason, and impulse governed all her actions.

For several successive nights she went to hear Fioretta, until at length she became convinced that he specially addressed his most impassioned songs to herself; and, determining to have an interview with him, she wrote to him to say, that a lady wished to see him upon business, at ten o'clock the following morning; at the same time fearlessly giving her address, knowing that her mamma, being always in her room, would be no interruption to the visit.

At the appointed time, the knock was heard, and a card brought into Lucy, with Signor Fioretta inscribed thereon. Lucy tremblingly arose, and had advanced into the middle of the room, as the gentleman entered. He appeared about eight and twenty years of age, with a tall, dignified, and courtly bearing; his complexion was of that rich olive, with features of exquisite and rare beauty. Few could gaze on that face unmoved, for it was a marvellous concentration of all that was noble and refined. Fioretta bowed, and asked if Mrs. Palmer was at home, as he concluded it was regarding tuitions she had written to him?

"I am sorry to say mamma never sees strangers," replied Lucy; but I wrote to you for the purpose of performing the part destiny has allotted to me."

"Pray, explain," said the Signor, coldly.

"It is most manifest to me," said Lucy, with perfect simplicity, "that your fate is interwoven with mine, and I sent for you for the purpose of telling you, that, notwithstanding all the obstructions my family, who are very proud, may put to our marriage, still you alone shall be my husband."

The Signor, who, fortunately for Lucy, was an exception to his class—a truly religious man, looked aghast, and, drawing himself up in the most dignified manner, replied—"Having spoken so plainly, I am bound, in common charity, to answer you as candidly, which I can do, by assuring you, that I have no intention whatever of marrying; and I regret extremely being obliged to tell you, that, even if I were disposed to marry, I should select one whose mind was more congenial to my own than yours can possibly be."

"But, as yet, you know me not," exclaimed Lucy.

"Quite enough," said Fioretta; "and I only regret," continued the proud Roman, "that you have not learned that a maiden's proudest boast is modesty; and that man can resist temptation, when strengthened by the ennobling influence of religion."

Bowing profoundly and coldly, the Italian withdrew.

Poor Lucy even now did not see her error; all her feelings were absorbed in an increased admiration for the man.

"He is more than human," she mentally ejaculated, "and he only acts thus, to try the extent of my love."

Letter after letter did this deluded girl write to the Italian and the next post invariably brought back her own letter, unopened, in a blank envelope.

For two whole years did this malady prey upon poor Lucy, until her heart became wearied of the chase after happiness, and hope and consolation appeared to be completely shut out from her view. "Still," she would exclaim, arousing herself from her despair, "still, he cannot avoid his destiny, and ultimately he will love me."

Again, hope became active, and fresh exertions were used, but with the like result; the bow of recognition was unheeded, and the letters returned unopened. Secret trips were taken to London, for the purpose of obtaining an interview, but the man was inexorable.

In one of those trips, as Lucy was sauntering through Warwick-street, she recollected there was a Catholic Chapel in that direction, where Fioretta was accustomed to sing. A sort of impulse prompted her to enter it. Mass was about half gone through; and as the girl wished to avoid observation, she remained as near the door as possible. Her attention soon became attracted to a poor old woman, who was in an extacy of devotion, with her beads between her fingers. At this moment, the silvery sound of the bell was heard at the elevation. The poor woman prostrated herself, and, drawing forth a little crucifix from her bosom, kissed the feet of it with intense devotion. Awed without knowing why, Lucy thought she had better kneel down. She did so, but still kept her gaze fixed upon the prostrate penitent, and would have given worlds to have spoken to the woman, whose tattered garments bespoke the most abject poverty. "Great God!" she inwardly ejaculated, "how intense this poor woman's religious feeling must be—how elevated her faith—when, amidst all this apparent wretchedness, her heart is so fervently directed to God's worship. Oh! would that I were religious; what a dreary void it would fill in my poor tortured heart," and a tear imperceptibly stole down her pale and grief-worn cheek.

Absorbed in the contemplation of her sorrows, she was aroused by perceiving that the prayers were over, and the congregation about departing; and, turning towards the woman who had previously so much attracted her attention, saw that she had risen from her knees, and, having made a deep reverence before the altar, turned to leave the chapel.

Following an impulse for which she could not account, she walked after the old woman, whose tottering footsteps betokened great bodily infirmity. In crossing the street, the poor woman stumbled; Lucy rushed forward to assist her, and soon got into conversation with her.

"Have you far to go, for I should like very much to see where you live," said Lucy.

"Not very far, good lady," said the woman; "but I fear you might not like to enter my poor room."

"Indeed, I should," said Lucy, "and if you will allow me, I shall often come to see you?"

They soon arrived at the narrow entrance leading to the scantily furnished apartment of the old woman, the very appearance of which shocked Lucy, from its extreme destitution. Complying with the earnest request of the poor woman, Lucy seated herself; and looking around the cleanly, but wretched, apartment, questioned its occupant as to how she was able to endure such misery?

"My dear lady," replied Mrs. Herbert, "although I have seen what the world calls better days, yet I never enjoyed such pure happiness as I do at present, for I am overjoyed that God thinks me worthy of chastisement here; and when hunger keenly gnaws me, and that I feel disposed to murmur at my lot, I just take out my little cross, and, when I look upon it, my eyes fill with tears, and I feel as full and as satisfied as if I was after eating a hearty meal."

"Would that I could feel this love for God that you do," said poor Lucy, mournfully.

"And so you do, my good lady, and must now, I warrant you; for what but love to your heavenly Father could induce you to accompany a poor infirm creature like myself to her humble home?"

Lucy blushed deeply, and felt that she would willingly exchange situations with that poor outcast, if she could calculate on having her serene mind and hopeful heart. Lucy drew forth her purse, and handed a few shillings to her needy companion.

"My blessing be upon you, young lady, and oh! my God, how good you are to me to send me this help in my hour of need, for now, young lady, I must tell you that I have not tasted food since yesterday morning; but I cannot feel hunger as others do, when I am so often allowed to partake of the bread of eternal life, nor do I feel the winter's cold severely, for my heart is warmed with the fire of divine love, and, as to my clothing, how can I complain of being scantily covered when I look upon my divine Redeemer hanging naked upon the cross. And now, my benefactress, may heaven's choicest gifts descend upon you, and may you possess that greatest of blessings, the desire of serving God in the way most acceptable to him."

Lucy felt touched to the heart and unable to speak, and, hastily telling the old woman that she would soon call again to see her, rushed into the street. Her brain was on fire, and the old woman's words had caused her to think upon a subject which had hitherto been unknown to her. She stopped, not knowing which way to turn; she thought of going back to the chapel, and praying that God might enlighten her; but then again, her more than ordinarily protracted absence might cause her mother alarm and uneasiness, and she, therefore, turned her steps homewards.

Upon reaching her home, she flung herself upon a couch and burst into tears. She looked around her luxurious apartment, and contrasted it with the squalidness and misery of the one she had just left, and she thought of the thankful resignation of that poor woman, and how much more reason she had to be grateful to God, who brought her into the world surrounded by plenty and profusion, and, prostrating herself on her knees, she returned God fervent thanks for his blessings—and this was the first time in her life that she had done so from her heart—and she concluded her short prayer by begging of God to instruct her in His holy ways, and, rising, she felt happier and calmer, and more cheerful than she had ever felt before, and she longed for the morrow to visit her old instructress again; and that night, before retiring to rest, Lucy again prayed, and, strange to say, had not thought of the Italian singer for several hours. And Lucy slept more serenely and sweetly than she had done for months, and awoke with a more lightsome heart, and her first thoughts were upon the exalted piety of the old woman, and again she asked God to enlighten her.

Days passed, and still she continued to visit her old pensioner, and her happiness increased and her mind became hourly more peaceful; she looked with horror upon her former life, with its mispent time and heart-breaking struggles; she then thought of God, and wished to know him more intimately and to serve him more faithfully, but the heart-wrung girl knew not where to seek for instruction. But God's ways are merciful, and her half-aspirated prayers were heard.

Her next visit to her pensioner found the poor old woman in a dying state, and not the remotest hope of her recovery. A heavenly smile crossed the countenance of the invalid as Lucy entered, and, faintly grasping her hand, she exclaimed: "God be praised that I have seen you before I die, and oh! my dear and only friend, if spirits are allowed to watch over those they love on earth, mine shall hover over you, and, if permitted, shield you from all harm."

Exhausted by the exertion, she gasped and closed her eyes. Lucy sobbed aloud as she thought of the moments of pure happiness she had enjoyed, listening to the edifying conversations of the poor dying woman. She felt, in losing her, as if she were about being separated from God, whom she had only known through her, and, falling on her knees beside the bed, she besought Him, if He took her poor friend from her, that He would supply her place by sending one who would direct her in all truth.

At this moment a gentle step was heard on the stair, and the door was noiselessly opened, and the Priest, who had been for some days attending Mrs. Herbert, entered. He was, in appearance, mind, and manners, exactly what a priest ought to be; his countenance was sweet and mild, and his manner affectionate and paternal. He advanced towards the bed, and kindly questioned the invalid, and then, turning to Lucy, held out his hand to her and said that he was glad to see her performing the part of an angel on earth.

Lucy's heart was bursting, and she longed to confide all her sorrows to him; she abruptly informed him that she was not a Catholic, and begged permission to call upon him. The Reverend Father was but too happy in granting this permission, and, after inquiring her place of residence, lest she might change her mind as to visiting him, again turned to the invalid, who appeared anxious to speak. "Father," she said, "will you give me one promise before I die—it is, that when I am gone my only treasure, my little cross, may be given to this angel of mercy, who has soothed all my troubles since I have had the happiness of first seeing her; and oh! my child," turning to Lucy, "may this semblance of our crucified Lord comfort you, as it has ever comforted me; cling to it through life, and let neither joy or sorrow separate you from it!"

The poor woman's struggle was soon over, and the gentle and affectionate Lucy was, for the first time, in possession of the symbol of redemption. She soon repaired to the good priest, who unfolded to her the great object of her creation and the grandeur of the heavenly inheritance for which she was destined. Lucy's joy was extatic, and her fervour unbounded; every faculty of her newly-converted mind she now devoted to God, every pulsation of her ardent heart thrilled with love for her crucified Saviour—she felt as if she had been born anew, and that life was now valuable to her, for she had to toil in God's service—all her enthusiasm was now directed towards Him, whom, had she known in her youth, she would have faithfully served.

Lucy remained not long in the world where she had known nought but bitterness; but, under the direction and advice of her confessor, entered a convent in the vicinity of London, where she edifies and cheers, by her fervour and humility, and where she has, at length, discovered a secure haven at the foot of her crucified Saviour, where alone she feels that fulness of happiness which is a foretaste of heaven.

CHAP. III. TYPHUS FEVER—A CAVE—AN OLD WOMAN—FATHER JOHN—A BIBLE-READER AND A CARD PARTY—A PLOT DISCLOSED—A GOOD ANGEL.

THE road, for the remainder of their journey, lay quite close along the shore, and the young man, for a short time, felt himself revived as he took off his hat and allowed the fresh sea-breeze to fan his burning temples. They had not, however, proceeded half a mile when he felt himself so weak and dizzy that, if he had not clung to his father for support, he would have fallen upon the road. The old man carried him to a bank of sand with great difficulty, for he had become quite insensible, and laid him down upon it. At first he thought his son was dead, but he shortly afterwards uttered a deep sigh, opened his eyes and said, "For God's sake get me a drink of water." Withdrawing his arms which he had wound round the young man, in the agony of his feelings, he started off without his hat, in so wild and frantic a manner, his white hair streaming in the wind, that some children who were gathering shell-fish on the shore took him for a maniac, and fled screaming away. Without knowing wherefore, he pursued them at his utmost speed into a cave where they took refuge. There was no one inside but a very old woman, around whom the children had clustered for protection, and who was herself as much frightened as any of them, by the strange apparition which presented itself. "The cross of Christ be between us and harm," said she, making the sacred sign upon her forehead, "but he is a madman." "Get me water," he cried—"give me a mug of water."

She rose quickly and gave it to him with trembling hands, and he no sooner got it than he rushed out of the cave with as much speed as he had entered it. The young man drank it to the last drop, and then said with a faint smile, "it is folly to strive to conquer or conceal it any longer, father, I feel that the sickness is upon me, and that I cannot proceed. I am grateful to God that He enabled me to leave M'Loughlin's house, and that I did not bring this terrible scourge into it." "But, Heavenly Father," said the old man, "what will we do now; oh, do not allow him to perish by the road side. I give thee thanks that she is not here this day, for it would break her tender heart." His son, making a great effort to speak cheerfully, and to hide his own deep sorrow, said: "You must not be cast down, my dear father. Many a time you and I helped to make a shed for a poor houseless wanderer, when he was seized with the disease, in which he was kindly watched, and almost invariably recovered, whilst many died who had their own house to live in and their own family to attend them. I am sure you will find some person near who will assist you to make me a shelter against some of these banks; where the sea breeze will blow upon me, and near which there is a stream of clear cold water, for I am still parched with thirst." The old man had knelt down by the side of his son whilst he was speaking, and had prayed fervently to Mary, "the mother of mercy," to intercede with her divine son to take pity on them. He arose shortly after he had ceased, and having taken the mug and said, "God bless you, dear, until I return," went back to the cave.

The old woman had sent one of the children to the top of the high bank out of which her cave had been excavated, to watch wither the old man went with the water, and had learned that he gave it to some one to drink who was lying by the roadside, and appeared to be ill. She was by the same means made aware of his approach; and when he fervently thanked her for the use of her mug and for the water, and said how deeply grateful he would feel if she would fill it for him once more, she perceived that he was not mad, and therefore recovering her usual bitterness, answered him with great asperity of manner, that she was too poor to lend her mug for nothing, and too weak to carry water for strangers. She, however, informed him that she could give him something that would do the sick man infinitely more good than cold water, and that if he purchased that he might take as much of the latter beverage with him gratis, as he pleased. "I am regularly licensed to the trade," said the hag, "for I served my time to it for two years in the stone jug."

Whiskey was the Holloway's ointment of the time—the universal medicine which cured all diseases—and Sullivan gladly purchased some for his son. The woman eagerly clutched the money in her shrivelled hands, and was so far conciliated, either by what she already received or by the hope of getting more, that she carried a large jug of water to the sick man. His skin was hot and parched by the internal flame which was burning within him, and still both the hag and the old man attempted to force him to swallow the "liquid fire" which they carried with them. Fortunately, his horror of it was so great, that he could not bear it to be brought near him, and they were reluctantly obliged to be content with his drinking the pure water. Sullivan had noted the woman's greedy avarice, and being resolved from the first to procure the shelter of a human habitation for his son, if it should cost him his last shilling, he offered to pay her liberally if she would take him into the cave until he should recover. "I will not deceive you," he said, "it is the fever he has, I am sure, for it was in the house we left; but if you will give him the shelter of your roof, God will give you a blessing for it." Although not in the least afraid of the disease, she pretended to be terribly alarmed, grumbled a good deal, got an advance on the first offer, and then struck the bargain, protesting that she did so out of pure kind-heartedness and humanity. The old man was not deceived by her professions, but he gladly paid her the money, and then went to tell his son that this good woman agreed to take him into her abode until he should recover. His son had disliked her at first sight, but as she was present when the announcement was made, and besides he did not see any alternative, he feebly assented. With the assistance of his father and the woman, one of them supporting each of his arms, he was able to reach the cave which was at no great distance. A bed of clean straw was soon prepared, and he found it a great relief, and was thankful to Providence for it, to obtain even here a place whereon to lay his aching head.

The shore in this part of the country rises, almost perpendicularly, to the height of from fifty to one hundred feet. It is a formation of red sand, cemented into a solid mass, without however having acquired the shape or hardness of stone. The sea does not now come up as far as the banks, but they are filled with caves, which were evidently made at first by its action, although some of them have been enlarged by human industry. The road sometimes intervened between these sand hills and the sea, sometimes it was made over their very summits, and sometimes it ran quite through one of them, taking advantage of a cave which perforated it from end to end. Several of the caves were inhabited; in one there was a carpenter's shop, in another a blacksmith's forge, but these were only occupied during the day; the old woman, however, lived in her's always. Each of these three caves had wide open mouths towards the sea, but they had also one or more outlets in some other direction, and at a distance of about three or four perches from the entrance. The roof also was sometimes twenty feet high, and even more, and sometimes it was not above three or four. The parts far removed from either entrance, were, of course, profoundly dark, except when lighted by candles or torches. That one which was occupied by the old woman, was known to contain five apartments, and how many more she alone could tell. There was first the large and lofty one at the entrance, which was her kitchen and sale room for spirits, and in which she had lived for fifty years in smoke and darkness, for the wide entrance served at once for door, chimney, and window. Behind this, in a semicircle, there were three others, into two of which there were wide openings from the outer cave, and which were consequently full of smoke. The third, however, was entered by a door, and had a window consisting of two small panes of glass, which looked into the outer cave, and which, if it did not admit the light, at all events enabled the person who was in it to observe all that was passing in the other. Behind this again, there was another apartment, which had no direct connexion with those just mentioned, but was entered by a small opening which looked into a green field, where cattle were grazing, and which, as there was no fire within, admitted not only air but light. Like all the other apartments, however, it was very large, and the corners which were farthest away from the little opening were almost always enveloped in entire darkness. This was John Sullivan's sick chamber.

He was not long in bed until he fell into an uneasy and broken slumber. This moment he was conscious of his situation, and looked up at the old man who was bent over him; the next, without falling asleep, he became the prey of the wildest and most incoherent wanderings; now imagining himself tossed on the horns of wild animals and cast amongst nettles, which stung and burned him—and, anon, that he lay in a hot climate, under the fervid rays of a mid-day sun, on the banks of a beautiful river which glided swiftly by, and though he was parched by thirst and scorched by heat, he was not able either to quench his thirst or to cool himself by plunging into the stream. A single word was sufficient, at first, to put to flight these fancies, but, whenever he was left in undisturbed quiet, they haunted him again. The violence of the disease was aggravated by the long resistance he had offered to it, and, during the night, the symptoms became alarming; his feet and legs were seized with cramps, and he was deprived of all rest by a violent and uninterrupted hic-cough, which lasted for twenty-four hours. During the second night he raved almost incessantly, and, in the morning, though his reason returned at intervals, it was difficult to make him understand anything, for he was quite deaf. About nine o'clock he made a sign to his father, who had never left his side, that he wished to speak to him. "Well, dear," said he "is it a drink you want?" "Yes," he replied, "leave plenty of water within my reach, and go for the priest, for, although I hope God, of his infinite mercy, will spare me to take care of you in your old age, we must run no risk where eternity is at stake, and, if it were possible, I would rather see Father John than any other." "But, darling," said his father, "who will take care of you if I leave you, for you know you could not even lift a drink to your parched lips during the whole weary night. I cannot, I will not leave you, but I'll get a messenger to go for Father John." "It is," said the young man, "a long journey, and God knows I do not wish to impose it on you if it could be helped; but, father dear, do not let me die like the beast of the field—do not let me die as none of us ever died, without the blessed sacraments of the church.” He sunk down exhausted with the effort which he had made, and the old man, after leaning over him and kissing him, left the apartment for the first time since they had entered it.

It may appear strange that he should have thought of sending for Father John, who lived at so great a distance, but, it must be remembered, that their road led them in the direction of his parish, and indeed that his residence was very little farther off than that of the nearest priest. In the direction from which they had come, there was none nearer than Father Peter, who lived several miles beyond their native village, and, besides their very natural reluctance to make their present distress known there, both had a strong desire to see Father John, who was one of their oldest and truest friends. The old woman who had given them the lodging had visited them a few times, and had provided a messenger to go for the doctor and to bring medicine and other necessities from the neighbouring town, for a “consideration.” An argument of the same kind induced her to undertake the duties of nurse during the old man’s absence; for, seeing that his refusal would afflict and injure his son, he determined to go instantly in search of Father John. He accordingly hired a horse and set out at once, determining to reach his destination that night, and to be back by the following evening.

To judge from the old woman’s practice, she must have considered that the duties of a sick-nurse were very easily discharged, for from ten o’clock until five she only went to the invalid three times; and, on each of these occasions, she urged him to drink as much as possible, and gave him a double dose of medicine by way of making up for the fewness of her visits. But after five o’clock she did not appear at all during the evening; and the poor sufferer remained until it was quite dark tortured more by thirst than by his other pains, and unable to wet his lips even with a drop of cold water. If he could have called for help never so loudly no one would have heard him, but as it was his tongue had become so swollen that he could not utter even the faintest whisper. He had been insensible he knew not how long, when he was roused by some one touching him gently; he could not speak, but he felt that a drinking-vessel was held to his lips, and he took a deep draught of cold lemonade, which refreshed him wonderfully; he thought it was the old woman, and said in a husky voice, “is my father come back?” “No,” was answered in a plaintive and musical voice, which formed the strongest contrast with the shrill, harsh tones of his nurse. “Cathrine,” said he in a seeming soliloquy, “my own Cathrine, that nursed my dear mother when she died, has come to nurse me also.” “No, no,” said the voice in a tone still more plaintive than the first, “I am not Cathrine, but I have come to nurse you tenderly until you get better; how sorry I am that I did not know sooner that you were in this terrible den.” He did not answer her, for he was raving once more, and talking to his mother as if she were still alive.

He remained in this state through the whole night and the following day. During all this time, his strange visitor attended him with the greatest care, administering his medicine, keeping his lips wet, and his humble bed clean; and still no one had seen her there, but the old woman and the sufferer. Although the names of his father and mother, of Catherine and Father John, were frequently on his lips, he had never once breathed that of his gentle nurse. No thought of her to whom he owed his life ever entered his mind. Still she remained a patient watcher, until the evening of the next day, when two horsemen approached the cave, at as rapid a pace as their jaded animals were capable of. She instantly disappeared, and they entered, accompanied by the old woman, and found the young man apparently in a dying state. His breathing was heavy and difficult, his hands tightly grasped the blanket, and his eyes were turned so that, though they were wide open, no part of the pupil appeared. His father cast himself frantically by his side; blamed himself for leaving him; accused the old hag with neglect, although she protested that she had scarcely ever been a moment absent and finally fell down on the floor, exhausted with fatigue and sorrow. Father John, waiting until the first paroxysm of his grief had spent itself, said to him, in a tone of the deepest sympathy, “You know that I loved John as my own brother, and that my sorrow for him is only less than yours. Kneel down, therefore, and pray to God, and who knows but that He will yet spare him; for you are aware that the sacrament of Extreme Unction was instituted for the relief of the body as well as of the soul.” So saying, he put on his stole; and, having exhorted the sick man, if he could hear or understand him, to be heartily sorry for his sins, he executed that divine commission, which Christ has given to man, and not even to the angels of heaven, to purify the soul from sin, in His name, and through the merits of His blood, by pronouncing over him the sacred words of absolution. He then proceeded to anoint him with the holy oil, and instantly his eyes returned to their proper place; he looked full upon the priest and said, “God bless you, Father John; when did you come here?” “The Lord be praised!” the priest replied, “that you are better;” and then turning to the old man, he added, “He has heard our prayers; let us not be ungrateful.” He knelt down by the old man’s side, and they both prayed long and fervently, not without shedding tears of joy and of thankfulness. I have known innumerable instance of the same kind, and no matter how sceptics may sneer, I am not afraid to avow them in which the divine sacrament of Extreme Unction, according to the promise of St. James, relieved the body, and restored it to health, when all other remedies had been tried in vain.

Father John remained during the whole night watching by the bed of the sick man, who had fallen asleep, and enjoyed several hours of calm repose. When he awoke he was greatly better, and it was evident that the fever had left him. At his own earnest request, the good priest heard his confession, gave him absolution once more, and administered to him the Holy Eucharist; and then, as soon as early morning began to appear, he set out on his return, in order to be ready for every call, and to spend the day, and perhaps the night, in converting the sinner, in comforting the sick, in burying the dead; everywhere sharing the sorrows of his people, and fearlessly breathing, without hope of earthly recompense, the poisonous air of pestilence, whose breath was fraught with maladies and with death. There is no where a greater, a truer, and a more disinterested hero than an Irish Catholic Priest; and well and nobly has he earned the love and affection of his people.

the day, and about six o'clock in the evening he fell into a deep and refreshing sleep. His father had not once closed his eyes for five days and nights; and, having now watched the quiet slumbers of his son for several hours, he felt that all danger was over, and the anxiety and excitement which sustained him under his fatigues being thus removed, he found that it was impossible for him to remain awake; and wrapping himself in his great coat, he lay down and composed himself for a brief repose. It might be about nine o'clock, or a little later, that the young man was roused by a strange voice, which seemed to issue from another apartment in the cave, and to be at the same time very near him. He turned his face in the direction from which the sound came, and saw, through a chink in the partition which separated the apartment in which he lay from another of the recesses in the cave, upwards of twenty men drinking, and singing, and shouting in the most uproarious manner. The apartment in which they were assembled was dimly lighted, so that he could not distinctly see the features of any of the men, but their general outlines seemed to accord perfectly well with their occupation, and to be savage and forbidding in the extreme. The greater number were sitting round a rude table drinking; whilst six or seven, without neglecting to pay their respects to the spirits, were playing cards on one end of a meal-barrel, on which was placed a solitary candle. One of the players was directly opposite John Sullivan, and he distinctly recognized him. He was a famous "Bible-reader," who was liberally paid for going through the houses of the Catholic tenantry of Evangelical landlords, and kindly informing them that they were the children of Antichrist, and bore upon their foreheads the "mark of the beast." He always carried a pack of cards in one pocket, and the Bible in the other; thus keeping, as he pleasantly observed to his boon companions under the rose, "two strings to his bow." His companions called him "Grace of God Peter;" and during the card party on the present occasion when he had a dispute with one of them, he suddenly took the Bible out of his pocket, and swore that he was right. "Is that," said his opponent, "the cards or the Bible?" "The Bible," said he. "Then," the other answered, "that will do for this time; but, by—, if swearing is to be in at all, I insist that the book be left on the barrel, so that every one may have a fair chance."

The game was "spoil five;" and it was evident, from the number of times each person put down, without any one winning, that the stakes must have become very considerable. The excitement kept pace with the increase of the money, and every "spoil" was the signal for boisterous shouting and exultation. At length, one person became certain that he should get the game, for he had already won two tricks; he was the last but one to play, and held the knave in his hand. He threw down his card in triumph, and every one gave up the game for lost; but the person who was last in play, flourished his card round his head, and, crying out spoiled again, struck the bottom of the barrel with such force, that he knocked it in, cards, candle, money and all. The person who had played the knave vociferated that he had won; whilst the last player swore that his card was the "five of trumps," and consequently that the game was spoiled. The affair ended in a regular scramble; the barrel was torn to pieces, and the floor was covered with meal, blood, and money.

And now they are gone, and the place where they were is dark and empty. But hush! there are persons speaking in it again, and in a low voice, at his very ear. Why does the mere sound of one of these voices make him start? What name is pronounced by it, and what horrid plot does it disclose, which makes the blood rush back upon his heart, so as almost to smother him? It is too late to prevent it; for, according to the speaker, whose voice he instantly recognized, and who had absented himself from home on an evangelical mission with the Bible-reader, he knew full well, in order that he might be able to prove, by the clearest evidence, that he had no connexion with the destruction of the Widow M'Quillan's property, with the burning of her house, or the abduction of her daughter. The voices here cease, and he calls to his father to awake as loudly as his feeble strength will permit him; but the old man sleeps on. He tries to rise, but as soon as he presses his foot against the floor, he feels as if he had stood upon sharp needles, and falls back exhausted upon his bed. Again he calls wildly, frantically, but in vain. Was it in vain? Some one has heard him who will at all events awake his father. Thank God. But hush! Great God, is it that man? Yes, he feels it though he cannot see him. He first goes to the old man, to be sure that he still sleeps; then stealthily gropes his way to the sick man's bed. He feels that the breath of a murderer is in the room. Already it is upon him, when a light step is heard in the cave, and the horrid phantom flies from the presence of his good angel. Yes, it is the same sweet voice which soothed him in his delirium; and he knows it now—it is the voice of Ann M'Loughlin.

St. Columba's Hymn to St. Bridget.

[FROM THE LIBER HYMNORUM.]*

I.

Oh, Bridget, Virgin ever bright,
Oh, golden torch of love and light,
Rich lamp illumining earth's dark dome,
Guide us to our eternal home!

II.

Defend us, Bridget, mighty Saint,
From every evil touch and taint;
Defend us from all wiles and woes,
And from our fierce infernal foes,

III.

Create in us, anew, afresh,
A spirit that shall hate the flesh;
Oh! Blessed Virgin, Mother, give
To all new power to love and live!

IV.

Thou holiest saint of these our days,
Worthy unutterable praise,
Protect green Leinster from all harm
And keep her sons from vain alarm!

V.

O! pillar of our kingdom, grandest!
To Patrick next, that chief, thou standest
Thou blessed maid, thou Queen of Queens,
On thee each soul devoutly leans!

VI.

And after this vain life be past
Oh, let our lot with thine be cast!
And save us in that last dread day
When Heaven and Earth shall flee away!

THE

Life and Death of Oliver Plunkett,

PRIMATE OF IRELAND.

PART II.

WE are unable to tell the precise time at which Primate Plunkett arrived in Ireland, for he came in the most private manner, and continued for a considerable period "lurking in the country" after his arrival. It was not without reason that he adopted this precaution, for, on the 20th November, the lord lieutenant, Robarts, pretended to Lord Conway that the king had privately informed him, that two persons, one of whom was Archbishop Plunkett, "had been sent from Rome, and were lurking in the country to do mischief." Although it was "very late," Robarts commanded Lord Conway to write that very night to Lisburn, in the county of Antrim, to his brother-in-law, Sir George Rawdon, to tell him that it would be "An acceptable service if he could dexterously find out the Primate and his companion, and apprehend them." It is most improbable that the king had written to Robarts in the way he mentions, but it is not at all unlikely that if Dr. Plunkett had been discovered at this time, his head would have been taken off eleven years earlier. The following is the letter:

LETTER CVI.

From the Lord Conway to his brother-in-law, Sir George Rawdon, then residing near Lisburn, Co. Antrim.

DEAR BROTHER—

I have been all this day with my lord lieutenant, or employed about his commands, and I am but newly come home from him; though it be very late, yet I am to give you notice by his command, that the king hath privately informed him of two persons sent from Rome, that lie lurking in this country to do mischief. One is Signori Agnetti, an Italian employed by the college de Propaganda Fide; the other is Plunkett, a member of the same college, and designed titular archbishop of Armagh. If you can dexterously find them out and apprehend them, 'twill be an acceptable service. But I told him I did not think they kept their residence in our parts (about Lisburn), however, he thinks it his duty to search everywhere.

Dublin, 20th November, 1669.*

CONWAY.

The primate, therefore, must have been in Ireland a little before this date, but not long, for the letter evidently implies that his arrival must have been very recent. It is probable that he reached his diocese about the end of October, 1669, and, consequently, soon after Robarts had assumed the reins of government.

Notwithstanding the knowledge that he was hunted after with the most persevering diligence, he did not fly from the kingdom nor abdicate his functions, as head of the Irish Church, at this time of her utmost need. Persecution had so thinned the priesthood by death and exile, that, notwithstanding the return of many after the Restoration, there were still a vast number of parishes entirely destitute of pastors. The Primate immediately set about supplying this want, in spite of the perils which surrounded him, and we know that he held at least two ordinations before the end of the year 1669.* Shortly afterwards there was a brief

* We learn this interesting fact from the list of priests registered at quarter sessions in Ireland, in 1704, pursuant to an act passed the previous year, entitled "An Act for registering the Popish Clergy." The object of this act was, as is stated in the preamble, to carry out "two acts lately made for banishing all regulars of the Popish clergy out of the kingdom (Ireland), and to prevent Popish priests from coming into the same." These two acts were; first, "A Bill to prevent Popish Priests from coming into this kingdom," passed by the House of Lords on the 5th of October, 1703; and second, "A Bill to prevent the further growth of Popery," passed by the Lords on the 29th of February, 1703. The bill for registering the Popish clergy passed the Lords on the 3rd of March, 1703. These anti-Popish acts, which followed each other in such "hot haste," will be found duly chronicled in the "Irish Lord's Journals" of the second year of the reign of Queen Anne. It will be observed that the Irish Parliament still followed the "old style." In all Catholic countries the year commenced with the first of January ever since the Papal alteration of the style in 1582. All Europe, immediately after, adopted the Gregorian computation, with the exception of England, which was too Protestant to receive the truth from a Pope. Scotland commenced the year with the first of January since 1600, but still followed the old style as to the day of the month. At length, after a resistance of nearly two centuries, England was obliged to allow the year 1753 to commence on the first of January. Eleven days were also omitted between the second and fourteenth days of September, 1752, so that the day after the second was called the fourteenth of that month. Without keeping this fact before our eyes we cannot correctly quote any documents of this period. For instance, the three acts to which we have referred all belong to the year 1703, though, according to the new style, one of them was passed in February, and another in March, 1704. By the last of these acts each priest was bound to go to the first general quarter sessions after the feast of St. John the Baptist, in the year 1704, and to make a return to the clerk of the peace of his name, age, place of abode, together with the time and place of his receiving orders, the name of the person from whom he received them, and of the parish "of which he pretended to be Popish priest." He was also obliged to produce two sureties, who were each to be bound in the sum of £50, that every such priest would be of peaceable behaviour, and not remove out of the county in which his abode was. Every infraction of the act was to be punished by transportation. One of the clauses provided for apostate priests in a most singular and cruel manner, by levying the sum of twenty pounds annually for their support "on the inhabitants of such county, or counties of cities, or towns, where such converted priest or priests did last officiate or reside." The list of priests registered in consequence of this act, through the several counties of Ireland, in 1704, was reprinted in Battersby's Catholic Directory for 1838. It is, however, so incorrect as to be destitute of all authority unless when its statements are confirmed by other evidence. For instance, "Oliver Plunkett, Primate of Armagh" is made to hold an ordination at Dublin in 1667 (Catholic Directory, p. 114), that is, two years before he was a bishop. The same error occurs in p. 115, whilst in pp. 161 and 226, he is said to have held ordinations in 1666, and in p. 183, so early as 1657, that is, twelve years before his consecration, which just coincides with the date of his appointment to the professorship of divinity in the college "de Propaganda Fide," at Rome. On the other hand, he is not only made to hold ordinations in 1681, during the whole of which, up to the time of his death, in July, he was in the prison of Newgate, London, but it is stated, moreover, in three different places (pp. 120, 140, 147), that he ordained in 1685, four years after his death; and in p. 235 he is represented as exercising the same function in 1692, eleven years after his execution. The whole time during which Dr. Plunkett was Primate, from October, 1669 to July, 1681, does not amount to quite twelve years, whilst this list represents him as exercising that high office from 1659 to 1692, a period of thirty-three years! There is an original printed copy of this list in the library of the Royal Dublin Society. The original broad sheets are bound in square folio and were "printed by Andrew Crook, printer to the Queen's (Anne) most excellent majesty on the Blind-quay (Dublin), 1705." It begins with the County of Antrim—not with Armagh as in the Catholic Directory—and goes through all the other towns lull in the desolating tempest which had so long swept over the Irish Church, for, in May, 1670, Robarts was displaced in the lord lieutenancy by Lord Berkley, who carried with him to the government the virtues of mildness, toleration, and justice. Under his administration the exercise of the Catholic religion was tolerated, and Peter Talbot, the illustrious archbishop of Dublin, publicly celebrated high mass in the capital, to the lasting horror and indignation of the Puritans.

in regular alphabetical order. The cities, counties of towns, and towns are placed immediately beside the several counties in which they are situated, with the exception of Youghal, which, through mistake, is assigned to Waterford instead of to Cork. At the end of the list for each county the following words occur: "By order of his grace the lord lieutenant (Ormond), and council, H. Pulteney, Dep. Cler. Con. Priv." The total number of priests in each county, city, county of town, and town, is placed at the foot of each of the lists. These things have not been printed in the Catholic Directory, in which there are some other more important omissions. In a great many instances the day of the month, on which the ordination is said to have taken place, is mentioned in the original copy, but omitted in the reprint in the Catholic Directory. These dates sometimes make the anachronisms more glaring, as in one of the instances, already mentioned, where Dr. Plunkett is said to have held an ordination at Ardpatrick, in the county of Louth, in the year 1681, whereas he was confined during the entire of that year, up to the time of his execution in Newgate, in London. In the original copy the time mentioned is the 10th of June, 1681, and his trial and conviction took place on the 8th, two days previously. In other instances, however, as we shall presently see, the mention of the month enables us to reconcile apparent discrepancies. Frequently the year is not mentioned positively in the original copy, but only "about" such a year; or "about" a certain number of years ago; or such a time before Plunkett's death. In such cases if the dates be irreconcilable with the other facts mentioned, it is natural to suppose that they are incorrect. All these are, however, set down absolutely in the Catholic Directory. In other respects the reprint is exceedingly accurate, preserving even all the misprints and errors of the original.

There is perhaps no other document of equal interest connected with the history of the Irish Catholic Church during the seventeenth century, and it is, therefore, a great pity that it should not be carefully edited by some one thoroughly acquainted with the history of the period. One of the chief causes of the errors connected with Primate Plunkett's ordinations is, that there was one of his contemporary Irish bishops of the same name, who also ordained a considerable number of the priests registered in 1704. This was Patrick Plunkett, bishop of Ardagh. He is one of the twenty-six Irish Bishops mentioned by Dr. French in his "Elenchus," as having been resident in their sees in 1649. He was afterwards obliged to fly from the country, but returned secretly after ten years' exile. In conjunction with the vicars-general of Armagh, Dublin, and Meath, he acted as representative of the general body of the clergy in November, 1665, and agreed to the assembling of the synod to consider the Valesian remonstrance. More than thirty of the priests registered in 1704 were ordained by this bishop whilst he remained in the see of Ardagh. Almost all his ordinations were held in Dublin, and chiefly during the years 1665-6-7-8. He is falsely called bishop of Armagh in the list published in the Catholic Directory (pp. 125, 137, 149); in consequence of which error two ordinations are ascribed to Primate Plunkett in 1667, and one so early as 1665. Patrick Plunkett was translated to the see of Meath about 1668 or 1669. It had been vacant since the death of Anthony Geoghan, which took place about 1664. More than sixty of the priests registered in 1704 are represented to have been ordained by him whilst bishop of Meath. Most of these ordinations took place in Dublin. The list, however, is grossly wrong with regard to this bishop, as his ordinations are continued in a regular series down to 1699.

As if all this confusion about bishops Plunkett were not sufficient, we have Oliver Plunkett made archbishop of Meath (Catholic Directory, p. 190), and, by way of compensation, Patrick Plunkett, is called Primate (p. 212). Again Patrick Plunkett is made archbishop of Dublin (pp. 209, 210), bishop of Ferns (p. 153), and bishop of Dublin (pp. 163-4). The real bishop of Ferns gets a new title (p. 167), being called "bishop of Gaunt Flanders." Besides many of the ordinations are said to have been performed by "bishop Plunkett," which sometimes means the Primate, sometimes the bishop of Meath, and sometimes the bishop of Ardagh. All these errors, and many others which we could mention, are found in the original copy as well as in the Catholic Directory, and we Professed Catholics were also admitted to inhabit and trade in the towns; to become members of corporate bodies, and to hold the commission of the peace. In Dublin the Puritans attempted to prevent, by force, the admission of Catholic aldermen and common councilmen; but, as the lord lieutenant was not on their side, they were obliged to desist from their violence, and to smother their resentment.

The Catholic lords and gentlemen who had been have only pointed out the places in the latter because it is in the hands of so many of the clergy and laity. The names of places are also horribly mutilated; for instance, Ballybarrack, near Dundalk, where the workhouse of that union is situated, and where Primate Plunkett held a great many of his ordinations, is printed Ballybarky, Ballybark, Ballyvarum, Ballyvaruk, and in a variety of other most extraordinary ways. The names of persons are not a whit more respected, and Joey B. had not half so many aliases as Dr. Phelan of Ossory gets in this "list." A great many of Primate Plunkett's ordinations took place at Ardpatrick, near Ardee, in the county of Louth. This place the Catholic Directory (p. 226) places in the county of Galway. Still, a person acquainted with the personal history of the bishops, and with the history and topography of Ireland, would be able without much trouble to correct most of the errors in this "List;" which would then be a most valuable document. We may as well mention here, lest it might lead any person into error, that in the notice of Catholic bishops of Ardagh, published in the Catholic Directory for 1837, there is a mistake of something more than a century with regard to the time when Patrick Plunkett was bishop of that see.

In this "List" there are three priests registered in 1704, who are said to have been ordained by Primate Plunkett so early as 1669. One of them, Owen M'Iver, parish priest of Magherafelt and two other parishes, was ordained at Ballybarky (Ballybarrack), county of Louth, in 1669. The month is not mentioned. Another, Hugh M'Cormick, parish priest of Upper Termon, in the county of Tyrone, was ordained by the Primate at Ardpatrick, in the county of Louth (falsely called Galway in the "List"), in the same year. These must have been two distinct ordinations as they were held at different places. But this last ordination is said to have occurred in March, 1669. Now, Edmund Reilly, Oliver Plunkett's predecessor, is said to have ordained James Reilly at Paris, in 1669 (Catholic Directory, p. 188). The original list places this ordination in the month of January. It would, therefore, be impossible for Dr. Plunkett to have been in Ireland, or indeed to have been appointed at all in March. In the first place, it may be observed that the "List" contains several errors regarding Primate Reilly's ordinations—that it represents him as conferring orders in various parts of Ireland when he certainly was not in the country at all; and that (p. 225) it makes him hold an ordination in Dublin in 1674, several years after his death. But, in fact, the two statements are not at all incompatible, when we remember that the "style" was different at this time in France and in Ireland, and that January, 1669, in France corresponded with January, 1668, in Ireland. By this computation fourteen months would intervene between the two ordinations, which is amply sufficient. Edmond Moore, parish priest of Carrickfergus, and several other parishes in Antrim, is said, in the Catholic Directory (p. 116), to have been ordained at Ardpatrick by Patrick Plunkett, bishop of Meath; but as Ardpatrick is in the diocese of Armagh, as Primate Plunkett held a great number of ordinations at this place, and one as we have seen during this very year, it is certain that he was the ordaining bishop in the present instance; but as the month in which Moore's ordination took place is not mentioned we are unable to tell whether he was ordained along with M'Cormick or at another time. Denis Colgan, parish priest of Donagh, county Donegal, is said (Catholic Directory, p. 137) to have been ordained in Dublin by Patrick Plunkett, the titular bishop of Armagh, in October, 1669. It is certain that this ordination was performed by the bishop of Ardagh, then translated to Meath, for the preceding ordination is said to have been also performed at Dublin, by Patrick Plunkett, titular bishop of Armagh, and then Colgan's ordination is set down ditto, ditto. Now the first was performed in 1665, and consequently four years before Oliver Plunkett was consecrated. It is, therefore, obvious that the mistake consists, in the first instance, in putting Armagh for Ardagh, and, as the second was manifestly performed by the same person as the first, that Patrick Plunkett was the person who ordained on both occasions. From all this, however, it is certain that during the year 1669, old style, Dr. Plunkett held two or three ordinations at least, as there were living, thirty-five years afterwards, three priests who were ordained by him in that year, two of them at different places.

robbed of their property, although they had fought valiantly and loyally for the king, now ventured to represent to his majesty that they, his tried friends, had been deprived of their property, in order to enrich his bitter enemies, the undertakers, adventurers, and Cromwellian soldiers; and they commissioned Colonel Richard Talbot to lay their grievances before the king and parliament of England. He accordingly proceeded to England, in 1671, and presented their petition to his majesty and council, praying that some impartial persons should be appointed to hear and report their case, and that, in the interim, the king should suspend his grants of any lands not yet disposed of in Ireland. A committee was appointed on the 28th of January, 1671, to consider this petition, but their old and inveterate enemy, Ormond, had the assurance to propose that the petitioners might not be heard nor their counsel admitted to object against either the Act of Settlement or the Act of Explanation—the former of which had been passed eight, and the latter five years ago. But, though he did not succeed in this, he prevailed on the attorney-general, Sir Heneage Finch, who was himself nothing loath, to make a report most unfavourable to the petitioners against the clearest and most decisive evidence. Notwithstanding this opposition, the report made by the committee on the 12th of June, caused the king to issue a commission under the great seal, on the 17th of August, 1671, to investigate the matter. A second commission, with more extensive powers, was issued, without however producing any result, for the adventurers and other robbers, who feared that some part of their plunder might be taken from them, raised such a ferment among the English Puritans who constituted the vast majority of the parliament which was about to assemble, that Lord Berkley was suddenly recalled, and the Earl of Essex appointed in his stead to the chief government of Ireland.* The English parliament met on the 5th of February, 1673, and during the same month compelled the king to rescind the "Declaration of indulgence to dissenters," and on the 18th passed a resolution, declaring every person incapable of employment, civil or military, who would not take the oath of supremacy, and receive the sacrament according to the rites of the church of England. The cause of the Irish plunderers was taken up with the greatest vehemence by the popular leaders, and on the 25th of March an address was presented to the king, demanding the revocation of the commission, the maintenance of the Act of Settlement in Ireland, the banishment of all Catholic priests from that kingdom, the dissolution of all convents and seminaries, the expulsion of all Catholic inhabitants out of Irish corporations, the disqualification of all Papists to be sheriffs, coroners, or magistrates, and the punishment of Colonel Richard Talbot, for daring to act as agent for a number of mere Irish lords and gentlemen. They also demanded that the lord lieutenant should have orders to persecute the Papists, and to encourage the planters and Protestants.† The commission was dissolved on the 26th of the same month, and thus was every prospect of relief closed, and at the same time the signal given to let loose once more the hell-hounds of persecution.

The brief interval of repose which the Irish Church enjoyed during the administration of Lord Berkley, was employed by the Primate in repairing the disorders which had necessarily crept in, on account of the absence of the bishops, the guardians of discipline, and also on account of the terrible calamities through which she had passed. The Valesian remonstrance and the counter-remonstrance had produced heart-burnings and dissensions, which his mild and conciliatory, but at the same time firm and determined conduct enabled him to allay. The opposers of Peter Walsh's remonstrance, who formed the vast majority of the clergy of the kingdom, had been, as we have already seen, terribly persecuted during the administration of Ormond. On the accession of Berkley to the viceroyalty, some of these persons were inclined to retaliate with considerable severity; and even the archbishop of Dublin had denounced the supporters of Walsh's remonstrance as excommunicated. The Primate, though taking no part with the remonstrants, opposed this severity, as calculated to keep open and to fester instead of healing the wounds of the Church. A misunderstanding ensued between the two archbishops, each asserting that his own was the primatial see; and so strongly was each convinced of the justice of his cause that, when a general convocation of the clergy took place in Dublin, during the year 1670, to present an address to Lord Berkley—expressive of their gratitude for his mild and paternal administration—neither of these prelates would sign it after the other.

* The members of the second commission were, Prince Rupert, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Lauderdale and Anglesey, Lords Holles and Ashley, Sir T. Chicheley, and Secretary Trevor.

Peter Talbot, who was at this time archbishop of Dublin, was the son of Sir William Talbot, and brother of Colonel Richard Talbot, afterwards Duke of Tyrconnell and lord lieutenant of Ireland. He was born at Carton, near Maynooth, in the county of Kildare, in 1620, and in 1635 joined the society of the Jesuits in Portugal. He studied his divinity at first in Portugal, and afterwards in Rome; and, having received holy orders in the latter city, he returned to Portugal. He afterwards removed to the Low Countries, and read lectures on moral theology at Antwerp. Carte (vol. ii., p. 172) says, that during his residence in the Low Countries he was supposed to have reconciled King Charles II. to the Catholic religion at Cologne in 1656, and that he was sent secretly to Spain by that prince to communicate the intelligence to the court of Madrid. Great discredit is, however, thrown upon this story by the silence of his contemporary, Arsdekin, who has written his life and especially noticed his intimacy with the king (Vita, &c., Petri Talboti, &c. ad calcem Theologiæ, p. 161). De Burgo relates it as a fact, on the authority of Carte and Harris (Hib. Dom., p. 711, note 2). It is stated in the notice of Talbot's life which is given in Harris's Ware's writers, on the authority of "Foxes and Firebrands" (p. 96), that he was afterwards sent to England; that he became intimate with Cromwell himself, and that he was seen "to walk amongst the mourners at his funeral in a black cloak, which as the fashion was he wore some time after in publick." It is also asserted in the same place that, when Monk declared for the king, he marched out with Lambert to oppose the design, and that he fled from England on the Restoration. This story must be placed in the same category with the calumnies of Peter Walsh, who lyingly asserts in his remonstrance, that Talbot was ejected out of the society of the Jesuits in 1659. Arsdekin (ubi supra) clearly indicates that he did not visit England until after the Restoration. So far as the story about his opposition to the king is concerned, it has not the least feasibility, for he came to England the year after the Restoration, and, on the king's marriage, became one of the chaplains to the queen. Lady Castlemaine (afterwards Duchess of Cleveland), Charles's mistress, got the king to order Talbot to depart the kingdom in 1662, on account of a story which he told the queen about an "enchantress." Some years afterwards he came to Ireland to assist as a private individual in advancing the Catholic cause; but his virtues, learning, and numerous writings, soon made him famous not only in Ireland and England, but also upon the continent. Upon the application of many of the clergy he was advanced to the archbishopric of Dublin by Clement IX., and consecrated at Ghent on the 2nd of May, 1669. He had been acquainted with the duke of Buckingham at court, and in 1670 enjoyed the confidence of that nobleman, who was then in the ministry, as well as of Lord Berkley, the lord lieutenant. Relying on the favour of these powerful persons, he assumed a lofty tone in the synod, and told Dr. Plunkett that if he did not concede him the rights of Primate of the whole kingdom, he hoped he would at least defer to the authority of the king, "who had appointed him to oversee all the clergy of Ireland." Dr. Plunkett insisted on seeing the document which conferred upon him such extraordinary authority: Talbot—"I have it not indeed under the great seal." Plunkett—"The little seal will serve my turn; but, until one or the other is produced, I shall oversee thee, and I expect to be obeyed." The archbishop of Dublin found that the Primate was a man not to be intimidated in the assertion of what he conceived his just rights; and that however mild and tolerant he was in general, he was fearless and intrepid when the occasion required these virtues. Dr. Talbot therefore finding that he was not able, even with the aid of the lord lieutenant, to exercise the rights of Primate over all the clergy of the country, signified his intention of going over to England, for the purpose, as he alleged, of counteracting Peter Walsh's efforts to have the remonstrance enforced. But the Primate suspected that he had other designs, and he therefore inhibited him from leaving Ireland, and told him plainly that "he had the reputation of intermeddling too much in affairs of state, contrary to the canons of the church and the orders of the Pope."—(Harris Ware's Writers—Life of Peter Talbot.)

The Sicilian Question

IN 1848.

BY THE REV. FATHER JOACHIM VENTURA,
EX-GENERAL OF THE THEATINES.

In his funeral oration on O'Connell, Father Ventura pleaded the cause of Ireland in the capital of the Christian world; the same eloquence has lately contributed to the emancipation of his own country, for, like most of the great Roman preachers, Father Ventura is a Sicilian. He published this philippic immediately after the rising of Palermo, with the express purpose of preventing his countrymen from yielding any of their advantages, and resisting all overtures of powers however friendly, which would not guarantee the legislative independence of Sicily. Ireland furnishes some of his most powerful arguments; but the parallel is not complete. Sicily did not lose one-eighth of her population by famine in one year, while her produce, in grain alone, in that year would feed double her population; but Ireland did lose one million in 1847, though her harvest of that year would feed sixteen million during twelve months! Sicily was often taunted with her ingratitude to her generous governors; but these governors never boasted—as Lord John Russell, we are sorry to say, frequently does—of having lent £10,000,000 of imperial money (much of it her own) to save a million of her sons from death, while they granted (they! the richest empire on the earth they tell us) £20,000,000 to give liberty to some 100,000 well-fed, well-housed, well-clothed "African slaves." The sufferings of Sicily were not so great as those of Ireland—her enemy was less powerful, her sons more united. Ireland is not united—in truth she has no native aristocracy; her few Catholic nobles and gentry—where are they since 1829? not even the confiscation by poor-law can persuade them or their Protestant compeers that their interests are those of the Irish people. Sicily has an aristocracy; her people knew that her revenue, even in the worst year, was greater than her expenditure, and that the surplus was expended for the benefit of Naples; the influence of the ecclesiastical revenues of Naples in Sicily could not neutralize the eloquence of these facts—and Sicily now is free.

It is not for the parallel we publish "the Sicilian Question," but because we feel that when the Thierry's of a future age review the great revolutions lately accomplished with so little bloodshed in Europe, Ventura and O'Connell, Sicily and Ireland, must hold a very prominent place in their pages.

SECTION I.—ANCIENT RIGHT OF SICILY TO A SEPARATE CONSTITUTION.

UNDER the specious mask of the political interests of the state, and the interests of the Italian league, there is a party in Naples which is endeavouring to inflict the greatest injustice and injury on Sicily.

They wish to rob that isle for ever of its right to its own government and its national parliament, and to keep it in a wretched and degraded position as a miserable province of the kingdom of Naples—a condition to which it has actually been reduced during the last thirty-three years—by a measure as despotic as it was infatuated. No; Sicily shall never be content to be the mere baronial fief or lordship of a Neapolitan minister.

From the days of King Roger, about 700 years ago, Sicily was always a separate kingdom, under its own constitution, which had been guaranteed by the oaths and the respect of thirty-eight monarchs, kings or emperors, of the most powerful dynasties in Europe, to which the island had been successively subjected during that long course of ages.

Sicily is therefore one of the most ancient constitutional kingdoms in Europe—it may be said it was really the cradle of constitutional liberty. Sicily is the parent of the Italian language and literature, so that the remark of Petrarch is true even in the political order:

"I Siciliani che gia furo i primi ed ora son da sezzo."

Now is it just, is it reasonable, that the country in which constitutional liberty first arose, in which, and by which, constitutional liberty is restored and propagated to other states at present, should herself be deprived of it? Must she sink to the rank of a province, surrender her own constitution, and serve the caprices and interests of a party on the continent? What crime has Sicily committed that she should be thus degraded and blotted out from the map of nations, amongst which, in our modern, as well as in ancient times, she has always figured with so much dignity and glory.

SECTION 2.—CONSTITUTION OF 1812; WHY IT WAS ESTABLISHED, AND WHAT WERE THE CONSEQUENCES OF ITS ABOLITION.

In 1808, the national parliament, which had assembled according to ancient usage, resisted energetically a new tax of one per cent. on all transfer of property; this was at once a grasping impost, which would soon bring cent. per cent. to the government. The most distinguished members of that memorable assembly—men of the noblest and most powerful families in the kingdom, who had organized and maintained this truly patriotic and national opposition—were unceremoniously cast into prison like the vilest brigand, and transported to the islets in the neighbouring seas, there to expiate, in chains and hard labour, the noble crime of having defended with heroic courage, the true interests of their country, and of the people.

A proceeding so atrocious and insulting opened the eyes of the most indifferent. It was manifest that the old Sicilian constitution, which left power so exorbitant in the hands of the government, was no sufficient guarantee for the property of the nation, the freedom of election, the independence and personal security of the member, against the arbitrary and tyrannical acts of the court.

It was therefore resolved to reform that constitution on the plan of the constitution of England, and that reformed constitution, confirmed by the oaths of king and people, established by the co-operation and under the protection of Great Britain and the other powers of Europe, governed Sicily during five years, and raised her during that time to a remarkable degree of power and prosperity.

The ministers of the king of Naples, who had accompanied his majesty to Sicily, beheld with a jealous eye, the improving development of wealth and power in that hospitable land which had afforded them an asylum during ten years. As soon as they returned to Naples, when Ferdinand IV. recovered that kingdom, their first act was to destroy the new constitution of Sicily, without leaving even the old in compensation. Without the least formality, without a single reason alleged, a royal proclamation declares that Naples and Sicily are an united kingdom, and that, with the exception of a few paltry and useless privileges, Sicily shall henceforth be a province.

Thus, the same royal personage who had twice confirmed, by oath her independence and liberty, now, with one touch of his pen, pronounces her degradation—her slavery—her annihilation. Thus, that imprudent monarch tore with his own hands the legitimate title-deed of his power in Sicily. The Bourbon dynasty held the crown of Sicily on no other title than the constitution of Sicily, and the free and express wish of the people. But from that moment its title and government was force, the bayonet and cannon were the only bond—the true expression of the political relation between king and people. Thus, those Neapolitan courtiers, in the kindness and generosity of their grateful hearts, devised no better means of manifesting their gratitude to that Sicily which had twice afforded them an asylum from the French invasion of the continent, than to trample on all her rights by the most flagrant perjury, and to abolish all her privileges.

Unhappy Sicily, that was the commencement of the long succession of miseries of all kinds to which you have been subjected during thirty-two years. That was the commencement of those laws and institutions which were planned in Naples, for the interests of Naples forced on Sicily at the cannon's mouth; and which engendered revolutions, pauperization, and oppression, which, in a word, fulfilled to the letter that brutal prophecy, pronounced with cold-blooded atrocity by the Neapolitan ministers, on their return from the emigration—"Sicily shall have nothing left, but her eyes to weep."

SECTION 3.—REVOLUTION OF 1820; SCANDALOUS CONDUCT OF THE NEAPOLITAN GOVERNMENT TOWARDS SICILY.

In 1820 an event still more deplorable and scandalous took place. A successful revolution in Naples had extorted a new constitution from the king; the ministry lost no time in imposing it on Sicily, with the avowed object of making her a partner in its benefits, but really to enlist that island in the revolutionary movement on the continent, and to strengthen themselves, by the imposing power of the Sicilians, against the dangers which threatened what they called the rising regeneration.

The Sicilians, who had suffered so much from the Neapolitan ministers during the last five years, had learned wisdom from experience, and were perfectly aware of what they would in future have to suffer if they remained under the united government of Naples. They accepted the constitution, in as far as it implied the union of the crowns, but on the express condition that Sicily should have a separate national parliament, and a separate government; with the obligation, besides, of contributing their due share to the common expenses for the support of one army, one navy, and one sovereign court, all on the plan which had existed during so many centuries, and which had been established in the last constitutional reform in 1812.

A demand so just and reasonable, founded on ancient rights which had never been legally abolished, much less proscribed—because the treaty of Vienna had nothing to do with Sicily, which had never been invaded by the French—a demand, I say, so just and reasonable, appeared to certain liberals in Naples an exorbitant and inadmissible pretension. Palermo was pronounced rebellious, and an army and fleet of ten thousand men were sent to reduce it. What! those lords of political opinion are justified in declaring themselves independent of the king, but the Sicilians are not justified in declaring themselves independent of the ministers? They jealously stand up for their own liberties at home, but Sicily and Sicilians must drink the dregs of slavery. And why? by what right? by what law—but the right of the wolf over the lamb?

But the citizens of Palermo, not acknowledging, and never having acknowledged such a right, not even in the most powerful sovereigns who had governed them during the course of so many centuries, defeated the fleet and the general who had been sent to command it. The fleet then bore for Messina; the inhabitants, seduced by the false promise that their city should be the capital, submitted, and thus opened the gates of Sicily to the Neapolitan armies. All the cities through which they marched were treated as a conquered country; the conquerors levied contributions; made prisoners; dismissed the authorities; and, at the point of the bayonet, ordered the election to proceed which was to send provincial deputies as prisoners of war, to vote in the parliament of Neapolitan liberty!!!

This victorious army, however, where it encamped in the plain of Palermo was near finding its tomb. True, they besieged the city during ten days, but the Palermitans made so gallant and successful a defence, that they brought the hostile army to the verge of ruin, and compelled it to surrender at discretion.

The capitulation was actually concluded and signed, on board an English vessel, by the brave General Florestano Pope in the name of the army, and by the Prince di Paterni in the name of the Palermitans. Of course, one of the articles of capitulation was a national parliament for Sicily, and the independence of the Sicilian government.

But let it never be forgotten, that the Neapolitans have ever been and ever shall be, with regard to Sicily, what the English have been and ever will be towards Ireland. It is the nature of man, and the necessity of the case. Between two neighbouring kingdoms, one of which is stronger and holds the other in subjection—there is no bond but force. There cannot be the least hope that the stronger government will respect the faith of treaties, justice, or equity. The capitulation of Palermo had the same value at Naples that the treaty of Limerick had at London. It was torn by the Neapolitan ministers, who persisted that General Pope had exceeded his powers in signing it. And this liberal congress attainted the general of a great crime for having, when his army was reduced to the most awful perils, consented to acknowledge the right of a nation to its liberty. Justice must be done to General Pope. He was a man of principle and honour, as well as a brave soldier. Not content with protesting against the injustice and scandalous violation of faith by his government, he rejected indignantly the honours and pension which were offered as the reward of his services in the Sicilian campaign; and, renouncing all command and office, he retired to private life.

Sicily, thus treacherously enslaved, was soon involved in the misery of Naples. Like Naples, she soon witnessed the ruin of the constitutional government, and had her share in the common expenses and humiliations. During eight years, she was garrisoned by foreign troops—a disaster which a national parliament would certainly have averted, for the Austrians are not more powerful than the French, who for full ten years, under Napoleon, had their hopes constantly bent on Sicily, but never could succeed in subjugating her.

SECTION 4.—HORRORS COMMITTED IN SICILY IN 1837; PICTURE OF THE FRIGHTFUL STATE TO WHICH IT HAS BEEN REDUCED SINCE THAT TIME.

I omit the arbitrary acts, the oppressions, the tyranny which unhappy Sicily suffered under the Neapolitan government from that date to 1837. All that she suffered hitherto was nothing, it was actual happiness compared to what she suffered after that time.

Corruption, imprisonment, war, famine, occupation by foreign soldiers, had been hitherto the gifts of the Neapolitan government to Sicily—the plague was the only gift wanting. But it should come, that last scourge also should be added. The government violated by force the sanitary laws, and, in spite of the entreaties and protestations of the local authorities, discharged at Palermo a cargo of military uniforms which had belonged to soldiers who died of the cholera at Naples. The monsters had the cruel satisfaction of seeing Sicily infected with that terrible malady which swept off in the city of Palermo alone 40,000 inhabitants.

The other cities in the island, anxious to escape the terrible fate of Palermo, established quarantines, interrupted all intercourse with the capital, and wished to govern themselves as long as the contagion lasted. But, alas! it was criminal for these hapless cities to wish to avert the plague. A man, whose name is already associated in history with the most blood-thirsty monsters of antiquity, was invested with absolute power. Without even the formality of a trial, but on mere suspicion, Syracuse and Catania were proclaimed as rebellious, and their noblest citizens were shot in scores. Young men were savagely massacred before their parents' eyes. Even the women were not spared. The very wealthy alone were able to purchase their lives from that man of death, by enormous sums. After having made the whole country a scene of massacre, desolation, and ruin, he was honoured, after his return to Naples, with the great red ribbon of the royal order of St. Januarius. A sacrilegious profanation no doubt, but singularly in keeping with the circumstances; for what but a blood-red decoration could be a meet recompense for services of blood?

But ministerial contempt of Sicily did not stop here; she had the unpardonable audacity to repress the plague—and she should pay for her insolence.

Under the pretence that the island was an ever-flaming focus of sedition and revolt, a police government was organized there, far more oppressive and humiliating than even military despotism. A decree, nominally proclaiming the eligibility of all subjects of Naples to places in all the Neapolitan dominions, by which Sicilians could hold office in Naples, and Neapolitans in Sicily. This decree was planned with the generous design of establishing in Sicily a vast system of espionage, to watch and report to Naples all the movements of what was called that UNGRATEFUL AND TURBULENT SICILY. Accordingly, with some rare and honourable exceptions, the refuse of the clergy, magistracy, and officials of Naples were let loose on Sicily, to seize the highest and most lucrative posts in the most discontented quarters. The important episcopal sees of Palermo, Catania, Trepani, Maygara, Catanigetta, Noto, and Syracuse were filled by Neapolitans, who were regarded by the people as mitred policemen, and therefore objects of the greatest distrust and hatred. They did no good; they did infinite mischief—they robbed religion of the affections of the people. Thus, among its other scourges, the Neapolitan government can boast of having inoculated Sicily with infidelity and indifference to religion.

The same may be said, and with more truth, of civil and political functionaries. The Neapolitan officers, with, as I have said, a few honourable exceptions which justice actuated, exercised their functions with the insolence of conquerors, and the despotism of pachas. Sustained, encouraged, applauded by the ministry of which they were the creatures, they had no answer but wrath and punishment for all who dared to oppose the folly of their caprices, and the injustice of their oppression. There was no appeal against their tyranny; remonstrance, however mild, was dangerous; loss of office or imprisonment was sure to follow the impertinence or insolence of complaint! What impunity could be expected at the hands of the representatives and satellites of despotism?

Among the councillors of the prince, there was one truly religious man, who combined with eminent integrity, a mind of great prudence and moderation. This prudent man, this genuine statesman, foreseeing the terrible effects which should be one day produced in Sicily by such atrocious tyranny, ventured to hint one day "take care, let us not go too far; Sicily does not deserve to be treated so brutally." "That Sicilian mob must be crushed," was the only reply. Mark this. Robbed of all their rights, oppressed and trampled in the dust, the Sicilians ventured, from time to time, to complain of their hard lot, and for this they are stigmatized as a mob. Even so, the brigand calls the travellers whom he seizes a mob, and insults them while he buries his steel in their hearts.

This atrocious temper of the ministers was realized in their government. In the commencement of this regime the word continually on the lips of the Neapolitan officials was "the Sicilians are barbarians, we are come to civilize them." But this insolence cost one of them his life—he was shot in a duel: another, fearing the same fate, consented to make an abject apology, alleging as his excuse, that "he had used the words after dinner!" From that moment, those brave gentlemen kept their opinions to themselves; there was a stop to their insults. Cowardice is ever the distinctive characteristic of tyranny.

But all the acts of government breathed contempt. They wished to humble Sicily, and therefore to pauperize her. Enormous sums, raised as additional taxes for the most urgent wants of the island, were, by a simple order from the minister, transferred to Naples, where none could tell the use that was made of them.

The shadow of local government was soon abolished. All the political and magisterial functionaries were ordered to conform strictly with Naples; the vice-royalty was deprived of even the petty authority which it enjoyed under the old regime; to such a state was it reduced, that even the Neapolitans laughed at it, and to the credit of the great Neapolitan nobles it must be said, that there could be found among them but one contemptible and degraded being to accept it. He resided at Naples ten months of the year; he signed at Naples, but dated as from Palermo, all acts regarding Sicilian affairs; twice a year he represented his sovereign in a Sicilian church, and received, in all truth, the most abundant and unequivocal testimonies of public contempt.

Thus compelled to look to Naples as the fountain of all favour, the Sicilians were truly objects of commiseration, as they crossed the strait and thronged the ante-chambers of ministers who could not be seen, if gold and strong letters of recommendation had not already raised the curtain and cleared the path for them. Often, after having in vain solicited, for months and years, the favour of an audience, they were compelled to return to Sicily, impoverished and humiliated, their brows clouded with discontent, and their hearts festered with indignation at not having received either favour or justice.

But there is something still worse. In a decree of October, 1844, the minister of the sovereign of a Catholic state did not hesitate to announce these strange expressions, which the minister of a Protestant sovereign and state would be ashamed to utter—"The supreme authority in the ecclesiastical affairs of Sicily is vested in the person of his majesty." These words speak for themselves; they declare that a Catholic government had claimed in Sicily the royal supremacy annexed to the English crown; that that Sicily should enjoy Catholicity only on the terms prescribed by the Neapolitan minister, and that under a monarch who, in other respects, was sincerely pious and religious, the church of Sicily was a slave. But the most shocking feature in this transaction is, that the most efficient instrument in forging these state fetters was a bishop.

The liberty of all citizens depended on the will of the police, and on the conscience of a spy. To ruin a man, nothing more was required than simply to report him to government as a liberal, and his fate was sealed. Without any form of trial, on the mere order of a constable, respectable citizens disappeared, no one knew where—some buried in dungeons—others driven into exile; their only crime being that they were better qualified for an episcopal see than the government creature—that they had a better right than their competitors to an office—that they had defeated their antagonist in the courts of law—in a word, that they would not co-operate in arbitrary orders, abuses of power, peculation of superiors, nor consign themselves to dishonour and infamy by consenting to them.

A government so severe and inexorable to political opinion, extended a scandalous indulgence to crime. State criminals had no hope but the dungeon or death. Political offenders were shot in platoons, but bandits and thieves were frequently restored to liberty, and even assassins and parricides were more than once pardoned. There was no respect but for spies, no privilege but for infamy, no liberty but for women of bad fame.

Agriculture was abandoned, commerce discouraged, honest industry shackled the public roads were almost impassable; and infested with brigands, the whole administration was in disorder, religion was degraded, and public morality turned into derision by the very authorities that were bound to preserve it. There was but one flourishing trade—one free profession, and that was prostitution, under the protection of the police. Misery, degradation, corruption, immorality, and irreligion made horrible ravages, under the eyes and with the sanction of the authorities; one of the noblest and richest countries on the face of the earth was reduced to the lowest depths of degradation and misery.

But impartial justice compels us to admit, that the Neapolitan ministers would not have dared to treat Sicily so ignominiously, had they not been encouraged and assisted by some degenerate Sicilians. hapless Trisomia had more cause to complain of her own sons than of her enemies.

SECTION 5.—JUSTICE AND MODERATION OF THE SICILIANS IN THEIR PETITIONS FOR REFORM; INJUSTICE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF NAPLES IN DECLARING WAR AGAINST THEM.

A system so unjust and oppressive towards a generous nation, which had been always jealous of its rights, would naturally lead to extreme and desperate resolves. Grievances far less galling have often induced nations to throw off the yoke and spurn the power that oppressed them. Nevertheless, the Sicilians, though horribly treated, never desired to withdraw their allegiance from the reigning dynasty. Well aware that the source of their misery was not in the evil designs of the king, to whom they gave full credit for his honesty, but in the system itself, and the despotic tendencies of the ministers, their only petition, last December, was for reforms. Imitating the peaceful and amicable agitation which had succeeded so well on the continent, they endeavoured to attain reforms by the same peaceful and amicable means. It was the imprudence of government alone that goaded them on to violent and sanguinary collision, by charging them with designs of revolt and rebellion, and by using violence to repress them. The imprudence of the local authorities was aggravated by the injustice and cruelty of the Neapolitan government. A nation which speaks, as the ten tribes spoke to Roboam: "We accept you as our king; we will be faithful to you, but we will not, must not be governed like a nation of slaves." A people propounding such proposals is not, and most certainly ought not to be stigmatized as rebellious. The government of Naples had therefore no right to answer such a manifesto by grape-shot.

To array against Palermo an army of 10,000 men, to doom her to the horrors of war, to bombard and discharge three hundred bombs on that faithful city, to attempt to burn and destroy it, and to deluge all Sicily with blood and fire, was one of the most atrocious and infamous crimes that history ever held up to the execration of mankind.

What are we to think then of certain collegiate politicians, some café politicians, who loll snugly in their easy chairs and discourse profoundly on facts of which they know nothing, or doctrines which they do not understand, and who pronounce dogmatically that the Sicilians have no right to a distinct, national representation, and an executive government completely distinct from that of Naples. Stupid fools! you, with your cigars in your mouths, usurp the insolent right of preaching justice to men who boldly meet their enemy, sword in hand, for justice sake.

SECTION 6.—HORRORS OF WAR IN PALERMO; FOLLY OF PROPOSING TO THE SICILIANS, IN SUCH CIRCUMSTANCES, UNION WITH NAPLES—THAT IS, ASKING THEM TO RENOUNCE THE FRUITS OF THEIR VICTORY.

Torrents of blood have been shed in Sicily. Thousands of citizens have been slaughtered. Every family has to deplore the loss of a relative or friend. Public indignation is roused to the highest pitch, and all hearts are on fire with fervent and well-grounded rage. Hatred and exasperation against the Neapolitan government is at its height. At such a time, in such a state of the public mind, to propose gravely to the Sicilians that they should be content with a Neapolitan union, under one administration and one parliament, to imagine they should surrender an independence, whose justice and necessity are demonstrated by so many recent recollections and expiring hearts—while the blood shed so barbarously by the Neapolitans still flows in the streets—while the bodies of the victims are unburied—while the bombarded houses are still a heap of ruins—while the tears of so many widowed wives and orphan-children are not yet dried up—while the cry of vengeance ascends to the throne of God from so many women, helpless babes, and innocents, unjustly, brutally massacred by a brigand soldiery; to preach to such a people, at such a time, Union with such a government, and to expect to be listened to, is the acme of imperial idiocy and insolence. But the right of Sicily has triumphed over the unjust exercise of Neapolitan might. God has declared for the generous and oppressed people, and has given them victory over the pride of power and the cowardice of their tyrants. Sicily is now mistress and supreme arbiter of her fate. Her destiny is in her own hands.

To imagine that Sicily should now voluntarily renounce her proud and glorious position, that, to please a Neapolitan ministry, she should sacrifice her nationality and independence which have cost her so many struggles, such labours, such torrents of blood! why it is madness to expect—'tis criminally wrong to propose it.]

SECTION 7.—MEANS OF RECONCILIATION, PROPOSED BY A SICILIAN, INADMISSIBLE; SICILY IS A DISTINCT NATION AND HAS A RIGHT TO GOVERN HERSELF.

It is said that a Sicilian has proposed, as the basis of reconciliation and peace—"1st, A lower standard of qualification for electors, in order that Sicily might have a suitable number of representatives; 2nd, That, in order to flatter the pride of the Sicilians, the imperial parliament, composed of the representatives of both kingdoms, should sit alternately at Naples and Palermo." The thing is incredible. No Sicilian could firmly entertain such an idea: so miserable and ridiculous a shift as that could never enter the mind of a statesman. The separate government of Sicily and Naples is not an affair of mere punctilio or honour; a whole people so brave and yet so prudent does not fly to arms, nor sustain so terrible a conflict, nor pour out its best blood in torrents for mere punctilio or nice points of honour. Were they only at stake, Sicily would sacrifice them; she never would have risen, or she would have at once acceded for the sake of the public good. If she has risen as one man, if she has fought with such courage and perseverance for a separate government, it is because that separation is for her a question of liberty or slavery, of prosperity or misery, of life or of death.

Parliament by changing its place does not change its nature. It is still an amalgam parliament, in which the preponderance must ever be, in all possible hypotheses, in favour of the representatives of Naples; in which, consequently, the special interests of Sicily must be always treated superficially and absurdly, and still oftener sacrificed. The man who dares to maintain the contrary shows clearly that he knows nothing of parliamentary government, that if sincere, he is a fool—if insincere, he is a villain—and that, in no case, could he be a Sicilian.

Mark it well—understand it, the whole world, kings themselves are beginning to understand it, that Christian nations, no more than Christian men, are not things—they are not brute animals, they are moral beings who belong to themselves. Duties they certainly have towards their governors, and towards other nations which may be united to them by various bonds, whether of religion, political institutions, nationality, or race. But as to possession, they are no man's property, they belong to no one but to God and themselves—therefore they ought to manage their own business in their own country. The moment they merge themselves in another and more powerful people, more important in the balance, they lose their power and become nonentities: the tutelage which they accept degenerates into oppression—their protectors are infinitely more injurious to them than their declared enemies. In their case the fable of the horse is verified—he began by exploring the assistance of man, and ended by carrying him on his back. They lose their national individuality and independence. These are truths which are well understood, professed, and appealed to universally, as the only true basis of the future interests and laws of Europe.

Now, whether you will or not, it cannot be denied that the Sicilians are a nation suited for an individual and distinct political existence. Their history proves it. Therefore they ought to govern themselves—they ought to manage their own affairs. None can know their wants better than themselves. All dependence or connexion in her own affairs with another nation must be an obstacle to the development of her action and her intellect—must be always humiliating, oppressive, and fatal to her. It is therefore indispensably necessary for her moral, material, intellectual, and religious well-being that she should enjoy, under the same sceptre, her own government and her own parliament; from which she may receive those institutions which are most suited to her wants. The crown shall have nothing, except the fair contribution which Sicily ought to pay for the civil list, and the support of the army and the marine. As to the internal administration of Sicily, Naples has nothing to do with it: it is no concern of the crown. In whatsoever way Sicily pleases to establish, uphold, govern, and defend herself, no man has a right to interfere with her, because it is no one's business but her own. On that condition alone—one already exemplified in the United States, and in Belgium, which by separating the former from England, the latter from Holland, have attained a degree of wealth, power, and prosperity, which appears almost miraculous—on that condition alone, I maintain, Sicily can be truly free, and enjoy those blessings of which true liberty is ever the fruitful parent, the powerful patron, and the invincible safeguard.

SECTION 8.—SICILY UNITED TO NAPLES, UNDER THE SAME GOVERNMENT, MUST BE ALWAYS MISERABLE AND OPPRESSED.

Full justice must not be denied to the good, open, loyal, generous, and indulgent character of the Neapolitans as individuals, and as a nation. In that light I respect them; many of them are my affectionate friends; personally, I cannot but feel unalloyed gratitude for the kindness, favour, esteem, and affection which I have invariably received at their hands. But where the Neapolitan government and Sicily are concerned, it is, and ever must be, quite a different thing. The Neapolitans are good, and yet the Neapolitan government, in its relations with Sicily, has, according to the unanimous opinion of historians and geographers, been at all times an oppressive and fatal tyranny. Again I repeat, it is the necessary, the inevitable law of human nature, that men placed in certain situations, in certain political or social relations with regard to other men, change their character—I would almost say their nature. The wisest nations at home (says Comte de Maistre) lose all sense when they attempt to govern other nations. The English people, for instance, universally get credit for no ordinary quantity of wisdom, justice, and generosity. But the English government, with regard to the people of Ireland, never has been, and never can be, either wise, or just, or generous. While that heroic people is expiring of famine, the English parliament offers no other support or consolation but a Draconian code to punish assassination, without giving any alleviation of the terrific misery that goads men to assassinate. That unfortunate people ask bread, and it is answered by muskets. Never can Ireland be tranquil or happy until she has obtained, under the same crown, a parliament and government of her own: they alone know the true wants, the real wounds of the country, and they alone can discover and apply the remedy.

Such is the case of Sicily. Never can her agriculture, her industry, her trade flourish—never can she expect to see the abundant and rich resources of her prosperity developed, until she has her own parliament and her own government. Under a Neapolitan government, with her representatives sitting in the same house with four times as many Neapolitan representatives, she will be doomed to the fate of Ireland at the hands of the English government and parliament; she will be doomed to beg from the Neapolitan parliament and government prudent measures—measures demanded by the most imperious necessity, with the certainty of obtaining them tardily or incomplete, or quite different from what she expected, or, finally and more frequently, of not obtaining them at all.

SECTION 9.—CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTEES WORTH NOTHING IF SICILY HAS NOT HER OWN PARLIAMENT.—EXAMPLE OF BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

It is useless to urge that under a constitutional government, with responsible ministers, and liberty of the press, you can prevent the recurrence of those scandalous abuses of which Sicily had most fatal experience under the absolute regime. Had not the Belgians all these guarantees from 1816 to 1830? and yet, because they were forced into an unnatural union with the Dutch under the same government and parliament, these guarantees could not save their country from pauperization, themselves from injustice and oppression, their religion from systematic persecution, till at length they were forced to the extreme and violent expedient of recovering genuine liberty by a national revolution.

The Irish enjoyed those guarantees; but, because they were subject to the one government and to the one parliament residing in England, all their securities could not prevent them from becoming slaves in the strict sense of the word. It cost them full thirty years of agitation, struggles, and sacrifice, to obtain partial emancipation, which was at length conceded to the dread of a violent outbreak.

No doubt Ireland, strong in the constitutional means which she enjoys in common with England, must succeed, sooner or later, in obtaining the repeal of that iniquitous and atrocious act which has made her one with her rival and tyrant. But please bear in mind how many years may pass before she shall obtain that victory—perhaps the suspension of her constitutional liberties, military occupation, massacres and desolation. Now with what face, on what pretence, does any man dare to advise Sicily to place herself in a similar predicament? At a time when you are proclaiming the independence and liberty of all, do you ask Sicily to offer the terms of her own slavery? Having it in her power to avoid, to secure herself against so wretched a position, and in which it is impossible she can remain—ought she on the contrary to accept it, because, forsooth, she shall always have the means of emerging from it one day or another? Why should she surrender her independence which she enjoys, under risk of being obliged at some future time to extort it by prayers and threats, and to accept, after long patience, as a favour and grace, what she now has in her armed hand by right? Why, after gloriously consummating one revolution, ought she place herself in the necessity of recommencing and preparing another? Why, when she has such a peaceful future in her hands, ought she, for mere amusement, plunge herself into a career of agitation and struggles whose results are always hard and painful and whose success is uncertain? Must you not have lost your senses when you deemed such a course possible?—must you not have lost all shame before you had the impudence to publish them.

SECTION 10.—SEPARATE GOVERNMENTS FOR NAPLES AND SICILY, THE INTEREST OF NAPLES HERSELF. SICILY UNITED TO HER, A SOURCE OF WEAKNESS.—EXAMPLE OF IRELAND.

Naples will be served by according a distinct government to Sicily. I remember well when all the Neapolitans who took refuge in Sicily, in the commencement of this century, they were received there as friends, and feted as brothers. Our houses, our tables were open to them; we thought ourselves happy and honoured in having them with us and in enjoying their company and friendship. The reason was—at that time the Sicilians had their own constitution, laws, and government, as the Neapolitans had theirs; there was, therefore, no distrust or jealousy between the two nations—they respected, they loved each other as brothers—they sympathised with each other as being twin jewels of the same crown.

But in the second emigration of the royal family to Sicily in 1806, when an imprudent and iniquitous policy persisted in governing her by an exclusively Neapolitan ministry, when the Neapolitans, backed by these ministers, their countrymen and devoted partisans began to play the tyrant, and treat as a conquered country that hospitable land which had given them an asylum, then it was that confidence was changed into distrust, love into hatred, friendship into enmity. It was then, only, that the two nations assumed really the attitude of mortal enemies; the Neapolitans conceived a plan for robbing Sicily of all her institutions, and reducing her to the miserable condition of a province of the kingdom of Naples; and the Sicilians, in turn, swore that they would not tolerate that tyranny—and prepared to overthrow it. From that moment, the brotherly relations previously subsisting between the two nations gave place to the relations between master and slave, conqueror and conquered; and hence that unprecedented array of horrors for Sicily, and her burning hatred of tyrannical government which has lately burst in a terrific eruption.

Now, suppose that ignorance of sound, social relations, or duplicity, or fraud, should succeed in establishing between Naples and Sicily such a union of parliament and government, that Naples should be the centre of all, even Sicilian affairs—under the name of that absurd system of centralization which is established there, and which is at once the most foolish and the most fatal legacy of imperial despotism—Sicily must be always on the defensive against the oppressive tendencies of the Neapolitan ministers, and Naples will lose no opportunity of impeding the development of her power and her wealth. Between two such nations confidence is an impossibility; between them there may be a hollow truce, but peace—never.

The government of Naples will therefore be obliged to hold Sicily as a conquered country which never resigns the hope of regaining its lost independence; the fear of a revolt, which may transfer the isle to the sceptre of a stranger, must continually haunt the oppressor; an imposing force must be maintained there, and a special police—remedies which only aggravate the miseries they were intended to heal. Thus Sicily must ever be to the crown of Naples a weight, a drag-chain, an endless cause of expense and weakness, and never can give her either advantage or support.

Here again, Ireland is an eloquent proof of this assertion. United to England under the same parliament and government, far from being a support, she is her “GREAT DIFFICULTY,” her greatest embarrassment, her greatest burden. The impossibility of tranquillizing her by holding her in slavery, that is, by maintaining the union, has driven statesmen to despair—has overturned cabinet after cabinet, and from time to time shaken the British empire to its foundations. How often has England been compelled to abstain from wars which were required by her interest or honour? And what prevented her?—Ireland. Always agitated, always restless, always on the point of making a desperate effort to free herself from the tyranny of a rich nation, she prevents her tyrants from making foreign war at will, because they are at all times in fear of a terrible convulsion within their own house. Thus, the unnatural union of two nations so different, is at once fatal to Ireland, and an eternal source of weakness and trouble to England; disconcerting all her political plans, and impeding her liberty of action.

Acta Sanctorum.

THE BOLLANDISTS.—LITERARY TOUR.

III.

THE Saints have now their historians—and the historians their plan. All work in unison, and from all quarters heaven collects and arranges the materials of the “Bollandist Museum.”

That museum alone was a proof of the special protection of heaven. So early as 1655, it was a miracle to Christina, queen of Sweeden, who had, however, reserved the gift of her own library to the Vatican; but, if it was so great even in its infancy, what must have been its value after the Bollandists had made, personally, two or three literary tours through every part of Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, Italy, Spain, and France.

A sketch of their labours would be miserably defective, if we omitted entirely those “literary tours,” which they had the glory of originating, at least on a grand scale. It is impossible to enter into details. We confine ourselves to the two first tourists, especially as we can follow them, step by step, in their published narratives, the daily correspondence of Henschenius with Bollandus, and, particularly, in the notes drawn up on the spot, and in the form of a diary, by the young Father Papebroch. His companion had passed his sixtieth year—the Mentor of a new Odyssey—on this adventurous tour for the discovery of saints.

In July, 1660, the feast of St. Mary Magdalen, they set out from Stuveran, and took their leave of their old masters at Cologne, under the star of the three Magi, and the patronage of the virgins of St. Ursula.

At St. Goar, they did not forget the example of Charlemagne, who, after the manner of the humblest pilgrims, would not leave that city without placing the iron collar of the patron saint on his imperial head. At Coblenz, Father Godfrey wrote his first letter; they thence proceeded to Mayence, Selegenstad, Wurtzburg, Bamberg, Eichstadt, and Augsburg, examining the libraries and shrines, collecting the traditions and authentication of relics, and all the peculiar observances in honour of the patron saints. Fervently they prayed at many a desecrated shrine for the salvation of Germany, which was one of the last European races that embraced the faith and was the first to renounce it. The prayer for her conversion was ever on their lips; and, as the country was then breathing freely after the thirty years' war, they thought, as they travelled together on the long and brilliant summer's day, that the harvest was whitening for the sickle. Leibnitz was not the only person who was then dreaming of a re-union of the churches. A recent negotiator met our pilgrims on their route, and joined them again in Rome; and they often repeated with fond enthusiasm the words of the Lutheran senator, who, when reproached for having made a present of a superb lamp, to be lighted before the blessed sacrament, replied, "that in twenty years the whole world would be papist."

Those twenty years are a long time coming; but our pilgrims invoked them ardently at Spire, as they repeated the "Salve Regina" before the Madonna, which St. Bernard, in the same spot, saluted with the "O clemens, O pia, O dulcis Virgo Maria," which was then engraved on the marble pavement of the church, and has since been adopted by the Catholic world. At Eiligen they poured forth their hopes to St. Hildegard, the prophetess of Germany, and kissed her tomb and the inspired leaves which had been collected there during her life-time. Poor Henschenius believed more firmly than ever in his fond vision, when, after his arrival in Venice, he received the abjuration of a convert.

As their researches are not chronicled in detail, we pass over them slightly, but the church doors and the reliquaries of the sacristies were always interrogated for their legends. Every day brought in its accession to the harvest, and in those times it was yet most abundant in Germany. At Augsburg they ransacked the library of Welser, where they discovered the acts of St. Affre. Peutinger threw open to them, at Munich, the library of the Electorate, and there Papebroch made a collection of the old German songs and ballads, of which he found other copies at Inspruck. In the town of Aschaffenburg alone, in Franconia, they discovered full materials for a "Germania Sacra." A member of their society, Father Gamans, the friend of Bollandus and rival of Rosweyde, had piled there, in three apartments, bulls, charters, catalogues of bishops, notices historical of abbeys, proper offices, and obituaries for upper and lower Germany, Poland, Hungary, Bohemia, and Switzerland. He was about to publish an illustrated history of the metropolitan see of Mayence, with all its appendages and its eleven suffragans, and yet how few have ever heard of this Father Gamans? Our tourists spent eight days at their ease in his collection, taking notes and, sometimes, whole piles of well-digested documents.

Success smiled on their journey; messengers came from places twenty miles distant to welcome them; Father Gamans saw them to the foot of the Alps. At Bamberg, as well as at St. Goar, they had been invited to the table of the imperial electors. Along their route, wheresoever they went, even among the dis-calc'd Carmelites and Capuchines, they met with a cordial reception in all the libraries, and in the museums of the learned; the first five volumes of the "Acta," and the history of the three Dagoberts, were their best letters of introduction. Papebroch, glowing with the fire of youth and genius, shrunk from no labour; he took notes on all subjects and furnished innumerable albums, and excited the wonder of all, how a man so diminutive—the littlest Jesuit they had ever seen—could ply so vigorously his laborious task.

When Father Henschenius, who was accustomed to his own plains of Holland, came in sight of the Alps, his head reeled at those tremendous precipices and nodding glaciers. Father Papebroch gives a most amusing account of their transit. His companion would not trust his life to any of the ordinary vehicles; he buried himself in a sort of a covered van, which, by the eternal jogging of the mules, was speedily dis-masted; the rain fell in torrents, and, to crown the misery, the jolting was so frightful that they could not sit steady for a single moment, and when they arrived at Trent they were covered with blisters. They were detained there full eight days by incessant rain, and, when the storm blew over, the fair plains of Italy beneath them were one wide sheet of water. They were compelled to work their way over uprooted roads, or be ferried over the flooded arms of the Po and the Adige, or trust their lives to restive mules, to the inexpressible terrors of poor Father Henschenius, who was capsized more than once on the sand or in muddy pills to the great annoyance of his young companion, who was obliged to re-seat the cavalier, and put him once more in marching order.

But how could such mishaps afflict them when they were compensated so richly? Verona, and St. Zenon, Padua with its St. Antony, Vicenza, Venice, Ferrara, Bologna, Imola, and Faenza were so many sanctuaries, rich in museums and literary spoils; Ravenna, too, with its byzantine domes, which would appear to have been wafted over the waves from the shores of the Bosphorus, and, above all, Loretto, made them forget all their sufferings.

On their first visit, after their first prayer in the oratory where the Virgin was praying when the arch-angel appeared to her, and the Son of God became incarnate, they forgot all in the extacy of an hour and a-half's devotion. Henschenius summoned up all his hopes, and memory, and knowledge, and saluted one hundred times the blessed Virgin in the name of all the saints, and of all his brethren, and of all that was dear to him; his emotion became more overpowering at each successive effort, till his feelings at length found vent in a flood of tears. These particulars are taken from a confidential letter, in which he unbosoms himself to an intimate friend, and well may we hope that his two petitions have been granted—to promote and to partake of the glory of the saints. On the 10th of December, the great anniversary of Loretto, they witnessed the festive solemnities of myriad pilgrims thronging from all quarters, and, when night closed on the happy pilgrims, the glories of the day were still prolonged under the bright and cloudless skies of the Appenines. "As far as the eye could see," writes Papebroch, "along vale and mountain-ridge, in all the towns and villages of the neighbourhood, festive fires and illuminations crowned the closing of the fete, the moon herself, shining with her brilliant aureola, would appear to have assumed her fairest ornament in honor of the day."

From Loretto to Rome there were few incidents of travel; the tourists made their researches in St. Nicholas of Tolentina, St. Francis of Assisium, and St. Angela de Foligno, the first of whom had his acts illustrated by Henschenius; thence, by forced marches from the earliest hours of dawn to the serene moonlight of the Italian sky, and under uninterrupted torrents of rain, they pushed onwards for Rome, and, on the 23rd of December, discerned, at twelve miles distance, the dome of St. Peter's, and saluted the eternal city.

A severe trial awaited them the moment they arrived. The man whose aid was almost indispensable to them, Luke Holstein, the prefect of the Vatican library, was called away to the other world. He had, at first sight, conceived so profound a respect and attachment for Father Henschenius, that he implored him to assist at his last moments, to receive his profession of faith, and console him in his agony. His last words were "Padre Henschenio!" But the kindness of Alexander VII. mitigated the severity of this blow. When they were admitted to an audience, the Pope, remembering his nunciature in Cologne, familiarly asked "How was his old friend, Father Bollandus; many a letter passed between us at Cologne, though we never had the happiness of meeting." The conversation was continued in this paternal tone for a full hour, though it was a great audience, at which all the highest notabilities assisted. Express orders and briefs were immediately issued, that all the libraries in Rome should be opened, and the manuscripts of the Vatican were also entrusted to them. The new prefect, Leo Allatius, Fathers Possin, Kircher, Aringhi, Ughelli, Ciampini, the heads of the different orders, and the cardinals rivalled each other in zeal and liberality. The oratorians gave all the manuscripts of Baronius, and Abraham Ecchel translated from the Syriac the manuscript acts which he was after bringing to Rome.

During nine months, five or six copyists were constantly at work transcribing. They reserved for themselves the Greek manuscripts, in which they were aided by the Abbate Lorenzo Porcio, many of whose elegant translations are printed in the "Acta." Papebroch began his daily toil at two o'clock in the morning and worked till nightfall without any interruption, save for the most indispensable duties.

They also visited Naples, where the very singular favour was paid them of beholding, in all its solemnities, the veneration of the relics of St. Januarius, that they might witness in person the miracle of the blood. At Grotta-Ferrata they found the manuscripts from which Lipomani had published "Metaphrastes." At Monte Cassino they obtained a letter from the head of the congregation of St. Justine to the whole order in Italy, requesting their co-operation with the "Acta Sanctorum." Wherever they went they left copyists, who, five years after their departure, were still forwarding manuscripts to the Bollandist museum.

On the 2nd of October, 1661, they set out from Rome. They remained four months in Florence, and, after another stay at Milan and Vallambrosa, they took their leave of fair and lovely Italy. Passing rapidly through Piedmont, where their good angels saved them from imminent danger of being drowned, they arrived at Grenoble, whence they dispatched all their treasures safely. Then proceeding on foot by slow journeys, often so early as three o'clock in the morning—even Henschenius, though sixty-two years old, bore the fatigue of this journey during six weeks. From the Grand Chartreuse of St. Bruno they proceeded to Lyons, where the learned Fathers Menetrier and Colombi, and the old veteran Theophilus Raynaud, were impatiently expecting their arrival. Our pilgrims celebrated here the festival of the patron St. Irenæus in his metropolitan church, where the rites and psalmody, which were then so ancient, recalled to mind what they had witnessed in Rome and Milan. They spent three days in Cluny, where the rapid and indefatigable labours of Father Papebroch amazed the monks; when they saw him cover, without blot or stay, not less than twenty pages in a few hours, they exclaimed in rapture with the psalmist—"Calamus scribæ velociter scribentis." Hence they were escorted through the country, over the mountains and valleys, under the glowing rays of a July sun, until they reached La Fertè. From Chalons, Father Ferrand, whose gaiety was not chilled by the snows of eighty winters, conducted them to St. Marcell, where they prayed at the tomb and holy well of the martyr, and the shrine of St. Gontran of Burgundy. Dom Lanoy, one of the last of the great literati of Cîteaux, was as kind to them as he had been to d'Achery and Mabillon, who have so frequently recorded their acknowledgments to him. The literary glory of Dijon was then at its height; it had given to science a Saumaise, to poetry La Monnaie, Bossuet to eloquence, and Condé to military glory: literature flourished there as an heirloom in the families of De la Marre and Bouhier. The Bollandists met, among others, the Abbé Nicaise, Pere Ferry, the historian of Chalons, and the most learned of the four brothers Chifflet, who placed his invaluable collection at their disposal. "There," says Papebroch, "we could plunge and collect in heaps everything we wished." He discovered a Synaxarion, whose leaves were so closely knitted together that it was almost impossible to separate them. "But blessed be all the saints of Greece," he exclaimed, "the part necessary to complete our Greek Calendars was entirely uninjured." But his rapture was still greater on finding, in the library of President Bouhier, a small martyrology of Bedes of the ninth century. This work, of which they had seen a copy in the manuscripts of the queen of Sweden, when they were carried through Cologne, had been inspected a second time in the archives of the Vatican, where it was deposited, but on examination it was found to contain only eight months. At Dijon, however, it was happily found complete, and enveloped, like all other precious manuscripts of President Bouhier, in costly silk, for such was his scrupulous taste, not unlike that of his townsman Buffon, who never sat down to write without dressing himself, as if for a grand ball or festival.

A few days more and our tourists were in Paris, consulting in his cell with Pere Sirmond, attended constantly by Labbe Cossard, Hardouin, Petavius, Daniel, Vavasseur, Jouveney, Maimbourg, and visited by Baluze, Combefis, d'Herouval, the two Valois, the Benedictines of St. Maur, and even by Launoy, the "unnicher" of saints. They were complimented by Turenne, who met them in the library of Clermont, and, though as yet a Protestant, wished all success to their labours; they saw the great Condé, to the dismay of the Jansenists, conducting in person, to the professed house of the Jesuits, his nephew, the eldest son of the Duc de Longueville. Paris appeared to them in a thousand enchanting lights; so enraptured was poor Papebroch, that in his own enthusiastic strain, he called it the suburb of heaven. But Henschenius was of opinion that it was a filthy suburb; that the air was corrupt; that it had a murky sky, to use his own Flemish expression—He believed the days long until they rose over him in his own Antwerp.

We may give at another time the tours of Fathers Jenninck and Barten in Austria, Hungary and Bohemia, where they proceeded as far as Buda in search of the wreck of the invaluable library of Matthew Corvinus; also the tour of Father Couper in Spain, where he explored even the mysterious Armario of the Escorial and of the cathedral of Toledo; and, finally, the recent discoveries of the new Bollandists in resuming their labours. But let us hope that all those tours will be collected by those heirs of the illustrious tourists; and since the old Bollandists have found worthy successors, it is not too much to expect, that, if the storms of those tumultuous times do not disturb their labours, we may have detailed accounts of the personal history of all their predecessors, of their travels, their labours, their discoveries, and the present state of the monuments which they had visited and described. To them it belongs to exhibit to us Father Papebroch, not only as the pilgrim, the savant, the interesting companion and correspondent, but what is still more novel and suprising, the artist and scientific antiquary so early in the seventeenth century. It is amazing how, in a few hours, he was able to explore all the churches of a great city; to describe every inch of them with the most minute detail—their statues, paintings, vaults, galleries, their exterior and interior—to compare at one glance Belgium, Germany, and Italy—to be as much at his ease under the cupola of St. Marc in Venice, or St. Apollinaris in Ravenna, as under the belfry of his native city—as enthusiastically sensible to the beauties of the Greek as of the Gothic—in a word, the man of all times, independent of epochs, country, and schools. He was a musician too: he listened with the ear of a virtuoso to the melodies of the Tyrol; he shook his head gravely at the first Italian concerts; but his heart overflows with emotion at the chant of the confraternity for a “happy death” at Ancona, and at the plaintive melodies which Canisius opposed to the popular distichs of Luther, and which to this day are the delight of the Rhenish provinces. Were all this published, after the lapse of two centuries by children of the same family, it would be a new Bollandist museum, which could not but be received with gratitude by all who feel any interest in the history of literature and art.

In some other Number, a sketch may be given of the literary tours of Ward on the Continent, and O’Clery in Ireland, collecting materials for Colgan; but the literary tour, most urgently demanded just now, is to send over to Brussels and Rome our best Irish scholar, to bring us copies of our exiled manuscripts. The want is generally felt—a little energy would satisfy it.

PAPERS ABOUT

Irish Missions and Missionaries.

NO. V.

PRIESTS, ardent, intelligent, and self-sacrificing—such as the clergymen of the United States and of the colonies—must produce great fruit, and doubtless their fruit will remain; but, as we have already observed, the number is wofully insufficient. Thousands upon thousands of Americans are prejudiced only through defect of instruction, and many indifferent because unacquainted with the beauty of Truth. These might, every one, be subdued to the captivity of faith, and sent forth to convert and confirm their brethren. The effect of such a progression is incalculable. We must await the designs of God, and “pray the Lord of the harvest that he will send labourers into his vineyard.”

We happen to know the excellent pastor of Waterbury, Connecticut. Within a few months he has been an humble, Irish student—a pious priest—and he is now, we thank Providence, an efficient republican missionary. Churches, schools, and converts—almost equal in number to the days of his holy labours—console him in his trials, and attest that the “children of the saints” have a great duty to perform, by reason of the great salvation which they can confer. We need hardly remark that he—the writer of the letter, of which the following is an extract—was educated at the invaluable missionary college of ALL HALLOWS, Drumcondra. He gratifies the charity of his former learned instructors by an account of his success. The letter is dated 12th of February:

“I have purchased the Episcopal Church for 1500 dollars. I paid off 600 already, in the course of nine weeks, and I expect to have the whole debt liquidated very soon. For some time after I went there, I celebrated in the Town Hall. On Christmas Day I had the church prepared for service. I had the interior beautifully illuminated—the altar dressed off in handsome style—the platform neatly carpeted—with a communion cloth, which extended all round the railing. I had, also, a very excellent suit of vestments. I had the little boys, whom I previously prepared to serve Mass, dressed in red soutanes and surplices; and a choir which sung the “Gloria in excelsis,” the “Sanctus,” and the “Adeste Fideles,” magnificently. All contributed to shed a new lustre upon religion, particularly in a locality where the like had been never witnessed before. I was so filled with interior joy that I almost shed tears, as I reflected that about two years ago a priest could not get a place in the town to celebrate Mass. . . . I have another church in a place which is called Derby. It is only just built. I am now getting pews in it, and also erecting an altar. The congregation is about 300 Catholics; but a great many others attend. I have attended, during week-days, two or three other stations. I had the happiness of receiving two individuals into the Church since I commenced my missionary labours. The one, a Protestant of the Church of England, and the other a Presbyterian. During the ceremony of their reception I felt the real force of the Psalmist’s words, ‘Non nobis Domine . . . sed nomine tuo da gloriam.’”

It must be a considerable time before America can be blest by an indigenous priesthood. Recent emigration can never supply the resources, taste, and condition necessary for alumni; and the more ancient settlers are affected by numerous causes, which prevent them from contributing in proportion to their number and competency. There have been, doubtless, many brilliant lamps hung in the sanctuary, by the devotedness of the Hiberno-Americans, who have struggled with difficulties and succeeded; but the utilitarian spirit of the republic affects even them. The pride of rule and the power of wealth dazzle, at an early age, the imaginations of the youth. Religious practices are observed and virtues inculcated; but the thought is not directed to self-sacrifice for the purposes of enlarged charity. A lay spirit presides—a spirit which, naturally speaking, is likely to predominate, so long as the rewards of fortune are profusely poured upon exertion and ability, and huge ambition is a feature distinguishing the whole people. Ireland must still be the parent of the missions. Her children must still labour, suffer, and die with the cross their burden and their glory, until having revolutionized the spirit of the republic, selfishness shall yield to religion—this world to the next—and men shall live to die, rather than for a mode of living.

Yet would we not be understood as decrying a priesthood "racy of the soil"—by no means. Many inconveniences follow from the necessity of importing a clergy. Their ties upon their missions are few—their ignorance of the character of the people exposes them to indiscretions at a time when favourable impressions are important—they cannot have the same natural impulses and responsibilities as the missionary who lives and labours under the eye of his friends and relatives—and their temptation to change the scene of their ministry is more frequent than that of one who has made the home of his affections and duty in the same locality. All these reasons—and many might be added—would make a native clergy desirable, wherever 'tis possible; but we believe that in our colonies and in the States it is not so.

We need not add, that the difficulty of obtaining a colonial and American priesthood is enhanced by the claims upon missionary labour, and the consequent inability of the bishops to retain a staff of professors in their colleges. Besides the loss of their exertions, resources would be required to maintain them; and these, neither the missions nor the students are able to supply. Hence, in very many cases, where the establishment of seminaries has been attempted, it has been only partially achieved, while the clergymen, educating and educated, communicated and acquired information only by endurance and toil. We have seen many priests so educated, and we know some who are an honour to their profession; but they owe their success to great physical energy, and to an extent of intellectual power, which is, indeed, very rarely conceded. We cannot but admire the happy circumstances of those foreign missions, which enables the bishops or vicars-apostolic to send to this country their youthful subjects, who are thus secured a true ecclesiastical education, and who bring to their native dioceses the ardour of home-love and the vigour of young graces. They are truly fortunate, and we are happy to know more than one of them.

The Catholic reader will bear with us. We are anxious to impress him with the conviction which sways ourselves. Ireland has a mighty destiny to fulfil. A world, upon whose soil five hundred millions shall have grown and have been poured before a hundred years, are to be fashioned and redeemed by her hand. Her mind, virtue, and faith must sway from Patagonia to the pole, or we must conclude that Providence has spiritually abandoned regions on which his blessings have been so benignly poured. No; it is a duty—a noble, a hallowed, and hallowing duty—of our country to interpose, as it has ever done, her zeal between hell's ascendancy and God's creatures, and to "preach the Gospel" even to the "ends of the earth." To avoid many evils, and to attain all the ends of missionary-life, the clergyman should be educated for that purpose. His literary pursuits and his spiritual training should contemplate that object; he should grow up in alienation from all things but his profession; with a spirit of devotedness, decision, obedience, and firmness. He should have lived for years a stranger at home, and a priest of his distant congregation. Thus he should go forth, as his fathers have gone, and leave to after ages the same beacon-name which sheds lustre even on our hapless annals. All this can be accomplished only by such an establishment as that of which we spoke above—and which God's mercy has left us through the enthusiastic Catholicity of the late FATHER HAND—the Missionary College of All Hallows.

"Spiritus spirat ubi vult," is mysteriously illustrated in the many roads by which the children of love are brought within the ark of salvation. Some approach by the slow process of quiet and cautious examination, others, by the aspirations after an ideal to which only the "spotless spouse" can respond; numbers are influenced by the excesses to which the "individualism" of dissent so constantly hurries its victims; and many seem to grow and flourish in the soil of heterodoxy, as if accident had transplanted them—in their sweet innocence "believing all things," yet unconscious of the identity of their objective faith with that of the church from which they shrink. We have known more than one instance in which the real presence of our Lord in the adorable sacrament had been, for thirty years, most sincerely and orthodoxically believed; and, in the case of a Presbyterian, as well as a member of the church of England, the first occasion on which the individuals became acquainted with the error of their sects was on the examination of Catholic works of instruction.

The imprudence of ministers and the fanaticism of disciples sometimes become agencies in the hand of the Lord—offended reason and outraged charity fly the alliance of madness and design. We once knew a great "revival" which took place after the due preparation, and was accompanied by the usual "outpourings of the spirit," and followed by the usual accession of heavenly gifts. The "bag and baggage" of a district—tables, forms, tents, stools, and pulpits—moved in solemn procession to the solitude in which the voice of the soul was to be heard, undistracted by sublunary cares and anxieties. Fair damsels and solemn young men, sighing spinsters and unearthly "ministers of the Gospel," rode upon staid horses, broad waggons, luggage carts, or anything which could be made available for an occasion so important. If bread and viands formed a portion of the procession to such reunion, they were "gifts," to be taken with all "thankfulness," and brandy we warrant, if found there, was an interloper not named among the appliances for the day of examination. How calmly the party descended from their vehicles, and how noiselessly they disposed themselves along the green grass and beneath the shadowing trees, "sub tegmine fagi," and now the psalm—which makes one feel like stillness, 'tis so solemn; and then the prayer, so eloquent and so sonorously declaimed; and, finally, the moment of deep thought and spiritual interchange of feeling. The "solemn young men" are, of course, quite accidentally sitting beside the "fair damsels," and the spinsters if they sigh, as they look round upon the scene, 'tis for the imperfections of their hearts—and years! How Christian souls twine in sacred sympathy at such a moment! how all the poor heart's weaknesses and wanderings are poured into the ear of female tenderness or manly sensibility! Commingling their words, their sighs—and, hand in hand, as the warmth of spiritual friendship progresses, 'tis not surprising that the moonlight finds them far advanced in perfection, and that the morning beams are only a mockery of their internal illumination. Wonderful things are said by the friends and the foes of these "dear revivals." Malice hath ever a bad tongue and prejudice a blind judgment—we shall say only, that many have come home Catholics from them.

"Ah! do, Klobeck, bring out that dear, mad, old daughter of Jacob, that cries so—will you?" said a sprightly girl of nineteen—the affianced of the young clergyman who had been almost domesticated with her family—"I do wish so much," she continued, "that my friend Harriet should see her."

"You mean old Boland, dear—so sinful and so perfect."

"Yes!"

"And then—"

"Get away!"

* * * * *

The young deacon sat in his pulpit; his hands covered his handsome features—the gathered disciples were silent as the grave—he had affrighted them by images of the next world, and filled them with contempt for this. He paused in self-recollection, as if stricken by the picture his own fancy had pencilled. There were openings, however, between his fingers, through which the initiated caught a glance of humorous meaning; and, from the forms below, there was at least one head sometimes raised to enjoy the expression.

A convulsive shudder now made the young preacher's frame vibrate—'twas accompanied by an indistinct sound, like that which marks the suppression of tears. Another moment the vibration increased, and the expression of emotion was more defined. Another—and an old woman with wrinkled brow, and silver hair, and shrivelled hand, started up in the assembly. Her eyes of grey were flashing—her bosom heaved with fearful excitement—the eye of the revival was upon her, because she, poor thing, was about to give her "experience." The words were few—the faults none; but she cried very piteously. The wag in the pulpit enacted his part to perfection. At every interval of her moans, he raised the key by a tone emitted from his own labouring bosom. From note to note he carried poor Boland—every cry of hers bringing him a note higher. At length, at the pitch of frenzied misery, both joined in a howl so thrilling, so awful, that numbers joined, some in terror, some in despair; and some—saw, for the last time, a "revival."

* * * * *

"Why then, Miss, 'twas a burning shame, so it was, to treat old granny Boland that away—an' I'm thinking there's more show than use in the whole religion, that does no better for the minister."

The stranger, for whom the betrothed of the preacher interested herself, had been telling all to her servant. "I'll go bail," she added after a little, "if he went to confession he dare'n't deceive old age for young ladies' diversion."

"I shall never again go to a "revival," Mary.

"May the Lord revive you, Miss!—and 'tis the pity you don't go to the place where your good pure heart would warm to."

"There are good and bad in every place, Mary."

"Thru' for you, Miss Harriett, thru' for you; but 'tis very hard to be bad in the ould church, agra. 'Tis hard to be confessin' and not mendin'; an' 'tis hard, if one had ever so much, to be proud before the tabernacle out; an' 'tis hard for the great man that doesn't go to the rail to feel himself betther than the poor man that does."

"What do you mean, Mary?"

"Och, nothing, Miss! only 'tis hard for the people of the ould church not to love one another—an' hard for 'em to be proud, an' hard for 'em to be bad."

A shade passed over the fine face of Harriett. We saw her received into the sheepfold of the "One Shepherd," and she would have no godmother but Irish Mary. Was it wonderful?

The association of religious feeling—deep religious feeling—with the faults and misfortunes of Irishmen is a phenomenon at which we have often felt surprise. Men sometimes neglect the duties of faith, who would readily die in defence of it; and 'twould be a determined cause of quarrel if even their own conduct was appended as a commentary to their religion. It has its effects. The Catholic may err, and wander, and forget the lessons of life which he imbibed at the knee of his mother; but a day ever arrives, when the prostrate penitent endeavours to expiate the deeds of the oblivious sinner, and there is "joy in heaven for a soul that doeth penance."

A most unpromising specimen of the impractical once came across our path. During a voyage from Rio, one half the crew of a noble ship rose against the other; and eleven murders placed the bloody survivors in possession of the vessel. She was laden with silver bars and specie, all amounting, we believe, to thirty or forty thousand pounds. Among the pirates was one—said to be the most daring free-booter of his tribe—and accused of terrible leadership in the sanguinary deed. Providence placed the assassins and their spoil in the hands of the law, and thus arose our opportunity of meeting the terrible stranger.

Undoubtedly John Hazleton was an extraordinary man. His thoughts, language, bearing—even his crimes were unlike those of any human being whom we have encountered. For many weeks we were in the closest intercourse that human beings can have. His whole character developed itself in incidents casually occurring, or narrated by himself; and in every combination—whether betrayed by his accomplices before the judges of the land—in the depths of his dungeon—or, finally, upon the scaffold of doom—he neither acted, nor spoke, nor did he seem to feel like other men. There is only one depository living to whom the young fellow committed even his real name—and that depository is a very safe one.

The first time we saw the pirate immediately succeeded his examination on committal. Having descended to the cells of his prison—in part through curiosity, in part from better motives—the jailor informed us that some believed Hazleton to be an Irishman. Our interest was awakened; and our request to be permitted to converse with him was immediately granted. The huge door gradually opened, and we were in his presence. A log—somewhat like the boat-holds on our old quays—rose out of the floor; 'twas just under the window, or slender air-hole that lighted and purified the apartment. The room might be eight feet by six, or something less. Perched upon the pillar just-mentioned—one leg thrown carelessly over the other—was the handsomest man we had ever seen. He was the beau ideal of a corsair. A red cap, the tassel of which fell jauntingly on his left shoulder, obliquely covered his forehead. His hair was raven jet—his eyes large, full, and lustrous—his mouth was outlined by perfection itself—but the lips were not full enough for beauty—they were those of firmness and command. He wore no jacket—a fair cambric shirt, yellow vest, with rich studs, and white trousers, completed his costume. He could not be more than one-and-twenty years old.

We bowed. The prisoner returned the salute, but was silent.

"You are an Irishman?"

"I have not said so."

"It is so reported. I am sorry to behold a young fellow of your appearance in such circumstances, and if I can do you a service, command me."

"Thank you, Sir—I need nothing just now."

"'Tis an early age to be in the hands of the law. You must have seen better days and other society. I have no doubt but bitter tears would be shed, were your condition and prospects known at home."

"They are not likely to be."

"Well, let me pray you to prepare for the worst. Whatever country you come from, or whatever may be your creed, you know there is a place beyond the grave; and you are not weak enough to fear, nor, I hope, fool enough to omit your preparation. Send for your clergyman."

There was a pause. We added some few words, and were preparing to depart, when the prisoner moved his lips to speak. We thought him about to unbosom himself, but were disappointed. We turned towards the door, and, as we called to the turnkey, Hazleton said—"Sir."

"Well, friend."

"Please, see me to-morrow."

We did see him, and learned that he was the victim of circumstances the most extraordinary that imagination ever dreamed. Many a day we spent with him; and we kissed him with more than the warmth of brotherhood at the moment when he looked into eternity. A future number shall record his and his companions' histories. They are instructive, though almost exceeding credibility, and will hardly be deemed an episode in our "Papers about the Missions."

We cannot suppress the impulse to give a few circumstances of his last moments. 'Twas a gorgeous summer day—not a cloud shrouded the azure, from the horizon to the zenith. A scaffold looked out upon the broad Atlantic—the death-scene was a rising ground, about a quarter of a mile from the sea. Just before was a church-yard, and on one of its shelving sides new-made graves were visible—there was a neat mortuary chapel in the centre. The deep over which the culprits had journeyed—the chapel which should receive their lifeless remains—the graves where they should repose until the judgment day—all the past and the future were before them. Hazleton prayed fervently but collectedly. He read or repeated the responses to the litany with an even, steady tone. The Protestant clergyman very beautifully and impressively recited the "Lord's Prayer"—his business was done. The three pirates of his communion quietly turned round, and joined their companions in distress; they invoked all the saints with a piety quite edifying. At length proximate preparations were being made. Hazleton was collected as if a mere witness of the scene—he coolly drew the rope "taught," to see the "purchase," or length of fall.

"Mr. Sheriff," said he, "will you please fling off one or two coils of this rope—I shall be hanging with this all day."

The official looked amazed—the culprit quietly pursued his prayers. A thought again struck him. He raised his hands to his neck, and found that he had not been pinioned with sufficient tightness to prevent his catching the cord above.

"Mr. Sheriff, please draw this twine a little more taught, or I fear I shall by-and-by be putting up my hands."

The Sheriff was sending the executioner.

"Pray, Sir, do it yourself," said the composed and undaunted young fellow—the awkwardness of the Blackey had not escaped him—"I don't think he ever tied a knot in his life."

A few moments, and a brave man, who might have been a great one, hung a lifeless corpse.

Hazleton that night lay in the little chapel to which we have already referred. It had been known that he was a "son of the sod," and that others' villany, more than his own immorality, had brought him to a luckless end. A thousand conjectures on his origin, family, and career, had been hazarded, discussed, abandoned, or adopted; but all came to one opinion, that his "misfortune, not his fault," had brought him to his premature end. As twilight advanced, many hundreds of the population wended their way to the graveyard, and knelt around the bier to offer their orisons for the repose of the pirate's soul. The coffin was opened, and, contrary to every anticipation, no rude trace of his violent transition marked the culprit's remains. He lay in all the manly beauty of guiltless repose—and sighs and tears were poured forth as tributes to his unhappy destiny. Some there were whose moral sense was offended, 'twas said, by such unwonted manifestations of regard for the departed culprit. But they knew him not. They knew not the frightful ordeal to which he had been subjected, and the many efforts which he had made to extricate himself from a position that looked like doom. Alas! it was a weakly encouragement to crime that a man should not be pursued beyond the gate of death, and that kind hearts should yearn towards the lonely exile, whom the law itself had surrendered—when it had killed him. At all events, old men sorrowed as they kept vigil by his body, and young girls came with fresh-plucked flowers to scatter perfume 'round his clay. Incessantly, from eve to the following morn, the little edifice rang with "Lord have mercy on him! Christ have mercy on him?"

About the hour of midnight, a circumstance occurred which struck some with dismay and supplied others with a most acceptable enigma, which was solved as truly and as variously as it was represented. A lady entered the church—tall, commanding—with firm pace and collected bearing. A hand-maiden followed, we believe, as deeply disguised, and as much self-possessed as her mistress. The servant bore a basket of flowers, with which she accompanied her lady to the coffin. The people were not slow in opening an avenue, and their hearts beat more rapidly as the strangers advanced. To scatter the mingled roses and lilies was the work of an instant. One moment the lady drew aside her veil—but her face turned towards the altar. She stooped—gently kissed the pirate's cold lips and withdrew.

Decidedly the little chapel was much more mysterious, and not near so comfortable after the departure of the recent visitors. The timid stole away together, and the romantic sat in the moonlight, to weave tales of broken hearts and black weeds, and so forth. We are not sure that we do justice to ourselves by the explicitness with which we detailed matters full of such dramatic interest. But we have an uncommon regard for our readers, and would not unnecessarily awaken a susceptibility, or call a sensibility into action which the necessity of our "Papers" doth not demand.

Now, who was the lady?—Was it a lady at all? It was shrewdly remarked that a foreigner of great distinction had arrived the evening before; a duchess—a countess, at least. Certainly she must have been the mother of Hazleton. But then—no; that step so light—and that bearing so agile—ah! she could not be old enough to be the pirate's parent. Stop—we have it; the lady was—his—his LOVER. But where has she come from—or whither has she gone? "'Pon my conscience, I believe," said a man who had seen the apparition, and had heard all, "'Pon my conscience, I don't believe she came there at all."

* * * * *

Some few weeks after the "wake" of the pirate, an Irish missionary was sitting in his little room. It was evening. Possibly enough he was thinking of Hazleton, whose confessor he had been, and whom he had endeavoured to prepare for his trial by the hope which followed it. A lady was announced, and a lady entered. The height—the dress—the bearing—every thing corresponded with the often-heard-of nocturnal admirer of the youthful victim of misdeeds. In a moment the whole mystery was solved; and we generously communicate the explanation. On the morning of his execution, the pirate had requested of her father a moment's conversation with the daughter of the governor—the governor of the penitentiary. The hour was a solemn one—the condemned man had endeared himself to every one—the interview was to be in the presence of her parents, though at sufficient distance to confine its import to the two—he could not be refused the last request—and he was not. Poor, Catholic Ireland! Sorrow, shame—even guilt—cannot wither thy love of the church of ages. He had never spoken to the lady before—he had rarely even beheld her: with an eloquence caught from the other world, when half-sundered from this, he addressed her—addressed her on her faith! Her heart was won—her whole being revolutionised. She who had perhaps never before spoken to a Catholic, left the convict's presence in tears, and a devoted CONVERT!

Poor young man!—he never mentioned the matter even to his confessor—but he determined to save a soul before his own should depart for judgment; and never was conviction more deeply impressed than that which his burning words had effected upon the spirit of her, who was the last to press her maiden lips upon his brow.

Local Memoirs of Ireland.

TRIM.

In the midst of one of the most fertile of Ireland's plains, and on the banks of the Boyne, one of her loveliest rivers, and, from its historic associations, the most deeply interesting, stands the ancient town of Ath-Trim. Centuries have rolled by since it existed as the heart and centre of the powerful palatinate of Meath; its power has departed, its grandeur is in ruins, and of many memorials of its former greatness not a trace can now be found; yet do the memories of that old town twine round our imaginations, leading us back through the lapse of ages to the contemplation of the actions of men, whose very names are now nearly forgotten within the walls where they once maintained almost kingly state and sway. The moated castle, the church, sheltering itself beneath the shadow of the strong and lofty tower, whence the rude clang of arms was as often heard as "the sweet and peaceful warnings of its bells," the issuing forth at early morn, from the several town-gates of knightly bands in glittering armour, with waving pennons and "all their bravery," to pillage, or, in the words of the books, "to reduce the enemy," and their return at even-tide to the boisterous merriment of the baronial hall, are as apt exponents of the state of society in that "vanished day," as the county jail, the union workhouse, and the barrack with its pipe-clayed and epauletted warriors are of the present age. In this old town dwelt many of the deputies of the foreign "lords of Ireland." The parliaments of the "Pale" sat more frequently within its castle and monastic halls than in the capital itself; and the flower of England's chivalry, and even some of her royal princes, were sometimes its rulers and sometimes its captives. But all things human have put on new forms here, as elsewhere. The courts of the Lord Palatine have yielded place to those of "our sovereign lady the Queen," and "Sherieeves of the Cross" and "Sherieeves of the Liberty" have now merged into one official. The Mac Herathies and O'Marethans, and others of the "Irish rebels" no longer "rob, spoil, and destroy" the English marchours, nor do the "liegemen" now return the compliment precisely after the ancient fashion. One point alone remains unchanged, the method of "reduction," then as now, had the solemn sanction of the law and was executed constitutionally. But this perhaps is political, and enough yet remains of Trim to interest us as Catholics and Irishmen, without entering into that troubled sea.

The first notices we find of Trim extend so far back as the era of the patron saint of our nation. Niall Navigiallach had fallen a victim of the treason of Eochaid, king of Leinster, in the year 404, as he was carrying the terror of the Irish name and prowess throughout Gaul, and was succeeded by Dathy, his nephew; but he too had now passed away, and Leogaire, Niall's son, reigned a "true Irish king." In the thirty-third year of the fifth century, and the fourth of his reign, he was solemnizing the high religious festival of his nation at his royal palace of Tarah, surrounded by his magi, the ministers of those idolatrous rites. By ancient custom and royal ordinances, no fire should be lighted on that eve, within a considerable distance of Tarah, before that which was the object of worship. Yet in the east a bright flame is seen, as if in defiance of regal mandates. Leogaire consults his wise men, who, oracle like, declare, "that unless the fire they then saw was extinguished that night, it would not cease to burn for all eternity." Artful impostors! little thought they how much truth they then spoke. It is a beautiful instance of error whose course is run, and whose days are numbered, bearing unconscious and unwilling testimony of the advent of Faith; for, surely, there was much of truth in those words, though spoken in all hollowness and deceit. That light has been extinguished, but the light of Divine Faith, of which it was the material symbol, has never ceased to burn in the land; and let us hope it may endure through all time. Upon hearing this sage prophecy, the king went in the direction of the strange fire; and, having come near to Tertafer-feic (Slane), he summoned the author of the offence to appear before him. The apostle Patrick then appeared;* and, the following day, he crossed the plain of Breg, and announced his high mission before the assembled princes at Tarah, declaring to them that the "sun which they worshipped was a creature whose splendour would not always endure, and whose worship could only involve everlasting torments on its votaries, but that the sun which he announced was 'solem verum, Christum,'—'Christ, the true sun,'" It has been observed, in the life of another apostle, that "wherever man is, there are hearts and consciences which will correspond to the simple doctrines of religion, and be conscious on hearing it of the truth, that one thing is needful," so we may easily believe that this announcement of Divine Truth carried immediate conviction to the souls of many of its hearers.

* St. Patrick had lighted the paschal fire, the day being Holy Saturday.

We are not told whether Leogaire then or ever corresponded with the grace, but our most credible historians and annalists inform us that his son, Fedlimid, was converted, and that he gave to God and the Church the site whereon St. Patrick erected a monastic establishment, and where he established the first Irish see, consecrating his disciple, St. Loman, its bishop. This site was TRIM.

And so, from that Paschal commemoration, we date the origin of Trim. Henceforth it is the source whence flows the living streams of Christian truth to the surrounding country far and wide—a centre, from which radiates the effulgence of heavenly light. Hither would men's eyes turn to him who sat there, the spiritual father of the flock committed to his care; for the successors of St. Loman sit in his see and teach the faith delivered by him; and the faithful come to venerate his memory and invoke his intercession on each recurring anniversary. A school, after the custom of the country and the age, springs up and flourishes, within the precincts of the church; and, here, youth are taught the secular knowledge of the times, with the most important of sciences, that of Christian perfection. The clergy live in community, and support themselves, most probably, by the labour of their hands, and by the occasional but scanty offerings of the faithful; for it was one of the lessons taught them by the precept and example of their great apostle, "not to accept of presents, at least of any considerable value, lest they might give occasion to the incredulous to defame their ministry." And here the houseless and unfriended find a home and consolation, for the poor, the images of Him "who had not where to lay his head," are ever the choicest portion and care of Holy Church.

But there is a great lapse of time between the fifth and the twelfth centuries, and by the close of the latter the work of St. Patrick and St. Loman was nearly undone. The forms of Christianity still remained, and, indeed, much of its spirit; but it no longer influenced the world around it as it had done in an earlier time. Danish invasions and internal commotions, for two centuries, had disturbed the gentle influences of the Gospel, and native princes no longer paid that affectionate and scrupulous deference to the Church and all that belonged to her which their fathers had done. Our annalists record a sacrilegious burning of the tower and steeple of the church of Trim, where 200 persons had fled for protection, by an Ulster king, named Connor O'Meaghlin, in the year 1108. Thus, by the end of the same century, Trim needed, we may say, a new state of things. At all events, its old character was gone, and it was about to enter on a new career. Its bishopric, with many others, merged into the newly constituted diocese of Meath; its church was governed by an arch-priest in lieu of its bishop; it was no longer the home of simple faith and piety, but the turbulent arena of noisy knights and barons, of protervees and burgesses, of leige-men and march-men.

We have now arrived at that period, when Trim assumed the character of a town of the middle ages, and put on the garb of Feudalism, so many of the memoirs of which yet remain, although it has, again, assumed a new character. We are not writing a history of Trim, but merely sketching a few of the prominent incidents and characters of Irish history associated with it, and which most naturally suggest themselves by a visit to the locality and an inspection of the remains of bygone ages.

The first object which attracts the attention of the tourist, as he approaches Trim from the Dublin side, is the grand remnant of the castle, "frowning tremendous even in ruins." It has a commanding effect, towering over the quiet current of the "pleasant Boyne," and, as the eye takes in its massive outline with the towers of the churches in the distance, the spectator at once feels that he is in the vicinity of a very old town; enough yet remains of the castle to enable the visiter to ascertain its precise extent and formidable character. For the following very accurate description of its present state, we are indebted to an interesting little volume by the amiable Vicar of Trim, the Rev. R. Butler, who has industriously collected all available records connected with it, and has shown much antiquarian zeal and taste in collecting various memorials of its former greatness. "The castle of Trim, on the east side of the town, and on the south or right bank of the river Boyne, consists of a triangular-walled enclosure, defended by circular flanking towers, and a large and lofty donjon or keep in centre. One of the sides of the castle was formerly washed by the river Boyne, and, when the river is very full, the low meadow, about fifty yards broad, which is now between the castle and the river, is still inundated. This, the north-eastern side of the castle, is 171 yards long, and is defended by four flanking towers, two at the angles and two intermediate. The west side—that which faces the town—is 116 yards long, quite straight, and defended by flanking towers at the angles, and the tower over the gateway in the centre. The groove for the portcullis is very perfect, and it seems, from the projecting masonry, that there had been a draw-bridge and barbican to the gate. The tower over this gate is octagonal, though the base is rectangular, which gives it a peculiar appearance; there was a wet ditch in front of this as well as the south side, which was supplied with water by the small stream which runs along the town-wall by the Dublin gate. In the north angle of the castle, there are the ruins of several buildings, one of which has a high gable and was three stories high. Four very large windows in the castle-wall towards the river, with niches in the piers between them, mark the site of a chapel or banquetting-hall; there is also a large vault extending partly under this room. Three large windows have been rudely filled up at some period—loops for musketry in each have been made. In the south-west angle of the castle, where the town-wall adjoined it, a mound of earth has been thrown up, to the height of the castle wall, filling the first and second towers from the town gate. This was, probably, done for a battery for cannon, to flank the town wall and to defend the approach to the Dublin gate. The wall, against which the mound of earth was thrown up, has fallen down, but the towers remain, one of which have been lately cleared. It is divided into three stories; the upper one of which was a pigeon-house, having holes for sixty or eighty pair; the lower story led to the postern, at which was probably the level of the water in the ditch. The third side, which is towards the country, facing the south, sweeps round in an easy curve to the Boyne; it is 192 yards long, defended by six flanking towers, including those at the angles of the gate. This tower of the gate is circular and in good preservation, as well as the arches over the ditch and the barbican beyond it. The gate had also its portcullis, the groove for which, and the recess for its windlass, are perfect. The circumference of the castle wall, then, is 486 yards, defended by ten flanking towers, at nearly equal distances, including those at the gate. The donjon is a rectangular building, the plan of which may thus be described:—on the middle of each side of sixty-four feet, rectangles are constructed, the size of sides, perpendicular to the square, being twenty feet, and those parallel to it twenty-four feet; thus a figure of twenty sides is constructed. The thickness of the wall of the large tower is twelve feet, and of the smaller towers from four feet six inches to six feet. The walls were carried up sixty feet above the level of the ground; but on each angle of the large tower, square turrets, sixteen feet six inches in height, are built. By this arrangement a large shower of missiles might have been projected in any direction."

The town itself was also entirely surrounded by a wall. On the east side of it were two gates, the "sheep-gate," which yet remains in ruins, and further north the Navan or "rogues' gate." At the northern extremity of the town, adjoining the Dominican or Black Friary, was the Athboy gate. The south part of the wall extended in a westerly direction from the castle, and contained the Dublin gate; and in the west wall, on the south side of the river, was the water gate.

The present castle was erected, in 1220, on the site of one which had been erected, in 1173, by De Lacy; and, as it was very much connected with the civil and political affairs which followed its erection, we shall here take a rapid glance at the history of its origin and fate. From the time of the English invasion, Trim became one of the principal strongholds of the Anglo-Irish, or, more correctly speaking, a great English garrison in Ireland. Murchard O'Mealachlin was the last native prince of the old race, who possessed undivided sway in the principality of Meath. The English king, Henry, spent the Christmas of 1171 in Dublin, and, proceeding southwards in February of the following year, arrived in Wexford about Lent. Here he parcelled out portions of the Irish kingdom to his faithful adherents and companions-in-arms. To Hugh De Lacy he granted the principality of Meath, in as full and ample a manner as it had been possessed by the Irish princes, on the condition of the service of fifty knights. The De Lacies thus became one of the first Anglo-Irish families, and it would seem that, as the royal grant was merely formal on the part of the king, and had yet to be made good, by conquest, on the part of the grantee, De Lacy regarded himself as an independent prince (or palatine), merely owing the claims of suzerainty to the English monarch. And reason he had for so thinking, for, were he armed with no other power than the charter of Henry Fitz-Empress, he would have little chance of gaining the territory he claimed. The O'Mealachlins did not dream of quietly yielding their lands to a stranger, on the authority of a parchment signed and sealed by a foreign king; and, though the Irish princes were too divided to prove faithful allies to each other, each fought bravely for his own interest. At the onset, however, De Lacy succeeded so far as to obtain possession of Trim, and there to build and fortify a castle. The year after the grant was made, he returned to England, leaving Hugh Tyrrell as his deputy and the custodian of the castle. During his absence, Roderick O'Connor assembled an army of his adherents—the O'Maddens, O'Dowds, and O'Carrolls—and attacked the strong-hold of the adventurers. Tyrrell fled, having set fire to the castle, and Roderick, probably supposing that he had completely banished the intruders, returned to his own country. But Strongbow, who had moved from Dublin to the aid of his fellow-robbers, pursued the Irish and having killed 150 of them retired to Trim, where finding no castle to abide in, he fell back upon Dublin. Thus fell the first castle of Trim. But the rich plains of Meath were too tempting a prize for landless interlopers; Tyrrell soon after returned, and rebuilt the ruined castle before his master's return from England. Still the "Irish enemy" was not reduced. In 1175, Tiernan O'Ruarc, whose territory lay adjacent to that of Meath, not liking such dangerous proximity, and not being alive to the virtues of a royal charter, resisted the stranger. In order to prevent open hostilities, the Irish prince (simple man) agreed to an adjustment of the quarrel, by conference with the invading foe, on a hill near Dublin; but, before any conclusion could be arrived at, Griffin, a follower of De Lacy's, assassinated O'Ruarc. The unfortunate prince's head was then cut off and placed over one of the town-gates of Dublin, and his body suspended by the heels, "an object of terror to all such evil doers," and an example of the results of confidential conferences with the enemies of one's country.

After this, De Lacy led a turbulent and, Giraldus informs us, a very profligate life. He terminated his career on the 25th July, 1186, at Durrrough, where, as he was inspecting the works of a new castle, his head was severed from his body by a blow of an axe, given by a labouring man, named O'Meey. The site of the new castle was that of an ancient monastery founded by St. Columbkil, and the Irishman was enraged at this desecration of a holy place and insult to the memory of the ancient saints of his nation. That De Lacy's body bore some resemblance to his mind we have the testimony of his countryman, Geraldus Cambrensis, who describes his figure as low and ill-formed, his face as hideously ugly, "being of a dark complexion, with black, deep-seated eyes, a flat nose, and his right cheek, down to his chin, sadly scarred by an accidental burn." The possession of his body, after his death, appears to have been a subject of much litigation, and even to have required the interference of a Pope to determine. After the lapse of nine years it was recovered, say the historians, from the Irish, and solemnly interred in the abbey of Beective, by Matthew O'Heney, archbishop of Cashel, and John Comyn, archbishop of Dublin. His head was deposited in the tomb of his first wife, in the abbey of St. Thomas, Dublin. Afterwards, a dispute arose between the abbeys of Beective and St. Thomas, for the possession of the body, when the treasure was given to that of St. Thomas, by arbitrators appointed by Pope Innocent III.; namely, Simon Rochford, bishop of Meath; the archdeacon of Meath, and the prior of a monastery at Duleek, which had been founded by De Lacy.

Walter, the son of Hugh, succeeded his father in the lordship of Meath, and constituted Trim a free borough, granting it rights and privileges similar to those enjoyed by the city of Bristol. His brother Hugh became earl of Ulster. These brothers appear to have inherited much of their father's disposition, for on the approach of King John to Trim, in July, 1210, they fled into France, their crimes of oppression and murder being so glaring that they dared not to answer for them to their sovereign. In France they concealed themselves in the abbey of St. Taurin, serving in mean offices, till the good abbot, having discovered their condition and rank of life, interceded for them with King John, who restored them to their possessions on their paying a large fine. After his return to Ireland, Walter led an uneasy life; now resisting the incursions of the "Irish rebels," and now engaged in the civil wars waged between the English settlers. At length, worn down by bodily sufferings and loss of sight, he died in 1241, and, leaving no male issue, his principality was divided between his daughters—Margery, wife of John Verdon, and Matilda, or Maud, who, in 1250, married Sir Geoffry de Geneville, a nobleman of Champagne, and brother of Jean de Geneville, the friend and historian of St. Louis.

The memory of this good and able man gives great interest to Trim. We are told that he was a politic statesman, and the "confidential friend" of Edward I. Thirteen years after his marriage he founded the Dominican monastery of Trim, and, subsequently, joined the crusade for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre. In 1273, after his return from Palestine, he was appointed lord justice of Ireland; and the remaining portion of his worldly career appears to have been a continued warfare with the descendants of Hugh De Lacy, earl of Ulster, who were unwilling to see the great lordship of Meath passing into the hands of a foreigner and the female branch of their family. Tired of the world and its ways, he at last resigned the lordship of Meath to the daughter of his only son, Joan and her husband—the ambitious and ill-fated Roger Mortimer—and assumed the habit of a Dominican, on the feast of SS. Simon and Jude, 1308. And there, having in the last few years of his life found that sweet interior peacefulness which all the varied scenes he had witnessed in the days of his youth and manhood could not afford, he passed from this life on the 19th of October, 1314. "It is to be regretted," says Rev. Mr. Butler, "that our notices of the varied life of this great man are so meagre, that we cannot fill up the outline of the young noble of Champagne wooing his wealthy bride in the court of England, retiring with her to her great seignories in Ireland, and joining with her in founding a religious house—joining in a crusade to the Holy Land—administering, for a short time, the government of his adopted country—busy, for years, in the councils and campaigns of the bold and politic Edward I.—and closing his career by the resignation of his lordship of Meath to his youthful grand-daughter and her ambitious husband, and ending his days, in the habit of a Dominican, in the cloister which he and his wife had built fifty years before."

The De Lacies, enraged at the apparent good fortune of Mortimer, gave up their allegiance to England and, in 1317, joined the standard of Edward Bruce, who, with his brother King Robert, a month before Easter of that year, came with his army within about four leagues of Trim, and there, concealing themselves in a wood for a week, refreshed their men, who were almost "worn out with fatigue and hunger." Mortimer banished Sir Walter and Sir Hugh De Lacy, and their lands were forfeited to his soldiers. The following year, the De Lacies, with Edward Bruce, landed at Dundalk, on Pope St. Calixtus' day (October 14th). Mortimer was now in England, and Alexander Bicknor, archbishop of Dublin, being lord justice, sent Lord John Birmingham, Richard Tuite, and Miles de Verdon with 1324 men to oppose them. A battle took place at Faghird about two miles from Dundalk, when the Scot's army, so long successful, received a total defeat, 3000 of their men being slain. Bruce himself was found, after the action, covered by the body of Maupas, a captain of the English army, who had thrown himself within the enemy's lines to encounter the Scottish chief hand to hand. The head of the unfortunate prince was sent into England to King Edward by Birmingham, who received for this signal service the earldom of Louth. His brother was created baron of Athenry. De Lacy fled from Ireland, and did not return till after the death of Mortimer.

The remainder of the career of Mortimer, husband of Joan de Geneville and lord of Meath, is more connected with English history than with the memoirs of Trim. In 1323 he was declared a traitor, and his lands forfeited to the king, and, in 1326, he passed over into England, having left, says Cox, the management of his estates of Leix in the hands of an Irishman, named O'More, who, after some time, claimed them as his own, although, continues the same authority, his pretensions were founded only in "perfidy and ingratitude." Mortimer, however, appears to have gained the favour of Edward III., who, on the 25th of April, created him earl of March, and granted him the moiety of Meath which had been the portion of Margery Verdon. But—strange reverse of fortune—on the 29th of November of the same year, he was hanged at Tyburn, on the charge of having made a dishonourable peace with the Scotch, and of having been, with Isabella the wife of Edward II., accessory to the death of that monarch.

In little better than half a-century afterwards, we find the lineal descendant and namesake of Mortimer not only the lord of Meath, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, but, by parliamentary declaration, heir presumptive to the crown of England, in case of the demise of Richard II. without issue. His claim to the English throne was through his grandmother, Philippa, only daughter of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, the second son of King Edward III. He did not survive Richard II. however. That monarch, on his departure from Ireland, in 1394, left the conduct of his Irish wars in the hands of Roger Mortimer, earl of March and Ulster. During four years, Mortimer wasted the country of the old Irish, and, at length, was slain by the O'Byrns at Kenlis (Kells) on St. Margaret's day, 1398, as he was fighting under false colours, "being disguised in the habit and accoutrements of an Irish horseman." He is described as having been "distinguished for the qualities held in estimation in his time—a stout tourneyer, a famous speaker, a costly feaster, a bounteous giver; in conversation, affable and jocose; in beauty and form surpassing his fellows—but warlike and renowned as he was, and fortunate in his undertakings, and fair, he was yet most dissolute and remiss in matters of religion." To revenge his death, Richard came again into Ireland; but, meeting strong opposition from Art Mac Murrough, who declared himself rightful king of Ireland, and hearing of the landing of his "thrice noble cousin, Harry Bolingbroke," in England, he departed, leaving the young son of Bolingbroke (afterwards the warlike Henry V.) a prisoner in Trim castle.

This "rascaliest, sweetest young prince" was not the only one of Shakspeare's heroes who figured in Trim. The "dreadful knight," Sir John Talbot, Lord Furnival, and earl of Shrewsbury,

—"the scourge of France—

—The Talbot so much feared abroad,

That with his name the mothers still their babes"—

frequently resided here during his several lieutenantancies of Ireland, and is supposed to have erected the building near the yellow steeple, known as "Talbot castle." He made peace several times with the O'Connors, and others of the "Irish Rebels," and presided at several parliaments holden at Trim; amongst others at that which met in 1447, on the Friday next after the feast of Epiphany, when an act was passed, forbidding "English marchours" to wear beards on their upper lips, after the manner of the "Irish enemy." An act was passed in this parliament against the "O'Reyle's, and other unlawful money." Talbot castle still preserves some traces of its ancient character, notwithstanding its modern alterations. The "oriel window" of the great hall overlooks the pleasant current of the Boyne; many of the old windows remain, and the arms of earl Shrewsbury still hold a place in the north wall of one of the towers. This building was formerly the diocesan school of Meath, and was the place of the early education of another of England's great heroes—the Duke of Wellington. Arthur Wellesley was representative of Trim in the parliament of his native country; and Dr. Butler says his signature is to every act of the corporation of Trim from June 1789, to September 1793.

The power of England in Ireland was near being annihilated in the 15th century, by the appointment of Richard, duke of York, the heir to the lordships of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, to the lieutenantancy of Ireland. His authority was almost regal, and his mild and gentle government won him the esteem of the great Irish and Anglo-Irish lords. In 1450 he held his court in great splendour at Trim, and restored the castle with unusual magnificence. He also liberally endowed the abbey of St. Mary, and built the tower called the "yellow steeple." He established a mint at Trim, and had two forms of coin struck totally distinct from the coinage of England; one called an Ireland, of silver, was struck with a crown and the word "Ireland" on one side, and a lion on the other; the other called a Patrick, had a cross on one side, and a crown with the name "Patrick" on the other. In 1460 the English parliament declared the duke and his adherents guilty of high treason. The Irish parliament, in return, declared it high treason to bring any writs from England to attack any of the enemies of that country who fled into Ireland. The Duke of York returned to England, and claimed the crown as his right. In the fatal battle of Wakefield he was defeated and slain. But this defeat did not extinguish the claim of the Yorkists. The son of this ill-fated Duke was afterwards Edward IV., and in him the great lordship of Meath and the kingdom of England were united. The palesmen of Meath did not long preserve peace with the native Irish after the death of the Duke of York. In 1466, with Thomas, earl of Desmond, at their head, they made incursions into the territory of Offaly. They were resisted by O'Connor Faily and his forces, and, in a pitched battle, totally defeated; the earl being made a prisoner, and his son John, "the best and most renowned leader of the English," slain.

We are compelled to pass over many minor notices of Trim from this period. The zeal of the people of Meath for the house of York induced their chief nobles to favour Simnel's imposition. The remaining portion of the history of the town is occupied with relations of the contentions between the two great parties, the natives and the settlers. From 1641 till the defeat of the confederated Catholics, the town was the scene of many of the exciting events of the time. Sir Charles Coote, after committing many cruelties, was killed on the 7th May, 1642. Ormond came here after his defeat at Rathmines (July 28th, 1649); but Cromwell, having gained his "crowning mercy" at Drogheda, the Duke ordered the burning and quitting of the town. His adherents were so terrified, that they retreated without executing his commands. The place was immediately possessed by the Cromwellians. The tower of St. Mary's was partly battered down, and the west tower of the castle completely destroyed. After the restoration of peace, the corporation ordered that the castle, and town-wall, and gates should be repaired at the public expense; but it is probable that this order was never obeyed, so that the dismantled walls of the castle, a few fragments of the town-wall, and one of the gates are all that now remain of this once important and much contested stronghold.

Of the several religious establishments which formerly existed in Trim, few monuments now exist. The tower, and a few fragments of the chancel, are all that remain of the ancient parochial church of St. Patrick, to which, Archdall informs us, there were attached three perpetual chantries of the Holy-rood, St. Patrick, and St. Laurence the Martyr. Within the present century the nave has been rebuilt after the fashion of the day, and forms the parochial church of the "Establishment." It contains many fragments of ancient art, and some monumental remains, which the laudable zeal of the vicar has rescued from destruction; amongst others an incised slab, commemorative of one of the ancient arch-priests of the church. The inscription is nearly effaced, the only words now legible being—"Rector et archi-levites," with the usual and Catholic prayer for mercy, expressed in a strange form, "Ira Dei pacificetur ei." In the west end the drip-stone, with the corbel-heads of the old west window is preserved, and some portions of the ancient tracery, which, with the window yet remaining in the south wall of the ruined chancel, and other fragments of Christian art, prove that this church formerly possessed some architectural beauty. In the vestry, a good many specimens of ancient Irish encaustic tiles are preserved. They afford an instructive study to those who take an interest in this branch of antiquarian art.

On the north bank of the Boyne, the "yellow steeple," or tower of the ancient abbey of St. Mary, occupies a conspicuous position. It is all that remains of the abbey once famous for its numerous pilgrimages, and the wonderful miracles reported to have been wrought through the agency of the image of the Blessed Virgin. This is probably the site of the ancient abbey, which was founded in the earliest ages of the Irish Church. Be that as it may, an abbey of Canons Regular was founded here, about the close of the thirteenth century, and existed till the year 1538, when, at the general suppression of religious houses, it was granted, with all its possessions, to Sir Anthony St. Leger. The celebrated image of the Blessed Virgin was publicly burned, and most of the monastic buildings ruined. The tower, which, from its strength and commanding position, formed a considerable fortress, was preserved entire till the wars of the following century, when, after being held for a considerable time as a garrison, one-half of it was demolished by the Cromwellians. This tower stood on the north-east angle of the church.

At some distance south-east of the "yellow steeple," one of the ancient town-gates, called the "sheep-gate," opens into the "porch-field," part of the patrimony of St. Mary's.

The Dominican, or "Black Friary" (dedicated to the Blessed Virgin), was situated near the Athboy-gate; but not a single trace of its former extent or buildings can now be found. Sir James Ware, in his "Life of Nicholas Mac Molissa, archbishop of Armagh," gives an account of a meeting of the bishops and clergy of Ireland, held in this monastery on the Sunday after the feast of St. Matthew, 1291, when an association was established for preserving "the rights, jurisdictions, liberties, and customs of the church" from the encroachments of any lay power whatever. This confederacy included all the archbishops, bishops, deans, and all degrees and orders of the clergy; and they not only ratified their agreement under their hands and seals, but by the solemnity of an oath. The primate presided at this meeting, and, from his character, we may suppose that he was the chief mover in it. He is described as an "inveterate enemy of such Englishmen as were preferred to bishopricks in Ireland, laying them under all the difficulties in his power, and an active opponent of secular usurpation." It is added, that "he was a man in great reputation for his eloquence and wisdom," and a liberal benefactor to the church.

The court-house stands on the site of the old Franciscan abbey of Trim. The Gray Abbey was dedicated to St. Bonaventure, and, according to Luke Wadding, was founded by King John. Allemande attributes the foundation of it to the Plunkets. At the suppression, this friary, with several small parcels of land and a church in Trim, were granted to Lodwyche O'Tudyr, parson of Roslaye, John Moryre, parson of Walterstown, and John Wakely, at the annual rent of 2s. 10d., Irish money. Although their lands were confiscated and their dwellings ruined, the Franciscans lingered for a long time about their ancient home. In the seventeenth century they were not entirely rooted out. Father Richard Plunket resided in Trim in those perilous times, and devoted himself to the preservation of the literature of his native land. A fochair, or vocabulary in Latin and Irish, which he completed in the year 1662, was made much use of by the learned linguist, Edward Lhuyd, who speaks of Father Plunket as a judicious writer and a man of great industry. He adds that he was held in great estimation by his countrymen for his knowledge of their native language.

There was, also in Trim, a Priory of Cruched Friars, under the invocation of St. John the Baptist, which is said to have been a truly magnificent building, and to have been the place of assembly of many of the Pale parliaments. Hussey, the last Prior, surrendered this monastery on the 4th of February, 27th of Henry VIII., and it, with all its possessions, were granted to Sir Thomas Cusacke, knight, the speaker of the Irish house of commons, which granted the title of King of Ireland to the English monarch.

About a mile east of Trim, on the north side of the river, are situated the extensive ruins of the priory of Canons Regular of St. Victor. This establishment owed its origin to the foundation of the bishopric of Meath. In 1206 it was founded by Simon de Rochford, the first bishop of the see, as at present constituted. He erected the church into a cathedral under the invocation of SS. Peter and Paul. The prior was third in dignity, and sat as a baron in the house of lords. Richard Hussey, the prior, favoured the pretensions of Lambert Simnel, but he received pardon on taking the oath of allegiance, 25th July, 1488. Laurence White, the last prior, surrendered on the 16th July, in the 31st of Henry VIII., and the house was suppressed by act of parliament and granted to the king. The walls of the cathedral are still standing, but the greater number of the windows and other ornamental features have been removed. Sufficient is left however to indicate that it was once a building of considerable extent and magnificence. It consisted of a nave and choir of uniform width. The nave was entered by a door at the west end, which yet remains. It was surrounded by a triforium, the ornamental portions of which have been destroyed, but the passages through the thickness of the walls are perfect. In the south wall of the choir there is a double sedilia, in the Norman style. The roof was stone-groined, as is evident from the remains of its beautifully-sculptured corbel shafts. Adjacent to the church are the ruins of the conventual buildings; and, a little to the east, the walls of a small church are yet standing. In the south wall of this building there is an old canopied tomb, with some other memorials of ancient piety and art, which have been there collected by the present vicar of Trim, as we are informed by a Latin inscription.

Crossing New-town (or St. Peter's) bridge, the ruins of the ancient priory or hospital of Cross-bearers, or Cruched Friars, immediately present themselves. They are situated south of the Boyne, and are actually washed by it. These ruins present much of the character of the religious edifices of the borders of the Pale. They were evidently half-castles half-churches. The towers possessed all the characteristics of fortresses, and were usually placed in the positions which afforded most protection to the church. The church of the Cruched Friars of New-town was a long, narrow, and low building. In the east end there was a triplet of lancet lights. The west end was protected by a castle, and other fortified buildings flank the north, or river side.

St. Vincent de Paul.

"Divina musica est rectus cogitationum, verborum, actionumque concentus."—Marcellus Ficinus.

A PANEGYRIC ON SAINT VINCENT DE PAUL, PRONOUNCED IN THE CHAPEL OF THE CASTLE OF VERSAILLES. By order, and in presence of LOUIS XVI., March 4, 1785, by Cardinal JOHN SUFFREIN MAURY. Translated from the French. DUBLIN: J. BROWNE.

THERE are sermons in stones! Nature is vocal with sweet and solemn teaching. History is ripe with moral! the present is preceptive; eloquence has a suasion which force misses; truth is beautiful and self-declaring; but nothing in nature, history, art, or abstraction, preaches so effectively to the human heart as the life of a brother like Vincent de Paul. Oh! it is most high and kindling—thrilling the heart like an old man's cry—nerving the soul like a brave man's deed; at once an appeal and a demonstration—a reproof and an incentive; it preaches to the young, holy and strong purpose, rich and golden opportunity; to the old, benevolence never growing feeble; to all, hope, and faith, and charity. Fact is more striking than thought; the concrete best shows the abstract. Practice is a rule's finest commentary. Christianity has no more fitting illustration than a life like this—history has no nobler object than its record—eloquence boasts few loftier themes than the details of its events and the enforcement of its moral.

From our soul we pity the man who could think of it with no fresh, warm gush of feeling showing in eye and mien; or the historian who could dwell upon its incidents without paying tribute to that holy Church, of which it is the special distinction and peculiar phenomenon; or the orator whose task it was to pronounce its panegyric, who could not catch from the page of the annalist, or at the foot of the cross, a spark of that inspiration—truly divine, because it comes of charity—that of old, fired Paul or Chrysostom, sweeping down opposition, firing tepidity, and inflaming enthusiasm.

None of these was the Cardinal Maury, whose name stands above—whose sermon on St. Vincent we would speak of—neither was he all we could wish. In a trying time, in a fearful ordeal of circumstances, he did not always prove what we would most admire. Amiable, learned, talented, and pious, he was not a Vincent de Paul. But in the midst of the affectation and profligacy, the morbidity and febrility of the sad times that preceded the Revolution in France, he conceived what this St. Vincent was, and resolved to announce, and did announce the same to France in a fitting way. This great fact of the past history of his country and his church appeared to his mind in all its majesty, and touchiness, and encouragement; so, he determined, shall it appear to this court of Versailles, and a godly work shall be done. Accordingly, on the fourth day of March, 1785, while Necliar was yet labouring at the finances, and Mirabeau haranguing at the Sacquetous, and Louis lordling it at the Convention, he preached, in the chapel of the castle of Versailles, to the king, queen, and court, a panegyric which has placed his name among the highest in French oratory, and given to French literature the most eloquent and truthful portraiture, that it can boast of—one of France's greatest men.

That panegyric, a few months since, has been, for the first time, placed before the English-reading public, and in a fashion that the good Cardinal himself could scarce wish improved.

Objections have been raised to it. In the 315th page of Cardinal Pacca's "Memoirs"—a book which all who would rightly study modern history must read—it is related how, while the great "Lord-secretary" was confined in the fortress of Fenestrelles, some twenty years after, he had a conversation with a certain Signor Hannon, of the house of St. Lazare, at Paris, concerning the genius and character of Maury; how, when he expressed his admiration of this "model of sacred eloquence," and his surprise that it should remain as yet unpublished, Hannon stated, in explanation, that it contained some allegations for which there existed no authority in bull or memoir regarding the Saint. With a somewhat perverted research, and indiscriminating zeal, this has been made out and put forward, lately, in depreciation of the sermon. Now we, loving the memory of St. Vincent with a true and hearty love, and recognizing, or believing we recognized, in Maury's panegyric, much of the highest eloquence and the truest portraiture, have attentively collated with it M. Collet's life of St. Vincent, recently translated—a labour so pleasant, that we can claim no gratitude for it—and have found every fact of importance noted in the panegyric, detailed at much greater length in the admirable memoir—the acknowledged authority on the matter. Some discrepancy of dates we discover, and some carelessness of arrangement, but any sign of deliberate fabrication or intentional misrepresentation, in general tone or particular fact, we confidently deny. We care not what may be the explanation of this; a hundred may answer without exceeding the bounds of probability, or implicating the character of any individual. Perhaps, that the sermon, as preached, did inadvertently contain something for which rumour was the only authority, but that afterwards, on consideration or representation, it was expunged from the published form, may not be the least likely supposition.

At any rate it is a fine oration. You cannot read a sentence without knowing that the man believed in his inmost soul what he uttered. It has the true magic of earnestness. Ars maxima est celare artem, combined with this, and elegantly concealed by it, is much artistic skill and power. The portraiture, the chief point after all, is admirable. Demosthenes-like flow, and majesty, and suddenness—the subject starting out upon you all at once, like Apollo armed to the rapt Darden shepherds, it has not; neither has it the exquisite poetic grace and elevation of Bosuet, with every proportion adapted and every adjunct used. Stealing upon your soul like a sweet angelic vision, tender and mystical—but vigorous, loving, true delineation—bold in etching, delicate in inlight and shade, such as a man might give of a friend whom he knew well and enthusiastically admired—it undoubtedly possesses. We defy you to read and think of it as it should be read and thought of, without feeling some glow of that holy resolution and humble gladness which are the seeds of heroism since the world began.

The style on the whole corresponds. The sentences, cumbrous at times, are in general straightforward, full, and musical, falling upon the ear with the roundness of Augustan latinity. Now and then you meet a chilling instance of the feeble conceit and poor pomposity of the then French school; but before you have time to languish over it, you come once more to the vigour of bold thinking and eloquent sincerity.

Recall now the scene. Imagine that gorgeous, regal chapel, nanoplied with the banners of old nobility, and glittering in the light of the noon-day sun, streaming, tinted, through scrolled windows upon the flaunting crowd and the dusty tombs of kings. Conceive that gay court come to pay to the religion its existence outrages, the tribute of a heartless formularism. Remember the emergency of the time—the old faith shaken, the old throne falling, the new Voltarianism, with all its plausibility and profligacy rampant, and already half triumphant. Picture to yourself weak Louis prostrate before the altar he has not courage to defend—fair Marie praying for the heroism she lacks and the prosperity that is passing away—the poor blind "enlightened," with curled lip and supercilious glance, invoking the Omnipotent round His chosen sanctuary—and hear a small dark man, with sonorous voice and earnest manner, utter such a passage as this:

"Ye children of indigence and affliction, who sleep in the dust of the earth, I call upon you, with the prophet Isaiah, to raise the hymn of praise and thanksgiving to Providence—'Awake and give praise, ye who dwell in the dust.'" I announce to you a friend, a protector, a father! And you, my brethren, who rank as the first class of society—who deem it so difficult to act the part of benefactors to your fellow-creatures, do you descend from your elevation, and contemplate for your instruction, the most accomplished benefactor the world ever witnessed issuing from the most obscure grade of society. Happy France! Vincent of Paul founds in thy capital the most important of his charitable institutions amid the storms of the Fronde, as, a century previous, Michael de L'Hopital gave thee thy best laws amid the commotions of civil war. Here, then, is a priest of Jesus Christ who has not signalized himself by any eloquent works in favour of the destitute, and to whom even the word 'philanthropy' would seem to be unknown, but who by his good works, and the influence of his virtues, has proved himself such, that we cannot think, without terror, on what this capital would have become if he had not existed—or without sensibility on what it might be, were God to bestow upon it, in every age, a citizen of such a character. He went about as Jesus did on earth, doing good to man. He extends, in favour of the indigent, the usual boundaries of Providence. His paternal solicitude for the unfortunate became the ardour and profusion of the most devoted affection, united with the perseverance that belongs only to virtue. Such is his love for his fellow-creatures, that in him the activity of charity surpasses the energy of the most intense passion that ever swayed the human breast. He becomes the immortal hero of Christian citizens, and seems chosen by heaven to exhibit in its purest light that Christian patriotism which is the creative genius of good, as impiety is the evil genius of destruction."

We would that we could follow the orator through his picturesque narration of the events of that soul-stirring life, view in succession the poor ignorant shepherd boy of Bordeaux, naked and hungry, "that he might be enabled to feed the destitute whom he meets in the fields, and to whom he distributes his daily bread"—the young priest refusing the rich curacy of Thil, because "the possession was contested"—the wretched Christian slave of Tunis, captured by a pirate, "sold three times in the market-place," and subject, three years, to the extreme of human misery and physical degradation, stripes, nakedness, disease, hunger, labour—the zealous servant of God in the din of Paris, thinking not of aught but "the companions of his sufferings whom he has left in the dungeons of the infidel"—the wonder-working missionary of Châtillon, who in six months "regenerated a district"—the priest of the galleys—the slave of the galleys, all gyved and fettered—slave for the love of his brother and of Jesus!—the solemn minister of unearthly consolation by the bed-side of the expiring king—the founder of societies and orders and missions, to this day the hope and strength of France's church, and of all churches that the cross crowns. Companion of Bosuet, Perochal and that last pavillion of Aronce—favoured of princes and potentates—loved of every class and province, blessed throughout Europe and in the isles of the East and on the sands of the desert, standing there at Paris. Ruler of a mightier executive than Louis the gorgeous; centre of a system conceived by his own mind, worked by his own hand; a great loving heart drawing to it misery and woe and sin, pouring forth consolation and love and manful aid—proof of the reality of Christianity, sign of the possibility of human attainment, life of the beneficence of God! and to us a joyful

. . . . "beacon, throwing light far out Over the rippling tide of centuries."

We must pass over all this. But we cannot refrain from quoting the concluding passages of the present "panegyric:"

"Oh! were it permitted to mingle in this solemnity the language of regret with such consoling recollections, I would complain that the Frenchman who had rendered the most important services to the nation is now scarcely known to his thankless country! that even those suffering classes who owe him so much gratitude, have cherished no permanent recollection of their benefactor; that even some of this audience are astonished at the relation of facts so recent and so sublime! I would exclaim, O folly of human applause! answer me, human glory! who are the men thus celebrated?—and who are those thou consignest to oblivion? But surely my brethren I must be deceived; the nation cannot be so culpable. How could the famous writers of the age of Louis the Fourteenth behold so many important movements rising around them—an admirable police established in Paris; the unheard-of munificence of a man emulating the liberality of Providence—without celebrating such a phenomenon of the genius of charity—without participating in such a glory by recording it—without publishing in their writings the name of such a citizen. Alas! is it possible that the ashes of the illustrious dead must lie in cold oblivion for a century before the voice of truth and justice is heard in its behalf. O Fenelon! Fenelon! thou who didst render him so glorious a testimony when soliciting his canonization—thou whose persuasive eloquence could have so meetly praised him—thou hadst only attained thy second lustre when he descended into the tomb. Ah! hadst thou witnessed his creative charity, thy soul would have recognized a kindred spirit—thy voice would have broken this long-baleful silence—and thy noble genius would have paid the debt of gratitude due by thy fellow-countrymen. But pardon me, sacred walls of this temple. You would disavow me in the name of Vincent of Paul himself, were I to attach too high a value to this celebrity—often deceptive when desired, but still more deceitful when obtained; particularly when terminating the panegyric of a saint who, referring all to God, never regarded the opinions of men. Why should I regret for him the vapour of fame? He placed his hopes infinitely higher in confiding his virtues to a religion which, after crowning him in heaven, now dedicated altars to him on earth. She will glory for ever in having given to the world, in the son of a peasant, a benefactor who throws into the shade the disciples of the Portico and the Lyceum. At the recital of so many deeds of mercy, infidelity, abashed and humbled, will be forced to pay homage to Christianity. It is the religion of Jesus Christ which has produced this great man—it is the school of Jesus Christ which has sent him forth on his career of beneficence—it is the spirit of Jesus Christ that has created all those wonders, ever present to our eyes, for the immortal honour of Christian charity—and it is beneath the cross of Jesus Christ that we humbly lay down all those titles of glory founded on the gratitude of mankind."

"It is at last achieved. The hour of justice has arrived. This day terminated our ingratitude—this day awakened a grateful recollection of thy benefits in every breast as, issuing from the temple, we behold thy charitable institutions. During more than an age, the very stones of the city did not cease to speak to us of thy charitable establishments; and yet it is only to-day that, roused from our apathy, we begin to comprehend their eloquent language. In viewing those extensive hospitals thou hast founded, those dispensaries of charity thou hast opened to every species of human misery, that asylum for deserted infancy (dear and sacred temple of a truly maternal charity, where religion fulfils the duties of nature, and every cradle is an altar to thee!)—in fine, when looking on those indefatigable servants of the poor, whom we meet in all parts, like so many visible angels of Providence, whose daily miracles they distribute to the suffering—those spectacles, hitherto mute to the unreflecting multitude, shall henceforth excite in all hearts the most lively unaction. The streets and the public places of this capital shall thus assume a new aspect, and become to us a touching incitement to piety and benevolence, as, together with the history of charity recorded in so many splendid monuments, we retrace at every step thy admirable life in action, thy eulogy in universal blessings, and thy most magnificent titles of glory in establishments worthy of Providence—institutions which proclaim to us from edifice to edifice what good can be accomplished in a great state by the fruitful alliance of religion with humanity. * * * * * Already, methinks, I hear the benedictions of posterity breathed around thy statues; and soon shall the enthusiasm of thy panegyrist become the sentiment of the public mind. Continue then, by thy intercession in heaven, to shed happiness on the people who were so dear to thee during life. Prove thyself still, after thy death, the guardian angel of Providence. Protect, from the height of thy eternal abode, the establishments thou hast formed, and which are so necessary in an empire where public spirit is so rare. Raise to thyself, by thy influence with the Omnipotent, successors in whom thou shalt revive. Enkindle in our souls a spark of that charity that burned so intensely in thine own. Lend to us that voice that could pierce the callous heart of the rich man, and soften it into pity—that could make the groans of abandoned misery re-echo in the palaces of kings—that could rally round thee every feeling and compassionate heart, and render Providence visible in action throughout the entire extent of France, to the end that having accomplished, after thy example, each according to his state, the measure of good in our power to perform, we may be called to share its recompense with thee in the kingdom of everlasting glory, and the enjoyment of the God of charity. Amen."

Have we exaggerated the merits of this oration? Have we done ill in devoting so much space to the finest picture of one of the greatest of men? No! It is good to think of this man—good to present him often to the public mind—good to grave his existence on our memory as a healing, a resource, and an encouragement—good, especially in our land and in our times. For to Ireland the name of St. Vincent should be dear as a son's—beloved as an apostle's. In his lifetime the clash of the Cromwellian troopers' swords, and the shrieks of maids and matrons, ringing from the cross-foot across the sea, caught his watchful ear and aroused his active sympathy. The "City of the Slaughter" was among the earliest of his foreign missions. That is more than two hundred years ago; and his spirit lives amongst us yet, glorious and beneficent. "Providence is active," indeed, through the holy "Sisters," ministering by the pestilential deathbeds of this generation, and rearing in virtue the poor young mothers of the next, through the zealous missionaries keeping alive that faith and charity among our rural population, which, as persecution could not scare, famine, fever, and beggary—reigning furies of the time—have failed to crush out, and performing wonders, the story of which reads like a chapter from De Monthston, or a lecture from Tertullian; through that singular and significant "society," binding in holy brotherhood the young men of our great middle class, for purposes in which angels might take part, and furnishing to our trades-people that succour which is the most judicious and most effective, because it is the most loving of any—a spirit so old, that it is linked with some of the sweetest memories of Ireland's past, so active, that it is among the greatest consolations of her present, and so fruitful that it is connected with the fairest and most rational hopes for her future. On another account, also, notice of his life is beneficial. At a time like this, when signs are rife abroad and at home, in the street and by the hearth, in the field and in the market, which to the humble reader, are not hieroglyphics, it is good to be reminded in a way so striking, that our holy religion is in truth a nation's best guardian, a state's strongest safe-guard, and a citizen's wisest and most effectual teacher. Oh! that God would fructify and multiply among us those individual qualities and citizen virtues, which only can light our path and safely direct our course, and of which St. VINCENT DE PAUL was, in one class at least, the loftiest and most perfect exemplar. Reflection on his life and on the other heroes of Catholic charity, might aid many of our political economists in solving the terrible problems which now perplex our Irish rulers. It might turn their attention to the cheap and simple management by which charity is developed and distributed for the benefit of the poor in Catholic countries. Our laws are all based on the essentially erroneous supposition that Ireland is like England. A Protestant church establishment, and an absentee Protestant aristocracy give a colour to the delusion. But, perhaps, legislative wisdom may at length discover that it would be better for all the subjects of Queen Victoria, if it were assumed that Ireland is not like England; that the great majority of the Irish are Catholic—too fervent Catholics, if we believe our enemies—and that a church which has produced social benefactors like St. Vincent of Paul might ever, in the eye of the mere lawgiver, be entitled to more consideration than phantom establishments and absentee aristocracies, who abdicate the noblest right of property—the rights of supporting and sympathizing with the poor. Is there a chapel in your poor-houses, where the poor Catholic may forget his sorrows in the presence of his God? No, because the English poor do not believe the Real Presence.

Sacred Irish Poetry.

THE original Irish of the following poem, by John Murphy, is the property of Mr. John Daly, Assistant Secretary of the Celtic Society. The author was born in the year 1700, at Rathoineach, parish of Whitechurch, county of Cork. At the early age of 26, he had finished a copy of Dr. Keating's History of Ireland; and if we can judge from the large folio and other volumes in his handwriting, in possession of Mr. Daly, his life must have been devoted exclusively to the literature of his country. Some of the pieces are original, but far the greater portion are transcripts on all subjects interesting to the Irishmen of his time, especially several pieces on the sufferings of Ireland in 1641 and 1689, from contemporary poets, the contention of the bards which worked the genius of Irish poetry and prognosticity at the commencement of the seventeenth century, and a very miscellaneous and interesting collection of the ancient religious and bardic history of Ireland:

Naomhtha ceáirda mhíe Mhíre.

Holy are the Works of Mary's Blessed Son.
 Holy are His Mercies unto every one.
 Holy is the Sun that lighteth Heaven.
 Holy is the Weather, morn and even.
 Holy is the Wind, that woos the flowers.
 Holy are the gentle April Showers.

The Monk of Olmutz.

A GERMAN LEGEND.

PREVIOUS to the period of Luther's preaching his mis-called Reformation, monasteries were to be seen at the declivity of all the hills in Germany. They were large buildings of simple and unassuming aspect, with their tapering steeples arising in the midst of thick woods, around which fluttered the wild pigeons. These establishments were inhabited by men, whose whole thoughts were devoted to heavenly contemplation.

At the monastery of Olmutz resided one, who was revered by the whole country for his piety and learning. He was a simple man, as all those men who have studied profoundly generally are—for science is like the sea, the more you advance in it the more extended the horizon becomes, and the more acutely one feels their own nothingness. Brother Alfus having wrinkled his brow and bleached his locks in the search after useless knowledge, called to his aid the faith of the little children, and, devoting his life to prayer as an anchor of mercy, he had found a soothing resting-place from the tempestuous waves of vain enquiry in fervent love and celestial hope. Notwithstanding all this, a violent squall would at times agitate the holy navigator. Occasionally, the temptation of a strong and exalted intellect would return, and reason would interrogate faith with human pride. Then brother Alfus would become sad, heavy clouds would pass over his interior sunshine, and his heart would become cold. Wandering about the country, he would seat himself on the moss-covered rocks, stop under the foaming torrents, walk amidst the murmurs of the forest, but vainly did he interrogate nature, to all his questions the mountains, the waves, and the leaves replied to him but in one mighty word—God! Brother Alfus escaped victorious from many of these fearful struggles; each time he felt more strengthened in his faith, for temptation is the gymnasium of the conscience—when it breaks not, it more strongly fortifies. But for some time a poignant disquietude had taken possession of the poor brother. He had often observed that all that was beautiful in nature lost its charm by usage, that the eye became fatigued in looking upon the most exquisite landscape, that the ear wearied of the sweetest voice, and he asked himself how he could find even in heaven the ingredients of eternal joy. What would become of the fickleness of our being in the midst of an endless magnificence? Eternity!—what a word for a creature who knew no other law than that of variety and change. Oh, my God! no more of the past nor of the future—no by-gone recollections, no future hopes! Eternity! eternity! Oh! word of mighty import, which unlocks the fountain of the sinner's tears, what sensation dost thou create in the realms of celestial joy? Thus thought brother Alfus; and his uncertainty with regard to the future became greater.

One morning, arising before the accustomed hour of the brothers, he left the monastery and betook himself to the valley beneath. The landscape, still moist with dew, was joyously opening its bright blossoms to the first rays of the rising sun. Alfus slowly followed the umbrageous pathway of the hill; the birds had just arisen, and fluttered in the hawthorn-tree, shaking upon his bald head the glittering dewdrops, and the butterflies, but half aroused from their repose, were carelessly moving towards the sun to dry their dewy wings. Alfus stopped and looked around the country which lay quietly reposing before him. He recalled to mind how surpassingly beautiful this scene had appeared to him the first time he beheld it, and with what intoxicating delight he had thought of finishing his days in such an elysium. To him, the dried up child of a sombre city, with its blackened walls and gloomy streets, these flowers, these trees, and the pure and balmy air, were thrilling novelties; and, during the sweet year that had been the period of his noviciate, short, delightful walks had he taken in the valley! What charming discoveries! The murmur of the rivulet amidst the glades inhabited by the nightingales, with the eglantine and the blushing rose, and the wild strawberry of the woods; oh! what excess of felicity to see all these things for the first time—what joy to ramble by unknown paths that lead to flowery arbours, and to encounter at each step a spring, from whence one never drank before, a mossy bed that one has never before trodden upon! But, alas! these pleasures endure but for a short time; as soon as you have traversed all the varied pathways of the forest, as soon as you have heard the thrilling melody of the feathery choristers, as soon as you have culled the sweets from off the flowery stems, adieu then to the beauties of the country and all its varied harmony; custom draws a veil between you and creation, which blinds your perceptive faculties and deafens your ear to the music of nature. Alas! brother Alfus was one of these, and might be likened unto a man who had drank so deeply of the most intoxicating liquors, that he no longer felt their power, he now looked with indifference on the spectacle which was formerly so ravishing to his eyes. What celestial beauties could then occupy a soul for eternity, when the works of God upon the earth could charm but for an instant? In proposing this question to himself, Alfus was in the very heart of the valley; with his head sunk upon his breast and his arms lying listlessly by his side he still walked on—seeing nothing, clearing the rivulets, the woods, and the hills; already the steeple of the monastery had disappeared—Olmutz was immersed in fog, with its churches and its fortifications; the mountains themselves appeared no longer but as a cloud upon the distant horizon. On a sudden the monk stopped—he was at the entrance of a vast forest, which presented itself to his view like an ocean of verdure, a thousand charming sounds hummed around the spot and an odoriferous breeze sighed amongst the foliage.

After having cast his astonished gaze into the faint obscurity of the wood, Alfus hesitatingly entered, as if he were afraid of committing an act that had been forbidden; but scarcely had he advanced ere the forest became grander and more magnificent—the trees bending with their flowery foliage, which shed an inconceivable perfume around. This perfume was unlike all other earthly odours, and was a sort of moral emanation which embalmed the soul, and was both fortifying and delicious, like the sensation one feels upon witnessing a high and mighty action. Alfus soon heard a harmony which filled the whole forest with its music; he still advanced, and perceived at a distance a dazzling splendour of marvellous light. What struck him above all with astonishment was that the perfume, the music, and the light, were conveyed to him through the same sense, and communicated themselves to him by a single perception, as if he had ceased to have distinct senses, and as if nothing remained to him but his soul. He soon arrived near to the light, and seated himself by it, the better to enjoy its wonders, when on a sudden a voice was heard, but such a voice—the oar gently dipping in the calm lake—the breeze softly whispering through the willow foliage—or the sigh of the sleeping infant on its mother's breast, could convey no idea of its entrancing sweetness. All that the water, the earth, and the air can convey of enchanting murmurs—all that language and human music can attain of celestial seductions, were concentrated in that voice. It was not a song, and yet one would say it was a strain of melody—it was not a language, and yet the voice spoke. Science, poetry, wisdom, all was in that voice. Like a celestial sigh, it raised the soul, and made it wander into an unexplored region. On hearing it, one knew all and felt all, and the world of thoughts which it embraced was infinite, and the voice though still the same was ever varying—such a voice as one could listen to for ages, and in the end find it as entrancing as it had at first appeared. The longer Alfus listened to it, the more he felt his interior joy increasing. He appeared to discover in it at each instant some ineffable mystery. At length the light which illuminated the forest disappeared, a lingering sound resounded through the trees, and the voice was hushed.

Alfus continued for some time immoveable, as if he had been aroused from an enchanted sleep. At first he looked around him with a stupified air, then wishing to rise, in order to retrace his road, he found his feet benumbed, and his limbs had lost their wonted agility. He retraced with difficulty the path by which he had entered the forest, and soon found himself out of the wood. He then sought the road to the monastery, and after some trouble recognized it; he hastened his footsteps, for the night was fast advancing, but his surprise augmented with every step he took, for the whole face of the country appeared to have changed since he had left the monastery. There, where he had seen the tender plant, arose as if by magic the towering oak; he sought upon the river for a little wooden bridge, interspersed with wild briars, which he was accustomed to cross, but it was no longer there, and in its place arose a solid stone arch. In passing near a pond, some women who were drying clothes upon the flowery elder trees, interrupted their occupations to look at the monk as he passed, saying to each other, "There is an old man who wears the habit of the Monks of Olmutz, but we know all the brothers, and have never seen this one amongst them." "These women are mad," said Alfus, and he passed onwards. He however began to feel a little uneasy, when the steeple of the monastery showed itself through the trees. He hurried on, clambered up the little path, crossed the meadow, and advanced towards the threshold, but to his indescribable amazement the door was no longer in its accustomed place. Alfus raised his eyes and was transfixed with surprise. The Monastery of Olmutz had changed its whole exterior; the entrance was considerably larger, and the building had increased almost beyond his power of recognition. A plantation which he himself had planted a few days before, beside the chapel, now covered the sacred asylum with its abundant foliage. The monk bewildered and amazed, directed his steps towards the new entrance and gently rang the bell; but it was no longer the silvery-toned bell, the sound of which he knew so well. A young brother opened the door.

"What is the matter?" demanded Alfus. "Why is not Antoine the porter of the monastery?"

"I do not know Antoine," replied the brother.

Alfus raised his hand to his brow with terror. "Have I become mad," said he. "Is not this the Monastery of Olmutz which I left this morning?"

The young monk gazed at him with astonishment and replied, "I am now five years porter to the monastery, and I know you not."

Alfus gazed around him with a wild and searching gaze; several monks were passing to and fro the cloisters; he called them, but they replied not to the names he pronounced; he ran to them to recognize their features, but they were all strangers to him. "Here is some miracle of God," he cried, "In the name of heaven, my brothers, look at me, and say if none amongst you have ever seen me before? Is there nobody present who knows Brother Alfus?"

All looked upon him with astonishment.

"Alfus," at length replied the oldest amongst them.

"Yes, there was in former times at Olmutz a monk of that name. I have heard my ancestors speak of him. He was a man learned and thoughtful, with a great love of solitude. One day he descended into the valley, and they saw him disappear in the distance behind the woods. They vainly waited for his return, but they never could learn what had become of Brother Alfus. This occurred about a hundred years ago."

At these words Alfus uttered a loud cry, for now he understood all. Throwing himself on his knees on the ground, and joining his hands fervently together, "Oh! my God," said he, "you wished to prove to me my folly, in comparing the joys of earth with those of heaven. A whole century has glided by me like a single day in listening to Thy voice. I now understand the meaning of paradise and its eternal joys. Accept now the offering of my fervent heart, my merciful God, and pardon your unworthy servant."

After having spoken these words, Brother Alfus extended his arms, and raising his eyes with a beatified expression towards that celestial paradise which was opened to his view, softly whispered the holy name of Jesus, and expired.

Reminiscences of the Irish Mission.

BY A RETIRED PRIEST.

NO. V.

THE M'QUILLANS—A FAMILY COUNCIL—THEY RESOLVE TO LEAVE THEIR FARM—MURTAGH DEVLIN VISITS THEM, AND PROPOSES TO MAKE CATHRINE HIS WIFE—A REFUSAL AND A PROPHECY—A WHISKEY DANCE AND THE PRIEST OF THE PARISH—PAYMENT FOR A COAT REFUSED—A JOURNEY.

THE Widow M'Quillan's house was a house of sorrow on the day that the Sullivans left it. Cathrine was scarcely more deeply affected than her mother, and, though each of them strove to hide her emotions, they had mutually surprised each other in the act of weeping several times during the day. The two younger girls, who loved their sister dearly, shed tears on account of her distress. When James M'Quillan, the widow's only son, came to his dinner from the fields, in which he had been assisting the labourers at some out-door work, he was astonished to find the whole family in tears, and grieved to observe that they scarcely tasted the food which was placed before them. The exciting scenes through which they had passed had enabled them to put an unnatural restraint upon their feelings, but now the reaction had set in and, though usually thoughtless and buoyant, the young man found himself infected by the prevailing despondency. He was yet but a boy, being younger than his sister Cathrine, but older than the other two girls. He thought it would be an unmanly act to yield to these emotions, and he therefore made a desperate effort to eat his dinner. But nature was not to be forced; his appetite, like a false friend, deserted him in his utmost need, and even his throat had joined so deeply in the conspiracy that he was in imminent danger of being choked by every morsel he attempted to swallow. At last the tears burst from his eyes, and rising and throwing his arms round his sister, he kissed her forehead. "Cathrine, dear," said he, "the best and dearest of sisters, I cannot look at you in this sorrow; but don't be afflicted, darling, and we'll all be happy yet. Mother (he continued), I wish you would consent to our selling our farm and going to live in Father John's parish, for we can never be happy here again; and, besides, that villain Devlin will surely undermine us, and the landlord will be against us on account of our religion." "My dear children," she replied, "I have lived a long time happily here, but within the last few years it has pleased the Almighty to afflict me with many sorrows. I know that He chastiseth us in mercy and not in anger, and His will be done. Since that time your father has died, leaving me with a young family, and our best neighbours and kindest friends have either died or left the country. But, blessed be God, He has left me good and virtuous children, and wherever they choose to go I shall go with them." "God bless you," said the young man, going to her and embracing her, "and we must have been bad indeed if we had not profited by the love and piety of such a mother. I promised to visit Father John during the summer, and I'll be ready the day after to-morrow. Besides I was very sorry that I was from home when John Sullivan and his father went away, and I want to see them, which I can do by calling at the town of —, from which they are to sail, and which is upon my way. I would not be astonished," he added, after a pause, "if, when the Sullivans hear this, they would change their minds about America, and settle along with us in Father John's parish." As he said this he looked towards his sister, but, although her tearful countenance was lighted up with a smile of gratitude, there was no hope in it. All places on earth were alike to her now—her only hope was in heaven. She even opposed the design of selling their farm, which, although concealed under other pretexts, she felt to be intended for her sake alone. As she expressed her grateful thanks for their kind desire to alleviate her distress, a sad smile of resignation, more painful to the beholder than the loudest burst of sorrow, played upon her beautiful but pale features. Her mother saw that her heart was breaking; she folded her to her breast, and besought God to spare to her this dear child, whom she loved better than her own life. James M'Quillan determined to leave no means untried to save her and to restore her to happiness, and, in spite of all her remonstrances, he set out on the morning of the next day but one, more for the purpose of seeing the Sullivans than of visiting Father John.

About the middle of that same day Murtagh Devlin, dressed in his holiday attire, was seen approaching the widow M'Quillan's house. Cathrine immediately left the kitchen, accompanied by the youngest of her sisters. "Good day to you, Mrs. M'Quillan," said Murtagh, entering, "I hope you are all well?" "Quite well, thank God for all his mercies." "And how are you, Mary," he continued, addressing the second of her daughters. The young girl, knowing that he had got the Sullivan's farm and looking upon him as the chief cause of her sister's sufferings, replied with more zeal than discretion, that she "wondered how he had the impudence to ask." Her mother, however, reproved her sharply, and this appearing to Murtagh a favourable symptom, he determined forthwith to explain the objects of his visit. He, therefore, requested to speak with Mrs. Sullivan alone, and Mary, who had waited on purpose to have an opportunity of "telling him her mind," as she expressed it, was obliged to take her departure and join her sisters, to whom she related the exploit which she had already performed.

"Mrs. M'Quillan," said Murtagh, "it is a good while since I was in this house, an' troth I gist came to make up friends, for I cannot think of remainin' on bad terms with sich near neighbours." "Deed, Mr. Devlin," she replied, "there is not one in this house who wishes to be at enmity with you or with any Christian." "Thank you kindly for that," said Murtagh, taking the widow's hand and shaking it warmly, "and maybe you wud call James an' let us make up that little quarrel at once. Its myself that's sorry for goin' to the landlord an' tellin' him about it, but, plase God, I'll go to the office the morrow, an' tell him that I was more to blame than James." "I'm very sorry, Mr. Devlin, that he has taken one of the horses and rode from home on a little business." "I'm in no hurry," said Murtagh, "an' I can wait until he comes back, for troth I cannot sleep at night since this quarrel came between us." "He will not be back," she answered, "in time for you to see him to-day, but, as soon as he returns, I'll tell him that you have been here and make him call over to see you himself."

Murtagh knew full well that the young man had gone from home, for he had seen him riding away in the morning, and had even followed and watched him for a considerable distance; indeed he would not have ventured to have gone to the house if James had been at home, and as he felt all the paltry curiosity which belong to mean and little minds, to discover where he had gone and the object of his journey, he determined to employ his miserable cunning to make the discovery. This was one of the objects of his present visit, but by no means the chief one. The other shall presently appear. The widow's hesitating answers, and her unusual reluctance to tell where her son had gone, convinced Murtagh that there was some secret connected with it, which he resolved to penetrate. Mrs. M'Quillan on her part, although entertaining the utmost horror for this man on account of his apostacy from his faith, yet was afraid to offend him, knowing his vindictive character and his influence with the landlord. Murtagh resumed the dialogue—

"I'll not think of troublin' James to come to me, for I wish to show him that I'll be the first to make friends, so I'll jist call back in the evenin', or in the mornin', if that will do better."

"James has gone," said Mrs. M'Quillan, "to visit a friend, and will not return for a few days."

"Ah, ha!" thought Murtagh, "I have you now. Well," he continued aloud, "I declare I'm very sorry for the departure of the poor Sullivans, and I often thought if James had been at home he would have prevailed upon them to remain. Troth an' if he's gone to see them afore they lave the country, and to try and bring them back, its kind of him an' I respect him for it. I'll engage, now, they're the friends he has gone to see?"

He was perfectly well aware that Mrs. M'Quillan would not tell a lie, and he was, therefore, sure that if her son had followed the Sullivans she would either tell him the truth or remain silent. But, as James had told the family that Father John was the friend whom he went to visit, and whose advice he wished to obtain with regard to their removal to that part of the country, she unhesitatingly answered that the Sullivans were not the friends whom he had gone to see. This did not satisfy Murtagh's curiosity, but it removed certain misgivings which had occurred to him. The suspicion flashed across his mind that James M'Quillan had gone to bring back John Sullivan for the purpose of giving him his sister in marriage. On this point he was now reassured, and he became once more convinced that Mrs. M'Quillan would not be disinclined to obtain a rich husband for her daughter. He also hoped that if he could enlist the mother on his side, the reluctance of the daughter would be easily overcome, since the departure of John Sullivan for America rendered all prospect of a union with him impossible. He now therefore, not without very visible embarrassment, approached the main object of his visit.

"How is Cathrine?" said he, "its an age since I laid my eyes on her."

"Indeed," said she, "Cathrine is but poorly. She has latterly gone through a great deal of fatigue and suffering, and her health has given way; but, please God, she will soon be better."

"I never saw a girl," said Murtagh, "for whom I had the feeling I have for Cathrine. I loved her since she was a child, and she may have tould you that I once wanted her to become my wife. She then, I believe, refused, because she considered herself engaged to John Sullivan; he is gone, and that engagement is of course at an end. Mrs. M'Quillan, I am a rich man—a great deal richer than you suppose; I am more wealthy than Doctor — (naming the young apostate), who is about to be married to one of the landlord's daughters, and I am sure that I might have one of them for the asking. I do'n't wish to ask Cathrine to marry immediately, if she does not wish to do so; I only ask you to use your influence to make your daughter promise that whenever she does marry she will become the wife of a man who will enrich her, and you, and the whole family."

The widow listened patiently until he had ended, and then said.

"Mr. Devlin, I feel very much obliged to you for the good opinion you entertain of my daughter, but I must tell you, candidly, that I could not prevail upon her to marry any person that was not of her own religion. Besides, Cathrine has but a very small fortune, which is not at all equal to what you have a right to expect."

"I dont want fortune," said he, "I have plenty myself, and as for religion—do you think I am a Protestant? No more than you are: I have made fools of the squire and parson to serve my own purposes; and, if Cathrine consents to become my wife, I'll go back to the holy Catholic church, the truth of which I have never doubted in my heart, no more than she has herself."

"Mr. Devlin," said she, "I feel that it would be unpardonable in me to deceive you in so important a matter, and, therefore, however painful the disappointment may be, I feel myself compelled to tell you that she will never be your wife. I would call her, to assure you of this herself, but she is in such a delicate state of health, that she could not bear the shock of such an interview."

"Oh you may spare yourself that trouble," said Murtagh, "for I'm sure she has been listening to every word that has passed between us."

"You quite mistake my daughter," she answered, "and that observation alone would prove that you are unworthy to be her husband, no matter how rich you may be. She would not be guilty of the meanness you attribute to her for ten times your wealth."

"Widow," he said, and his harsh features assumed a look of malice and hatred which Satan himself might envy, "you may keep your lady-daughter; but listen to me—the landlord has already promised to send your young rascal of a son off the estate on account of the way he trated me for my convarision from the religion of the baste, and I fear he may find it necessary to send you all to beg along with him. Kate will scarcely retain her beauty when she is going barefooted through the gutters, with a torn gown and a bag upon her back."

He left the house; and, as soon as he was gone, Mrs. M'Quillan burst into tears. The daughters, who saw him hurrying away at a rapid pace, quickly rejoined her, and enquired what he had done to distress her. She did not tell them of his proposal for Cathrine, which she knew would be a fresh source of affliction to her, but she repeated his threats of punishing the whole family on account of the insults which James had offered him.

When Devlin had first asked Cathrine M'Quillan to become his wife, she had thought it her duty to acquaint her mother and brother with the circumstance. They were both almost as indignant as she was herself. Murtagh Devlin was a great coward, and, though bigger and older than young M'Quillan, was mortally afraid of him. Rows were, at this period, unfortunately very common in fairs and in public-houses, and whenever one of these commenced, James singled out Murtagh to give him a drubbing. This was done more out of sport and thoughtlessness than from any ill feeling, which he really did not entertain towards him. Shortly after James had heard from his sister of Murtagh's proposal to her, he happened to meet him at a "punch dance"—that is a place where each person paid a certain amount for admission, in return for which he was supplied with a quantity of whiskey. Such meetings were always got up by the proprietor of some public-house for the purpose of selling his whiskey; they led to drunkenness, quarrels, and immorality, and were always denounced by the priests as the worst nuisances of the parish. Mrs. M'Quillan strongly disapproved of her son going to any place of the kind; and he would not have disobeyed her on the occasion to which we have referred, except for the purpose of meeting Murtagh, who was never absent from such gatherings. The dance went on, and the punch went round very merrily, when the priest of the parish in which they were assembled suddenly appeared amongst them. A ghost would not have caused a greater panic; every one, not even excepting the blind piper, made for the door—candles were extinguished—tables and forms upset—the very counter of the whiskey-shop was carried away by the fugitives—and broken glass, delf, and crockery were scattered everywhere. The priest was soon the sole occupant of the dancing-room and of the house, with the exception of those who lived there. James M'Quillan would have been as much afraid of the priest as any person present, but he was in a strange parish and had some hopes of not being recognised; he had never lost sight of Murtagh during the evening, and the moment the confusion commenced he darted towards him. Murtagh, who on his part had been taught by experience the kind attention which James would be likely to pay him, when an occasion like the present presented itself, had made up his mind to escape on the first appearance of disturbance. The moment therefore that he saw the priest, he bounded towards the door; but his flight was retarded for a moment by other fugitives. This enabled James to seize him by one skirt of his coat, which he fairly plucked off. Murtagh made his escape without waiting for the remnant of his garment, and, when James and a young man who accompanied him got a short distance from the house in which the dance had taken place, they were obliged to sit down on the roadside to give full vent to their laughter. Murtagh, who was engaged in various kinds of business, was a frequent visitor at the sea-port town from which the Sullivans had hoped to have obtained a passage for America. Here he became acquainted with a gentleman who dealt in old clothes, from whom he used to provide himself with cheap and fashionable dress—for he was both vain and a miser. These were commonly called "hand-me-downs," or "wall-flowers," and were held in the utmost contempt by the honest and independent yeomanry of the neighbourhood. Murtagh and the Bible-reader were the only persons who affected finery of this kind, and to spoil one of their second-hand coats was looked upon as an act of patriotism. This feeling it was which caused the excessive merriment of the young men on the present occasion. Besides, although eternally tattling to the landlord, it was well-known that they would not tell him anything which would lead to the disclosure of their having attended a "whiskey-dance," for they pretended to be so holy as to shudder at the very mention of a place of the kind.

On the day after the dance, Murtagh went to Mrs. M'Quillan's house at about twelve o'clock. Having first reconnoitred the premises, he asked if James were within? He was told that he was not. He then entered and sat down.

"I suppose," said he to Mrs. M'Quillan, "James told you we met at the dance, last night."

She answered, with unfeigned surprise, that she was quite astonished at what she heard, as she had been under the impression that her son had not been out of the house during the previous night.

"Oh! then he was," said he, "an' I suppose he did not tell you, neither, about his tearin' the skirt off a new coat af mine, worth two guineas; but I wint to the landlord this mornin', an' he bid me tell both him an' you that if he didnt pay me for my coat afore a week, you might all pack up an' lave the farm."

"Wait, Murtagh," cried James, who had just entered the house, and accidentally overheard part of the discourse, "and I'll pay you now." Murtagh did not wait to reply, but darted out of the house. James M'Quillan pursued him for more than half a mile, to the infinite amusement of a large number of spectators. He did not catch him, for fear gave him wings; but Devlin, who like all cowards, was proud of boasting of his physical prowess, was publicly disgraced, and conceived, in consequence, from this moment a mortal hatred for the young man. He also knew that his story of having told the circumstances to the landlord was known to be false, and the consciousness of having for the hundredth time been detected in a gross lie, added to the malevolence of his feelings.

When he left Mrs. M'Quillan's house, he hurried home at a rapid pace, and enquired, as soon as he entered, if the "Bible-reader" had been there. He was answered in the affirmative, and that he had left word that he would be back in an hour. "Very well," said Murtagh, "have the dinner ready by that time, and let two horses be prepared, for I am obliged to set off to the town on urgent business." He then went over to the landlord's office, where he saw the agent. Having first told innumerable lies against the M'Quillans, and done all he could to ruin them—without effect however, for the agent, although like his master a bigot, had a great respect for this family—he next informed him that his friend the "Bible-reader" was going to Ballymouray—which was near the sea-port town already mentioned—for the purpose of preaching the Gospel to the benighted Papists in that county, and that he designed to accompany him. These benighted Papists lived upon a small estate which his landlord possessed in that part of the country. The agent highly applauded Murtagh's pious intentions, and said he would not forget to commend him for it to his landlord.

In a few hours, Murtagh and the "Bible-reader" were riding in hot haste over the same road which James M'Quillan had passed in the morning. But with what different intentions?

"I'll humble the pride of the M'Quillans," cried Murtagh, as he struck his jaded horse furiously. "I'll see them begging at my door for a handful of meal; and if Cathrine wont be my wife, why then by — I'll make her my —"

The night was beautiful. The queen of the stars had led forth her bright armies, and shone down calmly and peaceably upon the reeking steeds, and upon the travellers, without being able to assuage the angry passions with which their breasts were agitated. It was but

"Moonlight on a troubled sea, Brightening the storm it could not calm."

THE
Life and Death of Oliver Plunkett,
 PRIMATE OF IRELAND.

PART III.

DR. PLUNKETT was a man of the most profound sagacity; and he knew that the demon of bigotry and persecution, which had been exorcised for a brief space would re-appear upon the slightest provocation. He combined the most consummate prudence with the most lofty heroism; and, whilst he was perfectly ready to die for the faith, whenever the occasion should demand this sacrifice from him, he firmly believed that at the period of which we are writing, nothing but the quiet and unostentatious discharge of their duties on the part of the clergy, and their almost total disavowal from temporal concerns, could repair the present evils of the church, or save her from the future dangers which he saw impending over her. But not even death itself could force him to surrender one atom of his country's nationality, or the least of the traditional glories of her Church, for in the cause of God and of Ireland he was zealous as an apostle, and as brave as a predestined martyr of her faith.

When his rights were disputed by Dr. Talbot, in the synod, in 1670, he maintained, from the practice of former ages and the diplomas of the Roman pontiffs, that the primacy always belonged, of right, to the successors of St. Patrick, in the see of Armagh. But, that the synod might not be disturbed nor its time wasted, he offered to submit the dispute to the decision of the assembled prelates. This Talbot refused, and they both sent their reasons to the holy see, and appealed to it for a final decision. After duly considering them, the secretary of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide, Baldescus, archbishop of Cæsarea, afterwards Cardinal Colonna, pronounced "L'Armacano sta a Cavallo,"* that the reasons of Armagh prevailed. Shortly afterwards the Congregation, with the approbation of the Roman Pontiff, ordered these words to be inserted in the office of St. Patrick:—"Armacanam sedem Romani Pontificis autoritate totius insule principem Metropolim constituit" (stus Patricius).†

It was in consequence of this dispute that Dr. Plunkett published, in octavo, in 1672, his "Jus Primatiale;" or, the antient rights and prehemineny of the see of Armagh above all the other archbishopricks of the kingdom." Dr. Talbot wrote a letter, dated the 24th of May, 1672, to Peter Creagh, then the agent of the Irish clergy at Rome—afterwards bishop of Cork, whence he was translated to the archbishopric of Dublin—to obtain for him the title of Primate of all Ireland. The original of this letter Dr. M'Mahon (Jus. Prim. Armac., p. 22,) suspects to be still preserved in the archives of St. Isidore's, at Rome. From it we learn that Talbot had already written his book in reply to Dr. Plunkett, for he boasts (No. 30) "That he had made the most illustrious Oliver Armagh ridiculous, that he had most clearly proved the primacy of Dublin, and that Doctor Goolding would shortly send the preface to Creagh." This book was not, however, published until 1674, and it is stated that even then it appeared without the knowledge of the author. Its title is, "Primatus Dubliniensis, vel summa rationum quibus innititur ecclesia Dubliniensis in possessione et prosecutione sui juris et primatum Hibernie." Insulis (Lisle), 1674. It is a small duodecimo.

Both the letter and the book are written in a lively style, and the author ridicules, with as little justice as mercy, everything which seemed to stand in the way of his claim to the primacy. He calls the Pallium of St. Patrick, an "individuum vagum ex lana caprina contextum"—a miserable affair, "ex ideis platoniciis consensendum." He disparages the "Four Masters," Keating, Colgan, and even accuses the secretary of the Propaganda, Dionysius Mazarius, with having deceived the Popes, Innocent X. and Clement IX., by inducing them to address Edmund O'Reilly and Oliver Plunkett as Primates of Ireland. The plan, he says (p. 54), which appeared to many persons the best and most convenient for ending the dispute, was to give the honorary title of Primate to the archbishops of Armagh, whilst the archbishops of Dublin should enjoy both the name and the authority.

Long afterwards, in 1728, Hugh M'Mahon, archbishop of Armagh, published, in a small quarto volume, the most able and learned work that has been ever written on the Irish primacy. This book is entitled "Jus primatiale Armacanum in omnes archiepiscopos, episcopos et universum clerum totius regni Hibernie, apertum per H. A. M. T. H. P.;" to which he annexed another treatise, called "Prosecutio ejusdem argumenti contra anonimum," "which anonymous," says Ware (Writers, 195), "was a Jesuit of Clonmel, one John Hennessy." Dr. M'Mahon says (ad Lectorem, p. 1), that he was a little boy at the time of the contest for precedence, which took place in 1670, between the archbishops of Dublin and Armagh, and that he remembered it. He was ten years old at the time, for he was born in 1660. He says that he was for a long time familiar with Plunkett's book on this subject, but that he had great trouble in finding Talbot's. He at length, however, procured a copy, and wrote his own splendid work, which is in a great measure a reply to Talbot, and published it in the sixty-eighth year of his age. In this work he ably vindicates Keating and the "Four Masters" (p. 178), and passes a just and glowing eulogium (pp. 99-100) on the learning, the zeal, and the genius of Colgan. This love of our ancient annalists was derived from his illustrious predecessor, Oliver Plunkett, who fully appreciated the difficulties against which they had to contend, and deeply honoured them for the brief but truthful and precious records of our country's history which they have transmitted to us. He loved all who loved them and who laboured like them in the vast field of Irish history, and his dearest wish would have been gratified, if an O'Donovan had arisen in his time to fill up and to breathe life into the skeleton which they left behind them.

* Literally, that Armagh was on horseback.

† See Dr. Hugh M'Mahon's, "Jus Primatiale Armacanum," pp. 20, 21.

In the year 1670, Dr. Plunkett received an appeal from a decision of the archbishop of Dublin; held his court in that city, and pronounced a decision which was acquiesced in by all parties (M'Mahon's Jus. p. 17).

The dispute of these two holy bishops, Plunkett and Talbot, though warm, led to no personal animosities. It was not ambition, but a deep sense of duty by which each of them considered that he was bound to preserve intact the rights of his see, that induced them to enter upon this contest. And if there was anything inconsiderately said by either, the language of St. Augustin, concerning the altercation between the holy martyrs, Stephen and Cyprian, may be applied to them—that the peace of Christ prevailed in their hearts, so that no crime of schism took place between them, and that they washed out by their blood whatever imperfections they were guilty of; for although the archbishop of Dublin was not hanged, he was imprisoned for the faith in Newgate, where he died in 1680, after having endured a most cruel imprisonment of two years. All parties admired the integrity and prudence of the Primate; they listened respectfully to his merciful counsels with regard to the “remonstrance,” and his exhortations to be united; and thus a matter which threatened to produce almost a schism, ceased in a short time to be even mentioned in the Irish Church.

In the year 1671, which was the next after that in which the convocation had been held in Dublin, Dr. Plunkett, was delegated by commissorial letters from the Holy See, to decide on a dispute which had been carried on with great animosity between the Dominicans and Franciscans. The question related to the respective rights of the two orders, to receive the alms of the faithful in the dioceses of Armagh, Down, Dromore, and Clogher. Each of the orders had been settled in the province before the Cromwellian persecutions, and all the houses belonging to each were destroyed during those lamentable times. Whether any of the Franciscans who had resided in these places escaped death or exile does not appear; but De Burgo tells us, in the place referred to at the foot of the page, that not one Dominican belonging to the province of Ulster was left in Ireland. The Franciscans returned very soon after the Restoration, whereas the Dominicans did not return to that part of Ireland until a considerably later period. In 1671, however, as we learn from the Primate's letter, they had re-established three houses in Ulster—one in Clogher, one in Down, and one in Armagh. The Franciscans insisted, that in consequence of the priority of their return, they alone had a right to seek or receive the alms of the faithful in Armagh, Down, Dromore, and Clogher; they vehemently resisted the attempts of the Dominicans to re-establish themselves in these places, and induced several of the laity to take part with them, to the no small scandal of religion. The Primate taking along with him Patrick Plunket, bishop of Meath, Oliver Dease, vicar-general of the same diocese, and Thomas Fitzsimons, vicar-general of Kilmore, visited, as he himself says, with great labour and at great expense, each of the dioceses in which the disputes existed, and examined on the spot the allegations of both parties. Having thus thoroughly investigated the matter, he determined to put an end to the scandal at once, and he accordingly issued his definitive sentence in favour of the Dominicans, dated Dundalk, 11th of October, 1674,* and commanded the Franciscans to submit to it under pain of suspension, to be incurred without further process or appeal. When we remember his scanty revenue, which, as we shall see hereafter, never exceeded sixty pounds per annum—the difficulty of travelling in those times—and that he took with him three dignitaries of the church from dioceses which were not involved in the dispute, in order that he might not be obliged to trust to his own judgment alone, we can form some idea of the energy and zeal displayed by this apostolic bishop. The controversy, however trifling it may now (note 2), in the latter page, that we must not conclude that the Dominicans had only three houses in Ulster at this time, but that there were no friars in the rest, or that there was no dispute about their rights. The former we take to be the true state of the case.

In Dr. Plunkett's letter the bishop whom he took with him is called “Reverendissimus Patritius Midensis,” and De Burgo says in a note at the foot of the page that his name was Patrick Cusack. All modern writers of Irish ecclesiastical history have adopted this statement. Yet it is not the fact, for the Primate's letter is dated 11th October, 1671, and of course the visitation must have been made somewhat earlier. Now Peter Walsh, who was not only a contemporary, but was intimately acquainted with all those affairs, states (Hist. Remon., p. 576) that Patrick Plunket was translated from Ardagh to Meath 1669, and that he was still bishop of Meath in 1672, the time in which Walsh was writing. This passage which is quite decisive will be found a little farther on.

No person can have a higher veneration for De Burgo than I have, but I must say that he, along with others, was too apt to trust to the slippery authority of Protestant writers upon Irish Catholic ecclesiastical affairs. As an instance I may mention that he dates (Hib. Dom., p. 690) the bull granted by Alexander VII., and directed to the bishops of Raphoe, Clonfert, Leighlin, and Cork, empowering them to absolve the Irish from the censures of the Nuncio Runicini, so late as 1665. The true date is 1655 and De Burgo was led into an error of no less than ten years by relying on Ware's “Gesta Hibernorum,” ad annum 1665. The writer of the reign of Charles II., in Cox (Appendix, p. 7), commits the same mistake, and gives as his authority Peter Walsh. The latter, however, who was himself concerned in this bull and absolution, everywhere gives the date of 1655. Thus he says (Hist. Rem., p. 573) “That in the year 1655 the said Nuntiotist party, having as to the affairs of their own country all power at Rome, prevailed at last with His Holiness Alexander VII. to grant a bull of extraordinary delegation, dated at Rome, August 27, 1655 . . . directed to John Cullenan, bishop of Raphoe, in Ulster, Walter Lynch, bishop of Clonfert, in Connaught, Edmund Dempsey, bishop of Leighlin, in Leinster, and Robert Barry, bishop of Cork, in Munster, though all four, even at that very time (as always after till they all every one died) living abroad in banishment, and wide enough dispersed and separated: the first in Brussels, second in Hungary, third in Gallacia, or elsewhere in Spain, and fourth at St. Malos, in France.” Walsh again, in the preface to another work (Causa Valesiana, London, 1784), gives the same date of 27th of August, 1655 to the bull of Alexander VII.

Besides, the four bishops to whom Alexander VII. directed his bull were all dead before 1665. Walsh (Hist. Rem., pp. 604–5–7), inserts two letters of John Burk, Archbishop of Tuam, the latter of which bears date 13th March, 1665, and one letter of Mac Swiney, bishop of Kilmore, dated 22nd February, 1665. Having spoken of the “infirm” bishop of Tuam, he continues, “How the other infirm (nay, besides Ardagh, the only other, either infirm or not infirm) bishop then at home in Ireland, Doctor Swiney, bishop of Kilmore . . . as for the three other bishops, viz., Ardmach, Ferns, and Kilfenuran, likewise the only bishops remaining at that time (1665) in foreign parts (their banisht bretheren of Cashel, Limerick, Cork, Clonfert, Killala, Leighlin, &c., being all dead before in several countries during their banishment).”

The truth is, that absolutions from the Nuncio's censures were granted by several of the bishops, by virtue of the bull of Alexander VII., long before 1665.

De Burgo was also partly misled by the fact that some Irish Dominicans who, being at Rome in 1656, endeavoured to induce the Holy See to grant their countrymen absolution from that censure (Hib. Dom., p. 690). But he himself quotes a note (pp. 690–1) which proves that what these Dominicans asked for was a relaxation of the penance imposed by the bull of Alexander VII., and which must, therefore, have been published before the year 1656. What they asked was not granted until about the year 1698, when, after much solicitation, Dominick Burk, bishop of Elphin, obtained it from Innocent XII.

appear to us, involved in its consequences the most vital interests of the Irish Church; for so early as 1665, not five years after the Restoration, there were in Ireland no less than four hundred Franciscans, two hundred Dominicans, one hundred Augustinians, and nearly one hundred other regulars, consisting of Jesuits, of whom Sall, afterwards an apostate, was then superior, and of Carmelites, Capuchins, Cistercians and canons regular of St. Augustin.* Many of these acted as parish priests and curates, and in those times of persecution the united efforts of all were necessary to preserve the faith, and to administer to the poor people all they had left on earth—the consolations of that religion for whose sake they had endured so much. Indeed the total number of the Irish Catholic clergy at this period—which did not amount to 1900, of which only between 1000 and 1100 were seculars—was miserably disproportioned to the exigencies of the people. The firm, zealous, and impartial conduct of the Primate, fortunately had the effect of putting an end to the scandalous discussions which had arisen between the Franciscans and Dominicans, and of inducing those two illustrious orders to labour strenuously and lovingly together in the troubled times which followed, and to contend with each other in a generous rivalry for the crown of martyrdom.

It was impossible that the widowed church of Ireland should not have had occasion to bewail, amid her other woes, the evil effects produced by the expatriation of almost all her bishops, and of the great bulk of her clergy. It is true that some priests and bishops, still remained who kept alive the faith in the hearts of the people, and that one was no sooner dragged to martyrdom, than another eagerly rushed into his place, and coveted the glorious crown which he had so nobly won. But it was impossible that the loss of the advice and instructions of their pastors should not have produced some disorders amongst the laity, and that a few—and they were very few—of the clergy should not have felt the absence of the wholesome controul of an ecclesiastical superior. The Primate, from the moment of his arrival in Ireland, had set about the reformation of these abuses with his usual zeal and fearlessness. He commenced first with his own diocese, but no part of the province of Ulster escaped his vigilance and care.† His chief object was to procure holy and learned priests; for the successor of St. Patrick knew that this was all that was necessary to preserve the faith amongst a people who clung to the teaching of their national apostle, even with the loss of their property and to the shedding of their blood. By the sanctity of his own life, he was a burning and a shining light to the whole kingdom. Like another St. Paul, he preached publicly, and from house to house; and, by his example as much as by his doctrine, raised the minds and the hopes of the most lowly from the earth and lifted them even to heaven. With him religion was no abstract idea, but a sublime reality which taught men, even when weighed down by this body of death, to live pure as angels and to reflect in their lives the image of the omnipotent God.

He stated, at his trial, that he had “lived in a little, thatched house, wherein was only a little room for a library which was not seven feet high, that he had never more than one servant, and that he was scarcely ever able to support even one.” How he managed to support himself and a servant, and even to procure books, is a mystery, for he declared, on the same occasion, that his income never exceeded “three score pounds per annum.” Yet from the list of those ordained by him, who were registered in 1704, we find that he held ordinations in many places far removed from each other, each year from 1669 to 1679, and it is certain that on the miserably small sum of sixty pounds a-year he visited the entire of his extensive diocese during each of these ten years. Nor did he confine his zeal to his own immediate diocese, but extended it over the whole of Ulster and even to other parts of the kingdom. We have already seen that the cause of religion led the Primate, within the first two years of his episcopacy, to Dublin, Down, Dromore, and Clogher; and Arsdekin, whose words are copied by De Burgo, affirms, that he travelled through every part of Ulster to instruct and confirm the faithful in the faith of their fathers. During these visits he narrowly inspected the conduct of the clergy; and, although Dr. M'Mahon justly designates him “meek-minded” (Jus Primatiale, p. 17), yet he was possessed of the greatest firmness and punished the incorrigible and refractory with the severest censures. He also found that some of the friars had occasioned grave abuses by their “questing,” and he therefore interdicted some of them from pursuing this occupation in his diocese. These necessary acts of severity procured him enemies amongst the base and irreligious of his own order, some of whom, as we shall see hereafter, carried their enmity so far as to insult him in his thatched cottage, and even to swear away his life—thus procuring immortal infamy for themselves and imperishable renown for their victim.

Dr. Plunkett did not confine his exertions to the reformation of the lives of the clergy, but he laboured also with the most unwearied zeal to supply every parish in his own diocese and through the whole of Ulster, with a faithful, a learned, and a holy priest. So successful were his exertions that Peter Walsh says (Hist. Remon., p. 576) the number of secular priests was doubled between 1665 and 1672. Most of these ordinations took place after the period of the Primate's arrival in Ireland; for we have already seen that all the bishops, most of whom had but lately returned from exile, were obliged to fly in consequence of the rejection of the Valesian remonstrance, in 1666, with the exception of two who were bed-ridden and unable to leave the country. Peter Walsh asserts (Letter to Henrix in the Causa Valesiana, dated 17th of January, 1677, old style, p. 41) that there were four archbishops and eight or nine bishops appointed in Ireland in the years 1669-70, besides Duffy and Tyrrell, who a little later successively filled the see of Clogher.* It is worth while to quote the words of the same writer (Hist. Rem., p. 576), "Now forasmuch as peradventure some readers, observing how occasionally I have given the number as well of bishops then however living, viz., three at home in Ireland, and three abroad in foreign parts, as of those Irish churchmen at that same time possessing and tyed to regular orders by solemn vows, in all about 800, may think it some oversight if I give not also the total number (that is my best conjecture of the number) of secular clergy throughout all the several diocesses of that kingdom at that very time. . . . I can say that the secular priests then at home were between a thousand and eleven hundred; though I cannot say the exact number. But now, in 1672, I doubt not they are well nigh as many more by reason of the indiscreet laying of hands, ever since 1666, by the bishop of Ardagh, till 1669, on all persons that were presented to him; and since 1669, to this present 1672, not only by the same bishop, translated to Meath, but by so many other bishops and archbishops who have been made since by new creations from Rome." It may therefore be safely affirmed, that within little more than two years after the Primate's arrival in Ireland, most if not all the vacant sees were filled, the number of secular priests was increased from eleven hundred to two thousand two hundred, and that this glorious result is to be especially ascribed to the zeal of this illustrious prelate. When the bloody hand of persecution was again raised to strike the Irish Catholics, and especially the Irish Catholic priests, Dr. Plunkett continued to hold frequent ordinations in various parts of his diocese, and occasionally in other more remote places. Out of eighteen hundred secular priests, registered in 1704—that is twenty-three years after Dr. Plunkett's death—no less than one hundred and sixteen were still living who had received orders by the imposition of his hands. We learn this fact from the "list" of priests registered at this time, of which I have expressed my opinion in a previous note, and, although several ordinations are there ascribed to the Primate which he did not perform, yet this is counterbalanced by some of those which he actually did perform being attributed to other bishops. He held ordinations in the year 1679, in which he was apprehended and put into prison in Dublin. In the "list" of priests registered at the Wicklow general sessions, on the 13th of July, 1704, the second name is James McKee, P. P. of Ballynure, who resided at Baltinglass, and who is stated to have been ordained by Archbishop Plunkett at Castletown Bellew, county of Louth, in the year before he was executed. Although this cannot be literally true—for the Primate was imprisoned from the 6th November, 1679, until the time of his execution, on the 1st of July, 1681—yet it is most probable that this ordination must have taken place very shortly before he was arrested. It is mentioned in the Catholic Directory (p. 240), but the interesting fact regarding the time when it took place is entirely omitted.

* Hist. Remon. part ii. treatise i. p. 575. Antony Dougherty was prior provincial of the Franciscans, John O'Hairt of the Dominicans, and Stephen Lynch of the Augustinians, in 1665. The Jesuits, of whom Sall was then superior, amounted to twenty-five; there were nearly as many Discalced Carmelites, of whom Thomas Dillon was prior; about twenty Capuchins, amongst whom Gregory Mulchoury was superior of the mission; nine or ten monks of St. Bernard; three or four Canons Regular of St. Augustine besides others in commendam, two or three Benedictine monks, and one Calcedonian Carmelite (Id. Ibid.) The number of secular Priests was between 1000 and 1100. (Id. p. 576.)

So long as the hands of the Primate were unbound by chains, he did not cease to lay them on the heads of those whom he considered worthy of being admitted into the holy ministry. His conduct in this respect forms a strong contrast with that of his rival, Talbot, who did not ordain a single one of the 1800 priests registered in 1704. The two Plunketts—Oliver the Primate and Patrick, successively bishop of Meath and Ardagh—frequently ordained in Dublin during the time Talbot was archbishop, but his own name never occurs as an ordaining bishop. This fact seems to justify the charge which the Primate made against him, in 1670, that he was more anxious about secular than about ecclesiastical affairs. English by descent, he was a stern and unflinching Catholic, but at the same time he was thoroughly imbued with the feelings and prejudices of the "pale." He could scarcely suppress his scorn for the "mere Irish," and he ridiculed the ancient annalists of the country, and discouraged those who laboured to rescue her ancient history from oblivion. When Colgan died at Louvain in 1658, having only published the first three months—January, February, and March—of his Acta Sanctorum, or lives of Irish saints, he left behind him, in manuscript, abundant materials for the completion of that great and valuable work. It is the heaviest charge against Talbot's memory that he was opposed to its continuation. He was, moreover, like his brother, the Duke of Tyrconnell, an aristocrat in sentiment and in feeling, whose dream of Irish justice was not to rescue the people from misery, but to restore their wide domains to the ancient nobility. Plunkett, though descended of a noble family, was imbued with entirely different feelings. He loved the poor better than the rich, and spent his time amongst them, consoling them and alleviating their distress to the utmost extent of his abilities. His leisure hours were spent in his "little library not seven feet high," in the study of theology, of sacred scripture, and of the ancient history of his country. Of the latter he was passionately fond, and Peter Talbot's attempt to wrest the primacy from him he regarded not as a personal injury to himself, but as an effort to overturn the venerable traditions of the country. He always looks, through the blood and tears of the few last centuries, to that early light which, though no longer visible, still left the reflection of its glory on the dark clouds which hung threateningly over the ancient and renowned "Island of Saints." He wished to preserve the fading remnant of this light of the past which still struggled to live, and he hoped that it would survive, for he believed it to be immortal and that it would one day burst forth with renovated splendour and with a brightness which would rival its ancient glory. Patriotism supplied in his breast the spirit of prophecy and enabled him to discern, even in her present ruin, the future resurrection of his country.

The Sicilian Question

IN 1848.

BY THE REV. FATHER JOACHIM VENTURA.

EX-GENERAL OF THE THEATINES.

SECTION 11.—UNION AND FUSION ARE VERY DIFFERENT THINGS; THE FORMER PRODUCES POWER, THE LATTER WEAKNESS.

It is foolish to urge for the contrary opinion, the maxim that "union is force." In the first place, "union is not fusion," union is "the league of several distinct beings for a common end and interest, each remaining what it was originally." Fusion is the decomposition of beings, and their aggregation so as to form but one whole, so that they lose altogether their former manner of existence. In union, the numerical distinction of the units is preserved—in fusion it is lost. Union, therefore, supposes and requires that the units which combine should preserve their own existences and their individuality intact. Things which in combination lose that distinct and individual existence are fused not united.

* Duffius et Tyrrellus ad Clocherensim in Hibernia sedem unus post aliam evecti; et paulo ante ipsos Archiepiscopi quatuor; episcopique alii octo vel novem annis 1669 et 1670 creati.

Should Sicily therefore, as a people, be united to the crown of Naples, she must retain her individuality and political existence; she must remain what she has ever been; what in spite of all the foolish combinations of diplomacy—in spite of all the blind efforts of despotism, she shall never cease to be—a people—a nation. Therefore she must have native government and parliament, for on that condition alone can she be a people and a nation. But if she is foolish enough to surrender—if force or fraud compel her to renounce those prerogatives; if she is amalgamated with Naples as a pitiful province of an united kingdom, she ceases, by the very fact, to be a people and a nation; she loses all individuality and political existence; she disappears from the rank of nations; her amalgamation is no union, but a dissolution—a result directly the reverse of what is intended.

I say "directly the reverse of what is intended," for if union be force, fusion is dissolution—is death. Three bars of iron bound together oppose greater resistance and are more difficult to be broken than one, though it was formed of the three bars melted together, and was of precisely the same material and weight as the three separate bars.

Now the case is precisely the same in the political order. Several nations, preserving their personal political existence, but coalescing, confederating, uniting under one head, for the common defence, present a more powerful resistance, and are more difficult to be conquered than if they were fused together, and formed but one people.

SECTION 12.—EXAMPLE OF THE EMPIRE OF AUSTRIA; ITS PRINCIPAL FORCE CONSISTED IN ITS BEING COMPOSED OF DISTINCT NATIONS, EACH HAVING ITS OWN CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT.

Where lay the power of the empire of Austria?—was it in her twenty million of subjects? Certainly not; but because these millions consisted of five or six distinct kingdoms, with their own laws, institutions, and governments, but under the political sway of the one crown. Hungary was the most powerful bulwark of the empire, precisely because she had been always preserved as a distinct nation, because they left her her constitution, her diet, and her distinct national existence. The same was true of Bohemia and Transylvania; and for that reason Austria never sanctioned the absurdity of fusing these different nations, under the same government and one constitution, a measure that would in fact have been impossible, for no power on earth can destroy at will the nationality of nations, and create on their ruins one people and one nation. And a nation, compounded of so many different elements, would be a people only in appearance and by force, but in reality divided by its interests and sentiments. The empire would thus become a prey to intestine dissensions, and fall to pieces rapidly; that very fusion which, according to the foolish opinion of a few politicians, should be the guarantee of her power and stability, would really be the cause of her decline, and perhaps of her ruin.

Why has she not always observed this prudent and wise policy in respecting nationalities? Why has ministerial despotism renounced its instincts and, by slow and successive usurpations, weakened those local laws and institutions, and thus, by degrees, robbed those states of their ancient privileges and liberties? Oh! if that had not been done, how much more powerful and respectable would the Austrian Empire be this day?—Austria, the sovereign of five or six free nations, would be the most powerful monarchy in Europe.

As the sovereign is more honoured by swaying five or six nations than one, so is he much more powerful at the head of five or six distinct nations, than if he ruled over those same nations, fused and amalgamated into one people.

So will it be in the present case; Sicily, united to Naples, under the same sceptre, but enjoying her own government, will be one of the principal props of that crown, and the chief glory of the kingdom.

SECTION 13.—DIGRESSION ON ITALIANISM. ITALY WOULD NOT BE MORE POWERFUL UNDER ONE CROWN.

This doctrine—founded on the nature of things, and, consequently, an absolute and invariable truth—ought to be preached and inculcated, especially in present times, so that it may be universally acknowledged, because some silly and pedantic politicians imagine that Italy would be more powerful if united under one crown, and formed into one kingdom. Quite the reverse; Italy, so constituted, would be much more feeble; the loss of a single battle would subvert her, at one blow, to the sceptre of the stranger. Had Italy been so constituted, French or German would now be the general language from Cape Lilibeo to the Alps. But it is because she was divided into so many small, independent principalities, into so many different centres of subordinate nationalities, and above all, because it was the seat of the Papal power, in whose independence alone all nations, and all Christian powers were interested, for that reason (and it ought never be forgotten), Italy was never more than partially occupied by the foreigners. That was the real cause that saved her language and nationality, and preserved her Italian existence. That was the real source of that one thought, one feeling with which her soul throbs at present. That it is which makes her rise now as one man, full of force and life, and disconcert all calculations, baffle all ambitions, and set the world laughing at the stupid diplomacy which, in its imbecile impudence, has always presumed to dispose of her without her own leave.

The great secret of the enemies of Italy has ever been, to foment discord and rivalry between her different kingdoms and principalities. It was thus they succeeded in annihilating her, in shutting her out from all political influence, as if she did not exist at all, in oppressing each state in turn, and holding all in the most sovereign contempt.

But now, when, at the word of the Pope—the guardian—the natural protector—the natural and powerful bulwark of Italian liberty—now, when at his word, the rivalry of the Italian provinces, their prejudices and international jealousies have disappeared—now, when no Italian people fears that it shall be enslaved by another—when no Italian prince fears that his neighbour will rob him of one-third of his territory—when the sincere sentiment of fraternity and confidence has supplanted that of jealousy and the terror of foreign domination which kept us divided—when Italy, rich and magnificent in the inestimable advantage of being of the same religion, the same language, the same genius, the same nature, and soon, we hope, of the same material interests and political institutions—confederated, anointed, under the presidency of the august Head of the Religion of the World, who, because his power is moral and religious, can never excite that jealousy and distrust which is invariably excited by the head of a great military power; now, I say, Italy begins to live a new life—to take her rank among the nations—to become a power—to inspire fear—to command the respect due to a great nation—and to give an additional proof that it is not amalgamation, but union that gives power, and triumphs over all resistance.

SECTION 14.—SICILY AMALGAMATED WITH NAPLES, MUST BE ALWAYS HER ENEMY; UNITED TO NAPLES UNDER THE SAME CROWN, SHE WILL BE A GENEROUS SISTER.

Be it remembered that the Sicilians, by their character, their manners, and finally, by the geographical position of their country, are a people in themselves—an original people, with a peculiar political physiognomy, not like that of any other people—a people who, though frequently subdued by the most powerful sceptres on earth, have passed under the yoke of all, without ever being fused in any of them—a people two hundred miles distant from Naples, but infinitely farther removed from her by her character, habits, opinions, sentiments. A complete and entire fusion between the Neapolitans and Sicilians is therefore as impossible as a fusion of the Belgians with the Dutch, or of the Irish with the English. The government which has just fallen, and which conceived the silly and absurd notion of attempting it, now knows the result of its attempt. After thirty-two years of fatal amalgamation, the Sicilians were still disaffected slaves, guarded over to Naples in chains, and the Neapolitans were but an execrated garrison encamped in Sicily; antipathy and mutual hatred became every day more irritated and rancorous. Ah! believe me, it is easier to exterminate than to amalgamate Sicilians.

But though you should succeed now in establishing unity of government under the one parliament, this unnatural union would be only apparent, fictitious, transitory. People so different in character, are still more so in their interests, and in the rivalry of temper and position. Mutual distrust must engender discord. The inevitable preponderance of Neapolitan deputies must always keep those of Sicily in a state of inferiority and humiliation. By the very nature of the case, by the necessity of consequences springing from invariable principles, and which no human power can prevent or correct, the Neapolitans must assume the tone of superiors and masters,* and will exact from the Sicilians a forced resignation, silence, the obsequiousness of inferiors and slaves—a position which the Sicilian character can never brook. Hence, at first arise secret murmurs; then public reclamation; open hostility; next universal hatred; finally, a new revolution, necessary, inevitable, breaks out, convincing the obstinate, but too late, enlightening the blind, and demonstrating the transparent folly and absurdity of those who attempt to confound two nations whom God and nature have separated.

On the other hand, make Sicily a separate kingdom, under her own government and institutions, she will forget her past woes, those protracted afflictions suffered under the old regime. A people that fights bravely in the field, is always generous in pardon. She will no longer remember her sorrows more bitter than death—"affanni più amari che morte," but to execrate that form of absolute government which has dared during so long a time to make so many millions of Christians the sport of a few ruffians; which has so deplorably blinded an intelligent sovereign to the real wants, the true condition of his subjects, and their interests, that he regards as the clamour of a few disaffected men, the discontent and misery of all, and their determination to tolerate no longer the tears and cries of two oppressed nations; which, in a word, has changed into an unnatural parent a sovereign who had all the qualities necessary to form the good king as perfectly as those which make him the best of fathers.

Henceforward the Sicilians would throw the blame of their past sufferings on the times, and would feel nothing but love and gratitude to persons. They will once more regard the Neapolitans as brothers. Thus two nations, mutually independent, in their distinct parliaments and governments, will rival each other in ameliorating their condition, and thereby increasing the riches and power of the state, and the glory of the same crown.

SECTION 15.—IT IS THE INTEREST OF ITALY THAT SICILY SHOULD HAVE A SEPARATE GOVERNMENT.

It can hardly be necessary now to refute in particular the opinions of those who think "That Sicily ought to accept with the constitution, the same parliament and same government as Naples, and dissolve herself to form one kingdom, and one people—such fusion being required for the general interests of Italy." No, no—quite the reverse; the interests of Italy is, that Sicily—who is her advanced guard—her defensive citadel, on sea-board—should be peaceful, rich, powerful, free, and independent. Such Sicily never can be without her own parliament, government, and political existence. The interest of Italy, therefore, requires that these should be guaranteed to Sicily.

Sicily, confounded with Naples, will add but an additional province to that kingdom; it will be a burden, not a support, and must make the kingdom of Naples more feeble in itself, and in its relations with the rest of Italy. But separated from Naples, and being a distinct nation and people, it will give you a nation and people the more, which by contributing to the strength of Naples, must consolidate the power of Italy.

Furthermore, and this consideration deserves special attention, if Sicily should happen by this contemplated arrangement to lose her political existence and independence, her woes will soon recommence with more intensity than ever; she will merely change her tyrants, and after having been so long the victim of ministerial despotism, she will wither under parliamentary despotism, which is not less intolerable, or unjust, or shameful than the other. Once more then she must appeal to the chance of war and revolutions, but then it will be to throw herself into the arms of the stranger, for a nation driven to despair shrinks from nothing. Thus will that fair and fertile land be lost not only to Naples but to Italy.

CONCLUSION.

1st—Sicily though great, rich, and powerful enough to form a distinct nation, is not powerful enough to support her absolute sovereignty as an independent state. She ought, therefore, to be politically subject to the crown of Naples, and thus continue to belong to Italy, and to be a member of the great Italian family.*

2nd—But as her union in the bonds of political fraternity with a nation of 6,000,000 men is, and must be for her, a guarantee of power and dignity, not a title of slavery; she must have her own constitution, her own government, and her own ministry; she must have her own viceroy, or lieutenant, appointed by the king, invested with most ample powers, such as the selection of ministers, the exercise of the constitutional prerogatives of the crown, and of the executive power in accordance with the chambers and the national representation, as is the case in Hungary, with regard to Austria, and still better in Canada, with regard to England.

3rd—Where all is liberty, religion must not be a slave, dependent on the local ministry, or the caprice of the government. Religion, thus degraded—a mere government tool in the hands of power—loses all moral power, as experience proves, and can neither sustain the government, nor guide the people in the true paths of morality and civilization. When Italy is at peace, Sicily requires troops only in the fortresses, but she does not require them to preserve her fidelity to the crown, her word and oath being more than sufficient for that purpose, and consequently she can convert to other purposes the enormous sums hitherto consumed by a parasite enemy, which was the ogre of liberty, and good for nothing but the tyranny which employed it.

The revolutions of Sicily always commenced above; the people in Sicily were never the first to revolt; the people never revolted against the government until the government had revolted against the people; Sicily never rose against a just and paternal government. Inconstancy, in changing her masters, is not part of her character—she never forgot loyalty until power had forgotten justice.

Place government in the happy impossibility of oppressing Sicily. Give her a parliament and government of her own, and that fair portion of Italy—powerful, free, independent, subject to the crown of Naples, and a member of the Italian confederation—must be a powerful bulwark to our Italy, and a glorious manifestation of her independence and her liberty.

FATHER JOACHIM VENTURA.

OLD ANGLO-IRISH CATHOLIC ASCENDENCY.

A Correspondent having protested against "the parallel" between Ireland and Sicily, in the last number of the Magazine, we answer, that there was no intention of forcing a parallel. Some points of resemblance were obvious enough in the relation between England and Ireland and those between Naples and Sicily; and those points were urged so efficiently by Father Ventura, that they were left to speak for themselves. Our correspondent might have seen that there was even an express disclaimer of publishing the translation for the sake of the parallel; the points of dissimilitude between the two cases, are so obvious to persons of ordinary information, that it was not deemed necessary to mention them.

Objection is made, particularly, to that part of the translation in which Father Ventura describes the Neapolitan prelates in Sicily "as mitred policemen," and as aiding in the government of Sicily for the interests of Naples. "How," asks our correspondent "can that apply to Ireland? It may be true of the Protestant clergy of the last three centuries, but it never was nor will be true of the Catholic clergy in Ireland." To this the answer is not very difficult. It may appear strange, yet it admits of strong proof, that the relations between a large portion of the Irish clergy and the English government, from 1172 to 1560, were not so different as our correspondent imagines from those subsisting between the same government and the Protestant clergy from 1560 to the present day. In the former period England and Ireland were of the one faith. Catholic prelates and English nobles in an incredible short space of time covered Ireland with splendid architectural monuments of their zeal and munificence, but if viewed in connexion with the English government on the one hand and the mass of the Irish people on the other, those really princely prelates do appear after all to bear, in a political light, some resemblance to the Neapolitan prelates, sitting on the episcopal thrones of Sicily. A few proofs of this position will answer our correspondent's assertion with regard to the past; and, as to the future, we leave that to those who pride themselves on their foreknowledge of all that unborn Time has in store for this revolutionary world.

It is painful, even at this distance of time, to review the antagonism of the old Irish and Anglo-Irish Catholics, and the extremes to which they were hurried in mutual recrimination. So late as 1656, when Cromwell had crushed both in one common ruin, when the remnant of the Irish clergy, Irish and Anglo-Irish, were lurking in bogs and mountains, or huddled together in the western islands, awaiting the fetter of the West Indian planter; even in that hour of woe, when all animosities should be hushed, as in the chamber of death, a work by an Irish priest was circulated in Rome, tracing all the calamities of Ireland to the Anglo-Norman settlers, raking up their history from the moment Strongbow landed to the day on which their descendants fought in the armies of Elizabeth and defended her towns, and implying that there could be no peace for Ireland so long as those Anglo-Irish held sway in the land! It is not in this spirit that reference is now made to the past. This priest "with the long memory" drew forth a crushing reply from an Irish priest of English descent, who protested indignantly against being called an Anglo-Irishman. "Does Luke Wadding," he asks, "or Lombard, or White, or any other of our great writers of English descent, write themselves down in the title-page of their works 'Anglo-Hibernicus.' Are the English Anglo-Normans, or the French Franco-Gauls? Why is this pernicious and insulting distinction to be perpetuated among us alone?" The reply was presented to the Propaganda, a fact which shows that the controversy was not the mere ebullition of antiquarian bile, but the expression of a wide and deeply-seated feeling. Now how will our correspondent account for that fact? what is it that immortalized this animosity of race, even in the sanctuary, and excited two priests against each other, whose fathers had prayed before the same altars, in the same land, under the same nominal government during nearly 500 years? Is it merely that tenacious memory of national wrong, which, according to Thierry, characterizes the Irish race beyond all others? was it recent political discord, or are we to look higher for the cause? was religion its root? were there some clergy, after all, in Ireland in Catholic times, who, like the Neapolitan clergy in Sicily, were the nominees of an anti-national government, and soiled their hands by anti-national services? Let us see—

In the commencement of the fourteenth century, and not long before the invasion of Ireland by Edward Bruce, O'Neil, prince of Tyrone, sent his memorable remonstrance to the pope.

"MOST HOLY FATHER—The calumnies and false representations which have been heaped upon us by the English are too well known throughout the world, not to have reached the ears of your Holiness. We are persuaded, most Holy Father, that your intentions are most pure and upright, but from not knowing the Irish, except through the misrepresentations of their enemies, your Holiness might be induced to look upon as truths, those falsehoods which have been circulated, and to form an opinion contrary to what we merit, which would be to us a great misfortune. To avert such a calamity, we have resolved to send you, in this letter, a faithful description of the real state of our nation."

After this preamble, a long and painful statement of the political misery of the country follows, but the point to which we direct our correspondent's attention is:

"The same tribunal—namely, a parliament—with the co-operation and contrivance of some English bishops, at which the Archbishop of Armagh presided—a man who was but little esteemed for his conduct, and still less for his learning—made the following regulations at Kilkenny:—All religious communities in those parts of Ireland of which the English are in peaceful possession are prohibited to admit any novices but those of English blood, under the penalty of being treated by the king of England as having contemned his orders, and by the founders and superiors of those communities as refractory and guilty of disobedience. This regulation was but little needed; because before as well as after its enactment the English Dominicans, Franciscans, Benedictines, and Regular Canons, and all the other communities, observed the spirit of it but too faithfully."

This may not have been the universal practice; because, in the reign of Edward II., a Mora O'Melaghlin, and after her a Mac Geoghegan, were approved by royal letter as abbesses of the convent of Clonard, which was certainly within the English land. It is possible, too, that some of the Irish convents, especially that most Irish one at Mellifont, had enforced a similar practice against postulants of English blood. But the general fact is but too true. It was in vain that the Pope reminded the king of England of Adrian's grant to Henry II., and complained of the violation of its terms.

"To the tenor of that grant," he said, "neither Henry nor his successors have paid any regard, but, passing the bounds that were prescribed to them, they have, without cause or provocation, heaped upon the Irish the most unheard of miseries, and have during a long period, imposed upon them a yoke of intolerable slavery. None have dared to stem the persecution inflicted on the Irish, not one, I say, has been moved through a holy compassion for their sufferings, though the loud cries of the oppressed have reached the ears of your Majesty."

In vain did Pope John XXII. thus advise, admonish, and threaten; for about forty years later, and at a time when the political power of England was declining in Ireland, when those noble old barons had become more Irish than the Irish themselves, the memorable statutes, the great statute of Kilkenny was passed which excluded, by law, all native Irish not only from monasteries but from cathedrals and benefices wherever the English had any power. We have styled it the great statute—the fundamental statute—the Magna Charta of English rights in Ireland; because the great charter itself, the laws of the good King Edward were not more frequently sworn to and confirmed in England than was this statute of Kilkenny in Ireland. We pray our correspondent to study its enactment; manifestly he is a gentleman of respectable information on other points, but as he is not acquainted with these facts, we are excused, nay we discharge a sacred duty in enlightening him, lest other respectable men among our readers might be equally ignorant of matters which every Irish Catholic who loves the liberty of his church ought to know at the present time:

"XIII.—Also it is ordained," saith the statute, "That no Irishman of the nations of the Irish be admitted into any cathedral or collegiate church by permission, collation, or presentation of any person; nor to any benefice of Holy Church, amongst the English of this land; and that if any be admitted into such benefice, it be held for void, and the king shall have the presentation of the said benefice for that avoidance."

"XIV. Also, no religious house, situate among the English (be it exempt or not) shall henceforth receive any Irishmen to their profession, but may receive Englishmen without taking into consideration whether they be born in England or in Ireland; and that any that shall act otherwise, and shall thereof be attainted, their temporalities shall be seized into the hands of our lord the king, so to remain at his pleasure."

The Catholic understands, at once, the fearful consequences of this royal edict. The native Irish in the fertile plains of Meath, Kildare, Kilkenny, Wexford, and Tipperary, who never were able to shake off the yoke of English dominion, were doomed to perpetual exclusion from the hallowed precincts of the monastic choir; morning, noon, and evening the convent bell might speak to their souls of the tranquillity they could enjoy under the monastic rule; it might stir up within them a vocation which the Giver of all Good had implanted in their hearts; but English law frustrated God's vocation. Though they had never raised an arm in the field against the lord of Ireland, nor ever listened to Irish rhymers or proscribed bards, there was no admission for them (except by patent) into convent or monastery, though it were hallowed in their memories by the glory of a St. Columba or St. Kevin who had founded it, and shed a lustre around their land, before the Saxon had yet bowed to the cross of Christ. From the mountains of Wicklow, or the wooded frontier of Offaly, or the castellated marshes of Cavan and Monaghan, the young Irishman who felt he was not called to the busy scenes of life, but to the peace of the cloister, might gaze in sad despondency on the monastic turrets in the pale; he might sigh for a resting-place in Kells or Durrow, or Kildare, or Bective, but there was no admission because he was "of the nations of the Irish." The kindness of the Irish heart had often won its way through statutes, and annulled by the laws of nature the laws of England, but this law of exclusion was enforced by the tremendous penalty of excommunication. It was signed by three Archbishops and four bishops, and of these four at least were Irish by birth and name—may the Lord have mercy on them! Will our correspondent really maintain that there never was in Ireland, under English rule, in Catholic times, a system of politico-clerical government, analogous to that which Father Ventura denounces as lately existing in Sicily?

And yet those Anglo-Irish were really a noble race, men who have left lasting monuments of their zeal and munificence in Ireland; they were racy of the soil, but they were the instruments of alien dominion. That fact alone can explain how severely the statutes of Kilkenny were enforced down to the Reformation. In 1485 and 1493 the Catholic archbishop of Dublin was under the necessity of applying for an act of parliament to justify him in appointing Irish priests to the Irish districts of his diocese. Such was the law. Its violation was treason and excommunication. It was treason to appoint an efficient priest for the inhabitants of the Dublin mountains, or the southern suburbs of the city, if the king or parliament had not previously given a patent. When such was the case in the rural districts, it will not be surprising though it may be new to many of our readers, to read the following extract from a letter of Pope Leo X.:

"Item, consuetudo illa, antiquitus observata, de Hibernicis natione, moribus et sanguine non admittendis in Ecclesiâ cathedrali sancti Patricii præfatâ quâcunque regiâ dispensatione non obstante, concordatum est QUOD VIGENT VALEAT ET INVALESCAT, VIRIDI OBSERVATIONE SEMPER VALITURA et super hoc tam per archiepiscopum, quàm per Decanum diligentissimè fiet inquisitio."

Thus, not even royal patent could open the stalls of St. Patrick's cathedral to a mere Irishman so late as the pontificate of Leo X. Will our correspondent point out to us the difference, in point of national or political principle, between this system and that which has prevailed in the same cathedral during the last three hundred years, under the mixed system of Luther and Calvin? Substitute Catholic for Irishman and where is the difference?

We know the arguments that can be adduced to explain these extraordinary laws. The Irish and Anglo-Irish, as it has been forcibly said by Dr. Doyle were two nations struggling in the womb of the same mother. And they were her children, for when the Church was left to her own free action or could enlist the piety of the king, the distinction between Irish and Anglo-Irish was forgotten. Thus by royal grant of the kings of England the most inveterate Irish enemy or rebel, who had but just encountered the royal troops in the border passes, could march securely into the heart of the Pale on a pilgrimage to the churches of the Blessed Virgin at Navan or Trim, and any English paleman arresting or injuring this rebel pilgrim, was condemned to the utmost penalty of English law. These are memories on which it is sweet to ponder, and which you may seek in vain through all the royal charters of the successors of Elizabeth. We recall them lest it might be supposed that a wish to make our parallel good had led us to suppress facts. But we now introduce an unexceptionable witness.

It is deeply interesting to watch the progress of Anglo-Irish feeling at the period of the Reformation; how the colonists began to regard the Irish as not entirely so bad, when they found themselves ordered by English governors and influence to renounce the old creed. England now began to appear in a new light to the worthy burghers of the pale; but the traces of anti-Irish prejudice and English predilection are visible in the writings even of the most eminent among them. Peter Lombard, Catholic archbishop of Armagh at the close of Elizabeth's reign, who was one of the most accomplished scholars of the day, boasts, in several passages of his celebrated work, that he was of English descent, and indignantly disclaims any intention of disconnecting the countries. He maintains that the Anglo-Irish were vastly superior to the native Irish in civilization and general perfection—in a word, he was an honest but prejudiced palesman nurtured in pale ascendancy, the type of many honest Anglican Irish of the present day, who, in spite of the best possible intentions, unconsciously betray a sense of their own superiority over the natives. But this prejudice of the honest archbishop gives additional value to his condemnation of past English policy towards Ireland. In an able and very temperate work, which was presented to the Pope about the year 1600, he thus epitomizes the main grievances of Ireland under Catholic England. Mark how he, though a native of Waterford, speaks as if he were not an Irishman.

As to their complaints I will state a few of them, leaving to others to decide upon their merits:

"Secondly, they complain that though more civilized manners and arts have been established in the places occupied by the English colonists (as I proved already), yet the native Irish, so far from being made partakers in those blessings, were, on the contrary, systematically excluded from them. Nay, that no sufficient provision was made in the country for those establishments which could, at once, develop and increase the national wealth and respectability.

"Thirdly, though the Irish have a decided taste and eminent talent for literature and art, their genius being often of the first order, the English governors never could be induced to maintain an university in Ireland. When a project of that kind was once mooted, in Catholic times, at the English council-board, it was violently opposed by one of the most eminent councillors, himself a Catholic bishop. When he was afterwards asked how was it possible that a Catholic bishop could oppose so holy and desirable a project? he answered, that he gave his vote against the university not as a Catholic bishop, but as a councillor of the king of England. There might be some sense in this subtle distinction, if it could save the Catholic bishop, when the English councillor was condemned at the bar of God and his saints."—Commen. de Reg. Hib., p. 256.

This is not the harangue of a demagogue, nor the manifesto of a soldier like that of O'Neil, but a plain statement of grievances presented to the Pope by the highest ecclesiastical authority in Ireland. Surely there was grave reason for the assertion of Father Ventura, that the ecclesiastical relations between England and Ireland in Catholic times, were not on the most satisfactory footing. Men who have studied the subject with the calm of the historian believe, not without good grounds, that the native Irish Catholics were far less advanced in all the arts that adorn and elevate human society in the sixteenth century, than they had been when the English first came to the country. It would be too painful to adduce some of the proofs of this opinion, but we shall merely say that the ignorance of the sixteenth century was such as might be expected in a country which had gone through a period of 400 years' war, and in which the influence of the church was paralyzed, by being ranged on the side of foreign oppression. The more you compare those two government establishments—the Anglo-

Irish and the Protestant church—the more you will be convinced that they were both strongholds of an English interest, differing only in faith and in the extent to which they carried their anti-national feelings. It would be an atrocious calumny on the memory of the Anglo-Irish prelates, to say they were as bad as their Protestant fellows after the Reformation. The latter had but a small flock, they were generally imported direct from England, they sought but English interests, and have left hardly a trace of their beneficent influence on Irish soil. The exceptions to the rule are so well known that it is unnecessary to name them.

So much for the past; but as to our correspondent's prophecy that there never can be in the Irish Catholic church a party like that of the Neapolitan prelates in Sicily; fervently we pray that he may be right, and that there is no danger of a practical Catholic ascendancy in Ireland so long as Ireland is under the imperial parliament. Catholic ascendancy, whether under an imperial or an Irish parliament is a frightful evil, it would assuredly destroy the Catholic religion. On that point there is little doubt among Catholics, but many doubt whether the imperial parliament may not at length establish a practical Catholic ascendancy in this country. By a practical ascendancy is meant a strong Catholic party favoured by England and acting on English views, in return for the lion's share of English patronage. This ascendancy requires neither penal laws nor statute to support it. Its right is its power—its patent is that law by which English imperialism gravitates towards the strongest party in Ireland, that party by which Ireland could be most cheaply governed for English interests. But is there no danger of such an ascendancy under an imperial parliament? If the Catholic prelates adopted the principle of Whig Catholics, that a liberal state endowment was the panacea for the evils of Ireland, if on receipt of such endowment they co-operated cordially with the English government, if the Catholics, who eighty years ago could not take even an acre of bog without certain conditions, continue to increase in wealth and power, if the clergy and Catholic gentry, i.e. the genteel and moderate classes, consented after a generation or so, to be, in one word, the English party in Ireland, would there be any danger of a practical Catholic ascendancy? Such we presume is the true mode of testing the prophecy, that there never can be in Ireland, under the imperial parliament, a clerical party like the Neapolitan bishops in Sicily. You lean on a broken reed if you imagine that England will respect Irish Protestant feelings or Protestant interests when they are opposed to her own interests. She has never done so—she has severed, with an iron hand, the ties of centuries when they crossed her path. The present poor-law and, better still than the poor-law, the arguments by which the English press enforced its enactment, show her respect for her old Irish allies. So has it ever been. In 1340, the English crown resumed all the grants that had been made to the Anglo-Irish nobles, because they were beginning to become more Irish than the Irish themselves. In the sixteenth century she destroyed some and curtailed the possessions of other Anglo-Irish, because they were opposed to English interests, but, in 1660, the creation of a new English interest exhibits her system so truly that it is worth while to listen to the eloquent and prophetic voice of a Catholic bishop denouncing it.

"Supposing," he says, "that the preservation of an English interest were so sacred a thing, that it may be held lawful in that regard to extirpate the old inhabitants of Ireland, who have received from the hand of God that portion of the earth for their inheritance, upon what colour of title can our rigid statesmen design the extirpation of so many families in Ireland, of the English race and extraction lineally descended from the best families in England, and those ancient English colonies who first brought over that interest into Ireland and maintained it there for so many ages? If this cannibal English interest gives no better quarter to the children of English in Ireland, what can strangers expect? nay, what assurance can be had for the posterity of those very adventurers and soldiers (Cromwellian) that, after an age or two, they shall not be likewise disowned or displaced to make room for a new warm of English planters, upon the account of securing a new English interest; and those new colonies, also, within an age after, shall be extirpated upon the same score; for the children of those who were planted about the beginning of King James's reign, are now destroyed for the better security of an English interest, as well as the posterity of the first English, so that, to the world's end, if we follow this rule, we shall never be able to secure the English interest in the kingdom of Ireland."

Now is it not notorious that the Irish conservative press regards the poor-laws as a confiscation, and were not "English interests" the argument urged for its enactment, when the imperial revenue and the English ratepayers felt the pressure of Irish pauperism? were not the arguments used against it by the whole Irish conservative press that it would confiscate the loyal Protestant property of Ireland, for the benefit of disaffected Catholic paupers? Is there not some truth in Dr. French's prediction? That poor-law or its principle is nevertheless a law of the Medes; it cannot be repealed by an Irish or English parliament. Certainly it will become, not by mere figure of rhetoric but in stern reality, a confiscation on an extensive scale, if the tribute paid to England, in the shape of surplus revenue, purchased manufactures, and absentee drain, be not stopped before another decade. It will work the social revolution in Ireland predicted by O'Connell; it will drag down those who have the property to the level of those who have not, and when that revolution is approaching its consummation, what will be the ascendant power in Ireland? At present the aristocratic element is nearly worn out; we are not so confident in our prophetic skill as our correspondent, but, perhaps, there is more danger of a Catholic anti-national ascendancy in Ireland under an imperial than an Irish legislature. Eighty years ago, remember, an Irish Catholic could not take an acre of bog except under certain conditions; now they enjoy the good things of the government, and really, as far as we can judge from the moderate classes among them, since 1829, they relish those good things as well as any other class of her majesty's subjects—a Catholic attorney-general can draw the line of distinction between the government Catholic and the mere Irish Catholic. Let no priest who values the independence of his church imagine that the Catholic gentry will defend it; a certain old bishop in the south was dragged out of his bed some thirty-eight years ago by a Catholic millionaire, because he would not consent to the veto. "What!" exclaimed the indignant Sir, "a plebeian to cast his church scruples in the path of my liberty and promotion?" This may not be the feelings of the class at present, but the contrary does not appear; Shiel, for instance, has often prescribed the omnipotent sanative of gold. And should the Catholic clergy at last, worn out by the pressure of want, and endless agitation, and despair of conciliating the Protestant middle classes (the aristocracy some say are hopeless,) abandon themselves to the golden tongue of the Irish Catholic gentry and the English government (in some crisis of the Papal temporal power) young men may live to see one of the most wretched ascendancies that ever cursed even this island. And oh! what a shameful fall was there; that the church who has waged three centuries of successful war against England, who the first among all Catholic churches in Europe has, in those modern times, solemnized the union of the sternest Catholic principle with the most liberal constitutional liberty, that she should bend her proud neck to the gold collar of the English imperialist, and, at last, expire under the weight of boards, commissions, trusteeships, &c., &c., entrusted to her care for the benefit of imperial centralization. Welcome, a thousand times welcome, the puritan trooper and his Cromwellian bloodhound; welcome the mountain altar and the traitor mass, rather than such a degradation. It is death—the worst of deaths—the death of the anti-national, clerical, felon amid the execration of a confiding and betrayed people.

In these hurried lines some disagreeable facts have been stated, facts to which many persons, no doubt, would prefer extending the amnesty of death. What good is it, you ask, to exhibit the Catholic prelates, John O'Grady, archbishop of Tuam, Thomas O'Carroll, archbishop of Cashel, and Thomas O'Hogan, bishop of Killaloe, sitting in parliament, in St. Canice's cathedral, with English barons, and pronouncing sentence of excommunication against all who should presume to admit, any of the "nations of the Irish" into any Anglo-Irish church, monastery or benefice? Why this—it simply exhibits the ecclesiastical policy of England, it proves that if England were Catholic to-morrow, the woes of Ireland were not over, because the old system, as exemplified in Naples and Sicily, might be revived, and finally it indicates Father Ventura's parallel.

But we hope the time is at hand when England can no longer make any Irish church an accomplice in misgovernment, when all who are not ashamed, or are obliged, or love to live in Ireland will combine to manage their own affairs in their own country, and allow the Irish Catholic clergy to be as retiring as Giraldus Cambrensis, and his turbulent Norman clergy, found them centuries ago. The fear of Catholic ascendancy under a national government in the present age, when Pius IX. opens the ghetto, when the French clergy proclaim liberty and equality, when Catholic and Protestant are rivalling each other in preserving whatever of good there is in our history, when the young men of all parties are rapidly forming, what Ireland never had—a united, intelligent, and resident middle class, the class which will rule Ireland; the fear of any ascendancy in such times is one of those phenomena which could not be believed if many of the most famous Orange wreckers had not quietly perished by famine in the ditches round Dungannon, in 1847. And yet the fear really exists, not only among the veterans of the Orange party and the aspirants to high ecclesiastical promotion (in both of whom it is natural) but even among many who have nothing to gain but much to lose by things as they are. From such a shadow of national death may all honest men be speedily delivered.

Acta Sanctorum.

THE BOLLANDISTS.—LITERARY TOUR.

IV.

THE inscription on the tomb of Papebroch is rigorously true:

Quod Rosneydus prepararat
Quod Bollandus inchoarat
Quod Henschenius formarat
Perfectit Papebrochius.

It is true, if not of the "Acta," at least of the museum of the saints. Papebroch's father was a wealthy merchant of Hamburg, who emigrated to Antwerp in order to enjoy his religion in peace. He bequeathed all his wealth to his son, who devoted it all to the Bollandist library. The tour to Rome both enriched the collection with valuable accessions, and made it real and comparative value known to its founders. Henschenius was amazed at finding nothing equal to it before his arrival in Italy; and even after nine months' residence in Rome, his surprise was still not removed. The Papal collection, and those of some princes, it is true, contained more rare and more numerous articles, but as a general museum not one of them could be compared to the museum at Antwerp.

It is not merely to indulge ourselves on a delightful topic that we enter into some details on this point, for it is really the most essential part of the subject. The Bollandist museum is the cradle of the "Acta," the trophy of the saints, the permanent home of the hagiologists; their tent in labour and in rest—in truth almost their tomb. It was in the act of tottering out of it, after correcting a sheet, that Bollandus was struck with the paralysis that carried him off. Henschenius was paying it his last visit, when he, too, was struck at the very door; and Papebroch, at the age of eighty-six, and after losing his sight, still continued to dwell in that monument of the lights of Christianity.

Let us recall our reader's attention a moment to our first paper. When Rosweyde died, it was asked whether the manuscripts which he had collected in his cabinet should be abandoned to decay (tineis esset blattisque relinquenda) or preserved. The latter alternative was adopted; Bollandus, who was appointed legate, found all the materials piled in confusion in the library at Antwerp. He succeeded in obtaining for himself two chambers in the upper story, where he stored up by themselves all that he had received from Rosweyde. This apartment was very high, narrow, lighted from the roof, and so dark that even in noon day a candle was required in the corners of it. The books and manuscripts were piled here so closely that it was difficult to distinguish and count them. As long as Bollandus worked alone, his practiced eye and tenacious memory supplied a sure thread in this labyrinth. Still it sometimes happened that after a four days' search for a book he was obliged to give it up in despair. But when he had a fellow-labourer it was impossible that each of them could respect the mental catalogue of the other. The printing once commenced, scattered sheets, proofs, reserved pieces, and other incumbances, increased their embarrassment. An unexpected letter sometimes threw them into complete confusion. Every day, from twenty different quarters, letters were received giving the first and last lines of certain lives of the saints, and inquiring whether they had them. To ascertain it, they were obliged to turn over those chaos mountains of documents; dunned in the mean time by impatient messengers. In a word, Bollandus and Henschenius often remained, lamp in hand, until eleven o'clock, in the depth of winter, searching their two garrets. The whole month of January was compiled while the materials were in this disordered state, and the work still bears the marks of its laborious production.

By degrees inventories introduced some order into those mazy compilations. But it was not before the year 1660, after the journey to Rome, that they undertook to compile a general alphabetical catalogue of all the saints whom they had then discovered. Nothing but the old age and increasing infirmities of Bollandus could induce them to change the scene of their labours.

They succeeded in obtaining, over the refectory, in their house at Antwerp a large apartment, well aired and lighted : a long desk, breast high, extended through the whole room ; above it was ranged, in order for each month, a case, in which every day had its own drawer, for the manuscript documents and detached pieces. The rest of the apartment was furnished with shelves for books and the more ponderous manuscripts, arrayed in order under the general headings, general history, particular histories of bishoprics, abbeys, and other ecclesiastical institutions ; next, general lives of the saints, monographs, proper offices, breviaries, and other liturgical books. These details may appear trifling, but it is sweet to breathe in spirit the air of this sanctuary, and to become familiar with its very looks.

This was the Bollandist museum, over which one might justly write the inscription of Serapion, τήσ-φύξης ιατρείον : anima pharmacum. But philosophy, Omar of civilization, which burned all libraries because all knowledge was compressed into its own "Koran"—philosophy, in the day of its evil ascendancy, scattered the Bollandist museum to the winds, and of all the treasures which devoted industry and liberality had collected there, we have but a catalogue : even the specific inventory of manuscripts is lost. A few stray sketches may be discerned here and there ; and surely we may be allowed to study them with as much respect as the traveller gives to the remnants of Grecian or Roman genius which have escaped the destroying hand of Vandal or of Turk.

Papebroch states that during his tour to Rome, alone, he had collected more than a thousand "acts of saints," who had been hitherto either unknown or known from the brief notice in a martyrology only. In the city of Rome he found seven hundred. Four hundred others were restored to their original integrity, and two hundred and seventy acts of the Saints of the Eastern Church were preserved in the original texts. If we judge from the ninety-nine volumes which were intended as materials for the three last months of the "Acta," the collection for the whole year must have comprised more than four hundred volumes. An inventory, taken by an imperial commissioner when the Jesuits were dispersed, gives the number of 449 manuscript volumes ; "and this number," as Mr. Marshal observes in his notice of the "Bibliothèque de Bourgogne, Brussels," "would be much greater if the commissioner had specified the separate documents included in the same collection, the works bound up in the same volume, and the different papers marked with the same figure."

The original catalogue of these 449 manuscripts is lost ; there remains only a note concerning seventy-six of them, divided into two parts, one containing twenty-five, the other fifty-one, the only ones which were left to the Bollandists for the continuation of their labours, after their removal to the Abbey of Cauberg by Joseph II. This piece of imperial robbery is gravely attributed, in the official document, "to the generous solicitude of his Majesty for the success of a literary work which had always commanded his special patronage and sympathy."

In one of these catalogues are marked an "Eusebius," a "Rule of St. Benedict," a "Pliny," and a "Julius Cæsar," which were said to be very ancient, together with the "Annals of Antwerp," a posthumous work of Papebroch. But the Bollandists were deprived of the use of several other of their most valuable works, such as three ancient collections of the "Canons of the Church," all anterior to Burchard's ; the "Russo-Sclavonic and Muscovite Calendar," which had been presented by Baron de Spazwenfeldt, a descendant of St. Bridget of Sweden ; and the most ancient copy extant in Belgium of the works of St. Cesarius, which had been given to the Bollandists out of Bellarmine's collection.

Of the printed works the catalogue is extant in two large folio volumes. It appears that they exceeded 8,000, but their chief value was their rarity, selection, and the special subjects which they treated. Papebroch states that in his own time they had not less than 400 lives of particular saints, and 200 histories of cities, bishoprics, and monasteries of Italy, in the Italian language alone.

But to remove all obstacles to the triumphant progress of their work, the Bollandists extended their researches to all points, by means of an extensive and organised literary correspondence. Their museum was brought into communication with all the great literary treasures in Europe, and became, so to speak, a central counting-house for the literary world. They paid with rich interest any new capital forwarded to them. It is computed that Father du Sollier alone wrote 12,000 letters, of which a register was kept in a work destined exclusively for correspondence on the hagiological subjects ; and yet du Sollier's was certainly not the most extensive correspondence. The letters were often accompanied with dissertations, notes, and long memoirs. The increasing importance of the work gradually raised the house at Antwerp to the first rank among those of the order. It was the centre not merely of hagiological labours, but of many other works of literature and religion. Thus, almost all the "Lettres Edifiantes" of the missionaries passed through the hands of the Bollandists. There are still extant at Brussels large collections of documents relating to the history of China and Japan exclusively ; and among others, almost all the letters of Father Verbiest. The new Bollandists have in their possession some invaluable portions of that immense correspondence, in the autographs or with the signature of Bollandus and most of his successors, together with those of their learned brethren Fronton le Duc, Hardouin, Sirmond, Labbe, Jouveney, Lancinius, Poussin, Kircher ; as also those of Leibnitz, Muratori, Pagi Ciampini, Saxius, Magliabecchi, and Cardinals Fontanini, D'Aguire, Ursin, Tholomei, Barberini, and Bellarmine.

We have already heard the voice of that great man encouraging Rosweyde, and predicting the accomplishment of the glorious work, stupendous though it appeared at the time.

In going over this immense collection of letters, and communing with those great spirits in every quarter of the globe—seeing them in turn amiable and learned, candid and profound, we felt a charm which we would fain communicate to our readers. It was Raphael's dream of the school of Athens realised, but with that air of faith, humility, and Christian charity which the gardens of the Academicians never knew. This elegant correspondence, which was blessed by the saints, as it was commenced for their glory, is so very different from the literary correspondence of the present day, that it would look like a fable of the golden age if we laid specimens of it before our readers. Some idea must be given of it, however, because the Bollandists, whose tours have been already described, cannot be known in their every day life—the interior bustle of their museum cannot come home to us except through their correspondence. Bollandus commences his work like one of the patriarchs of old; as soon as his treasures begin to accumulate, he scatters them with more than regal profusion. Thus he gave Father Bucher the five “Opuscula,” which made him a name: to Father Sirmund he gave a whole volume of Archbishop Hincmar, and to André Duchesne the “Annals of St. Bertin,” and several other manuscripts to other literati, who, in return, contributed valuable aid in elucidating the difficult questions which were occasionally started in the extensive field of the “Acta Sanctorum.”

But the liberality of Bollandus was not confined to these men whose fame was already recognised in the republic of letters. Thus Father Lahier, a native of Lorraine, received from him copious notes for a calendar of Holy Virgins; to Father Lisen, a native of Liege, he gave full materials for a history of that city; and at the request of two Irishmen, then unknown to fame, Ward and John Colgan, he patiently examined that obscure labyrinth, the chronology and history of the saints of England and Ireland.

The Plantinian press was then in as great request as that of the Elzevirs, and it was through Bollandus that applications were generally addressed for its use. But, not content with giving his kind services for that end, he often undertook the trouble of correcting the sheets, and received frequently, as a compensation, the appointment of universal legatee to the manuscripts of celebrated authors. Thus Father Lancicius bequeathed to him all his works, and the good father published them in two large volumes, every sheet of which was corrected with his own hand. From another intimate friend, Father Casimir Sarbievius, he received a volume of poems, which were then highly esteemed, and regarded almost as classics. Bollandus, who was himself an admirable classical scholar, and a poet too, accepted the present, and, as he was wont, summoned to his aid the best classical scholars of the day to lend their charms to the preface, title-page, and dedication of the “modern Horace.” Even from the distant plains of the Catholic but now unhappy Poland, he received a letter from Father Hincska, requesting twenty-six steel engravings from the Plantinian press. The request could not, of course, be refused, being made for the most valuable volume of the “Bibliothica Mariana,” namely, that Polish work so highly prized, “The Life of the Blessed Virgin and the Infancy of Jesus.” Two theologians, Guismar, and Wadding, the Irishman, applied to him from Bohemia to have their ponderous tomes published by the same famous printers. The same favour was obtained, by his means for “a Funeral Oration on Frederic II.,” by his confessor; for the “Tides of the Sea,” by Moret;

the ascetical works of Nieremberguis, and the publications of Garzia de Valle.

Of course his kind offices could not be refused to his own society, which entrusted him with an edition of its statutes, nor to his devoted patrons, the Abbots of Liessies, for whom he published an edition of the works of Louis de Blois, to which he prefixed a life of the author.

But what episodes were crowded into the life of this extraordinary man! One day a missionary from China, named Father Martin Martini, came to him from Rome, with an enormous map of the Celestial Empire. Neither Plantin, nor Meursius, nor any of the Catholic printers in the Low Countries could attempt the publication of that map. Bollandus, without a moment's hesitation, went to Blaen, of Amsterdam; the missionary was at once received like a mandarin in that Lutheran city; a hotel was assigned for him at the expense of the senate, and the great Protestant printing press published the Map of China, dedicated to the Pope, compiled by a Jesuit, illustrated with Papist notes, and consecrated to the glory and diffusion of Catholic propagandism.

Father Bollandus had his eye ever watchful over all the interests of the Church. He was one of the first to detect and denounce the rising scourge of Jansenism. He kept up on that subject a close and almost daily correspondence with the Nuncio at Cologne. Henschenius and Papebroch found at Rome whole piles of those letters, which were then carefully preserved by the same nuncio after his elevation to the popedom, under the title of Alexander VII.

To the last moment of his life, the indefatigable old man was ever liberal of whatever strength and time his infirmities and professional labours left at his disposal. Shortly before his death, and as if to prepare him for it, Providence entrusted to his care, as the last act of his devotion, the printing of the “Euthanasia,” or “Meditations on a Happy Death,” of Father Weischer. Even when he was on his death-bed, they brought another work for his sanction, namely, “Moral Instructions taken from the Lives of the Saints.” He gave his opinion in favour of the publication of the work, and these were the last words he uttered before his agony. On the very day that he received the last sacraments, one of the superiors of the society wrote to him from Rome, and addressed him as the great pillar of science in all matters regarding the veneration of the saints; but before this eulogy came to its destination he was dead, and, let us hope, enjoying the society of the saints for whose glory he had laboured.

In a preceding article, some account has been given of the letters written by Father Henschenius during his tour to Rome. The relations he had contracted in that journey naturally brought on a correspondence, and enriched the Bollandist museum with many valuable letters. He left Father Possin after him at Rome to superintend and urge on the copyists in that city and throughout Italy. Father Kircher counted on his kind help for the circulation of his works in the Low Countries. Father Combefis sent him the acts of a St. Peter, of Mount Athos; and Father Quetif, in the name of his order, presented to those Bollandists all the literary labours of that learned Dominican.

Some years ago there was extant a collection of letters written to Papebroch from 1680 to 1700, but, unfortunately, we have not been able to consult it; his correspondence was more extensive than that of any of the Bollandists, and it gives a connected history of all the controversies to which their work had given rise. The letters would form a subject for a separate paper. Among them are several from Leibnitz, who, with characteristic candour and nobleness of soul, aids the Bollandists, and contributes to the circulation of their work. Some letters of Pagi on chronology, and of Schelesdat on hagiographical criticism, especially regarding the Roman Breviary, with others from l'Abbe Chatelain, Hardouin, and, above all, Mabillon, are still extant in the same collection.

It is pleasing to find in this correspondence a name worthy of being cited after those of Bellarmine and Mabillon; Muratori has also contributed his share of those letters, which are monuments so creditable of Christian greatness and simplicity. Father Jenninck, one of the youngest of the Bollandists, sent him some critical notes on the edition of St. Paulinus, which was Muratori's first great work. The learned editor at once acknowledged the kindness in the most cordial and candid manner. "You have conferred a very great favour on me," he writes; "nothing could be more welcome to me than your last letter. In suggesting the true reading of several passages of my 'Paulinus,' which I had mistaken, you have corrected, with the kindness of a friend and the profound skill of the critic, my sad attempts at correction. I cannot express to you how deeply grateful I feel that, overwhelmed as you are with far more important concerns, you could have spared time to bestow a thought on me. I am not at all surprised that a person of your learning should have found many faults in that book; but, allow me to confess my impudence. I published the edition of 'Paulinus' in a hurry, and without consulting a single person of competent judgment, or asking the opinion of any censor. And if you ask 'whence such effrontery?' I can only answer that I was urged on by an irresistible propensity to make my name appear in the world of letters, that I had no regard for the 'Lima' of Horace or his other sage precepts; in a word, that I was only twenty-five years of age. Here is my apology, if such it be, and not an aggravation of my faults, and I have no delicacy in making it known to the most indulgent of my friends. I have recorded all your corrections in my work, so that should my 'Saint Paulinus' see a second edition it will be with your amended readings. Should you detect similar faults in my other publications, please make them known to me; be assured that I will receive it as an act of great kindness at your hands." In another letter, he commences thus: "Do you remember a Muratori who once had the honour of being inscribed among your friends? I hope you do. Permit him now to protest against your silence. He can no longer endure this long interruption of our friendly relations. You are now, I suppose, under the care of your good father, and making a rapid progress in the vast career of your labours. Do spare time to let me know whether you have forgotten me. If there be any favour you require from the most serene Duke of Modena, you know how you can count, not indeed on the intellectual services of my head, but on a heart that is ever and affectionately yours." This is not the mere politeness of the scholar, for Muratori mourns, like a fervent and devoted Catholic, over the evils with which the Church in his day was afflicted. "Let us pray the ever good and most high God, to grant us the fortitude of patience, and the cure of our souls, that we may receive with calmness and profit the strokes with which He visits us. Literature, assuredly, will suffer; and I fear we cannot pursue our labours with tranquillity of mind; but O, may religion, at least, escape uninjured; may the Swedes be arrested in their invasion of Poland, and the turbulent disciples of Calvin in another quarter be hushed to repose."

With these extracts from the amiable Muratori we close the notice on the Bollandist collection. If the length of the extracts from his letters needed any apology, we would give it at the risk of adding to the offence, by citing another passage of his own flowing and Ciceronian Latin: "Dulce est eruditionis sectatoribus quotidie cum mortuis versari: dulcius profecto futurum, cum vivis a quibus brevi, facilique compendio, eruditior in dies discedas."

This account of the Bollandist collection naturally suggests some thoughts on the manuscript and monumental evidences of our own national history, which are far more numerous than many of our readers imagine. A short visit to the Royal Irish Academy shows that the convulsions by which Ireland has been tortured during many a long century have spared enough to enable the scholar to trace the history of civilization, and to prove that the glory of other days is not the enthusiast's dream. Of those who have commenced, and are every day increasing, at great expense, the collection in the Academy, we are afraid to speak as we feel—they belong in general to that party which had been long identified with oppression, and from whom no national good was expected; and yet they have been silently erecting a monument of unpretending patriotism which will make future scholars describe them—as more Irish than the Irish themselves. The Anglo-Normans of old, preferred Irish language, laws, and dress to those of the English. The same principle is operating at present, and fervently we pray that it may produce greater fruit. Catholics have welcomed with such enthusiasm all indications of Protestant nationality, that the very extravagance of their eulogy must have often defeated its own end.

Review.

ARCHÆOLOGIA HIBERNICA. A Handbook of Irish Antiquities, Pagan and Christian. By WILLIAM F. WAKEMAN, M'GLASHAN, Dublin.

THIS interesting little volume is, we hope, the pioneer of more extensive inquiries into the important subject of which it treats. A great deal has been written and published relative to our national antiquities, but until very lately these publications reflected little credit on the country or its historic monuments. Our antiquaries of a former period might be divided into two classes, and it would be difficult to determine which party proved more dangerous to the subject which they attempted to illustrate: there were visionaries who went on dreaming of an undefined degree of remote antiquity, who would, were you inclined to give credence to their fancies, persuade you that

"Of Eve's first fire they had a cinder."

But having pored over their dull tomes, you felt a certain misgiving as to the amount of enlightenment you had received, and if not sufficiently enthusiastic to stomach Vallancey, you probably terminated your inquiries in downright scepticism. The object of these investigators, however, was laudable, although their means were far from being justifiable. Truth was unfortunately sacrificed to the weakness of heightening our veneration for the past, by sending it back a few centuries in the stream of time. The second class of authors differed from the former in their object, which was to depreciate the antiquity of our historic monuments. They treated our antiquities as the remains of works of foreign invaders—the Danes; or of Popish superstition, ignorance, and all that sort of thing. Whatever they could not with any appearance of reason attribute to the latter, was freely bestowed upon the former; hence Dr. Ledwich gravely informs us that certain symbols which we know to have a Christian signification, are runic knots and so forth. Of these conflicting sets opinions the former were the more estimable, not that they contained more truth, but because, in the time they were set forth, they were calculated to excite in the minds of some persons a love and reverence for the old land, while the latter could only contribute to an ignorant contempt of our history and neglect of its monuments.

To what cause soever it may be attributed, it is certain that the remains of antiquity with which our country abounds, have been, with very few exceptions, completely neglected by what are called the “better classes.” The peasantry regarded with affectionate veneration the visible memorials of their ancient church, and were often scandalized at seeing their “betters” laying ruthless hands on the remains of holy places. Till about twenty years ago, a beautiful traceried window remained in the remote little church of Moyagher, in the county Meath. It had escaped the first shock of devastation, and withstood the damaging effects of weather for many a year. The poor people pointed to it with pride; and often as they returned from mass or a neighbour’s funeral, stayed to admire its intricate foliations and skilful workmanship. It was too much, however, for serfs to enjoy, so a neighbouring baronet, being engaged in building a residence for himself, which he called a “castle” (although it bears no more resemblance to a knightly stronghold than a Roman cement conventicle does to an ancient cathedral), tore it down from its old place, and set it up in the new castle, where it is as much in place as an old knight’s helmet would be on the cranium of the worthy baronet. As “civilization” and the “spread of enlightenment” have advanced, the peasantry appear to have grown more apathetic, so that it is no uncommon thing now to see places desecrated and ruined which were formerly held sacred. We think, however, that the circulation of such works as Mr. Wakeman’s will do much in exciting a love and reverence for Irish antiquities, principally by the dissemination of correct information relative to their dates, eras, and uses.

In the preface to the Archæologia the writer speaks of the indifference of many of our tourists and pleasure seekers to the claims of their own country, in the following terms:

“Yet most of our travelled countrymen are better acquainted with the appearance of the Rhine than with that of the Shannon; with the windings of the Thames than with those of the Boyne; their knowledge of these Irish rivers being probably just so much as may be acquired out of a school geography, while they have steamed down the Thames, and visited the chief points upon the Rhine.

“We may venture to say that in like manner there are, even among our Tipperary gentry, many better skilled in the fortifications of the Rock of Gibraltar, than in the exquisite monuments of ancient Irish piety and art remaining upon the Rock of Cashel, in their own county; many who, in England, Scotland, Wales, and upon the Continent, have sought mountain air and scenery, while the Galtees, the Reeks, and the sublime range of the Mourne Mountains had never cost them a thought. It would be at least out of place, in a volume such as we now present, to trace to its source this feeling, or rather want of feeling, by which so many Irishmen are ruled. It must be granted that Ireland—though generally rich in every point attractive to the tourist, whether the mere pleasure-seeker, or artist, antiquary, or geologist—has generally been described by book-makers as a country wherein, if indeed a man might pass in safety, he would still suffer so much from want of accommodation, &c., that, unless he possessed some presence of mind, and a considerable taste for the ridiculous, his time and talents had better be employed elsewhere. These writers were, almost without exception, strangers to the country—men whose knowledge of the Irish, previous to their visit, appears to have been derived from the stage, whereon it was, and perhaps still is, the fashion to represent us as marvellously fond of fighting, drinking, bulls, blunders, and superstition. Our neighbours appear to have been greatly amused with these representations, and with ballads and other publications which tended to show Irishmen and manners in the same light; and as the “squireens,” who form a numerous class in Ireland, and indeed too many of the gentry, were accustomed to adopt this cant, even when it tended to their own discredit—because they deemed it more aristocratic, in proportion as it pointed against the “mere Irish”—a very general disregard of everything Irish arose, and has continued, though in a decreasing degree, even to our own days. Happily there is a sign of better times.”

And with reference to subjects of interest to the archæologist, he continues:

“The subject of Irish Antiquities has latterly excited considerable attention, not only in Ireland, but even in countries beyond the limits of the British empire. Much has been done already, yet much more remains to be done. It is not sufficient to have shown that Ireland contains an unbroken series of monuments, many of them historical, which lead us back, step by step, to a period long before the conversion of her people to Christianity—to have formed museums—to have translated other annals and manuscripts relating to her history and antiquities; a feeling should be awakened in the breasts of the people generally, to preserve with scrupulous care the numerous remains of early Irish art with which the country abounds, and which frequently, in local history, form our only records. The anxiety which the various governments of Europe, even the most despotic, evince for the preservation of their antiquities, shows how widely their importance is recognized.”

The work is divided into three parts. The first portion treats of “Pagan Antiquities,” including cromlechs, druidical circles, pillar stones, raths, and sepulchral cairns. We extract the following description of the cairn of Dowth, which has been recently opened:

“Of the internal arrangement of this huge cairn, little, until very recently, was known beyond the fact that it was different from that of the monument last described, inasmuch as, instead of one great gallery leading directly towards the centre of the pile, there appeared here the remains of two passages in a very ruinous state, and completely stopped up, neither of which, however, seemed to have conducted towards a grand central chamber. The Committee of Antiquities of the Royal Irish Academy having, in the course of last autumn (1847), obtained permission from the trustees of the Netterville Charity, the present proprietors of the Dowth estate, to explore the interior of the tumulus, the work was commenced and carried on at considerable cost, under the immediate direction of Mr. Frith, one of the county engineers. It should be observed that, from the difficulty of sinking a shaft among the loose, dry stones of which this hill, like that of Newgrange, is entirely composed, Mr. Frith, in order to arrive at the great central chamber which was supposed to exist, adopted the plan of making an open cutting from the base of the mound towards its centre. The first discovery was that of a cruciform chamber, upon the western side, formed of stones of enormous size, every way similar to those at Newgrange, and exhibiting the same style of decoration. A rude sarcophagus, bearing a great resemblance to that in the eastern recess at Newgrange, of which we have given an illustration in page 30, was found in the centre. It had been broken into several pieces, but the fragments have all been found, and placed together, so as to afford a perfect idea of its original form. In clearing away the rubbish with which the chamber was found nearly filled, the workmen discovered a large quantity of the bones of animals in a half-burned state, and mixed with small shells.

“A pin of bronze and two small knives of iron were also discovered. With respect to instruments of iron being found in a monument of so early a date, we may observe, that in the 'Annals of Ulster' there occurs a record of this mound, as well as of several others in the neighbourhood, having been searched by the Northmen of Dublin as early as A. D. 862: 'On one occasion that the three kings, Amlaif, Imar, and Ainsle, were plundering the territory of Flann, the son of Coaing;' and it is an interesting fact that the knives are precisely similar, in every respect, to a number discovered, together with a quantity of other antiques, in the bog near Dunshaughlin, and which there is reason to refer to a period between the ninth and the beginning of the eleventh centuries. Upon the chamber being cleared out, a passage twenty-seven feet in length was discovered, the sides of which incline considerably, leading in a westerly direction towards the side of the mound, and composed, like the similar passage at Newgrange, of enormous stones, placed edgewise, and covered in with large flags. The chamber, though of inferior size to that at Newgrange, is constructed so nearly upon the same plan, that a description of the one might almost serve for that of the other. The recesses, however, do not contain basins—and a passage extending in a southerly direction, communicating with a series of small crypts, forms here another peculiarity. A huge stone, in height nine, in breadth eight feet, placed between the northern and eastern recesses, is remarkable for the singular character of its carving.

"A portion of the work upon this stone bears great resemblance to Ogham writing. A sepulchral chamber, of a quadrangular form, the stones of which bear a great variety of carving (among which the cross, a symbol which neither in the old nor the "new" world can be considered as peculiar to Christianity, is conspicuous), has been discovered upon the southern side of the mound. Here, as elsewhere, during the course of excavation, the workmen found vast quantities of bones, half-burned, many of which proved to be human; "several unburned bones of horses,* pigs, deer, and birds, portions of the heads of the short-horned variety of the ox, and the head of a fox."† They also found a star-shaped amulet of stone, a ring of jet, several beads, and some bones fashioned like pins. Among the stones of the upper portion of the cairn were discovered a number of globular balls of stone, the size of small eggs, which Dr. Wilde supposes probably to have been sling-stones. Up to the time of our writing, no other chambers have been found; but, as the works are still in progress, further discoveries may yet be made; and even now the gentlemen of the Academy may feel that their undertaking has been most successful. A double circle of stones appears anciently to have surrounded this cairn. Of these the greater number lie buried, but in summer-time their position, particularly after a long continuance of sunny weather, is shown by the remarkably dry and withered appearance of the grass above them.

"Among the trees between the mound of Dowth and the mansion are the remains of a small sepulchral chamber; and a little to the east of the house the student will find a grand specimen of the ancient military encampment, or rath."

Leaving the subject of "Pagan Antiquities," around the origin and use of which so much uncertainty yet exists, we turn into the surer path of Christian antiquity:

"Long had it been considered as an established fact, that the churches of Ireland, previously to the twelfth century, were altogether constructed of wood, or wattles daubed with clay; and that consequently there remained in the country not a single example of church architecture of a period much antecedent to A. D. 1148, in which year died Malachy O'Morgair, who is stated to have erected the first building of stone which had ever appeared in Ireland. The well-directed labours of one true antiquary—who, leaving the beaten track of what was misalled investigation, sought among our antiquities themselves for evidences by which their era might be determined, and in our hitherto neglected manuscripts, for notices relative to such structures as were in use at the time of their composition—have lately shown how little a question so interesting to every lover of Ireland was understood, even by the most judicious writers of the many who had dwelt upon the subject.

"With Dr. Petrie, indeed, rests the honour of having removed the veil of obscurity which had so long shrouded the subject of our ecclesiastical antiquities, and to have shown that Ireland not only contains examples of church architecture of the earliest period of Christianity in the kingdom, but also that they exhibit many characteristics of unrivalled interest. Following Dr. Petrie upon a subject which he has taken so much care to elucidate, we could not hope to bring forward much new matter; and, even were it in our power to do so, the brevity of this volume would preclude more than a general sketch. We shall treat the subject broadly, pointing out the more striking features of what may with justice be styled our national architecture, but leaving its more minute, though not less interesting details for the future study of any who may wish to pursue the inquiry."

The second part describes the general characteristics of our early Christian antiquities, including oratories, churches, crosses, and round towers. No new information is afforded us on these subjects, beyond that already communicated by Dr. Petrie, in his "Inquiry into the Origin and Uses of the Round Towers of Ireland." The chapter on "Crosses" contains a description, with illustrations, of the crosses at Monasterboice, two of the most perfect and beautiful of those interesting memorials of the ancient church of Ireland. The subject, however, is not capable of being sufficiently illustrated within the compass of a short chapter. A goodly volume might be made up of descriptions of those remains of our ancestors' piety and art. They are not, as many persons suppose, confined to churchyards and market-places, but are found—silent witnesses of the ancient faith—by the way side, and in the lonely recesses of our valleys. A fragment of a singularly beautiful cross was lately discovered in the valley of Glendaloch. It differs from any ancient Irish cross we have seen, and is of more ornamental character than the other crosses which are to be found in the same locality. It consists of the stem of a standard cross, which must have been about six feet in height. The arms and head are lost. The front is sculptured with a figure in good relief of an ecclesiastic in alb and chausable. The head of the figure is so mutilated, that it is impossible to determine whether it is that of a bishop or a priest. Above this the lower half of a figure of our Saviour is seen, also executed in bold relief, and with considerable artistic skill. The back and sides of the cross are sculptured with net-work of curious design. This interesting relic of antiquity has been removed to the chancel of the new church of St. Kevin, lest, like many other valuable memorials, it might become the prey of "curiosity" hunters. We cannot leave the subject of crosses without quoting the following allusion, by Mr. Wakeman, to sepulchral monuments, in which we heartily agree with him:

"A simple flag-stone, inscribed with a name, and sculptured with the sacred symbol of Christianity, such as it was the custom among the early Irish Christians to place over the grave of an eminent man, forms a striking contrast to the tablets which too often disfigure the walls of our cathedral and parish churches. Many remains of this class lie scattered among the ancient and often neglected graveyards of Ireland, but they are every day becoming more rare, as the country stone-cutters, by whom they are regarded with but slight veneration, frequently form out of their materials modern tombstones, defacing the ancient inscription.

The second part of the "Archæologia" closes with a chapter on Round Towers, in which some of the opinions formerly entertained with regard to their origin and uses are briefly examined. The author is of opinion that the proverbial mystery of the towers has been "dispelled completely and for ever by Dr. Petrie," and gives the following conclusions of the learned Doctor:

"I. That the towers are of Christian and ecclesiastical origin, and were erected at various periods between the fifth and thirteenth centuries.

"II. That they were designed to answer, at least, a twofold use, namely: to serve as belfries, and as keeps, or places of strength, in which the sacred utensils, books, relics, and other valuables, were deposited, and into which the ecclesiastics to whom they belonged could retire for security, in cases of a sudden attack.

* At Rathmullen, in the county of Down, similar bones, mixed with cinders and charcoal, and covered over with an earthen mound, occur.

† See Dr. Wilde's interesting paper on the Boyne, in the Dublin University Magazine for December, 1847.

"III. That they were probably also used, when occasion required, as beacons and watch-towers.

"That these conclusions were arrived at after a long and patient investigation, not only of the architectural peculiarities of the numerous round towers, but also of the ecclesiastical structures usually found in connexion with them, is sufficiently shown by many references to, and illustrations of examples scattered over the whole island. But Dr. Petrie, also, with the assistance of the best Celtic scholars in Ireland, sought in our annals and in our ancient MSS. [fortunately not a few] for references to such buildings as it was the custom of the Irish to erect; and from this hitherto neglected source of information, much of the light which he has thrown upon the subject of ancient Irish ecclesiology has been derived. The third and remaining portion of Dr. Petrie's work, it is to be hoped, will soon appear. But to our subject. There is but little variety to be observed in the construction or details of the round towers.

Mr. Wakeman then gives the following description of the characteristic features of those national monuments:

"DOORWAYS.—In form similar to those which we have described as characteristic of the early churches, but they are generally more highly ornamented, and appear to have been furnished with double doors. They are placed almost invariably at a considerable elevation above the ground. A flat projecting band, with a small bead-moulding at the angles, is the most usual decoration, but in some instances a human head, sculptured in bold relief, is found upon each side of the arch. A stone immediately above the doorway of Antrim tower exhibits a cross sculptured in alto-relievo; and at Donoughmore, in the county of Meath, a figure of the Crucifixion occupies a similar position. This style of decoration may have been much more common than is generally supposed, as of the number of towers remaining in Ireland the doorways of at least one-third have been destroyed. Concentric arches, with chevron and other mouldings, occur at Timahoe and at Kildare.

"WINDOWS AND APERTURES.—Generally similar in form to those in contemporaneous churches, with this difference, that they never splay, and that the arch-head in numerous examples is of a different form upon the interior from the exterior. The tower was usually divided into stories, the floors of which were supported by projections of the masonry, or by brackets. Each story, except the highest, was generally lighted by one small window: the highest has generally four of large size. A conical roof of stone completed the building."

From the occurrence of concentric semicircular arches and chevron and other mouldings, English ecclesiologists have concluded that the edifices in which these features are found cannot be of an older date than the twelfth century.

The third part, "ANGLO-IRISH REMAINS," treats of that portion of Irish antiquities which is likely to prove the most interesting to the ecclesiologist and student of mediæval art, and we regret to find that it lacks much of the information we would wish to obtain. Dr. Petrie, in his great work, has satisfactorily demonstrated the peculiarities which distinguish our Ant-Norman edifices from the contemporaneous buildings of other countries. He has also described their arrangement and proportions. We should wish the same information were afforded us relative to the more elaborate and elegant architecture of a later period. We should also desire to see the precise characteristics of the several periods of Irish ecclesiastical architecture pointed out; and the distinguishing features of the various districts (such as the half-church, half-castle churches of the borders of the old English pale,) illustrated. Another subject of interesting inquiry would be the difference in character of monastic churches of the same period, belonging to the several religious orders. This would, properly speaking, be an Ecclesiologia Hibernica, and would aid in preserving for future ages memorials of our fathers' piety and art, which time or sacrilegious hands may have destroyed, before a wiser generation may bethink themselves of turning into the ancient ways, and of treading in the "footmarks of their sires."

A few of the principal of our "Anglo-Irish remains," such as St. Patrick's and Christ's Church Cathedrals, Dublin, are described in a general way with dates and names of the founders, some few of the less pretending, though no less interesting churches situated in rural districts are likewise illustrated. With regard to these the author observes, that

"Down to the very latest period of Gothic architecture, the original plan of a simple nave, or nave and chancel, was followed, and the chief or only difference observable in churches of a very late date from those of the sixth and seventh centuries, consists in the form of the arch-heads, the position of the doorway (the style of the masonry of which is usually much better in the more ancient examples), and the use of bell-turrets, the cloigteach, or detached round tower having answered this purpose during the earlier ages. A beautiful and highly characteristic example of an early pointed church may be seen at Cannistown, not far from Bective, upon the opposite side of the river. As usual, it consists of a nave and chancel, and there are the remains of a bell-turret upon the west gable—the usual position. There are numerous examples of churches of this style scattered over the entire island, but they are usually plain, and the choir-arch is generally the plainest feature of the building."

Plain they are, surely, but unmistakeably churches—and contrast strongly in their unaffected simplicity or chaste and appropriate adornment, with the wretchedly mean barns, or expensive monstrosities which of late years we have been accustomed to erect for the service of religion. The foregoing extract contains a correct description of all that is essential for the fabric of a rural church. We hope that one of the good effects of such publications as Mr. Wakeman's will be, an improvement in our modern ecclesiastical architecture, by directing men's minds to the only standards of excellence which have yet been vouchsafed to us—the works of the old men who laboured in Faith and Hope. We are tempted to give the following long extract, descriptive of the singularly interesting church of St. Doulough, situated so near the Irish metropolis, and nevertheless so little known or cared for:

"The church of St. Doulough, the origin of which is involved in the deepest obscurity, is the most remarkable and unique example of pointed architecture remaining in Ireland. It stands at a distance of about four miles from Dublin, in the direction of Malahide, and has long occupied the attention of writers upon the subject of Irish antiquities. This church has been generally classed with the stone-roofed chapels and oratories of the early Irish saints; but its style is wholly different, and numerous architectural peculiarities, evidently original, prove the building to belong to the thirteenth century. In plan it is an oblong, with a low, square tower in the centre. A projection on the southern wall of the tower contains a passage leading from the upper part of the building to an exceedingly small chamber, in the eastern wall of which are two windows, one commanding the only entrance to the church, the other an altar in an apartment or chapel between the tower and the west gable. The body of the building is divided upon the interior by a mass of masonry which was evidently intended as a support to the roof, and which contains a small semicircular arch, now stopped up. The western apartment measures ten by seven and a-half feet: it is vaulted, and was anciently lighted by several windows, with square or trefoiled heads. The altar, or "tomb," as it is popularly called, rests immediately against the masonry which divides this apartment from other portions of the building. The chapel, or eastern apartment, measures twenty-one feet by nine and a-half. It was lighted by four windows, one to the east, two to the south, and one, now stopped up, to the north. The eastern window is larger than the others, and is divided into two lights by a shaft, with shallow hollows at the sides, and a semi-cylindrical moulding on its external face. Similar hollows, and a moulding, run round the arch, and meet those of the shafts. The northern window is of the plain, early, lancet form. The windows in the southern wall are unequal in size; the larger one is placed beneath the tower, near the centre of the building, and is divided by a shaft into two lights, the heads of which are cinque-foiled, while the space between them and the crown of the arch is left plain. The vaults of the lower apartments form the floor of acroft occupying, uninterruptedly, the whole length of the building. There are the remains of a fireplace in the centre of the northern wall of this singular room, which appears to have been used anciently as a habitation. It is lighted by small trefoiled windows in the end walls, and is higher, by several feet, for a distance of about four yards from the west gable, than in the other part. By this arrangement, and by a depression of the vault of the western division of the building, provision is made for a small intermediate apartment, to which a passage from the lower leads. The tower was divided by a wooden floor into two stories, the lower of which contains a small fireplace. The roof is formed of stones, well cut, and laid in regular courses. It has been suggested that the tower is more modern than the church. The upper portion is certainly different in its style of masonry from the rest of the building, and appears to be an ancient addition or restoration, but the body of the tower is clearly coeval with the church.

"Such are the more remarkable features of this singular and unexampled structure, in the erection of which the architect appears studiously to have avoided every principle of Gothic composition except variety.

"The well of St. Doulough, which was probably also used as a baptistry, is quite in keeping with the singular character of his church. The spring, which is covered by a stone-roofed, octagon building, rises through a circular basin, cut out of a single stone, and was, not many years ago, thought to possess miraculous powers. According to tradition, the interior of the octagon building was anciently decorated with pictures, and holes are pointed out as having been made by the iron pins by which they were fastened to the wall. Adjoining is a most curious subterranean bath; it is supplied by the well, and even yet the water rises to a considerable height within it. According to Mr. D'Alton, the well was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and the bath was called 'St. Catherine's Pond.'"

Mr. D'Alton says, the subjects of those paintings were the descent of the Holy Ghost and effigies of Saints Patrick, Brigid, and Columba, as also of St. Doulough, in the habit of a hermit. He adds, that they were represented "much after the manner they are engraved in the title to Messingham's Florilegium."

There is a short chapter on the very interesting subject of baptismal fonts, with wood-engravings of a very fine example, at Kilcarn, near Navan, in the county of Meath. Two chapters on castles and town-gates describe the chief features of those strongholds of the middle ages. The volume concludes with "Miscellaneous notices of weapons, ornaments, &c. &c.," including some notices of "ornamental cases for Sacred writings." We should prefer that the author had given us some information respecting sepulchral monuments, encaustic tiles, and such remains of ecclesiastical furniture and costume as are yet preserved, in lieu of the very doubtful celts which he has described.

As a manual for tourists, this volume will prove an excellent substitute for many of our trashy "Guide books," the staple of which is caricature of our countrymen with libels on our national faith and habits. The Archæologia is intended principally as a guide to those of our antiquities as are easy of access from the Irish metropolis. As a specimen of the writer's descriptive powers, we extract the following:

"The lone and singularly wild valley of Glendalough, in the county of Wicklow, lying at a distance of about twenty-four miles from the metropolis, presents a scene which, for stern and desolate grandeur, is in many respects unsurpassed. Huge, gloomy mountains, upon which clouds almost continually rest, encompass, and in some places overhang, the silent and almost uninhabited glen. Two little lakes, now appearing in the deepest shadow, now reflecting the blue vault, according as the clouds above them come or go—a winding stream, and grey rocks jutting here and there from out the heath—form its natural features. A noble monastic establishment—round which a city subsequently rose, flourished and decayed—was founded here in the early part of the sixth century by St. Kevin. The ruins of many ecclesiastical structures yet remain, and 'the long, continuous shadow of the lofty and slender round tower moves slowly, from morn till eve, over wasted churches, crumbling oratories, shattered crosses, scathed yew trees, and tombs, now undistinguishable, of bishops, abbots, and anchorites.* How few of the gay tourists, by whom the glen is yearly visited, view these ruins with any other feeling than that of idle and ignorant curiosity. Their ears have been poisoned with the burlesque and lying tales [inventions of the last half century] which the wretched men and women, mis-called guides of the place, have composed for the entertainment of the thoughtless. They wander unmoved among shrines which, nearly thirteen centuries ago, were raised in honour of their God by men joyous and thankful in the feeling of certain immortality—men whose fathers in their youth had revered the druid as a more than human counsellor.

"That several of the existing churches formed part of the original foundation, their style of architecture sufficiently indicates.

"The noble doorway of 'the Lady's Church,' a modern name, is, perhaps, the grandest of its kind remaining, and exhibits in a striking degree that early Greek form which is so very commonly found in the doorways, and in other openings, of our most ancient churches and round towers, and even, though more rudely developed, in the cathairs [cahairs], and other Irish remains of the Pagan era.

"The remarkable building called St. Kevin's Kitchen, now, alas! sadly mutilated, is not the least interesting object in the group. Its high-pitched roof of stone remains in a perfect state. A doorway in the western gable displays an instance of the lintel surmounted by an arch. The chancel, which a few years ago remained, though of great antiquity, and stone-roofed, appears to have been an addition; and a portion of the ancient east window may still be observed in the wall, just above the head of the choir arch, which was not formed in the usual manner, but cut out of the masonry. The little tower upon the west end appears to be the earliest example of a belfry springing from a roof or gable; but this, as well as the sacristy, is of later date than the rest of the building.

"Trinity Church, perhaps, in a greater degree than any coeval structure in Leinster, retains the original character of its various features. It possesses a magnificent specimen of the square-headed doorway; a choir arch, of its period, certainly the finest in Ireland; chancel windows, with heads semicircular or triangular; in fact almost every characteristic of the most ancient style of church architecture in Ireland, and each perfect in its way.

"In that singularly interesting ruin, styled the Monastery, are columns which, upon their capitals, exhibit ornamental sculpture of a style peculiar to monuments of the ninth and tenth centuries. These in England would be pronounced Norman, more particularly as the arch which they were designed to sustain displayed a variety of the zig-zag, or chevron moulding, as may be seen from several of its stones which yet remain.

"The Refectory, or Royal Cemetery Church, though less imposing in its general appearance than several of the equally ancient remains in the more eastern part of the glen, is, on account of its association with the life of the founder, not surpassed in interest by any of the others.

"In the cemetery of this (Refectory) church was preserved, a few years since, an ancient inscribed tombstone, popularly called King O'Toole's Monument; but it has disappeared, 'the guides' having sold it in small pieces to tourists, scarcely less ignorant than themselves.

"The large structure standing within the enclosure of the cemetery, a little eastward from the round tower, is popularly styled 'the Cathedral,' and appears, from its name, dimensions, and position, to have been anciently the Domhnach more, or Daimhliag-mor, or chief church of the place. Notwithstanding its present state of dilapidation, there are in Ireland few structures of the same antiquity and extent that retain so many original features. The tower adjoining is one of the largest and most perfectly preserved now remaining. Its semicircular doorway-head, carved out of a single stone, may be looked upon as a good example of that peculiar mode of construction.

"A caiseal, or wall, appears usually to have enclosed the greater number of the ancient Irish monastic establishments. That such a work anciently existed at Glendalough is certain, though scarcely a vestige of it at present remains above ground. One of the gateways however, until very lately, stood in a nearly perfect state. It is described and engraved by Dr. Petrie, 'Essay on the Round Towers,' page 447, and his prophecy that, for want of care this monument, unique in its kind, would soon cease to exist, became half fulfilled last summer upon the fall of the principal arch.

"We have slightly glanced at the greater and more generally interesting ruins of this celebrated glen. It also contains numerous relics, such as crosses, monumental stones, &c., which, by a visitor, should not be overlooked; but, as we shall have occasion to refer our readers to other and much finer remains of each class of antiquities which they represent, it would be at least unnecessary to describe them here. We may, however, mention the singular chamber called 'St. Kevin's Bed.' That it is altogether a work of art cannot be satisfactorily demonstrated. Though, to a certain degree, its artificial character is distinctly marked, it is quite possible that a natural cavity, the sides of which have been roughly hewn and squared, may have existed previously. The bed, which is situate in an almost overhanging rock, at a considerable distance above the lake, is said to have been the residence of St. Kevin, when pursuing that course of study and contemplation for which his name, even to this day, is revered; and the celebrated St. Laurence is said to have spent much of his time in prayer and heavenly contemplation in this cavern.

We cannot conclude our notices of this volume without bearing willing testimony to the truthfulness and excellence of the illustrations. The several wood-cuts, by Mr. O'Hanlon, with which the book is interspersed, are fully equal to anything which has been produced in the same department in England or elsewhere: another proof that native talent merely requires moderate encouragement and protection for its development.

NO. VI.

ANN M'LOUGHLIN AND JOHN SULLIVAN—AN INTERVIEW WITHOUT AN EXPLANATION—A DREAM—THE POOR MAN'S LOT—A HOUSE BURNED, AND A MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE—A HUT IN THE MOUNTAIN-SIDE—AN ESCAPE—A ROSARY—ANN M'LOUGHLIN'S FLIGHT—A MURDER—A TRIAL AND CONVICTION—A NIGHT CALL—A DISCOVERY—CONCLUSION.

WHEN the dark spectre had vanished from the cave, Ann M'Loughlin, having cautioned John Sullivan to speak low, said to him—

"Do you know that man?"

He answered "yes."

"What is his name?"

"His name is Murtagh Devlin."

"No," she said, "you are mistaken, that is not his name."

"Mistaken," he exclaimed, still speaking in a low tone, "no, I am as certain that it was Murtagh Devlin who was in this cave and that he would have murdered me but for you, as I am of my own existence—I saw him in the next apartment, through a chink in the wall, before he came in here."

"Then he is known by a fictitious name—but, tell me, has he any spite against you?"

"He has the spite of having ruined me and mine."

"In that case you must indeed be watched most narrowly, for he is the most cruel of all the ruffians that frequent this horrid den."

"God almighty bless you!" said he, fervently, "for your great kindness, for which I cannot find words to express my gratitude; but oh! my dear young lady—for such I believe you to be—I beseech you to awaken my father instantly, and I entreat you, by the love of the holy Virgin, whose name I have heard you pronounce with such reverence and love, to assist him to save one of your own sex, to whom virtue and honour are dearer than life and whose life is dearer to me than my own."

"What is her name?"

"Cathrine M'Quillan."

"And that," she said interrogatively, laying her hand at the same time on his arm, "is your name also—she is your sister?"

"No," he replied, with some embarrassment, "she is not my sister—my name is John Sullivan, and I have neither sister nor brother living."

She instantly withdrew her hand, but as she was in the act of doing so he felt it tremble violently; a pang shot like a burning arrow through his heart, as the conviction all at once flashed upon him, that he had gained the affections of this beautiful girl. He did not desire this—very far from it—and yet he was angry with himself that he did not feel so much pained by it as he ought. It is not wonderful that a sentiment of gratitude towards the preserver of his life should have sprung up and at once attained full maturity in his own heart; he did not strive to check this, although he knew that it was love—but only such love as a brother bears towards a darling sister, who has been his companion and his guide in his youthful years. If he could have hoped that her affection towards him—if she entertained any—was of the same kind, it would have removed a weighty load from his heart; for, incapable as he was at present of analysing his feelings, he did not dare to persuade himself that he would wish her entirely to forget him. If he had known the beautiful lines, he would have said:

"As a sister remembers a brother, Dearest, remember me."

It was, perhaps, owing to his bodily weakness that so many distracting images crowded upon his mind, for the moment his father, who now stood by his bedside, called him by his name they all fled away. He related briefly to his father and Ann M'Loughlin what he had heard and seen, and entreated them not to think of him, but to save Cathrine M'Quillan. He could have wished to have explained that in all this he had no other object than to save a young, innocent, and virtuous girl who had watched over his mother in her last illness and closed her lifeless eyes; but there was no time for this now, for Ann M'Loughlin, who had listened with the deepest attention, exclaimed, when he concluded, that there was not a moment to be lost. She ran out of the cave, and returned quickly with a light, and accompanied by a strong, coarse, and somewhat desperate-looking man, about forty-five years old.

"Neal," said she, pointing to John Sullivan, "this is the young man."

He merely nodded.

"And," she added, addressing the old man, "you can lie down again and get some sleep—if you should be required, he will awake you. At present you can be of no use in this matter, but, on the contrary if you were seen abroad it would perhaps deprive us of all chance of success; lie down instantly, for here is the old woman with the drink for your son, and if she sees you up she may suspect something."

In less than a minute the old hag entered with some whey, which Ann M'Loughlin handed to John Sullivan saying, "drink this before I put out the light, and perhaps it will enable you to sleep after the cruel fright you have received."

"Do you hear me, granny," said Neal, calling after the hag as she was about to depart, "I wish nobody to enter here unless I give him leave; or if he dis, I'll try how cowl' lead agrees with him."

As he spoke, he cocked his pistols, and the hag, giving a malicious grin, departed without uttering a word. The young girl, having extinguished the light, left the cave, silently and noiselessly, by the same secret passage by which she had entered it. The old man, in spite of his anxiety, soon fell into a heavy slumber, and, as his grim protector did not speak, John Sullivan was left entirely to his own meditations. These chiefly turned upon the dreadful situation in which Cathrine M'Quillan, and probably her mother and sisters were placed, but he could not forget the heroic and generous conduct of Ann M'Loughlin. She had already exposed her life to imminent danger for himself, and he had no doubt but that she was now once more doing the same for the sake of one whom she had never seen, and whom she regarded possibly in the light of a rival. Everything which had occurred since the adventures connected with the handkerchief, had surrounded her with new and more perplexing mysteries: the interest which she had taken in him, an utter stranger, was most inexplicable—her absence from M'Loughlin's house for so long a time, apparently without being remonstrated against, or even noticed, by the family, was still more wonderful; and he was now convinced—from the elegance of her language, the accomplished graces of her manners, and from the respectful deference which was paid to her slightest word by all those who came in contact with her—that she was not and could not be a mere country-girl. At first he vainly tortured his brain to conjecture who she might be; but, as sleep came on, he at once recognized her for the queen of Saba, who had come to visit his uncouth guard, now metamorphosed into King Solomon. There was never on this earth so potent an enchanter as sleep.

But how sped it during this time with the M'Quillans? On the evening of this same night, Mrs. M'Quillan, her daughters, and her servants, having as usual said their prayers together, the two younger girls and the servants retired to rest. Cathrine and her mother remained up very late, talking over their future plans and projects. It was night but not dark and they had not lighted a candle. Cathrine gave a sudden start and then said in a low voice:

"Mother, there has been a person looking through the window; his face was close to the glass when I saw him, but so soon as he perceived me he instantly withdrew it."

"Do you know who he is?"

"No; but judging from the obscure glimpse which I obtained, I think he is quite a stranger to me."

They became greatly alarmed—not for their own personal safety but on account of their cattle; for they at once concluded that the man who had looked through the window was one of the gang of horse-stealers who had, for some time past, infested the neighbourhood. They little imagined to what diabolical excesses a man may be driven by revenge and hatred, when his passions are not controlled by the soothing influence of religion. This alone—sweet and lulling as the music of David's harp, when he played before Saul—can chase away the evil spirit of crime when it torments the human heart.

Widow M'Quillan and her family lived in a substantial farm-house; it was a long, low house, thatched, and the windows were rather small, according to the uncomfortable fashion which prevailed in all houses of its class at the period of which I am writing; but it was pleasantly situated, commanding a view of fertile fields, of a bright lake on which numerous waterfowl gambolled, and, in the distance, of blue mountains, around whose rugged base the waters of the ocean leaped and danced with tumultuous joy. The few feet which intervened between the front of the house and the high road was divided into handsome flower-plots; along the walls, the roses peeped out from amongst the sweet honeysuckle and other parasitic plants, whilst the green house-leek flourished luxuriantly on the roof. Behind the house was a large farm-yard; the side which was opposite to the dwelling was occupied by strong and comfortable outhouses, the two remaining sides, as well as part of the front, being enclosed by a wall six feet high. The entrance was secured by a well-made wooden gate. In the beginning of the summer all the walls were regularly white-washed, both on the outside and on the inside, and it is really wonderful what virtue there is in a small quantity of lime; it makes an old, dull house look new and cheerful, just as the spring gives fresh life and beauty to the venerable trees which surround it. It is, moreover, a preservative of and an incitement to cleanliness, it banishes noxious vapours and prevents infection, so that it adds as much to the substantial comforts as to the appearance of the farm-house. What comfort has the labourer, the small farmer, or the tradesman upon this earth, but what he finds in the evening and on the day of rest by his own domestic hearth? He ought to remember that every bit of dirt removed from the inside or outside of his cot, and the slightest improvement he makes in it adds to his permanent comforts, and teaches his children habits of cleanliness and industry which will improve their condition and prospects more than worldly wealth, accompanied by filth and coarseness. The condition of the labouring classes must be improved—their misery is unendurable—a social revolution, more or less extensive, is inevitable, and I would prepare them for this by teaching them that they were not created to sleep with pigs and to eat the same food almost out of the same vessel with them, but that if they were born to labour they were also born to the rational enjoyment of human beings. The first practical result of this feeling, on the part of the poor, will be manifested in the care and attention by which they will strive to provide comfortable dwellings for themselves and their families—dwellings for human beings and not stys for pigs. Some well-meaning persons say, "Why talk of comforts when the poor are starving for want of food?" As long as the poor are content with just as much of the coarsest food as will keep them alive—as long as they confine themselves to the mere necessities of life and do not seek those comforts to which they may legitimately, and to which, therefore, they ought to aspire; so long will the slightest failure in the worst kind of food induce misery, starvation, and death. But whilst the condition of the poor must be greatly improved, I would not encourage indolence or mendicancy; I would expect to find the poor man on a fine evening doing something about his cottage or in his garden, if it were only planting a flower, or instructing his children how to do such things, instead of sitting at his door smoking in the midst of dirt which he could clear away in one half-hour. It is astonishing how much a man of industrious habits can add, in a few months, to the appearance of his cottage and garden, and to his own comforts and those of his family. The same may be said of farmers.

Widow M'Quillan's house was neither larger nor better built than those of her neighbours, but in it everything was neat and clean; she no more thought of admitting into it the fowl and pigs than the cows and horses; everything had its own house and place, and she was justified in acting thus by principles not only of comfort but also of economy. Her neighbours wondered how she could incur such expenses in building and keeping her whole establishment in such perfect repair, and grow rich, whilst they never calculated their own losses and discomforts when the fowl not only dirtied everything in the house but often broke the vessels which were filled with milk, and even ran away with the oaten cake from the fire; and the pigs which kept up a most dismal chorus of squealing at the door during the entire time the inmates were engaged at their meals, sometimes succeeded in lifting the door off its hinges, when they rushed in, pell-mell, upsetting, in a confused heap, stools, chairs, and children, destroying everything frangible, and, when attacked fiercely by men, women, and dogs, getting entangled in metal pots, crocks, and even in the rails of the table, and carrying all away in their flight.

The only persons in Mrs. M'Quillan's house, at the time the man was discovered looking through the window, besides the widow herself and her daughters, were two servant maids; for, it will be remembered, that her only son had gone to visit Father John and had not yet returned. Cathrine and her mother retired to an obscure part of the kitchen, in which they had been sitting, and from which, without being observed themselves, they could see any one who came close to the window. There they remained for a short time in silence, but, as nothing was seen or heard, Mrs. Sullivan began to think that her daughter was deceived; but she asserted that she could not be mistaken, and that as she was afraid some robbery was intended, she thought it would be better for her mother to go to bed, and she would awake one of the maids, who would sit up and watch with her. Mrs. M'Quillan would not listen to this proposal, but persisted in sitting up herself. There were several men servants employed by the family, but they were all but one married, and lived in cottages at some distance. The remaining one, who was an old man, slept in one of the outhouses which communicated immediately with the stable. The gate which led into the yard, and through which, as it was immediately at the end of the house, no horse could be brought without their knowledge, was locked, as well as all the doors of the outhouses. Of this they were quite certain, for ever since her husband's death Mrs. M'Quillan herself, or her son, since he was capable of discharging this duty, locked the gate and doors every night, and brought the keys into the dwelling-house, which was also strongly secured. It would, therefore, they knew, evidently be the utmost madness to open the door on any pretext whatever, as some of the party—if there was a party, for but one had been seen—would most probably rush in and secure the keys of the gate and stables. They hoped that the robbers would not be able to effect an entrance into any of the houses, and that if they even attempted it, the man who slept beside the stables would hear them and frighten them away. They remained thus for about an hour; in great anxiety at first, but this gradually subsided, until at length they made up their minds to go to bed, as they considered that no harm was intended; but just as they were about to retire, a small stream of light burst forth, brilliant as a meteor, and after flickering for a moment seemed to disappear. Again it burst out, more large and splendid than before. Cathrine rushed to the windows, and clasping her hands, exclaimed, "merciful Heavens! the stables are in flames." Without a moment's hesitation Mrs. M'Quillan, seizing the keys of the outhouse, opened the door and rushed out to rescue the man and the cattle from the fire. Cathrine hastily giving the alarm to the maids and her sisters, and telling one of the former to run for aid to the nearest neighbours, who lived something less than a quarter of a mile off, followed her mother. The sight which met their eyes was most awful and terrific. The doors and roofs were enveloped in one consuming flame. The old man who was locked up was uttering the most frightful screams, and the painful cries of the animals, on which the flames had fallen, were truly appalling. Mrs. M'Quillan had fainted, but Cathrine, snatching the keys from her, rushed to the door of the house where the old man slept, and opened it, although she burned her hand severely in performing this courageous action. Notwithstanding that he was old and stiff at other times, he shot swift as an arrow through the flames, and so terrified was he that he climbed over the high wall and wet himself all over in the waters of the lake, lest he might be on fire. Cathrine, at the peril of her life, and at the expense of some additional burns, opened the doors of the houses where the animals were confined, and called on the others to help her to release them. She herself freed many, some of them being already on fire, and maddened by the flames. The mother had recovered, and in conjunction with her sister and the maid, who remained at home, hastened to pump water and throw it on the suffering animals. The old man returned, and being thoroughly wet, and in no danger of taking fire, he rushed courageously through the flames to rescue the animals which were still confined, and which were sending forth the most piteous cries for help. One cow and four sheep were burned to death, but all the other animals escaped, the greater number having sustained more or less injury. By this time many of the neighbours arrived and attempted to save the barn and some of the other houses which had not yet sustained any material injury. Mrs. M'Quillan believed that this effort would prove unsuccessful, as indeed it did, for the devouring element consumed them all, and she therefore confined her own attention entirely to pouring oil on the wounds of the cattle which were burned. The sight at this time was magnificent and appalling. All the outhouses were burning in one fierce flame, whose ruddy glare was reflected in the clouds, and rendered the country for a considerable distance around bright as day. All eyes were involuntarily attracted to this magnificent spectacle; Mrs. M'Quillan herself desisted a moment from her labour, and looking earnestly around, said, "where is Cathrine?" The inquiry was repeated by all present almost simultaneously. The dwelling-house was searched—in vain; the yard, and even the fields around were searched—in vain; and now the horrid suspicion which had already found its way into the hearts of all, burst from her mother's lips, "merciful God, my darling daughter has been burned to death!"

All the other calamities of this dreadful night were quickly swallowed up in the intense horror with which everyone regarded what now appeared to be the certain and terrible fate of Cathrine M'Quillan—that she had perished by fire, her cries having been unheard or unheeded in the general confusion. Men and even women rushed in amongst the flames, and cast aside madly the burning embers, in the hope of discovering the blackened corpse. In vain—no trace of her could be found, although they did not desist from the sorrowful search until the morning sun shed his bright smile upon this scene of sadness and of desolation. The poor widowed mother awoke from insensibility, into unconsciousness—her reason had fled, and she frequently called her daughter by name, and wondered what delayed her. The two children sat by her bed-side, gazing with speechless anguish upon that mother who no longer heeded or, perhaps, even recognized them.

Whilst this fruitless search was being made for Cathrine M'Quillan, two parties were proceeding furiously towards the same point, from different directions. One of them consisted of but two persons—a boy and a girl—both young, but the former the younger of the two: they both rode the same horse, the girl being seated on a pillion behind the boy. The animal they rode was a fine, spirited horse, and they urged him as if life or death depended on his speed. They proceeded at the same speed after they had turned into by-paths and bridle-roads, although they had no other light to guide them save that of the bright stars. At length they arrived at a solitary hut, situated in a narrow glen which lay between two barren mountain ranges. Built in a fissure of the rocks, and not observable until you approached quite near, it was said to be a noted haunt of smugglers, the vicinity affording many excellent hiding-places. It presented so ruinous an appearance that no one would have believed that any human being resided in it. At a little distance from this hut the horse stopped, and the girl dismounting, stealthily approached it. When she reached the door, she listened for a moment, then rapped, muttered a few words to a person inside, made a signal to the boy to approach, and entered. When he reached the door, she exclaimed—“Thank God, this is the place, and we are in time. But lead the horse quickly by the pathway at the head of the glen, and take care that you are not observed.”

About an hour later, and when the earliest dawn of the morning began to appear, a more numerous party approached the same hut. It consisted of four men, and a young woman who was now carried in an apparently lifeless or insensible state on the pommel of the saddle, before one of the riders; but her dishevelled hair and torn dress showed how violently she must have struggled to regain her liberty. They carried her into the hut, and consigned her to the care of the old woman, who undertook to restore her to consciousness, not without considerable grumbling. For this purpose, she took her into a separate apartment, leaving the men to regale themselves with the “mountain dew,” of which, after the fatigues of the night, they now began to drink deeply.

When Cathrine M'Quillan recovered, she no longer felt herself pressed by rude hands, or assailed with coarse jibes, for she was encircled by gentle arms, sweet lips were pressed to her cheeks, and bright, though tearful eyes, full of tenderness and compassion beamed upon her.

“Where am I?” she cried, wildly.

“Hush!” said Ann M'Loughlin, “the men who carried you here are in the house, and if they should discover me here, we are both ruined.”

“Oh!” said Cathrine—suddenly recollecting all she had suffered, and throwing herself upon the young girl's breast, with all a sister's fondness—“for the love of God, and of His mother, save me from those horrid men.”

“I will, dear!” said Ann, returning her embrace; and she resolved to keep her word, if it should be at the expense of her life, for she said to herself, “She is indeed a sweet girl, and I love her as a sister.”

The same feeling had already sprung up in Cath-rine's mind towards her gentle and beautiful protectress.

The old woman had returned to the apartment where the men were drinking. She told them that the girl had got a little better, and that she was so exhausted that she fell into a deep sleep.

“No wonder,” said one of the ruffians, “for when we seized her, in her mother's yard; stifled her cries; took the keys from her; opened the gate, and carried her off, amid the confusion, by my sowl, I thought she would have torn herself away from the four of us, and for several miles we had to carry her, for whenever she got her mouth uncovered, she screamed like a devil, and as soon as we put her on horseback, she threw herself off again, as if she intended to kill herself. But take good care of her, Biddy, for you know Mr. Devlin will pay us all well for this job, an' by —, so he ought, for divil a nicer piece of woman's flesh I ever laid my eyes on.”

It was still early when the old woman announced that the men were all asleep. Cathrine, conducted by her companion, was obliged to step over some of their bodies, as they lay upon the floor. She shuddered as she looked upon the savages, and saw that some of them grasped their arms in their hands, even in their sleep. At a signal made by Ann, when they had reached the top of the glen, young M'Loughlin—for he was the boy who had accompanied his sister—approached, leading the horse. It had been already arranged between the girls that he should take Cathrine to Father John's house; for it would be necessary for the old woman, in order to avoid suspicion, and to save her own life, to awake the men soon, and to persuade them that in consequence of watchfulness and fatigue, she had fallen asleep for a few moments, and that on awaking, she found her charge gone.

Just as Cathrine was about to mount, she stopped, and exclaimed—“What will become of you; I cannot leave you at the mercy of those men.”

“Away, away,” she exclaimed, “if you would not ruin us both. I know every path over these mountains; fear not for me; I can save myself.”

In a moment the gallant steed dashed off, and the young girl after gazing after him for a moment, fled away herself, fleet as the roe, over the mountain. During the next night she entered the cave where John Sullivan slept, carrying in her hand an antique rosary, with a silver heart and cross attached to it. She had visited him in the evening, and assured him that Cathrine was safe; and as he had been able to sit up during a part of the day, he was quite astonished to see her enter now. Besides, she was deadly pale, and her eyes had the same fixed and staring look that had terrified him so much on the night when he slept in old M'Loughlin's house. She approached his bed, and calling him by his name, placed the rosary about his neck.

“There,” said she, “they told me that was the only mark by which I would find my mother. See the name on that heart is Ann M'Loughlin.”

“That is your name,” said John, who was a good deal frightened by her manner and appearance.

“Oh yes,” said she, “they called me after her; but come away to some quiet place where we will gather the wild flowers in the bright evenings, and live so happily together.”

He did not reply, not knowing what to think of this.

She looked at him reproachfully, and said, “Oh, John, you do not love me, and am I not a tender and affectionate sister?”

Before he could speak she glided swiftly and noiselessly away, leaving him in the greatest perplexity and astonishment. His first impulse was to awake his father, and ask him if he could explain the mystery. But then he thought this would be a dishonourable betrayal of her secret, and so he determined to question herself about it, on the very first time he should see her. He hoped that this would be in the morning, when least he should be afterwards suspected of having acted a treacherous or deceitful part, he was determined to explain fully the state of his heart and feelings, as well as the utter ruin into which all his prospects in this world had fallen. He was, therefore, deeply disappointed on receiving the following note early next morning:

"I think I forgot a rosary in the cave on yesterday evening. If so, I hope you will be kind enough to give it to the bearer, who will bring it to me. I regret that I am not able to go and see you, for I am making the utmost haste to start with messengers who are waiting for me. The business is most important. God bless you, and do not forget in your prayers your sincere friend, A. M."

* * * * *

More than a year had elapsed since the events which we have related had taken place. The Sullivans and M'Quillans were residing in Father John's parish. They had both neat houses and comfortable farms, for the landlord, on learning from the good priest the exemplary character and industrious habits of the Sullivans, had himself advanced sufficient capital to enable them to stock a farm which he gave them. The M'Quillans had money enough of their own, and although John Sullivan and James M'Quillan went out to fish occasionally, it was not from any necessity, but because they loved the sea. I was at this time curate in the parish; and one morning after having received the holy communion, as was his custom every fortnight, John Sullivan came to me and said,

"Father Ned, I am come to claim the fulfilment of your promise, to marry me and Cathrine M'Quillan."

"I shall be delighted," said I, "to do so, and I can say with truth, that you are getting as good a wife as in Ireland, and that you deserve her."

"I know she is all you say," he replied, "and I am fully sensible that I do not deserve her. But do you know, Sir, she is always talking of Ann M'Loughlin, whom she never saw but on that terrible night, and she has frequently declared, that if she thought that 'darling girl' had the least wish to become my wife, she would rather die than marry me. She constantly says that she would feel quite happy if I were Ann M'Loughlin's husband; and it was only after her brother's return from old M'Loughlin's, yesterday, and when she learned from him that Ann was no relation of that family, but some great lady who stopped with them for a time, they knew not why, as if she had been one of their own condition in life, and that they had never heard from her since she left them, that Cathrine consented to become my wife. And indeed, to tell the truth, I had, and have still, a great affection for Ann—just as if she was my sister—but she was always mysterious, and she was so good and charitable and kind to me, that I sometimes thought she was my mother's spirit which came back to guard me—not such as she was before she died, worn down by disease, but young and beautiful as a blessed spirit from heaven. And really, Sir, I observed in her at times, a great resemblance to my mother. I am going to-day to bring one or two old friends down to our wedding, and at Catherine's special request, I am to call round by old M'Loughlin's on my way back, to invite the young man who rode away with her from the glen. I am also anxious myself to enquire from them more particularly concerning Ann's history, and to know why she passed for one of the family, and whether the two servants—a man and a woman—who came for her, gave any hint as to her name and family, for to tell you the truth, I suspect the old man and his wife know more about these matters than they care to tell any one."

I was myself too deeply interested in the history of this girl, of whose goodness I had heard so much from both John and Cathrine, not to encourage him to make out as much of her history as possible. He set out soon afterwards to visit his native place, for the first time since that sad day when he had left it a houseless wanderer, after having resigned the hand of Cathrine M'Quillan, and along with it every hope of earthly happiness. Now he commenced his journey, riding a fine horse, with plenty of money in his pocket, and for the purpose of asking a few of his old friends to see him claiming that hand as his own for ever. A shade of melancholy passed over his mind, as he thought upon his dead mother, whose grave he had resolved to visit before seeing any one, in order that he might shed upon it a tear of regret and affection.

After visiting the few old friends who remained after the ravages of fever and the proscriptions of a tyrannical landlord, and receiving the hearty congratulations of all, and the promises of a few to be present at his wedding, he set out on his return. He knew the narrow glen to which Cathrine had been carried away on the night of the fire, and as it was not a great deal out of his way in going to M'Loughlin's, he determined to visit the hut to which she had been brought, and from which Ann had so wonderfully and so courageously rescued her. He entered the desolate, lonely, and barren glen, and as he approached the place where he knew that the hut was situated, he was horrified to hear stifled cries of MURDER! He urged his horse to his utmost speed, but before he reached it, he saw three men running up a rugged part of the mountain. He had a dim recollection that he had seen them before; and as he was about to enter the hut, one of them turned and fired at him, wounding him slightly in the arm. When he went in, the first object that presented itself to him was the frightful and mutilated body of Murtagh Devlin. His heart sickened at the sight, and he ran out of the place in horror. Just then a party of soldiers entered the glen in search of smugglers; they ordered the young man to stand, and seeing the blood on his clothes, took him along with them. They found in the hut the body of the murdered man (of which, however, he had already informed them, as well as of the other circumstances which he saw), beside him was a pistol which had been recently discharged. He was arrested on a charge of murder, tried at the next assizes, and found guilty.

It would be impossible to describe the anguish of his aged father and of his betrothed wife, who was now almost as frantic as her own mother had been when she imagined that her daughter had been burned to death. Every one who knew John Sullivan, would have sworn to his innocence, but all strangers believed in his guilt, for in addition to the other circumstances which told strongly against him, it had been proved on the trial that Devlin was his mortal enemy, and had got possession of his father's farm. Of course such persons believed his own story to be a pure fiction, invented to save himself.

I had, in common with almost every person in our village, been present at his trial, and when I returned home, being sick at heart and weary, I said my prayers and went to bed. I was too feverish and excited to sleep for a considerable time, but at length I fell into an uneasy slumber. A horrid dream came upon me; I thought I saw the wretched bible-reader who now resided in and endeavoured to disturb Father John's parish, hanging over the abyss of hell, and that he stretched out his hands towards me, imploring me to save him, whilst the devils endeavoured to drag him in. I awoke frightened, and at the same moment heard a loud rapping at my window.

"Who's there?" I inquired.

"For the love of God, Sir," said a voice, "come to the bible-reader who is dying, and openly declares that he will be damned if you be too late."

I was on horseback in less than ten minutes, and as I knew the road well, I rode across the country. When I arrived at his bed-side, he could scarcely speak, and he asked me to kneel down and pray that he might be allowed a fortnight to do penance for his sins. I did so, and made all who were in the house join with me, and when we had finished, he was able to speak. He then declared to me that he wished to be re-admitted into the Catholic church, which he had only deserted for money, but that there was a matter which must be instantly attended to, in order to save an innocent man.

"I am a murderer," he exclaimed, starting up and staring at me—"I and two of the smugglers who frequent the old woman's cave, and who had seen John Sullivan there, murdered Murtagh Devlin, because we found out that he had betrayed us, and was bringing the soldiers to arrest us for smuggling. I fired at John Sullivan, thinking to kill him also, and even this evening I was delighted when I heard he was found guilty. But when I saw death approaching, I knew that the devils were by my bed-side, ready to carry off my poor soul to hell. I became afraid of God, and I repented. Now send for a magistrate that I may swear this before him."

When all this had been done it was early morning, and I had found it so easy and pleasant to go across the fields, that I determined to return by the same road by which I had come. What then was my astonishment to find, that an immense wall of ten feet high was directly in my way, so that I was obliged to go to the road in order to avoid it. How I had crossed it coming I cannot tell, but God's mercy is above all his works, even when it is exercised by the instrumentality of sinners.

A gentleman, who, with his son, daughter, and daughter-in-law, had resided long in America, but had lately returned to his native land, and who had considerable influence with the government, exerted himself so successfully in behalf of John Sullivan, that he was soon liberated and the real murderers cast into gaol, where the bible-reader died at the end of the fortnight he had asked, a sincere penitent.

John Sullivan and Cathrine M'Quillan were married soon after, in the village chapel. A lady closely veiled, and two gentlemen, entered after the procession, and witnessed the ceremony, at the conclusion of which the lady rushed to the bride and clasped her in her arms. This lady was Ann M'Loughlin. Those who accompanied her were her youthful husband and her father-in-law. The knowledge that she was married, at once removed the embarrassment of the young bride and bridegroom. John Sullivan had even the courage to ask her to explain the "rosary." A cloud of redness passed over her beautiful features as she produced it. Old Sullivan no sooner saw it than he snatched it from his son's hand and exclaimed—"My God, this is my own dear mother's rosary, which she gave me when she was dying, and which was about the neck of my child when she was drowned."

"Father," exclaimed Ann, "I am that child"—and in a moment she was clasped in his arms.

"Ann, dearest Ann," said John, "how I have wished and prayed that you had been my sister, without daring to hope, and without having even once imagined that it was possible. Now, blessed be God, I have all I could desire. Is it not strange that I should never have suspected who you were, although I could never look upon you without remembering my mother, on account of the striking likeness which you bear to her."

"And what must my feelings be, dear John," she answered, "to find that I am not a child of shame, cast away and disowned by my own kindred upon earth. I know not how it happened, whether it was that some dim image of you had been impressed upon my infant mind, or that I was attracted by some invisible sympathy of nature, or that I felt in my inmost soul my mother's image reflected in your features, the first time I saw you pale, and sick in old M'Loughlin's house, but I certainly loved you from that moment until this, with all a sister's tenderness, devotion, and affection."

Never did two sisters meet after a long and painful separation with more delight, or with stronger affection, than did Ann and Cathrine. Nor was this feeling evanescent, but, on the contrary, it was strengthened every day, as each of them learned more and more the unselfishness, the virtue, and the piety of the other.

The story of Ann Sullivan (as we must now call her) is thus briefly told. Her mother, taking her two children along with her, had gone on a visit to a friend who resided in the town from which her husband and son afterwards resolved to sail to America. A young girl who was Ann's nurse, wandered out one day with the child in her arms, accompanied by two other girls as young and giddy as herself. They had proceeded about half a mile along the shore, when they perceived a solitary boat in a small secluded bay. They unmoored it, intending to row across the bay, where the water was not deep. Ann's nurse having the child in her arms, got into the boat first, and the other two pushed it into the water. The boat, however, no sooner floated than it got into a current which carried it into water about four feet deep. The girls who had pushed the boat screamed, but could give no assistance, and Ann's nurse, in her excitement and alarm, jumped out, as she still thought the water was not too deep for her to wade, and that she could pull the boat in by her strength. The current and the boat dragged her on farther, she was drowned, and the boat was drifted out to sea.

That boat was providentially picked up by a large merchant ship, when it was a considerable way out on the wide ocean. It was found to contain a child, only two years old, with no other means to identify it but a rosary, which was hung about its neck, having a silver heart attached to it, on which was engraved, but evidently very long ago, the name Ann M'Loughlin. The captain, whose wife had recently died in England, had on board his only child, a son about three years old, whom he was bringing to America, to place him under the care of his own aunt who resided there. The captain was almost glad of the accident which supplied his son with a beautiful playmate. The attachment which the children conceived for each other from the moment they first met, grew with their growth and strengthened with their strength, so that it was everywhere said that the orphan girl would be the bride of the rich son of Captain Hobart. The boy's father loved the girl, and was delighted to see his son's affections carried in the same direction. Not so the aged aunt, who looked upon Ann as a designing impostor, and persecuted her in secret with the most pitiless hatred. She taunted her with being a beggar, an illegitimate child, and with artfully designing to entrap John Hobart. She had now abundant opportunities of carrying on her persecution, for Captain Hobart still continued his sea-faring life, and John had joined his fellow-citizens, the Americans, in the war of independence. He occasionally visited home, and during one of these visits, towards the end of the contest, Ann had promised to become his wife as soon as America was a nation. It was on this occasion he gave her the handkerchief on which the name John was written. The old aunt had watched them, had heard and seen all, and made up her mind on the spot to put an end to the contract as soon as her grand-nephew should rejoin his regiment. She well knew the town near which Ann had been picked up, for Captain Hobart had caused inquiries to be made there concerning the parents of the girl; but as they lived far from this, and the friend whom Mrs. Sullivan had gone to visit was dead, they all proved unavailing. The old aunt watched anxiously for a ship proceeding to this place, and having found one, she paid the girl's passage immediately. Ann had no resource but to obey, for the old lady threatened to turn her out of doors if she refused. Besides she thought that this would allow John Hobart greater freedom in choosing his wife, and she argued that if he really loved her as he professed to do, he would easily find her in Ireland, and if he did not, she would not for worlds become his bride. She had, moreover, some slender hopes of discovering her parents, and of thus wiping away the stigma which was cast upon her birth. Leaving, therefore, an explanatory letter for her betrothed, in which she informed him that she would remain in the town for which the vessel was bound, until she should hear from him, she set sail for Ireland. Believing her father's name to be M'Loughlin, she had sought for her parents in vain, until a bountiful Providence, which turns even our trials into benefits, brought her relations and her together, when the secret sympathies of nature united the affections of the brother and sister, and the charity of the girl was at length rewarded by the discovery of her father.

The news of the acknowledgement of American Independence by England, had arrived in the new world on the very day after that ship set sail; but John Hobart had been severely wounded sometime previously, and he was neither able to go home nor to write, and when at length he did write, he received no answer. At length he came home, and learned with unutterable grief from her letter, the cause of her departure. He dare not, however, on account of the state of his health, undertake a sea voyage, but when his father arrived shortly afterwards, he told him the circumstances. Captain Hobart taking in a cargo, set sail for Ireland as soon as possible, and as his business did not lead him to the town where Ann was, and he could not conveniently leave his ship, he brought with him two servants who were fondly attached to her, and to one of whom she had entrusted the letter for her betrothed. These were the persons who found her at old M'Loughlin's house.

"But," said John, when they were alone together, "sister dear, why did you give me the handkerchief and rosary?"

"I was," she answered, "then so troubled in my mind, that I sometimes walked in my sleep; I was then, but thank God I am so no longer, a SOMNAMBULIST."

The Songs of Beranger.*

PIERRE-JEAN BERANGER was born in Paris, on the 19th of August, 1780, at the house of a tailor—his "poor and old grandfather." His father, a native of Flamicour, near Péronne, constantly aspired during an adventurous life to raise himself to a more elevated condition. He always retained before his name the "De," as the subsign of some long-lost but not forgotten trace of family distinction. His son, however, entertained a thorough contempt for this aping after titles, and he thus expresses the feeling in one of his songs:

"So I hear that the critics in heraldry blame
My presumption in having a 'De' to my name,
And ask by what right I nobility claim?
I have none in the world I reply—
A thorough plebeian am I.

Beranger remained in Paris until he was nine years old, and witnessed the taking of the Bastille—an event which he celebrated forty years afterwards within the walls of the prison De la Force. Shortly after this event he went to Péronne and resided with a paternal aunt, who kept an inn in the suburbs. This lady paid considerable attention to his moral and literary training, but unhappily she was not so successful in the former as in the latter, for she found it impossible to eradicate from his soul the scepticism and irreligion which was then so prevalent in France, and which had already made a deep impression upon his mind. But he advanced rapidly in his literary studies, and read with avidity Telemachus, Racine, and such other books as his aunt possessed. At the age of twelve he nearly lost his life, having been struck senseless by lightning.

When he was fourteen he was apprenticed to M. Laisné, a printer, and at the same time he attended the School of Primary Instruction, founded at Péronne, by M. Bellue de Bellanglise, deputy in the legislative assembly. This institution resembled at once a club and a camp—the children wore the military costume; on every public event they nominated deputations, pronounced orations, voted addresses; they wrote to citizen Robespierre and citizen Tallien. Young Beranger was the general compiler of these addresses, and by such exercises his taste was awakened, his style formed, and his knowledge of history, geography, and of public affairs extended. The learned languages were not however taught in this school, and these the poet never learned. On this defect in his education M. Tissot observes, "Beranger has always affirmed that he did not know the classical languages, and one cannot doubt the word of such a man; nevertheless, after having read a certain number of his beautiful songs, which breathe all the perfume of ancient poetry, one has some difficulty in repelling incredulity. But if Beranger has not read Homer, and Virgil, and Horace in their own language, he has not the less deeply studied those authors, as is evident from his observations upon them, and, above all, from his style and manner of writing."

At seventeen, Beranger returned to Paris, and in the following year he first conceived the idea of writing verses. He sketched a comic piece called the "Hermaphrodites," in which he ridiculed coxcombs and effeminate men, and ambitious and meddling women. But he soon abandoned comedy out of reverence for Molière, who, along with La Fontaine, was at this time his favourite author. He next turned himself to satire, but for a very short time, and then he determined to write a grand epic, of which Clovis was to have been the hero.

Poverty, however, now forced him to think of some means of supporting life, and he had actually resolved on expatriating himself to Egypt, which was then in the hands of the French. Still "sweet poesy" smiled upon him, and taught him to derive from his intercourse with the common people, and even from his very necessities, some of his brightest inspirations.

He was unexpectedly rescued from want and indigence by M. Lucien Bonaparte, the brother of the First Consul, who enabled him to cast aside his "Old Coat" and to desert his "Garret," each of which he has since immortalized in his songs. In 1805-6, Beranger lived in London and contributed to the "Annales de Musée," and, on his return to Paris, he received an appointment to an office in the University, on which he lived contentedly, although the receipts did not exceed 200 francs per annum. He retained this office for twelve years, but in 1821 he was dismissed on account of his political sentiments. He was also prosecuted for the collection of his works, which he published in the same year, and condemned to three months' imprisonment. In 1828 he was again prosecuted for the opinions expressed in his songs, and the term of his captivity was, on this occasion, extended to nine months. When France proclaimed herself a republic during the present year, Paris elected Beranger as one of her representatives to the national assembly. But the old poet loved his books and his retirement too well to exchange them for the noisy declamations of the senate, and he wrote to the national assembly for leave to resign his seat, which that body granted to him with great reluctance.

We have here transcribed a few of his songs from the English translation, but we must say that those who would see all the beauties of his thoughts, and all the graces of his style must seek them in the original. His songs are thoroughly democratic, and there is a delicacy in them even when they touch upon the grossest subjects, which they unhappily do not unfrequently.

My Republic.

J'ai pris goût à la république
Depuis que j'ai vu tant de rois, &c.

AIR—"WHEN OLD ADAM WAS FIRST CREATED."

I.

I AM quite a republican grown,
Since I've seen that our kings are such fools;
So I'll have a snug state of my own,
Make its laws and establish its rules;

Its commerce I'll limit to wine,
Its judges in fun shall decree;
My state is this table of mine,
And its motto it is "To be free."

II.

My friends, let us each take our glass,
You're my senate assembled to-day;
Only one severe law we will pass,
That Ennui shall be banish'd away.
What! "banish'd?" Ah, ever unknown
Amongst us that word ought to be;
And Ennui will still let us alone,
Since pleasure attends on the free.

III.

Mirth will teach us to stop where we ought,
For excess is destruction to joy;
No shackles shall fetter a thought,
So says Bacchus, that merry old boy!
Each may worship his god or his goddess,
Just whatever it happens to be;
He who likes it (if any so odd is),
To go even to Mass shall be free.

IV.

Aristocracy's narrow and vain,
We'll speak not of grandsire or crest,
E'en the comrade no tittle shall gain,
Who jokes and who tipples the best:
And should any, by folly misled,
Endeavour our ruler to be,
We'd soon lay such Cæsar down dead—
Drunk—and so keep ourselves free.

V.

Let us drink our republic, and may
The genius of liberty aid her!
Ah, a people so gentle and gay
Are no match for a mighty invader.
Lo, Lizzy comes in, and we bend
To her and to pleasure the knee;
With the fair it is vain to contend—
She will rule—we must cease to be free.

The Plebeian.

Eh quoi! j'apprends que l'on critique
Le De qui précède mon nom, &c.

I.

So, I hear that the critics in heraldry blame
My presumption in having a 'De' to my name,
And ask by what right I nobility claim?
I have none in the world, I reply.
I've no grant of coat-armour and motto and crest,
On vellum inscribed my descent to attest;
Tho' I love my dear country as well as the best,
A thorough plebeian am I,
A mere vile plebian,
A low-bred plebeian,
An arrant plebeian am I.

II.

Yes, I ought to have come into being without
This De, I confess; for, I have not a doubt,
That my forefathers were but a beggarly rout,
A poor service-rendering fry;
They were, as it were, the consumable grain,
Which some mighty great neighbouring noble was fain,
Enacting the mill-stone, to grind for his gain;
Yes, a thorough plebeian am I, &c.

III.

My ancestors were not like certain great lords,
Who, heading their vassals and plundering hordes,
Their living acquired by the points of their swords,
Spoiling those who their castles came nigh.
Nor was one of them ever, by Merlin's spells,
Transported to court from his rural dells
Into Charlemagne's service, or any king's else!
No, a thorough plebeian am I, &c.

IV.

In the old civil wars that laid waste our France,
My forefathers poised not their knightly lance,
Nor, to gain their own ends and deliverance,
Introduced the English ally;
And at length when towards ruin the state declined,
Thro' the church's intrigues and its own combined,
The LEAGUE by no sire of mine was sign'd,
No, a thorough plebeian am I, &c.

V.

So leave me alone, my fine lords of lace,
And be off to the palace, your natural place;
There are new rising-suns, don't be last in the race,
But to offer your incense fly.
How times are changed! It is I who am free,
And lords now are servile and bend the knee.
No, none, but the poor, are flatter'd my me;
Such a thorough plebeian am I,
A mere vile plebeian,
A low-bred plebeian,
An arrant plebeian am I!

Liberty.

First song composed in Prison, January, 1822.

D'un petit bout de chaîne
Depuis que j'ai tâté, &c.

AIR—"ON NEW YEAR'S DAY, AS I'VE HEARD SAY," &c.

I.

I've had a little taste of bolts,
And learnt to think those are but dolts
Who take so stoutly Freedom's part,
In truth I hate it from my heart!
So, down, down, Liberty down, Liberty down.

II.

Marchangy* was the sage so wise
Who open'd my benighted eyes,
And kindly proved how slavery's state
Is good and right legitimate.
So down, down, &c.

III.

That Goddess so bepraised of yore
Shall have my homage now no more;
How back she keeps the world I see
In swaddling clothes and infancy!
So down, down, &c.

IV.

Alas! and what remains there now
Of that proud civic tree? one bough,
One bough, to form the worthless wand
Of Despotism's grasping hand!
So down, down, &c.

V.

Ask of the Tiber? he can tell
The difference of the two full well;
He bathed the freeman's sinewy limb,
And papal fat has cool'd in him.
So down, down, &c.

VI.

When once a man has made pretence
(Infected fool) to common sense,
His acts are like a galley-slave's,
Who in his bonds rebellious raves.
So down, down, &c.

VII.

My turnkey so beloved, and ye,
My gaolers (jolly boys to see!)
Straight to the Louvre's self, I pray,
My alter'd tone and vow convey
Of down, down, Liberty down, Liberty down.

* The conductor of the prosecution against Beranger.

Mary Stuart's Farewell to France.

Adieu, charmant pays de France,
Que je dois tant chérir! &c.

AIR—"ROUSSEAU'S DREAM."

I.

DELIGHTFUL land of France, farewell,
Blest cradle of my infancy,
I love thee more than words can tell!
Adieu—to quit thee is to die!
Adopted country of my heart,
Let Mary's name remember'd be
In that sweet soil from which I part;
I part an exile, leaving thee.
The breezes blow, we quit the shore,
And God, to whom I groan in vain,
Stirs nor the billows to restore
In storms our ship to thee again.
Delightful land, &c.

II.

When round my brows thy royal flower
Was twined, the lily of thy pride,
How thy sons shouted in that hour!
What gallant praises bless the bride!
In gloomy Scotland's frozen scene
The sovereign power were vile and vain;
I ne'er would wish to be a Queen,
Unless o'er Frenchmen I might reign.
Delightful land, &c.

III.

Too fleet my happy days have flown,
With Love, and Mirth, and Poms beguiled,
A different lot must now be known
Midst Caledonia's deserts wild.
A dire foreboding has congeal'd
My blood and horrid sight to see!
An awful dream but now reveal'd
A scaffold, which seem'd meant for me!
Delightful land, &c.

IV.

Yes, France, still 'midst her woes and cares,
The daughter of the Stuart line
To thee will turn her thoughts and prayers,
And fix her hopes on thee and thine.
But ah, our ship too swift and light
O'er colder waves already sails,
And from my straining eyes the Night
Thy shores in mist and darkness veils,
Delightful land of France, farewell,
Blest cradle of my infancy,
I love thee more than words can tell,
Adieu—to quit thee is to die!

The Beggars.

Les gueux, les gueux,
Sont les gens heureux, &c.

AIR—"BALLAD OF LORD LOVEL."

I.

HURRAH for the Beggars, jolly boys!
How merry they are, hurrah!
And they love one another,
Each beggarly brother,
Hurrah for the Beggars, hurrah!
Let us sing to the praise and the glory
Of the jolly beggarly crew;
The honest man who has nothing else,
At least should have his due.
Hurrah for the beggars, &c.

II.

Yes, e'en in the breast of poverty
May happiness exist;
Ay, witness my own gaiety,
Witness the Evangelist!
Hurrah for the beggars, &c.

III.

For ages Parnassus Hill has been
The freehold of the poor;
Old Homer walk'd with wallet and staff
About from door to door.
Hurrah for the beggars. &c.

IV.

How many a hero has gone to the wars
With equipage complete,
Who has sigh'd for a beggar's wooden shoes
At last to shield his feet!
Hurrah for the beggars, &c.

V.

How many a man of sumptuous state
Has been an exile made!
Was Diogenes, with his tub on his head,
Of banishment afraid?
Hurrah for the beggars, &c.

VI.

To keep dulness out of palaces
There is no valid law:
One may heartily dine without damask-cloths,
One may soundly sleep on straw.
Hurrah for the beggars, &c.

VII.

And who is the God that is scattering flowers
Yon lowly couch above?
'Tis a guest whom smiling poverty
Oft welcomes—it is Love!
Hurrah for the beggars, &c.

VIII.

And friendship, who for so many a year
From lofty halls has fled,
Still lingers and takes his cheering glass
In the poor man's humble shed.
Hurrah for the beggars, jolly boys!
How merry they are, hurrah!
And they love one another,
Each beggarly brother,
Hurrah for the beggars, hurrah!

The Last Baron of Cluan.

WHAT Irish tourist has not visited the pretty little town of Inistioge, even now scarcely exceeding the limits defined for it by its founder, Thomas Fitz-Anthony. The ivied remains of the walls which he erected, strengthened with massive square towers—some of which still remains uninjured—bear witness of the care with which he secured to its inhabitants the quiet possession of their dwellings. He provided, moreover, for the spiritual wants of his vassal burghers by the erection of a noble abbey, the venerable remains of which attest, even to this day, the piety and power of its great feudal founder.

Having surveyed this pretty little town, with its picturesque scenery of undulating hills and rich woodland, together with the river, bridge, and islets of the lake, the next and principal attraction is the domain, house, and pleasure-grounds of Woodstock; their unvalued natural and artificial beauties being further enhanced by the free access and ready courtesy of the proprietor and his dependants. The visit to these scenes, the favourite resort of the tourist, antiquary, and trim artizan who, on some fine, summer holiday makes an annual visit or two to this delightful place with his wife and happy children, is generally, if not always, concluded by an adjournment to the "red house"—a lovely cottage that stands on an eminence overlooking the clear waters of the "stubborn" though ever tranquil Nore—there the day's pleasure is sure to be ended by the party partaking of plentiful and oftentimes luxurious fare.

As good cheer gives a zest to an old story—or perhaps, rather, 'tis the old story that gives the additional zest to the good cheer—we shall here endeavour to relate one for the amusement of the happy group that crowd round the well-furnished table in the octagonal room of the "red house;" or, may be, with better taste, regale themselves on the soft and mossy green-sward beneath the spreading branches of some venerable oak—assuring our readers, in the mean time, of the truth and authenticity of our tale.

In yonder gray, old, ruinous castle which crowns, at a short distance, that high, conical moat or mound, erected there by Heremon the son of Milesius, as tradition tells, dwelt the ancient palatine barons of Cluan, or Brown's-ford as they were alternately called, ruling over a large tract of country with all the arbitrary sway and, too often, wanton cruelty of feudal chiefs; many an aged villager would shake his hoary head significantly at name of one or more of its fierce barons, and many a fond mother would endeavour to still the cries or check the caprices of her wayward child, at the same time pressing it more close to her bosom, by threatening it with a visit from the "grim baron," there being still a vivid tradition that one of these dread Castellans had hanged the son of a widow, in punishment of his disobedience to his parent, the consequence of which unnatural act was, according to the bereaved widow's curse, that the bleak winter wind will for ever howl through its open windows, and the wild raven build his nest in its desolated hearths; with these more remote traditions we will have no more to do at present, suffice it to say, that till the memorable revolution of 1688, the barons of Cluan held large possessions in the vicinity of this their romantic and chief family residence. Edmond Fitzgerald, baron of Brown's-ford and Cluan, having taken an active part in the civil wars of 1641, and being a member of the Catholic confederation of Kilkenny, had his person and estates attainted by Cromwell, but, on the restoration of Charles II. to the throne, his estates were partially recovered by him: his son, Edward, he sent into France to be educated, under the care of an Irish ecclesiastic—that advantage being denied him at home on account of his religion.

Annoyed by the state officers and puritans, and apprehensive of losing his estates again, the father determined on sending his son, after he had completed his education in the Irish college at Bourdeaux, to a French military school, in order to join the army—then the resort of many an Irish youth of high birth and fallen fortune—and, in the armies of chivalrous France did they, in common with thousands of their more humble and exiled countrymen, acquire a high reputation for talent and bravery. In this school of military science, our young hero formed intimate acquaintance with many a daring youth who was destined to take an active part in the military operations which, in some years after, took place in his native land. Amongst those of his most intimate acquaintance we may number the Chevalier, afterwards Major-general De Fessè, the young De Hocquincourt, St. Martin, and the proud, vain, but brave Gascon noble, the Count de Lauzun. The chivalrous spirit, noble person and bearing of the young Irishman won their warmest sympathy for the exile, whose melancholy and love of home they often endeavoured to dissipate by making him the frequent though often reluctant participator of the pleasant recreations which their summer vacation afforded. From their parents and families, too, he met a cordial welcome at their splendid and richly-ornamented chateaus: he was an excellent performer on his native harp, one of which he carried with him to France, and which was often the sole companion of many of his leisure hours. Many a time would he wake in the breasts of his hearers the tenderest sympathies for his afflicted land, as he played for them some of its most pensive and thrilling melodies; yet, it must be said, his strings were not always attuned to those saddening airs; his enlivening strains inspired his young and buoyant companions to join the merry dance in the summer twilight amidst the rich vineyards of southern France.

Having finished his military education, he joined his countrymen in the French service, then under the command of Lieutenant-general Sir G. Hamilton, who, with his regiment, served with great distinction under Turenne. Our young hero, in all his campaigns, showed much bravery and military skill, but his chief officer Hamilton having fallen in the hour of victory, and his regiment being almost entirely reduced by waste of war and want of recruits, he, together with several other officers, found themselves reduced to the alternative of seeking commissions in the native French army or of turning their steps to the land of their birth, where some new hopes were held out to their persecuted countrymen by the accession of James II. to the throne; the latter course was adopted. It would be a vain endeavour to describe the feelings with which he again beheld the cherished scenes of his early youth, and his never-forgotten home; or the emotions with which he embraced his venerable and aged parent, whose eyes streamed with tears of joy as he again beheld him whom he so fondly loved, with whom he so sorrowfully parted, and whom he so justly considered now the support and joy of his old age.

Having enjoyed the happiness of his son's return for some time, the old baron closed his days in peace, and his son, in order to relieve the solitude of his heart and home, married a lady of suitable rank. The blessing of repose and peace was soon embittered by fears; rumours of war became rife, and the public mind became, in consequence, much agitated; the revolution broke out in England, King James was forced to make a precipitate flight to France, his son-in-law, William, prince of Orange, having landed with 12000 men. In the mean time Tyrconnell, King James's lord lieutenant in Ireland, made all possible exertion to raise an army in favour of the king, in which he was powerfully assisted by several of the old Irish and Anglo-Norman nobility and gentry, most of whom raised regiments or companies of horse and foot, and equipped them in the best manner they could, at their own expense. Among others who exerted themselves in this work of duty and loyalty was the young baron of Cluan; he raised a company of foot which he incorporated with the regiment of Colonel John Grace, then being raised in and about the city of Kilkenny. Among the new-raised troops, it is scarcely necessary to add there was a total ignorance of military discipline, and equal, if not greater was their want of military uniforms, arms, or ammunition. New life and vigour, however, were infused into all hearts by the arrival of King James into the harbour of Kinsale, early in the spring of 1689, bringing with him some French soldiers and several officers, with a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition. The military operations of that year are well known; early in the summer of 1690 active preparations were made on both sides for a final struggle. King William landed at Carrickfergus with a large and well-supplied army of British and foreigners. In the mean time King James collected nearly his whole force and advanced as far as Dundalk to meet him. The French fleet had a little before this time landed in Kinsale between 5 and 6000 troops of that nation, including a regiment of Swiss and Germans; they received immediate orders from King James to march northwards, whilst the several Irish regiments that lay in garrison along their line of march had orders to join them on the way.

It was a soft and brilliant evening, early in June, as they approached, in long line of march, the city of Kilkenny. Never did that ancient city resound with more loud or hearty acclamations than when were descried the snow-white banners of the advanced guard, having the "Fleur de lis" of France richly embroidered in blue and gold on their ample folds; crowds of expectant gazers thronged the walls, ramparts, towers, and gates of the city, whilst thousands who could not find access to these more elevated points lined every avenue through which their allies were to pass; immediately after the van rode the gallant, gay, and youthful commander of the whole, the Count De Lauzun, accompanied by his brilliant staff. Their approach to the city gate was announced by a renewed and prolonged cheer, which, accompanied by salvos of artillery from the walls and castle, made the distant echoes again and again reverberate. As he rode down the street towards the castle, where his quarters were assigned him, many a fair arm waved a snow-white scarf in token of hearty welcome, all which with true courtly politeness (in which, after all, the gallant count was a greater adept than in military skill) he gracefully acknowledged. As the several battalions, preceded by their splendid bands, passed beneath the narrow archway of St. Patrick's gate, they were loudly cheered. High over the northern tower of Ormond castle waved the royal standard of James, having written on it, in large capital letters, the significant motto "now or never—now and for ever," and on its southern bastion floated the snow-white drapery of the French standard. The interior of the castle became the scene of joyous feasting and revelry; French and Irish vied with each other in acts of gallantry and politeness—for on both sides were there many of high rank and ancient lineage. These amusements, however, in no way interfered with the military discipline which was strictly and punctiliously observed both by them and the common soldiers. During the night a strict watch was kept up, whilst the days were spent in reviews and military exercises; in these the French performed their part admirably, whilst the rude and awkward movements of the raw, undisciplined Irish gave occasion sometimes to the loud laughter and, oftener, to the contemptuous expressions of the French soldiery. At this, however, the Irish took no offence, nor did it in anywise damp the zeal, ardour, and enthusiasm which they felt; the gentry, for many miles around, with their families, together with thousands of the country people, flocked in daily to witness the military evolutions which took place in the great park of the castle. The charging and intermingling of horse and foot—the volleying of the small arms—the thunder of the artillery—the burst and crash of military music were all to them a new sight and sound.

THE
Life and Death of Oliver Plunkett,
 PRIMATE OF IRELAND.

PART IV.

BORN in the county of Meath, his heart filled with the splendid vision of Ireland's ancient renown, it could not be supposed that he would be insensible to the glories of Tara—the renowned hill on which stood for so many ages the palace of the monarchs of Ireland. There the assembled chieftains had received the truths of the Gospel from the mouth of St. Patrick, and proclaimed Christianity to be henceforth the religion of Ireland. Around this ancient hill were entwined the highest hopes of the faith and the “fondest memories” of nationality. The subject was calculated to call forth all the poetry that dwelt in the soul of the religious and patriotic Primate, and he accordingly wrote a poem upon Tara, probably during the peaceful administration of Lord Berkley. This poem is mentioned by O'Reilly,* who had a copy of it, but quotes, according to his usual practice, only the first line. The only other portion of it that I have been able to discover is the first stanza, which has been kindly given to me by a friend :

A Tēamharr na Ríog doḃ anam leat,
 Re lín Cormac mac Mícheall Mícheall Cúil,
 Alc ríabac boḃac boḃc,
 Bheir gearradh zort ar do dhruim.

The first line is, of course, the same as that which is quoted by O'Reilly. It may be freely translated as follows :

“Oh ! Tara of the kings, it was not usual with thee
 In the time of Cormac, son of Art, son of Con,
 To have the rough limbs of wretched clowns
 Cutting corn on thy back.”

Arthur Earl of Essex was sworn into the lord lieutenancy on the 5th of August, 1672. He does not appear to have been an evil disposed or bloody-minded man, but he lived in perpetual terror of the fierce and persecuting puritanical English parliament. This hideous demon constantly haunted him, and made him afraid of exercising the least indulgence towards the unfortunate Catholics of Ireland. Still if he was unable to confer upon them any favours, or restore them to any of their rights, he did not carry on against them a very active persecution. He was in particular an acquaintance and admirer of Primate Plunkett, and described him to Burnet as a “wise and sober man, fond of living quietly and in due subjection to the government.”* When the Primate was afterwards found guilty of high treason, Essex was so convinced of his innocence that he went to the king and implored him to pardon that excellent man, “assuring his majesty that the witnesses must needs be perjured, for these things sworn against him could not possibly be true.”† A quarto volume of letters, written by the Earl of Essex in 1675, whilst he filled the office of lord lieutenant of Ireland, was published at London in 1770. With the exception, however, of a few details concerning some of the robbers who then infested the country, under the name of “Tories,” there is nothing contained in them which can be at all said to throw light upon the history of Ireland. Besides, the events of this period are so well known that I shall consider myself bound, during the remainder of this narrative, to confine myself in a great measure to those which bear more immediately upon the transactions connected with Oliver Plunkett.‡

Shortly after Essex had assumed the chief government of Ireland the English House of Commons addressed the king on the affairs of Ireland. The address passed the house on the 9th of March, 1673. We have already had occasion to mention that the first part of this address required of his majesty that he would recall the commission which had been appointed to inquire into the claims of several Irish Catholic noblemen and gentlemen with regard to the forfeited estates, and that the commission had accordingly been annulled on the 2nd of July in the same year. The third article of the address prayed “That the Irish Popish archbishops, bishops, vicars-general, abbots, and all others exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, by the Pope's authority; and in particular Peter Talbot, pretended archbishop of Dublin, for his notorious disloyalty to your majesty and disobedience and contempt of your laws, may be commanded by proclamation forthwith to depart out of Ireland and all other your majesty's dominions, or otherwise to be prosecuted according to law. And that all convents, seminaries, and public schools may be dissolved and suppressed; and the secular priests commanded to depart under the like penalty. 4. That no Irish Papist be admitted to inhabit in any part of the kingdom unless duly licensed according to the aforesaid acts of settlement.” The fifth article demanded, that the indemnity granted to those who had been concerned in resisting the Puritans, in 1641 and the following years, should be recalled; the sixth, that Colonel Richard Talbot should be deprived of all his employments and banished from court; and, finally, the whole address was concluded by a declaration that his majesty's kingdom was chiefly endangered by Peter and Richard Talbot.

The archbishop of Dublin was, in consequence of this address, obliged to leave the kingdom, and so far was Charles from thinking him disloyal, that both he and his royal brother, James, united in recommending him to the protection of the King of France. The venerable archbishop did not, however, forget the church committed to his charge, for, like the early martyrs, he wrote letters from his place of exile to comfort and strengthen his flock. One of these documents was a pastoral epistle, addressed to the Catholics of Ireland, "On the duty and consolation of persecuted subjects," which was printed at Paris in 1674.*

In August, 1677, the Duke of Ormond succeeded Essex in the lord lieutenancy of Ireland. Although he had ever been unfriendly to the Catholics, he was undoubtedly opposed to the bloody persecution which was soon to burst upon them. England was at this period drunk with fanaticism, and the disordered imaginations of the people, which were constantly conjuring up monsters and devils, gave ready credence to the outrageous and impossible fictions of Tongue and Oates, which are commonly known by the appellation of the Popish plot. Even those who did not believe dissembled their incredulity, through fear or through dishonesty. The Duke of Ormond, who first received notice of the Popish plot, at Kilkenny, on the 3rd of October, 1678, was one of those who whilst he pretended in his official capacity to look upon it as a matter of the most awful magnitude, and to satisfy the fury of the English Whigs adopted the most stringent and cruel measures against the Catholics, treated it in his private correspondence with his friends, not only with perfect incredulity but, with the utmost scorn. He justly believed that if such a plot existed in England† it would necessarily extend to Ireland, where the Catholics were so much more numerous; and he says, as any one may see by consulting his letters at the end of the second volume of "Carte," that no such thing was to be found in Ireland; and he even treats with supreme ridicule and contempt, as we shall shortly see, the witnesses who were brought over to prove it.

Oliver Plunkett was the last victim of that diabolical conspiracy, and it is necessary to trace its progress briefly, in order to prepare the way for a mournful, but at the same time, sublime and interesting recital of the solemn tragedy which was enacted at his trial and execution.

On the 7th of October, only three days after the first intimation of the plot had been transmitted to the lord lieutenant, he received a further communication from the secretary of state that the plot extended to Ireland, that Peter Talbot was concerned in it, and that persons were hired to murder Ormond himself.‡ The duke had "no apprehension of that nature at the time, the Irish being in no condition to raise an insurrection, and Peter Talbot (being) in a dying way." Notwithstanding this belief, he signed a warrant on the 8th for his apprehension, and despatched an officer to secure his person, and then set out for Dublin, where he arrived on the 11th.§

The archbishop of Dublin had returned from the continent to England in 1676, "and had spent the two last years at Poole Hall, in Cheshire, being all the while in a very bad state of health, and terribly afflicted with the stone and stranguary. Thinking himself near his end, he was desirous to die in his own country, and, by his brother's means, made interest with the Duke of York to recommend his case to the lord lieutenant, and to prevail for a connivance for his return, he behaving himself quietly, without intermeddling in any affairs. Upon this assurance he had returned to Ireland, in the May before, and was carried in a chair to his brother, Colonel Talbot's house, at Lutterelstown,* from whence he had never stirred since he first entered the doors till the officer came to seize him and secure his papers. . . . None were found in his drawers but a few letters on controversial divinity. He was in so weak a condition that the officer, having no means of removing him thence, was forced to leave him, taking his brother's security for his appearance. But upon the lord lieutenant's coming to Dublin, Peter was removed thither in a chair, and committed close prisoner to the Castle, with a person to attend him in his miserable, helpless condition—the violence of his distemper being scarce supportable, and threatening his death every moment. Colonel Richard Talbot was soon after committed, pursuant to a like order from England, but was suffered to transport himself to foreign parts.† Archbishop Talbot, Colonel Talbot, Mr. Richard Butler, and two Jesuits, Bourke and Ryan, had been examined concerning the "plot," but nothing had been discovered which even the most malicious ingenuity could torture into a shadow of evidence that such a design had been ever contemplated. Yet Dr. Talbot lingered in prison for two years, amid the greatest afflictions, when death at length delivered him from his sufferings in the year 1681.

Although Ormond knew that the Popish plot both in England and Ireland was a malicious fiction, he acted as if he believed it to be an awful reality, which involved the fate of the whole empire. Notwithstanding that he had first heard that the plot extended to Ireland, on the 7th of October, 1678, and had reached Dublin only on the 11th, he issued a proclamation in council on the 16th, commanding all titular Popish bishops, dignitaries, and all others exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction by authority derived from the see of Rome, as well as all Jesuits and other regular priests to depart the kingdom by the 20th of November. It further ordered that all Popish societies, convents, seminaries, and schools, should be dissolved forthwith, and utterly suppressed. To deprive the clergy of all pretext for evading the clause ordering their banishment, a proclamation was issued on the 18th of November, requiring all owners and masters of ships bound for foreign parts, to receive them on board, and

* This is not correct. It is truly stated in Harris's Ware's Writers (Life of Peter Talbot), that the residence of Colonel Talbot, where the archbishop was apprehended, was at Cartown, in the county of Kildare, Lutterelstown is in the county of Dublin, and a few miles nearer the city than Cartown, which is near Maynooth. It may, perhaps, be useful to remark here, that the lives of the Irish writers of the seventeenth century, contained in Ware's works, were written by Harris. The latter is, therefore, the author of the lives of both Plunkett and Talbot. Harris wrote the fourteenth chapter of the first book of "Ware's Irish Writers," which occupies 200 pages, whilst the previous thirteen chapters occupy only 100 pages in the edition published at Dublin in 1646. Ware's own life will be found in this volume, pp. 145-157. He died on the 1st of December, 1666, when he was just entering on his 73rd year.

"Ware's Annals of Ireland" contain only the reign of Elizabeth; but they were published in English, in Dublin, in 1705, with a continuation, under the title of "Gesta Hibernorum," which begins with the proclamation of James the First, in Dublin, on the 5th of April, 1603, and brings down the narrative to the year 1704.

The sixth chapter of the second book of "Ware's Irish Writers" was also written by Harris. The latter is far more bigoted and less to be depended upon than Ware; and indeed he had no intention of writing anything upon Irish History until a great many of Sir James's manuscripts fell into his hands, in consequence of his having married one of the illustrious knight's descendants.

transport them accordingly. On the 20th—the day after which it became a felony for any Catholic bishop, regular clergyman, or any other, exercising legitimately his religious functions to be found in his own country—another proclamation appeared, offering a reward of £10 for every commissioned officer; £5 for every trooper; and 4s. for every foot-soldier that could be discovered to have gone to mass since he took the required oaths of supremacy and allegiance. The Catholic laity were also disarmed, and to insure the execution of all those measures, two proclamations were issued, one on the 2nd, and the other on the 12th of December, whereby all justices of the peace, and all others in authority were ordered to make more strict search after arms, and after the bishops and regular clergy, and to send to the government the names of their abettors, relievers, and harbourers.* Moreover more effectually to secure the extirpation of the Catholic religion, orders were given for “the suppression of mass-houses, and of meetings for Popish service in the cities and suburbs of Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Waterford, Kinsale, Wexford, Athlone, Rosse, Galway, Drogheda, Youghall, Clonmell, and Kilkenny.

The lord lieutenant and council having thus, as they vainly imagined, banished the Catholic religion from the land of St. Patrick, turned their attention to the Catholic laity, in order to deprive them of their civil rights, and to visit them with a persecution which it was hoped would satisfy even the Puritans.

On the 20th of November, 1678—the same day on which the reward had been offered for the discovery of any officer or soldier who had gone to mass since taking the oaths of supremacy and allegiance—a proclamation was issued :

“That none of the Popish religion, or so reputed, should come into the Castle of Dublin, or any other fort, or citadel, without special order from the lord lieutenant; that markets, and fairs should be kept without the walls of Drogheda, Wexford, Cork, Limerick, Waterford, Youghall, and Galway; that no persons of the Romish religion should be suffered to reside in the said towns, or in any other corporation, who had not for the greatest part of twelve months past resided therein; that no Papists should come to fairs or markets with swords, pistols, or any other weapons or fire-arms; and all of that religion to forbear meeting by day or night in any unusual numbers.”

Orders were soon after sent “to remove all the Popish inhabitants from Galway, Limerick, Waterford, Kilkenny, Clonmell, and Drogheda, except some few trading merchants, artificers, and others, necessary for the said towns and garrisons.” Thus all the Catholics, who were more numerous in these towns than in any other in the kingdom, and formed, indeed, fifteen to one of the entire population, were, without regard to age or sex, at once expelled from their own habitations.

“There were too many Protestants in Ireland,” says Carte, ii. 482, “who wanted another rebellion, that they might increase their estates by new forfeitures.” “To forward this righteous and evangelical design, anonymous letters were dropped in the streets of Dublin, in the month of December, of this year (1678), intimating a conspiracy formed for murdering the lord lieutenant. But he saw that the matter too nearly resembled the proceedings connected with the pretended ‘Popish plot,’ in England, to deserve any credit, and he therefore contented himself with offering a reward of £200 to any person who should make a discovery of the matter. He, however, soon after resorted to other measures of severity, for on the 26th of March, 1679, a proclamation was issued, ordering :

“That the kindred and relations (i.e. the wives, fathers, mothers, brothers, and sons) of such persons as were known tories, or out upon their keeping, in any county of the kingdom, should be forthwith seized upon and committed to close prison in the county jail, until such tory, or person out upon his keeping, to whom they were so related, should be either killed or taken, so as to be brought to justice; and that when there was any Popish, pretended parish priest, of any place where any robbery, or murder was committed by such tories, he should be seized upon, committed to the common gaol, and thence transported beyond the seas, unless within fourteen days after such robbery or murder, the persons guilty thereof were either killed or taken, or such discovery made thereof, in that time, as the offenders might therefore be apprehended and brought to justice.”*

These cruel and sanguinary measures, by which fourteen-fifteenths of the people were proscribed, did not in the least satisfy the Protestants, who wished to precipitate a rebellion, and thus occasion new confiscations. The very undertakers, to whom he was chiefly instrumental in securing their rapine, when the commission was issued to examine into the claims of the loyal Catholic noblemen and gentlemen who had been robbed of their property to enrich the king’s revenues, sent over complaints against the lord lieutenant, accusing him of acting with too much leniency towards the Papists. Constant expresses were sent to Dublin Castle, informing the chief governor that the French were on their way to Ireland, and that the Catholics were just about to rise in arms, and murder all the Protestants. Informations were forwarded in hot haste that Lord Shannon was advised by a priest to retire, with his plate and most valuable effects, into Cork, and that similar friendly cautions had been given to other Protestants by their Irish friends and neighbours. Ormond sent a free pardon to this priest, and the other Catholics who had given the warnings, desired them to be forwarded to Dublin without delay, and promised them rewards, in order that he might be able to probe the plot to the bottom. This order was treated as a matter of great severity against English Protestants, as indeed it was, for on the matter being investigated, it turned out “That no such friendly advertizements had been ever given, and the caution given to Lord Shannon was only the advice of a relation of his own, Mr. Richard Poore, who lived within a mile of him, and was a very good Protestant—that since he ordinarily lived in Cork, it was not proper for him to leave his plate in a lonely country-house—very open, his servants careless, and sometimes but one in the house—for fear it should be stolen.†

The chief complaint, however, against the lord lieutenant was, that some Catholics were retained in the towns as tradesmen and servants, because the Protestants could not do without them, “and that all the Popish priests had not quitted the kingdom upon the proclamation. But this (continues Carte) was not to be expected; it never was, and never will be the consequence of a proclamation: yet more had been shipped off than could have been imagined, and the rest lurked in corners, and durst not come near the great towns.”‡

Thus, the end of 1678, and the early part of 1679, were spent in constant endeavours to afford a pretext for seizing on the property of the Catholics, either by forcing them into rebellion, or by forging a plot. The continued tranquillity of Ireland was also a great disappointment to Lord Shaftesbury and the Whigs, and they therefore determined to insist on such measures being carried into effect against "Popery" as should force the Catholics into resistance. For this purpose they resolved to propose the introduction of the test act, as well as of all the other English penal laws, into Ireland. There was, however, another motive for this conduct, in which all the English parties in the excess of their blind fury against the religion of their ancestors equally participated. This motive we shall explain in the words of Carte (ii. 495):—"It was a terrible slur upon the credit of the Popish plot in England, that after it had made such a horrible noise, and frightened people out of their senses in a nation where there was scarce one Papist to an hundred Protestants, there should not, for above a year together, appear so much as one witness from Ireland (a country otherwise fruitful enough in producing them) to give information of any conspiracy of the like nature in that kingdom, where there were fifteen Papists to one Protestant, as that charged upon the Papists of England, whose weakness would naturally make them apply for assistance from their more powerful brethren in Ireland." On this account it was determined to goad the Catholics into a conspiracy, "all the endeavours that had been used by many persons who were on the watch against the least danger, and diligent to find out something to countenance the English plot, or to serve for the pretence of an Irish one, having hitherto produced but little to show there was any design of such a nature carrying on in Ireland."

Some persons may imagine that Carte is not an impartial witness concerning the Popish plot of 1678, which, if it does not owe its origin, certainly does owe its sanguinary success to Shaftesbury and the Whigs. We shall, therefore, give the opinion of Charles James Fox—the greatest Whig that ever lived, or that ever will live—concerning the conduct of the Whig leader in relation to the Popish plot:

"Shaftesbury did not consider the Catholics fellow-creatures; a feeling very common in those times Locke's partiality might make him blind to the indifference with which he expressed either monarchical, arbitrary, or republican principles, as best suited his ambition, but could it make him blind to the relentless cruelty with which he persecuted the Papists, in the affair of the Popish Plot, merely, as it would seem, because it suited the purposes of the party with which he was then engaged? You know that some of the imputations against him, are certainly false; the shutting of the Exchequer, for instance; but the two great blots—of sitting on the regicides, and his conduct in the Popish plot—can never be wiped off."*

Ever since the proclamation of the 16th of October, 1678, the persecution raged furiously against the bishops and clergy of the Catholic church. Vast numbers of them had been shipped off to foreign parts, and those who remained did not dare to come near the great towns, but lay concealed in the bogs and mountains. The Primate, however, did not desert his country, or even his diocese, but he left his usual residence of Ballybarrack, within a short distance of Dundalk, and took up his abode in a little house in an obscure country place called Castletownbellew, which is within a few miles of Drogheda. It was here he held his last ordination. As the persecution of the Catholic religion became every day more fierce and the search after its ministers more close and persevering, it was impossible that the head of the Irish Church should long escape the vigilance of his enemies. He was, however, so good a man, so wholly devoted to the duties of his ministry, so great and constant an enemy of Tories and robbers, as he himself afterwards declared at his trial, and so successful a promoter of peace, virtue and order, that Ormond was most reluctant to have him apprehended. Thus he succeeded in remaining at large for more than a year after the proclamation for banishing the clergy had been issued, and during all that time he continued to exercise the most useful and important part of his functions, by ordaining priests to take the place of those who were banished out of the country. At length he was apprehended in the retreat to which he had retired, and committed to prison on the 6th of December, 1679. It is not at all true, as De Burgo, p. 130, erroneously states, and after him all our modern ecclesiastical historians, that Dr. Plunkett was made prisoner on a charge of high treason.* On the contrary, the Primate himself, as well as the attorney-general, declared at his trial for "high treason," in London, that he was at first imprisoned solely on account of his religion. The usual charge against the clergy was that of having received orders abroad, and of exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction by the authority of the Pope, and for this alone was Dr. Plunkett apprehended. As I shall give his trial in full, I shall not quote, but merely refer to such portions of it as may be necessary to illustrate this previous portion of the narrative.

It was after the imprisonment of the Primate in Newgate, Dublin, that the charge of high treason was concocted against him by Owen (or as he called himself, Edmund) Murphy, at the instigation of Hetherington. These, as well as the other witnesses who appeared against him, were all men of notoriously infamous character; many of them were priests, whom he was obliged to suspend for their immoralities, and who, as we shall see in their examinations, had sworn to wreak vengeance upon him. But they were all, whether priests or laity, chiefly influenced in the perjuries concerning the Irish plot, whether they were directed against the Primate or other innocent individuals, by the promises of pardon for their own infamous crimes, and by the hope of rewards which were held out to them. Shortly before the arrest of Dr. Plunkett orders were given in the English council, on November 28th, 1679, for Mr. Secretary Coventry to draw up a letter "requiring the lord lieutenant and council (of Ireland) to issue a proclamation forthwith for encouraging all persons that could make any further discovery of the horrid Popish plot to come in and declare the same by a certain day to be prefixed; otherwise not to expect his majesty's pardon." The natural result followed; murderers and robbers and thieves, some of whom were actually in gaol, became informers, in order to avoid being hanged.

"Nobody (says Carte, ii. 498), was more active in procuring these witnesses than the bishop of Meath, who had been scout-

De Burgo here says that the Primate was apprehended in November, which is another error, for both Ardsdekin (ubi sup. p. 160), and Harris (Life of Plunkett), say it was in December. It is strange that Harris, and even Ardsdekin, fall into the same error as De Burgo, for they both state that he was apprehended on a charge of high treason.

master-general to Oliver Cromwell's army, and now exerted himself to the utmost to serve that great and worthy patriot, his very good friend (as he styles him), the Earl of Shaftesbury. The private, intercepted letters of his correspondence with the earl, which was carried on by means of Colonel Mansell, and William Hetherington (that nobleman's chief agent, manager, and instructor of the Irish witnesses brought to give evidence of the plot) show something more zealous than honourable in his proceedings in that affair."

"The most considerable witness (about the plot) was David Fitzgerald, a gentleman of the county of Limerick, and a Protestant. He was in gaol for having uttered treasonable words, and was soon to be brought to trial." Being acquitted, as a matter of course, of the crime with which he was charged, and this being his only object, he endeavoured to elude all further discoveries. He was, however, after considerable difficulty, sent over to Lord Shaftesbury; "but whether he could not comply with what was proposed to him, or was afraid of being prosecuted in his turn for accusations he could not prove, he stole away from London in order to make his way for Ireland, but was retaken at Bristol.* He then repeated his evidence, accusing Lord Brittas and other gentlemen, who wished to be tried in Limerick, their native county, but were forced to follow their accuser over to London, where they would have been infallibly convicted and hanged, if Fitzgerald had not confessed that all he had sworn was a pure fiction, concocted by himself and Hetherington. The latter opposed his design of retracting with all his might, but happily without success.† David Fitzgerald was so remorseful for his conduct, that Maurice Fitzgerald swore before the privy council in London, on the 20th March, 1680, that he strove to stifle the evidence of Edmund Murphy, John Moyer, Hugh Duffy (who were the chief witnesses against Dr. Plunket), and also of George Coddan, Paul Gormley, Murtagh Downing, and Maurice Fitzgerald." "Furthermore, that the said David did order me to write in my information that one William Hetherington and the rest of his majesty's evidence were all but rogues and thieves and gaol breakers; and that he gave Robert Poor instruction to draw up my evidence against Hetherington."‡ This "David Fitzgerald, upon a hearing between him and Hetherington, before the king and council, did assert that he could procure forty Irishmen, for forty pound, to swear whatever he desired them."—Castelhaven's Memoirs. See Thorpe's Pamphlets ubi sup.

Certainly nothing could show more strongly the degradation of our country and of our countrymen at this period than the shoals of witnesses who rushed to England to co-operate in the murder of the best men in the kingdom by the most foul and abominable perjury. It is to be observed, too, that these witnesses were found amongst the most fierce and turbulent opposers of English rule in Ireland. Most of them, whether priests or laymen, had actually been in arms against the government. They were all, however, base and immoral men, and such persons always carry in their hearts the seed from which treason against the holiest cause will spring. They are never its strength but its weakness. It will not, therefore, appear extraordinary, that the "parties of tories (to use the words of Carte) which the Duke of Ormond was careful to suppress, because they were a sort of nurseries for rebellion, served likewise for supplying witnesses for the Popish plot. One Murphy, living in their quarters, and corresponding with them, was prosecuted for that correspondence by Baker and Smith, of Dundalk. The proofs for convicting him were ready, and the assizes were near, when he made his escape out of prison, and put himself under the protection of the government as a prosecutor, for the king, of the charge against Oliver Plunkett, titular Primate of Armagh. John Moyer, being guilty of the like correspondence, took the same part as Murphy had done, and went to England, whence they returned with encouragement to proceed to the conviction of Plunkett, and powers to take up such persons as they saw fit for further witnesses. They had been examined in England as evidences of the plot, but had neglected to take out their pardons; and being prosecuted on their first return for their correspondence with tories, the bishop of Meath pressed the Earl of Shaftesbury, by frequent letters, to procure their pardons and get the titular Primate's trial (which was to be at the next assizes which were then near, at Dundalk) to be removed from that town, where he would be certainly acquitted, to either Dublin or London. The latter place was deemed most convenient, and the old man was accordingly sent for thither, tried, and convicted by this and the like evidence, of a charge that was in its own nature incredible, viz., the inviting 20,000 French to invade the kingdom, and land at Carlingford, and the listing of 70,000 men to join them."

Another of the witnesses of the Popish plot was James Geoghan, of whom Ormond, the lord lieutenant, thus writes.* After going to England and giving information concerning the plot, he returned to Ireland, in November, 1680, bearing with him an order of council requiring the government and magistrates to give him assistance in the business he came about, especially for the apprehending of any of those who had engaged themselves to kill the king. Having landed in Youghal he came to Waterford and was committed for treasonable words, but was released by the lord lieutenant, from whom he obtained money, a guard of six horsemen, and ample power to take up every person he pleased. "Thus authorised," says the letter, "guarded and provided, he set forth from Dublin," and commenced his work by whipping and beating a butcher in the open street about the hire of a horse, and riding away with the horse without making any agreement whatever with the owner. "In prosecution of the circuit he intended to make, he committed many other outrages, but at length his violences, excesses, debaucheries, and in effect his plain robberies committed on Irish and English Protestants and Papists, were so manifest, and raised so great a disturbance in all places" that it at last became necessary to put him in gaol.

Writing to his son, the Earl of Arran, on the 29th December, 1680,† the lord lieutenant says:

"You have already sent you a part of Mr. Geoghan's life and achievements till he left Ireland and was re-converted by the bishop of Durham, under the name of Dalton. His exploits since he came over with the authority of the council to take plotters are many and remarkable, and shall be sent to my Lord Sunderland as soon as the story is compleated to his committal to Newgate, where he now is. I send you authentic copies of examinations which will satisfy anybody that it was not fit to let him go on to plunder, beat, and imprison whom he pleased, English and Irish, Papist and Protestants, as his fancy, supported by strong ale and wine, should direct him.

"There is also Owen Murphy, authorized to search for and carry over witnesses (I suppose) to give evidence against Oliver Plunkett. . . . He has been as far as the county Tipperary, and brought thence about a dozen people, not like to say anything material as to Plunkett; so that I believe he takes them upon the account of Eustace Conyn's mad narrative."

In a letter to the same, dated January 6th, 1680, old style, or 1681, new, he continues the narrative of Irish witnesses.*

"Mr. Geoghan's history is brought so far that we have thought it time to transmit it to my Lord Sunderland; and we hope his villainies will appear to be such as will justify his sending to Newgate. Murphy, sent hither to gather witnesses, by virtue of an order of the House of Lords, is ready to embark with those he has picked up. In Hetherington's letter, produced by Murphy, he was advised to good husbandry, and particularly to take none with him but material witnesses, and yet he has taken some from Carrick that profess here that they are able to say nothing of the plot or plotters."

And again, writing on the 9th, he says :

"This westerly wind has carried over Murphy, with a number of witnesses; and Geoghan, since his imprisonment, has accused my Lord Carlingford, Colonel Garret Moore, and one Nugent, of treason, that the title of king's evidence may not only defend him from punishment here, but help him into England, where he hopes for more favour than here, where he is best known. And to make his presence there the more necessary, he now desires to be examined against the Lord Molineux. This is evidently his drift, but how safe it may be to find or affirm it to be so, I cannot judge."

He says to the same person, in a letter written on the 25th of the same month :†

"A notorious tory in Munster being ready to be sent by my Lord Orrery to prison, and at last actually, perhaps too hastily, sent hither by his lordship, offers at great discoveries, and names many persons as guilty of the plot. But orders will go this night for his setting at liberty, and for protecting him in his way hither. The fellow's name is Honaghan, as I think in times past an attorney in the Presidency Court, but since that was suppressed, turned robber. He has put his tale as well together as any of his country."

The last extract I shall produce from Ormond's letters is a most graphic description of an Irish witness of the period :

"All the business here belongs to the term and the judges; and at council there is little more to do than to hear witnesses, some come out of England and some producing themselves here; and all of them (I doubt) forswearing themselves. Those that went out of Ireland with bad English and worse clothes, are returned well-bred gentlemen, well coronated, periwigged and clothed. Brogues and leather straps are converted to fashionable shoes and glittering buckles; which next to the zeal tories, thieves and friars have for the Protestant religion, is a main inducement to bring in a shoal of informers. The worst is, they are so miserably poor that we are fain to give them some allowance; and they find it more honourable and safe to be the king's evidence than a cow-stealer, though that be their natural profession. But seriously, it is vexatious and uneasy to be in awe of such a sort of rogues. Now that they are discarded by the zealous suborners of the city, they would fain invent and swear what might recommend them to another party; but as they have not the honesty to swear truth, so they have not the wit to invent, probably. It is for want of something else to say that I fall upon this character of an Irish witness."

The truth is, as Carte states (II. 517), that "multitudes of miserable wretches were sent over from Ireland to serve in England as witnesses of a plot of which they knew nothing, till they were instructed by Mr. Hetherington, Lord Shaftsbury's chief agent, in managing and providing for them." Yet the evidence of these persons was made the pretext in England for ordering the lord lieutenant to persecute the Irish Catholics—and especially the priests—with the utmost rigour; and Ormond, whose opinions we have just seen, was base and subservient enough to feign a belief in the plot and to carry out the persecutions.

"Who is 'J. R.'?" "What is 'J. R.'?" "Where has 'J. R.' lived during his life?" "Who knows 'J. R.'?"

Such questions have often been asked in London and Dublin amongst literary people during the last few years. They relate to the writer of a variety of contributions to the Literary Gazette, the Gentleman's Magazine, the Dublin Review, and several other periodicals. Men of letters have often been glad to know the history of their author, and some account of this interesting writer will probably be acceptable.

The writings signed "J. R." are on a great variety of topics. They are of the nature of original ana on philosophy, general criticism, political history, and biography. Some subjects are more especially familiar to the writer's mind. Amongst these are the history of French literature since Louis XIV.; the family history of the great leading houses in Europe: the lives and adventures of eminent Irish Catholics since 1688. And throughout the writings there is displayed a knowledge of the last fifty years, evidencing, on the part of the writer, a personal acquaintance with many of the eminent characters of France and the British islands. The power of rapid reference shows, on the writer's part, a memory of extraordinary retention.

"J. R." is the signature under which Mr. James Roche, a magistrate of the city of Cork, makes public his curious contributions. In the seventy-seventh year of his age, performing the duties of a magistrate, and of the directorship of the National Bank of Ireland, Mr. Roche exhibits in advanced years an energy and vivacity of character, a parallel for which can scarcely be found. After the labours of the day, instead of dozing in an easy chair, like a fine old lazy gentleman, he commences to satiate his exhaustless appetite for reading. Copiously supplied with new works, he eagerly devours their contents. With pencil in hand he minutely annotates the margins, corrects all the wrong dates, and rectifies the quotations, often appending references of great value to a scholar. How he finds time to do all this is a mystery to those unacquainted with the wonderful readiness of his memory, and its singular precision upon dates and persons. The vigour of his memory is surprising, and when it is added that he is a master of the modern tongues, a sound classical scholar, that for sixty years he has been in "hellno librorum," and that he has mixed in the best circles of London and Paris, the variety of his attainments can be conjectured.

Mr. Roche is a member of a very ancient family—a branch of the great Roches. The representative of his family (nephew to "J. R.") is said to be the only person in Ireland who possesses landed estates in Munster, Leinster, and Connaught. This family always occupied a very high social position, and notwithstanding their adherence to Catholicism, they contrived to secure a large amount of their ancestral property. "What are the Roches of Limerick doing?" asked Edmund Burke,* when towards the close of his life he was applying his mind to the redemption of the Irish Catholics. The family of Roche exercised considerable influence amongst their fellow-countrymen in days previous to the advent of O'Connell.

* Vide Correspondence, vol. iv.

At an early period of his life Mr. James Roche was sent to France, where he was educated at one of the colleges which existed prior to the revolution. He was at Paris when Louis XVI. was executed, and witnessed the procession on the day when the most virtuous of the modern Bourbons fell a victim to the crimes of his ancestors, and the fury of a sanguinary populace. All the orators of that period were repeatedly heard by Mr. Roche, and with some of them he was personally acquainted. Though never in favour of violent measures, he was somewhat influenced by the amiable and generous party of the Gironde, whose classical spirit and romantic enthusiasm had great charms for one delighting in the study of the ancient authors. With the brilliant Vergmund he was intimately acquainted. Mr. Roche is probably the only person now living who repeatedly heard all the French orators of the revolution, and all the great British and Irish orators who illustrated the close of the last century, including Burke, Fox, and Pitt. The marked superiority of the British school of speaking was most evident. No comparison could be made between them by one who heard them both. Leaving Mirabeau out of the question, Mr. Roche has said that not one of the French declaimers, either of the Gironde or the Mountain, could be matched for an oratorical encounter with Pitt, Burke, Fox, or Sheridan—an opinion in which the French historians of the period would not coincide; but Mr. Roche's testimony is that of an impartial judge. Of our great British speakers, Mr. Roche, and he has heard all the great political chiefs from Burke to Peel, would assign the palm to Mr. Pitt, whose immediate effect upon an audience he has graphically described to the writer of these lines. Mr. Pitt appeared to him to unite strength and finish in a greater degree than his rivals. He came up more nearly to the standard of classical perfection.*

Of Mr. Roche one thing can be said, which is not true of any other Irishman—he was the personal friend of Lord Clare and Daniel O'Connell—certainly two of the greatest opposites that can be imagined! His grandfather gave John Fitzgibbon, the father of Lord Chancellor Clare, his first fee, and introduced him to the notice of some of the Catholic body. Lord Clare, the son, never forgot the kindness of the elder Mr. Roche, and a friendship and intimacy subsisted between the families, even though they were widely severed.

For a great number of years Mr. Roche was a banker at Cork. He resided at a very handsome country seat, over the river Lee, on the Glanmire Hill. In a wing of his mansion was assembled one of the most valuable private collections of books to be found in Ireland. The library was peculiarly rich in the classical and historical department. With his books Mr. Roche spent his leisure hours; and certainly none of his Irish commercial contemporaries could boast of such literary wealth as he was master of. In the year 1820 the house with which he was connected was compelled to suspend its payments. The disasters of a monetary crisis destroyed its prosperity, along with thirteen other Irish banks, which all failed within a few days of each other. No blame was attributed to the Messrs. Roche, and the deepest sympathy was felt in the reverses of the subject of this sketch. His creditors presented him with whatever books he chose to keep, as a mark of their respect.

* O'Connell had much the same opinion.

Mr. Roche resided afterwards in London for some years as a parliamentary agent, where his knowledge of Irish affairs was found extremely useful. He was an intimate friend of Charles Butler, the conveyancer. Community of tastes, not less than religious ties, united them. They were both the two most learned Catholic laymen in the British empire. The learning of Mr. Roche was appreciated in the highest circles. Amongst many others who distinguished him by particular notice, was that accomplished scholar, the late Lord Dudley. While secretary for foreign affairs, under Canning's ministry, Earl Dudley was much in want of a private secretary skilled in foreign tongues, and conversant with business and the affairs of the world. Mr. Roche's name was mentioned to him, and Lord Dudley eagerly desired to have an arrangement effected with Mr. Roche, on the most honourable terms. All was definitively settled. Lord Dudley, however, was excessively near-sighted, and from the nervous affection to which he was subject in his latter years his vision was much impaired. Mr. Roche's handwriting was curiously small—most provokingly minute. This writing was more suitable for a secretary to a queen of the fairies than for the British minister of foreign affairs. To the regret of both parties the cramp hand-writing acted as a disqualification.

It was always supposed that from Mr. Roche's learning and great variety of accomplishments, he made a considerable income during his stay in London. He afterwards resided for several years at Paris, and was there during the whole of the French revolution of 1830. He saw the assembly of the National Convention, and he was in forty years afterwards to see the erection of the barricades. He saw Benjamin Franklin at Paris, and beheld the procession to execution of Louis XVI. From Mirabeau and Vergund, down to Carrier, Perier, &c., he heard all their orators. He has thus known and seen France of the ancien regime; France during the throes of revolution; France of the Empire; France of the Restoration, and, last of all—France of the Throne of the Barricades. He has survived to see another revolution in the country where he passed so many years of his life. His knowledge of the various events of modern French history is extremely extensive; and he understands French literature with philological precision.

The conversation of this venerable scholar is extremely interesting. Always ready to communicate his knowledge, he is glad to assist all enquirers, and the swarm of living littérateurs of which Cork has been the prolific parent, constantly have recourse to his scholarship and encyclopedic learning. The Reverend Francis Mahony, in the "Prout Papers," called Mr. Roche "the Roscoe of Cork;" and there is more felicity in the title than is usual in compliments of that nature. Indeed few things are more admirable in Mr. Roche's character than the pious resignation with which he has borne great reverses. The loss of his library was to him a heavy calamity. His library occupied a large room in one of the extensive wings at the mansion of Lota Park; the room was tastefully ornamented with classic busts, and from its windows was a charming prospect of Lough Mahon, the river Lee, and the wooded peninsula of Blackrock; the books were selected with critical judgment, and contained some rare treasures. Conscious, however, of his intellectual resources he bore without repining the loss of his loved library. In study and philosophy he found ample amends for the cruelty of fortune, and the sincerity of his nature is in itself the best proof of the refining and elevating influence of literary studies. Delightfully free from the spleen of old age, and exempt from a querulous disposition, his is a bright happy, tranquil, and respected age. No gloom—no peevishness—no discontent—no sour repinings at diminished health or enfeebled energies.

“Semit a certe,
Tranquillæ per virtutem palet unica vitæ.”

Nor has religion, in its most elevated form, been wanting to this dignified character. In all periods of his troubled life—even during the first French Revolution—he was a devout and practical Christian according to the Catholic church, strict without asceticism, and pious without bigotry. False philosophy never lured him by its deceitful glare: the faith of his boyhood is the faith of his old age, as it was that of his manhood during a period when even the most religious minds contracted a dangerous laxity of thinking on subjects of eternal importance. As he never was tainted with infidelity, neither is his mind polluted with that morose antipathy to Christians of another creed. This toleration for the faith of others is as strong as his conviction of his own. He is a liberal, learned, and reverent thinker, and feels by his heart what his learned mind, skilled in historic lore, can promptly illustrate—that in all ages bigotry is a reproach to genuine religion.

Such is a faint picture of this admirable old man. Would that the wish of his numerous friends were gratified, that he might with his own pen, give the world his autobiography! His life would both instruct and entertain, and be perused with the greatest interest.

Evenings with the Poets.

NO. II.—ALFRED TENNISON.*

For a considerable time, Poetry may be said to have gone out of fashion. It is neither favoured by the learned, who have betaken themselves to philosophy—nor by the idle, who sleep over worthless novels. Yet a vast quantity of poetry is written and published in newspapers, magazines, and sometimes even in small volumes. It is proclaimed in narrow circles to be the genuine inspiration of the Muse, and is then forgotten for ever. We do not mean to say that some tolerable poetry has not been written within the last dozen of years, very far from it; but certainly no person who could with any truth be called a great poet, has arisen to fill the vacant throne of Byron or of Moore, of Wordsworth or of Southey. There is in fact no longer and Horace has sung, long ago, that “middling poets are an abomination in the eyes of gods, men, and booksellers.”

Why no poems are now written amongst us which are likely to procure for their author a world-wide fame, whose inspirations are transfused into every tongue, and which have impressed upon themselves the sure stamp of immortality, is a problem which admits of a great variety of solutions. It may be that splendid poetry is not written because the world is too busy with politics to appreciate or perhaps even to read it. It may be that the well of inspiration, which, during the early part of the present century, seemed so deep and inexhaustible has gone dry; or, mayhap, whilst an inharmonious Codrus stuns our ears with his hoarse sounds, the bright child of song is toiling for his daily bread, all unconscious of the hidden glory which dwells within him. There is a trite expression of this last solution, but withal so beautiful, that it cannot be too often repeated:

“Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark, unfathomed caves of ocean bear—
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.”

But, though none of those who at this time attune their thoughts to the harmony of sweet sounds “can be called a great poet,” there are many with whom we can spend a pleasant evening. Here, for instance, is Alfred Tennyson, a worshipper of the Wordsworthian school, who has been pensioned for his poetry. His poems are imbued with the great and redeeming virtue of the school to which they belong, for they contain nothing irreligious or immoral. The rhythms are also perfect, being often as sweet and harmonious as those of Moore. Unhappily he has also the vices of the “lakers,” being frequently obscure, and he sometimes confounds the natural with the puerile. Thus, in the introduction to a very pretty epic on the death of King Arthur, he says—

“For I remember’d Everard’s College fame,
When we were Freshmen.”

This is so natural as to cease to be poetic. But our object is not to quarrel with our companion, but to spend the evening pleasantly, and we shall therefore extract a few of the pieces which have pleased us most in the two volumes before us:

The Poet.

THE Poet in a golden clime was born,
With golden stars above;
Dowered with the hate of hate—the scorn of scorn—
The love of love,
He saw thro’ life and death, thro’ good and ill,
He saw through his own soul
The marvel of the Everlasting Will,
An open Scroll
Before him lay: with echoing feet he treaded
The surest walks of fame;
The viewless arrows of his thoughts were headed
And winged with flame,
Like Indian reeds blown from his silver tongue,
And of so fierce a flight
From Calpe unto Caucasus they sung,
Filling with light
And vagrant melodies the winds which bore
Them earthward till they lit;
Then, like arrow-seeds or the field-flower
The fruitful wit
Cleaving, took root, and springing forth anew
Where’er they fell behold,
Like to the mother plant in semblance grew
A flower all gold,
And bravely furnished all abroad to fling
The winged shafts of Truth,
To throng with stately blooms the breathing spring
Of Hope and Youth.
So many minds did gird their orbs with beams
Though one did fling the fire.
Heaven flowed upon the soul in many dreams
Of high desire.
Thus Truth was multiplied on Truth, the world
Like one great garden show’d,
And thro’ the wreaths of floating dark upcurl’d
There sun-rise flow’d.
And Freedom rear’d in that august sun-rise
Her beautiful bold brow,
When rites and forms before her burning eyes
Melted like snow.

* Poems in two volumes: London, Edward Moxon, 1843.

There was no blood upon her maiden robes
 Sunned by those orient skies;
 But round about the circles of the globes
 Of her keen eyes
 And in her raiment's hem was traced in flame
 WISDOM, a name to shake
 All evil dreams of power—a sacred name.
 And when she spake
 Her words did gather thunder as they ran,
 And as the lightning to the thunder
 Which follows it riving the spirit of man,
 Making earth wonder,
 So was their meaning to her words. No sword
 Of wrath her right arm whirl'd,
 But one poor Poet's scroll, and with his word
 She shook the world.

VOL. I., p. 46, and following.

We would warn the reader that he must accustom his ear a little to the peculiarities of the rythmes in these volumes, before he will be able to catch their harmony. The meaning, too, is not unfrequently to be attained only after considerable study.

St. Agnes.

I.

DEEP on the convent roof the snows
 Are sparkling to the moon:
 My breath to heaven like vapour goes:
 May my soul follow soon!
 The shadows of the convent towers
 Float down the snow'y sward,
 Still creeping with the creeping hours
 That lead me to my lord:
 Make thou my spirit pure and clear
 As are the frosty skies
 Or this first snowdrop of the year
 That in my bosom lies.

II.

As these white robes are soiled and dark,
 To yonder shining ground;
 As this pale taper's earthly spark,
 To yonder argent round;
 So shows my soul before the Lamb
 My spirit before Thee;
 So in my earthly house I am
 To that I hope to be.
 Break up the heavens O Lord! and far
 Thro' all yon star-light keen
 Draw me thy bride a glittering star
 In raiment white and clean.

III.

He lifts me to the golden doors;
 The flashes come and go!
 All heaven bursts her starry floors,
 And strows her lights below,
 And deepens on and up! the gates
 Roll back, and far within
 For me the heavenly Bridegroom waits
 To make me pure of sin.
 The Sabbaths of eternity
 One Sabbath deep and wide—
 A light upon the shining sea
 The Bridegroom with his bride!

VOL. II., pp. 171-2-3.

The next piece which we shall transcribe is written in exquisite rythme, and is better known than any of the other poems in these volumes:

Locksley Hall.

COMRADES leave me here a little, while as yet tis early morn;
 Leave me here and when you want me sound upon the bugle horn.
 'Tis the place and all around it as of old the curlew's call Dreary gleams about the moorland flying over Locksley Hall;
 Locksley Hall that in the distance overlooks the sandy tracts,
 And the hollow ocean ridges roaring into cataracts.
 Many a night from yonder ivied casement, ere I went to rest
 Did I look on great Orion sloping slowly to the west.

Many a night I saw the pleiads rising through the mellow shade
 Glitter like a swarm of fire-flies tangled in a silver braid.

There about the beach I wander'd nourishing a youth sublime
 With the fairy-tales of science and the long result of time;

When the centuries behind me like a fruitful land reposed
 When I clung to all the present for the promise that it closed:

When I dipt into the future far as human eye could see;
 Saw the vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be—

In the Spring a fuller crimson comes upon the robin's breast;

In the Spring the wanton lapwing gets himself another crest;

In the Spring a livelier iris changes on the burnished dove;

In the Spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love,

Then her cheek was pale and thinner than should be for one so young,
 And her eyes on all my motions with a mute observance hung.

And I said, "My cousin Amy, speak, and speak the truth to me, Trust me, cousin, all the current of my being sets to thee."

On her pallid cheek and forehead came a colour and a light,
 As I have seen the rosy red flushing in the northern night.

And she turn'd her bosom shaken with a sudden storm of sighs,
 All the spirit deeply dawning in the dark of hazel eyes—

Saying "I have hid my feelings fearing they should do me wrong."
 Saying, "Do'st thou love me, cousin?" weeping "I have loved thee long."

Love took up the glass of Time, and turned it in his glowing hands,
 Every moment lightly shaken ran itself in golden sands.

Love took up the harp of life and smote on all the chords with might,
 Smote the chord of Self, that trembling passed in music out of sight.

Many a morning on the moorland did we hear the copses ring.
 And her whisper thronged my pulses with the fullness of the Spring.

Many an evening by the waters did we watch the stately ships,
 And our spirits rushed together at the touching of the lips.

O my cousin shallow-hearted! O my Amy, mine no more!
 O the dreary, dreary moorland! O the barren, barren shore!

Falser than all fancy fathoms, falser than all songs have sung,
 Puppet to a father's threat, and servile to a shrewish tongue!

Is it well to wish thee happy?—having known me—to decline
 On a range of lower feelings and a narrower heart than mine!

Yet it shall be: thou shalt lower to his level, day by day,
 What is fine within thee growing coarse to sympathise with clay.

As the husband is the wife is: thou art mated with a clown,
 And the grossness of his nature will have weight to drag thee down.
 He will hold thee, when his passion shall have spent its novel force,
 Something better than his dog, a little dearer than his horse.

What is this? his eyes are heavy: think not they are glazed with wine.

Go to him: it is thy duty: kiss him: take his hand in thine.

It may be my lord is weary, that his brain is overwrought:
 Soothe him with thy finer fancies, touch him with thy lighter thought:

He will answer to the purpose easy things to understand—
 Better thou wert dead before me, tho' I slew thee with my hand!

Where is comfort? In division of the records of the mind.
 Can I part her from herself, and love her as I knew her kind?

I remember one that perish'd: sweetly did she speak and move;
 Such a one do I remember, whom to look at was to love.

Can I think of her as dead, and love her for the love she bore?
 No—she never loved me truly: love is love for evermore.

Comfort! Comfort scorn'd of devils! this is truth the poet sings,
 That a sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things.

Drug thy memory lest thou learn it, lest thy heart be put to proof.

In the dread unhappy night, and when the rain is on the roof.

Like a dog he hunts in dreams, and thou art staring at the wall,
 Where the dying night-lamp flickers, and the shadows rise and fall.

Then a hand shall press before thee, pointing to his drunken sleep,
 To thy widowed marriage pillows, to the tear that thou wilt weep.

Thou shalt hear the "Never, Never," whispered by the phantom years,

And a song from out the distance, in the ringing of thine ears;

And an eye shall vex thee, looking ancient kindness on thy pain.
Turn thee, turn thee, on thy pillow : get thee to thy rest again.

Nay but nature brings the solace ; for a tender voice will cry,
'Tis a purer life than thine ; a life to drain thy troubles dry.

Baby lips will laugh me down : my latest rival brings thee rest.
Baby fingers, waxen touches, press me from the mother's breast.

O, the child, too, clothes the father with a dearness not his due,
Half is thine, and half is his, it will be worthy of the two.

O, I see thee, old and formal ! fitted to thy petty part,
With a little hoard of maxims, preaching down a daughter's heart.

"They were dangerous guides, the feelings—she, herself, was not exempt—

Truly she, herself, had suffered"—Perish in thy self-contempt !

Outlive it—lower yet—be happy ! wherefore should I care ?
I, myself, must mix with action, lest I wither by despair.

Hark ! my merry comrades call me, sounding on the bugle-horn—
They, to whom, my foolish passion was a target for their scorn :

Shall it not be scorn to me to harp on such a mouldered string ?
I am shamed thro' all my nature, to have loved so slight a thing.

Weakness to be wroth with weakness ! woman's pleasure, woman's pain—

Nature made them blinder motions, bounded in a shallower brain.

Woman is the lesser man, and all thy passions, matched with mine,
Are as moonlight unto sunlight, and as water unto wine—

Here, at least, where nature sickens nothing. Ah, for some retreat
Deep in yonder shining orient, where my life began to beat.

Or to burst all links of habit—there to wander far away,
Or from island into island, at the gateways of the day.

Larger constellations burning, mellow moons, and happy skies,
Breadth of tropic shade, and palms in cluster, knots of Paradise.

Never comes the trader, never floats an European flag, Slides the hind o'er lustrous woodland, droops the trailer from the crag.

Droops the heavy-blossom'd bower, hangs the heavy-fruited tree—
Summer isles of Eden lying in dark-purple spheres of sea.

There, methinks, would be enjoyment, more than in this march of mind,

In the steamship, in the railway, in the thoughts that shake mankind.

There the passions, cramped no longer, shall have scope and breathing space ;

I will take some savage woman, she shall rear my dusky race.

Iron-jointed, supple-sinew'd, they shall dive, and they shall run,
Catch the wild-goat by the hair, and hurl their lances in the sun ;

Whistle back the parrot's call, and leap the rainbows of the brooks,
Not with blinded eyesight, poring over miserable books—

Fool again, the dream, the fancy ! but I know my words are wild,
But I count the gray barbarian lower than the Christian child.

I to herd with narrow foreheads, vacant of our glorious gains,
Like a beast, with lower pleasures, like a beast, with lower pains !

Mated with a squalid savage—what to me were sun or clime ?
I, the heir of all the ages, in the foremost files of time—

I that rather held it better men should perish one by one,
Than that earth should stand at gaze, like Joshua's moon in Ajalon !

Not in vain the distance beacons—Forward, forward, let us range, Let the great world spin for ever, down the ringing grooves of change.

Thro' the shadow of the globe we sweep into the younger day :
Better fifty years of Europe, than a cycle of Cathay.

Mother, age (for mine I knew not), help me as when life begun :
Rift the hills, and roll the waters, flash the lightnings, weigh the sun—

O, I see the crescent promise of my spirit hath not set,
Ancient founts of inspiration well thro' all my fancy yet.

Howsoever these things be, a long farewell to Locksley Hall,
Now for me, the woods may wither, now for me, the roof-tree fall.

We have transcribed only a portion of this poem, but the reader will be able to judge, from this specimen, of the merits of Mr. Tennison's verses. For our own parts we will freely confess that we formed a very low opinion of it when we first cast our eyes rather carelessly over it ; but we have since read it frequently and attentively, and on each occasion it has improved. We now consider it a powerful portraiture of the struggles of passion and reason in a mind whose confidence has been betrayed, and whose hopes of happiness have been suddenly and rudely blasted. The wild outburst of feeling and the sudden and unexpected reappearance of more sober thoughts which abruptly arrest it are finely and naturally expressed throughout.

Mr. Tennison has frequently seized upon the sweet recollections of our early years, where everything, although looked back upon through a long vista of sorrows, appears gilded with the golden hues of youth, and we doubt not that he owes to this circumstance much of his popularity. King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table, Godiva, Sir Galahad, Sir Launcelot and Queen Genevieve reappear in his volumes invested with new charms. We have only room for "Morte D'Arthur"—the death of King Arthur—of which, as in the case of "Locksley Hall," we shall omit much, and merely transcribe a few of the best passages :

Morte D'Arthur.

So all day long the noise of battle roll'd
Among the mountains by the winter sea ;
Until King Arthur's table, man by man
Had fallen in Lyonness, about their lord,
King Arthur : then because his wound was deep
The bold Sir Bedivere uplifted him,
Sir Bedivere, the last of all his knights,
And bore him to a chapel nigh the field ;
A broken chancel with a broken cross,
That stood on a dark strait of barren land.
On one side lay the ocean, and on one
Lay a great water and the moon was full—
Then spoke King Arthur to his Bedivere :

"The sequel of to-day unsolders all
The goodliest fellowship of famous knights
Whereof this world holds record. Such a sleep,
They sleep—the men I loved. I think that we Shall never more, at any future time,
Delight our souls with talk of knightly deeds,
Walking about the gardens and the halls
Of Camelot, as in the days that were.
I perish by this people which I made—
Though Merlin swear that I should come again
To rule once more—but let what will be, be.
I am so deeply smitten through the helm
That without help I cannot last till morn.
Thou therefore take my brand excalibur,
Which was my pride : for thou rememberest how
In those old days, one summer noon an arm
Rose up from out the bosom of the lake,
Clothed in white samite, mystic, wonderful,
Holding the sword—and how I row'd across
And took it, and have worn it like a king :
And wheresoever I am sung or told
In aftertime, this also shall be known :
But now delay not : take excalibur
And fling him far into the middle meer—
Watch what thou seest, and lightly bring me word."
Then quickly rose his Bedivere, and ran,
And leaping down the ridges lightly plunged
Among the bulrush beds and clutched the sword
And strongly wheel'd and threw it. The great brand
Made lightnings in the splendour of the moon,
And flashing round and round, and whirl'd in an arch,
That like a streamer of the northern morn
Seen where the moving isles of winter shock
By night with noises of the northern sea,
So flashed and fell the brand excalibur :
But ere he dipt the surface rose an arm
Clothed in white samite, mystic, wonderful,
And caught him by the hilt and brandish'd him
Three times, and drew him under in the meer.
(Sir Bedivere having carried King Arthur to the lake)
There saw they how there hove a dusky barge,

Dark as a funeral scarf from stem to stern,
 Beneath them; and descending they were 'ware
 That all the decks were dense with stately forms,
 Black-stoled, black-hooded, like a dream—by these Three Queens with crowns of gold—and from them rose
 A cry that shivered to the tingling stars,
 And as it were one voice, an agony
 Of lamentation, like a wind that shrills
 All night in a waste land, where no one comes
 Or hath come since the making of the world.
 Then murmur'd Arthur "place me in the barge,"
 And to the barge they came. Then those three Queens
 Put forth their hands and took the King and wept,
 But she that rose the tallest of them all,
 And fairest, laid his head upon her lap,
 And loosed the shattered casque, and clasped his hands.
 And called him by his name, complaining loud,
 And dropping bitter tears against his brow,
 Striped with dark blood; for all his face was white
 And colourless, and like the wither'd moon
 Smote by the fresh beam of the springing east.
 And all his greaves and cuirasses dash'd with drops
 Of blood; and the light and lustrous curls
 That made his forehead like a rising sun,
 High from the dais-throne, were parched with dust
 Or clotted into points and hanging loose.
 Mix'd with the knightly growth that fring'd his lips.
 So like a shatter'd column lay the king—
 Not like that Arthur, who with lance in rest,
 From spur to plume a star of tournament,
 Shot thro' the lists at Camelot, and charged
 Before the eyes of ladies and of kings.
 Then slowly answer'd Arthur from the barge:
 "If thou shouldst never see my face again,
 Pray for my soul. More things are wrought by prayer
 Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice
 Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
 For what are men better than sheep or goats,
 That nourish a blind life within the brain,
 If knowing God they lift not hands of prayer
 Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
 For so the whole round earth is every way
 Bound by gold chains about the feet of God."
 So said he, and the barge with oar and sail
 Moved from the brink like some full-breasted swan
 That fleeting a wild carol ere her death,
 Ruffles her pure cold plume, and takes the flood
 With swarthy webs. Long stood Sir Bedivere
 Revolving many memories, till the hull
 Look'd one black dot against the verge of dawn,
 And on the meer the wailing died away.

THE BOLLANDISTS.—PAPEBROCH.

NO. V.

To some it may appear that in following the literary tours of the Bollandists, and examining their museums, our object is merely to amuse the reader, as our brief sketch could not do justice to their subject. But sketches are now the order of the day. When Papebroch passed from the seventeenth to the eighteenth century, he immediately diminished the size of his folios, to accommodate himself to the growing fashion. If our brief notices of the chief points in the work of the Bollandists convey any useful information to the reader, or direct and confirm a taste which is rising in the country, our humble labours are more than repaid.

It is well to know in the first place, and above all, the labour that the hagiologist must undergo before he can write the first line of his work. It is well known that "legends" are no longer objects of contempt to the learned; a scholar does not now lose his reputation if he plead guilty to the charge of knowing the legends of his country; whether it is a reaction, or a mere amusement, or fashion, or devotion—legends of the saints are not unpopular; except, perhaps, among some of ourselves in the ends of the earth, who exhibit the usual Celtic obstinacy in clinging to antiquated prejudices which have long since been banished from most of our neighbours. The continental and English press is contributing every month an imposing accession of new lyrics and legends, dressed out in all the pomp of prose and verse, and the luxurious drapery of illuminated border and vignette. Bollandists are springing up in every province on the continent; every diocese will soon have its Godescard. Perhaps some reader is snatching a hurried glance at these lines before he rushes eagerly to his desk to lay down the plan of the life of a saint, on whom he has bestowed some anxious thought some twenty-four hours before. But whatever be the motive, whether a mere predilection, or an act of reparation, or a religious intention, the embryo hagiologist ought to weigh well the obligations of his task. He must earn success with the sweat of his brow, he must cultivate with long and assiduous care the earth which is to produce that lily of holiness, the perfect life of a saint; he must draw from the purest sources—walk over all the paths that have been examined by his predecessors; he must live with his hero, and follow him step by step, without resting even at his tomb, should he be so fortunate as to discover it; he must interrogate the generations among whom he lived, the cities that have adopted him as patron, and the churches dedicated under his invocation, in order to discover his shrines, banner, titles, and all the records of his posthumous glory. Some may think the labour is thrown away. Some may devote sleepless nights to discover one bright streak in the gloom of a pagan antiquity, or write tomes on the origin of some fossil remain, of ancient political or social life, but they could not waste a moment on the life of one of the heroes of the church, though, considered merely as a society of fellow-men, it is the most imposing institution both in its duration, extent and power, that has ever swayed the destinies of the world. Why should we not do for the saints of God what so many learned men have done for the illustrious names of Greece and Rome, or for the less famous characters of Egypt and the East? It has been calculated that one Bollandist wrote not less than 12,000 letters; we have seen them completing that labour of the intellect by making two or three times the tour of the world of letters. If you will be the biographer of the martyr or the virgin, go on in the name of the saint of your choice, but after having spent long days and nights in tracing the scenes of their labours, and after praying before their shrines and kissing the marble of their altars, remember that you have laid only the preliminaries, and that your work is not yet commenced.

If there be an ancient document to be read, a charter to be deciphered, or a strange tongue to be mastered, you must not shrink from the difficulty. If a knotty question in chronology, genealogy, or archeology cross your path, you must use a steady and fearless pen, and whatever point of dogmatic, moral, or mystical theology may arise, as it frequently does, you must not turn aside from it. These were the ordinary "postulata," the indispensable qualifications of the Bollandist. He came to his task, rich in profane knowledge, but grounded in solid principles by many long years in the halls or the chairs of theological study. As his final apprenticeship, he spent some ten years in conning over the folios of his predecessors, spelling, column by column, and line by line the two preliminary indexes and the four tables at the close.

But for those who are at liberty to select one life among a thousand, that liberty of itself imposes an obligation more stringent than that of the Bollandist who, by his profession, undertakes at the same time many lives, like Bollandus himself, to whose unaided labour we owe the 1,100 lives of the month of January.

Imagine, now, the work commencing: the literary tourists have returned home; the correspondence is exhausted, no more letters are expected; all the documents are arranged in order, like the produce of the harvest in the granary of the provident farmer. Surrounded by their literary treasures, and under the presidency of the senior, the conferences of the Bollandists commence. He cites, one after another, all the martyrologies, and marks down the saints which they commemorate on any particular day. Some of those saints are omitted, because their lives have been already published; others are deferred to another day, and many are erased from the list. After a long and rigorous examination two lists are drawn up—one containing those saints whose acts are to be given in full, the other, those that are passed over, or the "prætermisii." This latter list is found at the close of the former list, before the acts of each day of the month. It often contains, especially on Irish hagiology, short notices that could not be easily, if at all, found elsewhere. This duty of discrimination, or classification, was always entrusted to the most competent hand. At first it fell to Bollandus, then to Henschenius, whose notes marked out, during twenty years after his death, the track for his successors. Du Sollier next resumed that difficult censorship, and continued it to 1740, when he was succeeded by Stilling, in whose care it remained almost to the suppression of the society. Debye was the last of these venerable "ancients," as they are now usually styled. These five men were able during more than one hundred and fifty years to keep the whole system in motion, and to impart to all its productions as characteristic a seal of unity and consistency as any merely human work admits of.

As soon as the list of the saints had been fixed, the labourers immediately divided the work. The materials were distributed; auxiliary notes and references were supplied by the veterans to the younger hands, and the whole plan was at once struck out for a whole volume, embracing, perhaps, the labour of two or three years.

The first draught of a volume was sometimes twice or three times more voluminous than the form in which it ultimately passed into the printer's hands. After allowing 192 pages of text, and thirty-four of an appendix to St. Norbert's life, as it is published, Papebroch had still remaining materials for eleven folio tomes of his "Annals of Antwerp," which, after lying a century and a half in manuscript, are now being published.

When the printing commenced, the printer issued his sheets of eight pages; the author corrected the first proofs. The second was submitted to all his colleagues, each of whom examined it, and marked down his notes. A general conference was then summoned. If the votes were equal, the casting voice lay with the author, who, it was supposed, would be at once the most competent and the most sure, as having made the matter his special study. This was the regular censorship adopted. After the revision the sheets were given once more to the printer, the author gave his final corrections, and eight hundred copies were struck off.

But to arrive at this last point, what labours had been incurred by these indefatigable men! Death often carried them off before they had come at the term of their work. Cuper died while engaged in the "Acts of St. Augustine," and was succeeded by Stilling. Stilling, in turn, fell away before he had brought to a close the Life of St. Francis of Assisium, and was succeeded by Suyskens. An unknown saint, an obscure name in a martyrology, or a stray note on some holy man, often gave rise to a long train of inquiries. Bollandus, after having traced St. Switbert along the banks of the Rhine during five years, left Henschenius and Papebroch to go over the same route once more, through the almost inextricable confusion of the hagiology of the seventh and eighth centuries.

A better idea may be conceived of this immense labour by singling out one who was longer engaged in the work, and pushed his researches to a greater extent than any of his fellow-labourers. Papebroch continued his task to his eighty-fifth year. We have already accompanied him in his long literary tour from Antwerp to Rome. We contemplate him now in his study during fifty-five years, holding communication with all the literati of Europe, and communing with all the holy men who consoled and enlightened the church during 1,600 years.

When he was first associated with Bollandus and Henschenius he was in the flower of youth, and they were more than sixty years old. The first task imposed on him, as a birthday present, was to collect and edit the acts of the saint on whose festival he was born, St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland. Thus he became acquainted with the land of pilgrimages, through the life of the great patron of those countless troops of holy and learned men who went forth from the shores of Ireland in the middle ages. Bollandus, in exhibiting to his young disciple the glories of the "Isle of Saints," told him that he always regarded that daughter of the church as his own special portion. Papebroch illustrated the acts of St. Cuthbert, of Lindisfarne, St. Celsus of Armagh, St. Richard of Chester, St. Augustin of Canterbury, St. Edward the Martyr, and St. Margaret of Scotland, and a host of other less celebrated saints, whose shrines are scattered over the islands, grottoes, and valleys of the three kingdoms. This line of research kept him in close intercourse with the green isle of the west, which in the beautiful words of Görres appeared, during the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, like an emerald wafted from the glistening mines of the east and set in the verge of the western seas.

He traces to the most remote regions the pilgrim apostles from Ireland and Britain; he associates their names with the missionaries of Germany and the north, and with the martyrs of Mayence: with St. Norbert of Magdeburg, and his spiritual sons, who were invited to Denmark by Canute the Great; with Ladislas, the apostle King of Hungary, and the virgin Queen Cunegonda; with St. Stanislaus, the martyr of Poland, and a pleiad of less famous eclat, whose names are preserved in the Muscovite and Russian calendars, which he had received from a descendant of St. Bridget of Sweden.

Next after Rome, Constantinople was the city of his love; many a long hour he had snatched from his sleep, exhuming the menologies and ritual monuments of that new Rome, from the Vatican and Ambrosian libraries, and from those at Venice, Naples, and Grotta Ferrata. He translates into Latin poetry, preserving both the original metre and acrostics, the canons and hymns of St. Joseph, and St. John Damascene. He consecrated the close of his life to the history of the Patriarchs of Constantinople, but died before he had completed it; not, however, without bequeathing the lives of St. Nicephorus, St. Theodolus Stylites, and of Constantine the Great, the founder of the eastern empire.

Departing from Constantinople, with St. Gregory of Nazianzen, he examines all the cities of Asia Minor, to honour their martyrs; collects the splendid original and unedited acts of St. Theodotus of Ancyra; opens an unexplored mine of research for the Mechitarists in the saints of Armenia; takes the lead of the Assemani in the martyrs of Persia, and illustrates Nisibis, Edessa, and Mesopotamia, in the lives of St. John Damascenus, and of the holy abbots of the Eastern Lauras. Thence the life of St. Mary of Egypt brings him to the city of Jerusalem.

Arrived in that holy city, the cradle of Christianity and perhaps of the human race, he examines all the holy places in company with two guides—Phocas, the monk, and Antoninus, the martyr, whose itineraria he published. He traced up the long line of patriarchs to the days of the apostles, dwells with St. Peter on the shores of Genesareth, and with St. Paul at the feet of Gamaliel. To St. John the Baptist, the precursor of the apostles, he devotes one of the noblest monuments of learning and critical research that ever came from his pen; then, ascending beyond the bounds of the New Alliance, he penetrates the most ancient regions of hagiology, discovers the history of the saints of the old law, especially of Eliseus on Mount Carmel, and goes back full three thousand years to holy Job, the patriarch of all who have suffered for justice sake.

If we pass now to Egypt and the Thebaid, we meet Papebroch again in the acts of St. Athanasius and of the two St. Pacomius; in Africa he cleared the way for the life of St. Augustine, by publishing those of his mother St. Monica, and of his historian Possidonius; and in the isles of Chio, Cyprus, and Mytilene he reviewed the memory of illustrious saints, who shed on those classical regions a glory which they could never derive from their pagan associations.

There is hardly a country, or province, or diocese in Europe which this indefatigable writer did not examine in some of his publications. In Rome he traces down the illustrious line of martyrs from SS. Praxedes and Pudentiana to St. Philip Neri; at Nola he has St. Paulinus—at Lucca, St. Zita—at Padua, St. Antony—St. Antoninus at Florence—St. Catharine at Sienna, and SS. Gervais and Proteus at Milan. On the summit of the Alps he meets St. Bernard de Menthon, and at the opposite extremity of Italy St. Francis of Paula, who died in France. France herself, richly though she has been served by native writers of the first order, is under great obligations to Papebroch, who compiled in his best style the acts of some of her most illustrious men. Though France had been more especially allotted to Henschenius, Papebroch commented the lives of St. Hugh of Cluny, Robert of Cîteaux, Queen Hildegarde, Hilary of Arles, Ireneus of Lyons, and many other of the most brilliant ornaments of the French church.

Spain received equal attention from him, but was more ungrateful. An inexplicable decree condemned to suppression, in that country, during full twenty years the “acts” of St. Ferdinand of Castile, those of the Infanta St. Joana, of the blessed Ferdinand, and of the canonized labourer, St. Isidore; all of which had been compiled by Papebroch with more than even his usual care, nay with an almost enthusiastic predilection.

This severe blow brought grief and depression on his old age. To the last hour of his life—in his blind old age—this condemnation oppressed him; that was the strange reward of his fifty-five years’ labour—the price of his fourteen folio volumes which had cost him so much toil; but it was perhaps a happy recompense, because it assimilated his fate to the saints whose earthly sufferings he had so gloriously celebrated.

It would seem that he had long before anticipated and made preparations for this affliction by a particular department of the “Acta,” and the most important though we have not yet alluded to it. Those cosmopolite labours which we have sketched were, in truth, not the most important part of Papebroch’s labours. It was not enough to decypher charters and give dissertations on myths, and leave after him copious and respectable poetical effusions; whether from obedience or from choice, his chief care was concentrated on the most mystical saints, those favoured souls who had been raised to the highest flights of spiritualism. That distant and unexplored world was made familiar to him by the wonderful manifestations of its ways in the lives of the saints. Some are of opinion that in the volumes of the “Acta,” issued before and after his time, you do not find the records of the mystic life, the silent communings of the pilgrim soul with God, as abundantly as in those volumes published under his own care. Yet Görres, the most learned man in Germany, compiled his most learned work from those enlightened records, those inspired pages so much despised by the world, though they give a glimpse of what neither eye can see nor ear can hear. Thanks to Papebroch, when we are so disposed either in an hour of calm or spiritual depression, we can commune with St. Lidwina of Holland, St. Elizabeth of Schönau, St. Magdalen of Pazzi, St. Catharine of Sienna, St. Juliana de Falcariusi, the blessed Giles of Assisium, Simon Stock, Marie D’Ognies, and St. Humilita of Vallombrosa, with one of her inspired homilies, or the numerous spiritual letters of Osanna. These virginal souls were all purified by tribulations, and we may imagine them grouped like guardian angels around Papebroch in his humiliations, consoling him in his afflictions and blindness, and raising his hopes to the eternal mansions of the saints for whose glory he had devoted his life.

After this short sketch of one of the Bollandists, may we venture to take a passing view of his fellow-labourers, and of the character of their productions. To mark our ideas with some precision we may distinguish four phases in the whole learned series. The great leading characteristics are preserved throughout; there was no departure from the main object, but different periods had nevertheless different shades; like everything human, it was not exempt from change.

From the moment that Henschenius departs and leaves his three colleagues, Papebroch, Baert, and Jennings, labouring in the museum, you discover at once the inevitable law of human affairs. There was the gradual departure from the original plan of Bollandus; the masculine vigour of the capacious and persevering intellect of Henschenius, and the occasional "slumberings of Homer," towards the old age of Papebroch. The evidences of this are found in the more frequent revisions and rectifications in the beginning and end of the first twenty-five volumes, in the more numerous appendices, and in the meagre and often confused index. This period was still the great epoch of the "Acta."

The next group is Father Sollier, assisted by Pion, Cuper, and Van den Bosch; and after them, in order of merit, Limpens and Van de Velde. Under their care, the work proceeded silently, and more slowly, without any departure except for a moment from the beaten track. The exceptions are the martyrology of Usuard, the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria and the treatise on the Mozarabic liturgy, which form the most distinguished characteristic of this period. Intimidated, it would appear, by the violent controversies of the day the Bollandists studied to maintain a persevering equilibrium between the unhesitating credulity of the ancients and the daring scepticism of the innovators. Still there are traces of a fastidious criticism, and some timid admissions even in the best volumes of the period. The "Acts" of St. Bernard and St. Dominick have some traces of the evil days.

From the middle of this philosophic seventeenth century, the labourers become more numerous and urged on the work with greater rapidity. Suyskens, Perier, Ghesquier, Clè, De Rye, can scarcely keep pace with the indefatigable Stilting. The march of the Bollandists becomes more lively, more aggressive, more daring: there is more of polemics, the prescription of old traditions is losing its force; the negative argument, the want of rigid historical proof is often urged against the best positions. This feature, which was rather unusual, was developed principally by Stilting. You will be surprised to find him in almost every page in opposition to Papebroch and Henschenius on the Patriarchs of Constantinople; with Henschenius and Mabillon on St. Gregory the Great and St. Bechu; with Du Sollier, Pearson, and Baillet on St. Hermes; with Baillet, Tillemont, and Pagi on St. Firmin, St. Eusebius, SS. Cosmas and Damien; with Suarez on the one hand and the Jansenists on the other, regarding St. Faustus of Riez: with Grabe for his credulity and Ittig for his scepticism regarding St. Theckla; finally, with Baronius, the Roman martyrology and Breviary, and the traditions of the churches of Autun, Lyons, Vienna, Rheims, Orleans, Palermo, and Capua, on the succession of their ancient bishops. Stilting was right in most of his criticisms and hypercriticisms, but it is not pleasant to find him so frequently in antagonism with his predecessors.

In the saddest period of its history, that is from the dispersion of the Jesuits down to the dispersion of the Bollandists themselves, the working of the "Acta" was principally under the superintendence of Father De Bye. It is no wonder that during that interval of woe, the sorrows of the writers occasionally imprint some traces on the works themselves; dissertations are long and sometimes not decisive, and the prevailing opinions of the age are found to have some influence. But what is more astonishing is, when you follow the dates of those wretched days, to find always, even during the tornado of revolutionary passions, the imposing calmness of learning and faith in the Bollandists, and the fecundity of their better days. Thus, in the interval between 1783 and 1794, they published annually the "Analecta Belgica," which was exclusively their own work.

All due allowances made, no person can speak of the "Acta Sanctorum" but as the admiration of the world. Science by all its oracles, authority by all its organs, have decided in its favour. Even incredulity and scepticism have been disarmed. After Alexander VII. and Benedict XIV., after Bellarmine, Bona, and Fontanini, with Mabillon, Muratori, and Ducange, uniting in the same homage with Leibnitz, Meibom, Bayle, Ludovig, and Fabricius, what more is requisite. Napoleon spoke as highly of it as Turenne. It is not long since M. de Hammer and Görres in Germany and Monge and Guizot, and St. Marc Girardin, in the name of the learned and scientific world in France, have subscribed to the following passage of one of the most learned fellow-countrymen of Bollandus. "Whatever," says M. de Reiffenberg, "be the opinions you profess, or philosophy you adopt, be you believers or unbelievers, zealots or indifferentists, Catholics or disciples of Luther or Calvin, if you love learning and have any historic belief in the past, you must respect the 'Acta Sanctorum' as one of the greatest monuments of learning, and as the archives of the grandest epoch in the history of man."*

RECOLLECTIONS, CONFESSIONS, ADMISSIONS, AND AVOWALS OF AN

Irish Parliamentary Reporter.

BY WM. B. MAC CABE, ESQ.,
Author of "A Catholic History of England."

"Dispari in causa idem omnium clamor est."—Q. Curtius, lib. x. c. 2.

CHAP. IV.

THE king's visit to Ireland.—The author unacquainted with politics in 1821. Eloquence of O'Connell, as exemplified in its impression upon a school-boy.—Promises of benefits to be conferred on Ireland by George IV.—The Government papers paid for deluding the Irish.—Unpopularity of George IV. accounted for.—Prosecution of Queen Caroline, and its disgusting disclosures.—The state of feeling in England with respect to the king.—The necessity felt by the king's advisers of exciting a loyal enthusiasm in his favour in England.—The means resorted to.—They are successful.—The monarchical republican!—the loyal ribbonman.—The 12th of August, 1821.—The king astonishes his admirers by his ugliness.—The first day of the royal visit.

AT the time that it was announced "his most gracious Majesty, George the Fourth," intended paying a visit to his good and loyal people of Ireland, I could not with justice boast that I had the honour of being connected with the press. I knew much more then of the achievements of Alexander the Great than of the Duke of Wellington, had read more of the speeches of Cicero than of George Canning, and was a greater admirer of Demosthenes than of Richard Shiel; or, to state the truth in plainer and simpler language, I was utterly ignorant of politics—and took so little interest in them that I had never attended but one Catholic meeting. That meeting was held when I was a school-boy at Cork—and I now refer to it for the purpose of showing what were the powers of O'Connell as an orator, and how different he was from any other person I ever listened to. I remember being brought to the meeting, listening for a couple of hours to various speakers, and wondering to find that what was as unintelligible to me as if it were spoken in a foreign language, should be so much applauded. I could not make out what was the object of the assembly, nor why there was so much excitement, until it was addressed by O'Connell, and then—I felt as if the speech he delivered was addressed to myself alone—was solely intended to enlighten my ignorance—to awaken my zeal, and to animate my exertions. All was plain, clear, and comprehensible, and as a boy-Catholic, I wished that I was a man, that I too might struggle to remove the stigma which bad laws imposed upon me, because I was an Irish Roman Catholic.

I trust I may be pardoned for this digression, but I could not avoid referring to an incident which made a deep impression on my after life, and that has always strengthened the conviction that there never was, and never will be, a popular orator to equal O'Connell.

The first great political event in Ireland that attracted my attention was "the king's visit." I was not then a reporter—merely a student—corresponding in bad prose, and worse poetry, with one who was then, as he ever has been, despite of all differences in politics and religion, a true, trusty, and honoured friend, Dr. Andrew Mac Arthur, of Shinrone. He it was who made me believe I could even write epigrams, and who stirred up in me the ambition of being connected with the press. I might then be said to begin to flit about the flame, although I was not absolutely caught, nor even singed. My justification for referring to "the king's visit" amongst my "Recollections" is, that it was a great act in the political drama—that upon it turned the interest of many of the succeeding scenes, and that such was the impression it produced upon me, I can refer to the various incidents with as much clearness and vividness of thought as if they had occurred but yesterday.

For weeks—I may affirm for months—previous to the time determined upon for the king's visit to Ireland, the papers of the Castle were filled with mysterious declarations, and demi-official announcements of great and important changes in the political condition of Ireland being in the contemplation of our kind monarch—of wondrous blessings that were to be bestowed upon the country, either at the time of his visit, or as memorials that such a visit had taken place. That there was great good to be done, it would have been a species of heresy to disbelieve; the only doubt or uncertainty was as to the time of its being done; but one thing at least was positive—it was to be either whilst the king actually was there, or immediately subsequent to his departure from the country! In these announcements the most implicit credence was placed by the people of Ireland, who, if they are not always willing to be deceived, have ever been found that as a nation, they could with facility be cajoled. The honest, well-meaning, and confiding Irish credited these announcements: and they had some reason for doing so; for they knew that there was not a paragraph that assured them of some unknown good, and which appeared in the Castle papers, that was not paid for by the public, and charged for by those papers at the same rate as if each were a proclamation—that is, one shilling a line for each particular promised blessing! Accordingly the Irish had at that time a most lively "sense of future sorrows"—they were full of gratitude for the good they expected, and they were determined that their future conduct should not disen- title them to it.

I cannot say by whom was concocted the plan of holding out false hopes at this time to the Irish people; but to this I can bear witness, that if it were a dishonest, so also was it a most politic measure, and one for which a Machiavel might find an excuse, as "una astutia fortunata," because of the indispensable necessity of having recourse to such a device. Truth to say, immediately previous to the publication of those hopeful and well-paid paragraphs, the character of our most gracious sovereign was not in very high odour in Ireland. Until they appeared, I verily believe that Sir Harcourt Lees would, at the time, be better received at a Catholic meeting in the South, or Mr. O'Connell at an Orange club in the North, than King George the Fourth in Dublin. Orangemen and Catholics are Irishmen, and never, amid their multitudinous squabbles, have they lost sight of that characteristic of their country—a respect, amounting to a romantic devotion, to the purity and honour of the fair sex. This feeling had been outraged in the prosecution, and the publication of the trial of the unfortunate Queen Caroline. Both had tended to excite in the hearts of all Irishmen a general feeling of commiseration and of pity for the accused. I well remember the horror excited by the publicity given to the testimony of one witness, especially, against the queen—it was that, if I recollect the name aright, of Barbara Krantz—it aroused one common, universal, and most disloyal sentiment of disgust: and it is by no means improbable, that if at the moment that it was prevalent, "the royal visit" had been paid to Dublin, the "jackeens" of the Liberty would have been as profuse in their bestowal of clumps of turf upon the royal carriage, as "the vagabonds" of London with dead dogs, defunct cats, and treasonable stones.

At the time that the Irish were promised a beneficent visit, Queen Caroline was living. She had a strong party in England. The lower classes had enrolled themselves under her standard, and their superiors in station would, had she survived but a few months longer, been compelled to join their ranks. It was the popular spirit which first tried its strength in her defence, that subsequently carried the Reform Bill. It began by defying a king, and ended by mastering, for a moment, the House of Lords.

Queen Caroline was, at the time, most popular in England, whilst her kindless and remorseless husband, who ruled over the mightiest empire in the world, was not merely unpopular, but was personally hated for his cruelty, and despised for his meanness. Such was the state of feeling in England, whilst in Ireland, the popularity of the queen, as the opponent of her husband, was daily increasing; had not feelers then been thrown out by the government journals respecting the king's visit, and the good that was to be accomplished—had Mr. O'Connell then accepted the situation of Her Majesty's Attorney General which was offered to him—had he raised the ægis of his eloquence in defence of her cause, presenting to her opponents the gorgon-head of his sarcasm and vituperation, and which would have indurated them for ever as emblems of infamy in the memory of his countrymen—had such as this occurred, then in vain would the king's visit have been made. It would have effected no good for his majesty, and he would have been as unpopular in Ireland as he was in England.

The king of England dared not then appear in presence of his English subjects. The monarch was hooted after as a baffled conspirator who has sought to oppress the innocent with charges of crimes invented by himself, and deposed to by his creatures. It was necessary to relieve the king from this position in the face of Europe. Some point d'appui must be discovered—some expedient resorted to for the purpose of sustaining the sinking spirits of the king's party. The Lord Castlereagh, then one of the chief secretaries of state, knew Ireland well; he knew that there was the possibility of deluding her people by words that seemed to be promises, but that time should prove to be nothing more than false hopes—the associate of Pitt, and the prompter to Cornwallis, he had proved by the Union that the Irish were credulous; and consequently their powers of belief were to be again tested. False hopes were held out to them. The stratagem had the desired success. Ireland was prepared to be grateful. The people had official authority for imagining that they ought in reality to be grateful. That exuberant loyalty for which Ireland had long been remarkable was aroused. The people became desirous to see the king who was “coming to Ireland to do them good, to serve them, and to confer great benefits upon them.” Day after day their loyalty waxed stronger, and at last they were betrayed into that enthusiasm, which brought down upon them the vial of wrath which the glorious genius of Byron poured forth in his “Avitari.”

It is not my desire to enter into political disquisitions in the course of these “Recollections,” but when reference is made by me to the king’s visit, it is indispensable that I should show what were the causes that induced the enthusiasm manifested by the Irish in their reception of the king in 1821. To illustrate the feelings that then prevailed is to state facts, and to adduce arguments. I remember, a few days before the king’s arrival in Ireland, I was speaking to a gentleman, whose name, for reasons that will immediately appear, I forbear to mention. I asked him how he felt as to the approaching visit of the king to Ireland.

“You know,” said he, “that I still bear upon my person marks of the wounds I received in fighting against the king’s troops in Ross. I could have little idea that when I shot a sergeant, as he was running over the bridge, and received at the same time a wound which disabled me for the day, that I should ever feel rejoiced to see a king of England come to Ireland as her monarch. I am rejoiced that I shall live to see the day when such an occurrence takes place; for I do believe that the king—God bless him!—(and here the pious rebel took off his hat) will do more good to Ireland than could be accomplished by any republican government we might have established. I have seen it stated in the papers, and I have also heard it from the best authority, that his majesty has said he will endeavour to prevail upon his ministers to have the parliament of the United Kingdom held in Dublin every third or fourth year. If so, the English, as with us, the Irish nobility, will be obliged to have houses in Dublin, and the former will begin to know and love the country; and in a few years they will, not improbably, prefer a residence here in summer to a tour through France and Italy. Yes—our kind monarch, now that he has the power will make Ireland a happy country.”

So this “good, easy man” thought at the time, and therefore he was enthusiastically loyal! I remember too, my private tutor was a gentleman whose violent, and ultra-political principles were so notorious that he was once publicly accused in Trinity College of being a leader of ribbonmen; and he declared to me, upon my questioning him as to his feelings with respect to the king, about this time; “That he was so convinced of the honest intentions of George IV. towards the Catholics, that he would willingly have laid down his life to save his majesty one moment’s pain.”

Hopes of promotion, places, pensions, and a modification of the Union, were the inducements held out to the one party—honours, titles, and Catholic Emancipation were the temptations for the other. Both placed implicit confidence in their deceivers, and all became impatient to welcome the king in Ireland, and to show the radicals of England that their monarch had at least one brave and faithful nation in whom he could confide, and on whose valour he might rely.

It was on the evening of the 12th August, 1821, that His Majesty, King George the Fourth, landed in Ireland. It was a glorious evening, rich with the glow of a sunset that fell upon a land with fields that were either bright as with a summer’s queen, or uplifted the golden fruits of an abundant harvest. I bear in mind that as the first booming cannon told by its clamorous roar that the king was in Ireland, I was sitting at the dinner-table with my father, and the Very Rev. Eugene O’Reilly, the Vicar-General (I believe) of the diocese of Down, and I remember the enthusiasm of both, as they stood up and pledged with the heart, as with the lip—“the king, God bless him.” It was the loyalty of the home—the loyalty of the hearth—with none to witness it but one, who now records it but as indicative of that which occurred most probably in every homestead in Ireland, whatever the rank or condition of the inmates. This home scene portrays the state of feeling in Ireland at the time. The deceiver and the deceived have since gone down into their graves. The one won what he wished for in this world. May that peace and happiness which man cannot give, be for ever the lot of those who were then so deceived!

At the moment that George IV. landed at Howth, there were but few persons, comparatively speaking, to welcome him; and I am sure I am justified in saying that there was not one who had been previously unacquainted with his person who was not disappointed upon seeing him. There were many persons, who, like myself, had formed an opinion respecting the appearance of the king from the pictures of him that were to be seen in the print-shops. I, for instance, thought I should have looked upon a man, certainly declining in the vale of years, but who would still bear some traces of the manly beauty which was attributed to him. I thought I should have seen an antiquated Adonis. Moore’s satires had prepared me for that at least; but instead of it, nothing was to be remarked but a very infirm, a very unwieldy, and a very bloated old man; and no more like the pictures which Sir Thomas Lawrence has given to the world “than I to Hercules.”

I can never think of the figure the king presented to my astonished sight, the first time I saw him, without bringing to mind the description given of him a few years afterwards to a friend of mine, by a clever droll in the Castle, whose powers of mimicry led to his expulsion by the Marquis Wellesley. “You know,” said Sir C—— V——, “that when the king was in Ireland he was ugly enough, but egad, now, Sir, he is the ugliest man in the world!” And “ugly enough” he certainly was when he landed on Howth—however he was the king—“every inch a king”—and all was joy and enthusiasm. The moment he landed, he was placed in his carriage—horses, mules, and asses formed his body guard—turnpikes flew open to receive him—a shouting mob dashed, helter-skelter, after him—along the roads, through the park into the Vice-regal Lodge. Previous to the king retiring, he took off his blue travelling cap, and assured the tag-rag-and-bob-tail by whom he was surrounded, that “that was the happiest moment of his life." Curious as it may appear, he certainly then spoke the truth; for he was received in Ireland better than he deserved, and he was aware that not many hours had elapsed since his hapless, persecuted wife had expired.

The moment that the king reached the Vice-regal Lodge, in the Phoenix Park, notice was sent to the salute battery that the king had arrived. The cannons' mouth soon roared forth the good tidings to the citizens of Dublin. The people, in return, huzzaed, and put tallow candles in their windows. There was a general illumination—feasts were in every house, and bacchanalian royalists rolled through every street, and in this happy and delightful manner passed off the first day of the king's visit to Ireland!

Lament

OF FERGHAILL OG MAC AN BHAIRD* FOR HIS VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

(From the Original Irish.)

I.

O MOURNFUL my journey to Alba has been!
I left the spouse of King Feilim, Rachtmar the Fair!
With a heart o'erborne by grief and despair
I sailed away from Erin of pastures green!

II.

Through love of this world's false pomp and show
I crossed the seas, alas! to an alien strand—
I left my home for the stranger's land.
Oh! God's Great Day for me will be dark with woe!

III.

And fearfully pondered I that day,
What time I crossed with my precious poem the wave,
Which seemed to yawn for me like a grave
For thus forsaking the Isle where the Gael held sway.

IV.

Already my punishment seems begun!
In the land of golden goblets and hedge-rows white
I never, never, by day or night,
Received the body of God's Eternal Son!

V.

O! ruinous pride of intellect!
Well pondering thee this night, may I wail and weep!
Alas! by voyaging over the deep
My peace of mind, I fear, has been ruefully wrecked!

VI.

O, woe! for a share of this vile world's wealth
I left the bome, the churches, the shrines of my youth,
For sake of lucre, and not of truth,
I madly perilled my soul's eternal health!

VII.

Were all the treasures of bower and hall
In Alba's regions of mountain-crag and lake
This blessed moment mine own to take,
One single holy Mass would excel them all!

VIII.

O, Alba! think not, altarless one,
That the blood of the Heavenly King is given to thee!
The Eucharist, holiest mystery!
Resides, and bides in the Catholic Church alone!

IX.

And other lands too, O sad and strange!
O! cause to me of bitterest lasting grief!
There be who reject the high belief
Of the Angel-worshipped sacramental change!

X.

Thrice dead is the land that adareth not
The pure, celestial body of God the Lord!
Catholic! Fools may hold thee abhorred,
But strong in the Church's faith, how blest is thy lot!

* Lived in the beginning of the 17th century.

XI.

Better in the Green Isle to beg my bread,
Where I may kneel and worship the sacred Host,
Than reign a king in this land of the lost,
Which even the day of wrath scarce moves to dread!

XII.

I glance around me with many a sigh;
I see house, castle, flood, forest, valley, ravine,
But where is the chalice or jewelled shrine?
O, Saviour! not in this cold, cold realm would I die!

XIII.

And yet, for thy sake, may Alba be blest!
I bid that land of disasters a long farewell,
Though Heaven above alone can tell
If e'er I again shall see mine Isle of the West!

XIV.

Thy holy help, O Lord I entreat,
To guide me safely anew to Erin's shore—
Thy Mother's protection, too, I implore,
Till that loved soil shall next be pressed by my feet!

XV.

From dying in sin in this godless clime
Preserve me, O, Trinity! Spirit, Father, and Son!
And thou, too, Mary, Immaculate One!
Rich Tree of Holiness, ever in golden prime!

XVI.

Behold, Blest Mother, my griefs and tears!
In mercy pardon whate'er I have wrought of wrong,
And 'mid the woods that I lov'd so long
O, grant me the favor to close my weariful years!

XVII.

There was one who of old wept bitterly
For denying the Lord who came to save Man's race—
O, holiest Virgin! Queen of Grace!
Remember penitent Peter, and pray for me!

The Compact.

A LEGEND OF FLANDERS.

In the middle of the seventeenth century there was at Brussels, in a street leading from La rue Notre-Dame-des-sommeit—which they still call "The Devil's owner"—a small house of neat and modest appearance, the inhabitant of which was a celebrated architect, whose history contains a sage lesson and a useful moral.

This architect was called Olivier. He had amassed by skilful speculations a tolerable fortune, when he undertook to construct the bridge over the rushing waters which cross the Seine at its entry into Brussels, between the gates of Het and Anderlecht. He calculated on finding there a solid foundation, but he was obliged to go to enormous expense, in order to strengthen the fundament, which was upon a very marshy and miserable soil. However, the first stone of the new bridge was laid the 28th of April, 1658, as is proved by an inscription discovered some time since, during some partial repairs which it was undergoing, and which inscription bears the names of Necke, Bruyere, and Bassery, chief officers present at the ceremony.

Olivier pursued his work with courage and perseverance. Soon the capital which he possessed was devoured by it. He saw that he had been fearfully deceived in the undertaking; his enterprise was scarcely one-third raised, ere he was obliged to suspend the work, not having means to proceed any farther.

This thought maddened him, he was a ruined man, about being dishonoured, the public looking to him for a ratification of his engagements, those whom he had employed awaiting the means of preserving their daily bread; he rushed wildly to his friends, and he sought their assistance for a few months, but those who had offered him their purses when they knew he did not require them, closed them again under some pitiful pretext when they saw him in want; and, heart-sick and disgusted at the name of friendship, he returned grief-stricken to his home. He shut himself up alone, in order to meditate on the part he ought to take, no satisfactory step having as yet occurred to his mind. All those upon whom he had confidently looked for assistance had abandoned him. Friendship he looked upon as a vision, which fled at the approach of gloom. He numbered over those who had so often protested their devotion to his interests, but who, in the hour of need, had forgotten their protestations, and looked smilingly by upon the ruin which awaited him. But a nobler view of humanity soon presented itself—he thought of the loved one to whom he was about being espoused; he remembered her devotion, in insisting upon his drawing upon the means she had at her disposal. But her resources were not sufficient, and distress soon reappeared.

One evening Olivier returned to his home, his heart filled with despair, and his mind debating the propriety of flying rather than endure his complicated embarrassments any longer. Shame had put to flight his courage, and his pride had outstrode his patience.

The night was falling, and it was gloomy and cheerless. The wind whistled fiercely, and the rain fell in torrents—all nature appeared to manifest a sympathy with his sufferings.

On entering his house, it was announced to him that a gentleman was awaiting his arrival. He ascended the staircase eagerly, and, on entering his chamber, saw, seated by the fire, a gentleman dressed in green.

"You are at present in some embarrassment," said the stranger, without further preface.

"Who has told you that?" cried Olivier.

"Your friends, or those whom you considered your friends; but you have not had much to boast of in that way. If nobody comes to your aid to-morrow, you are ruined," coolly replied the stranger.

"I know it," said Olivier, "and yet I dare to ask you what motive has brought you hither."

There was a momentary silence. The candle, which the servant had left behind, threw around a pale and sickly light, but the eyes of the unknown flashed and glistened, and lighted the spot where he sat. His features were coarse, and a smile, the bitterness of which he tried to dissemble, displayed itself upon his thin and parched lips. After he had looked for some minutes at the excited architect, he slowly said, "I feel interested in your welfare."

Olivier trembled from head to foot. He wished to take the hand of the man whom he already looked upon as his benefactor, but the stranger avoided this by promptly withdrawing his hand, which was covered with a black glove.

"No demonstrations," said he, coldly; "I lend upon interest, alone."

"It matters not," said Olivier, wildly, "my blood, my life—all shall be yours, if you relieve me from my present embarrassment."

The eyes of the stranger sparkled still brighter.—"Of what sum are you in want?" he demanded; "I think we shall soon understand each other."

"For the present, a small sum will suffice," replied the architect; "but to save my credit, I must finish my undertaking, and for that purpose one hundred thousand florins——"

"You shall have them, if my conditions are complied with," interrupted the stranger.

"I comply without even hearing them," said Olivier, "it is heaven, ever merciful, that has sent you to my rescue."

"No, not heaven," said the green man, with a wrinkled brow; "but you cannot comply with conditions of the nature of which you are ignorant. I have come a considerable distance to see you. I appreciate your great talents, and am desirous that you should belong to me, both in life and in death."

The architect started.

"Let us understand each other perfectly," said the unknown, "I give you ten years; at the expiration of that term you must follow me; I shall bring you where I choose; I must be the master, you shall be my property."

Olivier, surprised, without being able to analyze the sensations he experienced, and fearing to admit what he was beginning to suspect, looked sadly and uneasily at his guest. His heart beat with violence when he saw the stranger coolly draw from his pocket the bill for one hundred thousand florins, to be paid at sight, upon the first house in Brussels.

"Remember," he emphatically articulated, "without my assistance, you must perish. Sign, then, this engagement." At the same time he presented a sheet of parchment, and with his right hand he drew forth a gold pen.

"Excuse me," at length said the bewildered architect, "this scene confounds me; let me know, at least, whose debtor I shall be?"

"That cannot be a matter of interest to you," said the unknown; "I shall leave you ten years in your own country. I repeat it, that although you shall be mine, yet you shall never hear of me during that period, and to-morrow your credit shall be restored. A young bride awaits you. You hesitate? Perhaps one hundred thousand florins is not sufficient?—here is half a million."

Olivier, in his delirium, no longer possessed his reasoning faculties—at the sight of so much money, the possession of which would make him rich, glorious, and distinguished. He seized the two gloved hands of the unknown, and frantically pressed them to his lips, and hastily snatching the gold pen, he signed the engagement—to follow in ten years the unknown who had purchased him.

When this was done, the green man folded the parchment, placed it in his pocket, and withdrew, saying, "Adieu! in ten years, upon this day, you will be ready."

"I shall be ready," said Olivier.

How profoundly the architect afterwards meditated on what had first passed! He could not sleep, but remained the whole night gazing upon his half million.

The next day he procured his cash, and satisfied all his engagements. He publicly announced that his object of late was to try the stability of his friends, and he doubled the number of his workmen.

Instantly he was overpowered with proffers of friendship and protestations of affection, but he smiled in bitterness at the sad lesson he had been taught of the value of those professions.

His betrothed bride—the only human being who had been true and trusting in her love—he soon espoused.

Nought but joy and gladness reigned around, his sun had risen with miraculous splendour, and he dared not think of the gloom that was sure to follow.

Of the nature of his sudden leap into prosperity, and the conditions annexed to it, he closely kept concealed within his own breast. He endeavoured to dispel the disagreeable thoughts which would occasionally obtrude themselves to disturb his peace, and he thought of the present, and endeavoured to be unmindful of the future. He was in due time blessed with children, handsome and healthy, all his speculations succeeded far beyond his most sanguine wishes, wealth restored to him his friends, and happiness greeted him on all sides.

But, notwithstanding all this, it was observed by all, that the prosperous architect was daily becoming more pallid and abstracted.

A short distance from the city, between the Porte de Flandre and the Porte du Bioage, he had built a small and elegant house, where he sought to forget himself amidst its magic beauties, occasionally returning to the house we have before described. During nine years did Olivier live thus, but when he saw the time approaching that he must leave all, to follow the unknown, his heart became agonized; terrors the most cruel were constantly before his eyes; sleep forsook his eyelids; and he daily became thinner. In vain his wife, whom he fondly loved, sought to penetrate into the secret recesses of his heart, but the secret which he there held was inaccessible to all. The caresses of his children agonized him, and the tears would course each other down his cheek, and already had his wife more than once remarked that he trembled convulsively in crossing over the grand and beautiful bridge which he had himself constructed, when their walks would lead them in that direction.

At last the fated day approached, when the stranger would come and exact the accomplishment of the bargain which had been made. Olivier gave a grand supper, to which he invited his relations, friends, and those also of his wife, who, rejoiced beyond measure at this apparent display of gait in her husband, besought of her confessor, the good old Father John Van Muffet, the Canon of St. Gudule, in whom Olivier had great confidence, to attend the festival, although for the last ten years the architect had neglected altogether the duties of his religion, which was owing to a most singular circumstance, namely, that during that period he could not enter into a Catholic church without feeling a sort of suffocation, attended with deadly sickness. This worthy priest had reflected long and sadly on the conduct of the architect, and, without manifesting his anxiety, drew from thence his own inferences, but acting all through with a precaution, the wisdom of which soon displayed itself.

The company had assembled, and they had been about an hour seated around the festive board. The pallidness of Olivier became fearful to contemplate; in vain had he recourse to the wine, to renew his courage. He drank deeply, and his thoughts became less troublesome. He heard the clock strike nine—this was the moment when the unknown had left him ten years before. With a convulsive movement, and intensity of anguish, he wished to drink again, and finding the bottles empty, he ordered his servant to fetch some of his oldest and best wine from the cellar. The servant, taking a candle, hastened to obey him; but when she had descended, she perceived a large and gloomy-looking man, clothed in green velvet, seated on the last step of the stairs. She drew back affrighted, and asked him whom he sought?

"Go and tell your master that I await him," replied the stranger; "he will know who I am."

The servant quickly ascended, and, in a trembling voice, acquainted her master with what had occurred.

The architect groaned in anguish, and at the earnest supplications of his wife related the compact he had made with a stranger, and the assistance he had received from him, and gave himself up to wild despair.

His wife, his children, and his friends shrieked in horror, and vented the most piteous lamentations.

"Do not ye despair of the bounty and protection of God," said the old priest; "tell the stranger to ascend."

The heart-broken wife, and the poor children were on their knees before the venerable priest, beseeching him with frenzied eagerness to spare their protector.

Olivier, upon whom a ray of hope had beamed, became more composed.

The servant, summoning up all her courage, communicated to the unknown that his presence was desired in the drawing-room.

He appeared on the instant, walking with a firm and dignified air, and holding in his hand the compact signed by Olivier.

A fiendish smile spread itself on his lips, and irradiated his eyes, at the approaching consummation of the engagement.

The old priest, calmly turning to the unknown, said, "you did not expect to find me here; you know that I possess power over you?"

The unknown bent his head towards the ground, and appeared ill at ease.

The old priest, raising in his hand a measure full of the grains of millet, continued—"I ask you but one favour, and that is to grant us but a few minutes. Swear that you will leave Olivier in peace until you have picked up, grain by grain, all the millet which is in this measure."

"I consent," said the green man, after a moment's silence.

"Swear it by the living God," said the venerable ecclesiastic, commencing to pour out the grains on the floor.

The unknown began to gather the grains with a fearful agility. He trembled, and said in a sepulchral voice, "I swear it."

The priest making a sign, a boy appeared, carrying with him a vessel filled with holy water, and sprinkling what remained in the measure with the holy water. The green man, not daring to put his finger in after this, bellowed most fearfully, and disappeared.

Thus was the architect saved, but ever since this occurrence, the bridge over the great fall between the gates of Het and Anderlecht has been called The Devil's Bridge.

Strange Story by a Student.

(Communicated by Isaac Webster, Esq., LL.D.)

SHOWING HOW HE PROPOSES TO PAY A VISIT HOME, AND WHAT BEFEL HIM ON HIS WAY.

" * * * * *

I had just caught a glimpse of them walking down the College square, arm in arm, and I wondered why they should not immediately have called upon me, especially as they passed close to my chambers. I was about to run out and hail them, but recollecting that I was neither shaved nor dressed, I deemed it better to wait a little, satisfied that they would certainly come to see me, and in the mean time I took up the letter which lay still unopened upon my table, and read as follows:

"MY DEAR CHADWICK—My father is a good deal concerned not to have heard from you for such a length of time. It is now three months since you wrote to us—a circumstance quite unusual in one possessed of those regular and studious habits for which you have always been so remarkable. He hopes you will pay attention to your health, and not overwork yourself. There is nothing new in this part of the country, unless the departure for America of your two former school-fellows, James Nugent and William Rafter, both of whom sailed for Upper Canada on last Tuesday morning. A few of their friends, myself among the number, accompanied them to the sea-port, and actually saw their vessel expand her sails to cross the broad bosom of the Atlantic. Their cousin, Tom Sleator—for you know he stands in that relation to them both—is also preparing to go, and on next Friday an auction of all his goods and furniture is to take place at his house. He sends his most affectionate regards to you, and, as he never expects to see you in this world, he bids you farewell for ever, but trusts to meet you in a better one. He says he would be glad to see you once if he could—but as he knows that that is out of the question he does not expect it.

Enclosed you have a ten pound note, which my father sends, lest you might feel any way cramped in your circumstances. As for ourselves we are all well. My father had a slight touch of rheumatism last week,—but it is gone. My mother joins him in begging that you will take care of your health, and, above all things, not study too much.

I am, my dear Chadwick, your ever affectionate brother,

ALEXANDER GRAHAM.

"I felt great compassion for my poor brother, in consequence of the delusions to which, unhappily, I and his whole family knew he had been occasionally subject. For instance, his account of the departure of James Nugent and William Rafter to America I felt to be one of them—I myself having seen them both, only a few minutes before, walking arm in arm down the College square. At all events I lost no time in shaving and dressing, after which I sallied out, and on arriving at the College entrance I was just in time to catch a glimpse of them turning at the outer gate towards Westmorland-street.

"I paused, and felt hurt that they should both be so near my chambers and decline coming to see me, especially as they knew my number. However, after a couple of minutes' hesitation, I followed them towards Westmorland-street, but in consequence of the delay caused by it, I could neither come up with nor discover any trace of them whatever. Still I felt for my poor brother, because I feared that their presence in Dublin was an incidental corroboration of my apprehensions lest he might relapse into those delusions which induced him to imagine so many strange things that had existence nowhere but in his own brain.

"As for Tom Sleator, however, I knew myself that he and his family had made up their minds to follow my brother Edward to America, where he was advancing rapidly into wealth and independence, and it struck me that by a short visit home I could satisfy myself upon many points—for instance, upon the appearance of Nugent and Rafter in Dublin, who were stated to have been on their way to Upper Canada, and, what was of more concern to me, upon the condition of my dear and affectionate brother Alick.

"Having taken all these points into consideration, and feeling myself fortified besides by the ten pound note, I resolved to start by the Belfast coach the next morning, and accordingly at half-past seven I found myself an inside passenger, and on my way to Black Park House, the residence of my father. It was called Black Park House in consequence of * * * where the spectre was in the habit of appearing.

[Here there is an obliteration in the MS., which appears purposely blotted out, as if he had felt regret at having detailed the circumstances, whatever they may have been.]

"On reaching the town of * * *, the nearest point, in fact, at which it touched in the direction of my father's house, the distance being ten miles by the shortest road, which went across the mountains, I felt so anxious to reach home that I preferred the latter, wild and gloomy though it was, to the better but more circuitous one, which would have brought me through the inhabited country. The season was about the beginning of March, the night was tolerably calm, but ever and anon there would arise that moaning breeze which passes solemnly along, like the voice of lamentation, and which dies away in something between a prolonged sob and a sigh. The light of the moon, too, was dim and ghastly, and shed a wild and spectral character upon every prominent object around me. For my own part, I rather enjoyed the feeling of romance occasioned by this, and as I proceeded through the dismal solitudes, I amused myself by trying to turn the trees or other objects into such fantastic shapes as pretty strong powers of comparison suggested to my imagination. This kind of fearful enjoyment increased upon me so much, that I began to feel as if, among so many grotesque and supernatural-looking shapes, it was impossible that I could be actually alone.

"In this way I proceeded for a distance of about five miles, when I remembered that there was a kind of broken pathway, sometimes distinct, and sometimes not, even in day light, but still such as I imagined my early sporting habits had made me sufficiently acquainted with—that went in a more direct line across the moors,—until it came out on the great road which passed within a couple of hundred yards of my father's house.

"I had, with my characteristic want of reflection, forgotten to consider how long the light of the moon could be depended upon on the night in question, but in point of fact, I deemed it next to an impossibility that I could mistake the path with which my feet had, to use a common phrase, been so intimately acquainted.

"The turn from the mountain road along which I was proceeding, to the path in question, was at the head of a little glen, the sides of which were covered with that description of underwood peculiar to mountain glens and dells. The sides of it were thickly tangled with hazel, hawthorn, dogberry, mountain-ash, and holly, and along the bottom ran a prattling little stream, whose banks were fringed with the varieties we have just described, which in many places met across it, so that it consequently peeped out only occasionally, whilst winding through this romantic little spot of lonely but picturesque beauty.

"One side of it was now in deep and impenetrable shadow, whilst the other lay in that dim and dreamy indistinctness that lends such an inexpressible feeling of terror and delight to such scenery, when viewed in solitude at such an hour.

"On taking the path across the head of this glen I felt still in that mood of imagination which gives peculiar shape and life to everything that meets the eye under such circumstances. A mournful breeze came up slowly from the glen, and as I advanced I thought I perceived a tall, supernatural being waving a long arm in an admonitory manner, as if to warn me from taking that path. I felt no terror, so, to speak, for I knew that the object before me was a bush set in motion by the breeze; but I experienced a wild kind of excitement, which was not without pleasure, nor wholly without pain.

"I had left the mountain road, and was now beyond the object which seemed to have warned me back, when, just at my very ear, I thought I heard the word "Chadwick"—my own name—pronounced with something like distinctness, yet not in such a manner as to render the fact of its pronunciation certain. It might have been my name, or it might have been some sound which the power of my imagination had shaped into it, just as it had given to the visible objects, that presented themselves to me, wild and fantastic forms as I went along. This little incident, however, shook my fortitude much more than anything I had seen during that part of the mountain journey which I had yet passed.

"I now became far more observant of the sounds than of the sights about me; but having gained an elevation that commanded a view of the wide and dreary moor that lay in front, I felt considerably relieved, as even in the struggling light I was able to recognise its undulations, and thought I could discern in the dim and uncertain distance the top of the mountain that overshadowed Black Park House. I accordingly proceeded with fresh confidence, and had got about a mile into the dark expanse before me, still satisfied that I was on the proper path—as, indeed, was the case—when I found that the little light that had hitherto been so friendly to me, was gradually fading away—the moon, in fact, being upon the point of setting behind the mountains that rose to my left.

"I now felt the full force of my folly in having, for the sake of saving a couple of miles, departed from the safe mountain road, and had thoughts of retracing my steps, when, behold, the light had completely disappeared, and I found myself alone upon the wild waste, and in utter darkness. I would, however, have still returned, were it not from the dread of missing my way. The glen I had passed was, on the side next me, precipitous in many places, and I knew not but in such palpable darkness I might have walked over one of its beetling cliffs. I determined, therefore, let what might happen, to proceed with as much accuracy as possible in the direction of home, certain that there was less risk in traversing the undulations of the moor than in encountering the danger of the precipices behind me.

"I soon found, however, what it is to walk along the expanses of a mountain solitude in pitchy darkness. In the course of a few minutes I had lost my path, and in a very brief period afterwards became conscious that I was completely, and in every possible sense astray. It is impossible to describe the terrors which now crowded upon me. Any person who has lost his way in a lonesome place at night, and out of the reach of human aid, will understand what I felt. The sensation is one of peculiar horror, combining as it does a frightful apprehension of personal danger, mingled with a vague but painful dread of something that is more than natural—or, at all events, of something that it fears but cannot define. All sense of my relative position was at once lost, and I knew not now in what direction I was proceeding.

"In this painful position I called aloud for aid, exclaiming, in my loudest voice—

"'Help, if there is any one within hearing; I am a traveller who has lost his way!'

"This I repeated at the top of my lungs several times, when at last I heard once more, just at, or rather into my ear, the word 'Chadwick!' firmly, and as I was now certain, distinctly pronounced.

"'Who speaks?' I shouted; 'in God's name, who or what is near me?'

"This I also repeated several times, but there was no reply—all was silence.

"I now bethought me of a plan common among the country people when they happen to feel themselves in circumstances similar to mine. They are of opinion that the act dissipates or neutralizes any evil influence that may have been cast over them, and restores them to a clear perception of their position and of the localities about them. Remembering this, I at once stripped, and began to turn my coat inside out; but whilst doing so I felt as if a hand had been gently pressed upon my right shoulder. It is true I might have been mistaken, but my convictions were all in the affirmative. The tumult of sensations, however, in which I felt myself, prevented any one danger from pressing too strongly upon me, and accordingly I got my arms into my coat, and had it drawn pretty tightly about me, when again I thought I felt a gentle pressure upon the right shoulder, as before. The pressure in this instance, I thought, was less, but still more distinct, than the first. The effect upon me was indescribably frightful. I trembled from head to foot, and the perspiration poured from me in torrents. To feel in a midnight desert, far from the contiguity of your fellow-creatures, that you have a supernatural being at your side, and to experience this by both touch and hearing, is such a trial to human fortitude as no philosopher, safe and comfortable in his study, could at all conceive. In the mean time I felt that the sooner I got myself out of this fearful position the better, and for that purpose I thought there was less risk in advancing than remaining stationary; and as I felt anxious, moreover, to ascertain whether the turning of my coat was likely to prove in any way beneficial to me, I walked on steadily in what I conceived to be the right direction. Still, however, although a little more composed, I felt in no sensible manner relieved by the act, unless it might be that I proceeded at a brisker pace, and with more confidence than before. Whether I was going towards home or from it, I could not for the life of me guess. At all events, I advanced at a rapid pace, and after about two hours and a half's toil, I had the satisfaction to find myself upon some kind of path that seemed like one that had been made by human labour.

"I stooped down and examined it with my hands, in order to determine if possible whether it actually was a pathway or not. The darkness, however, prevented me from ascertaining the fact in a satisfactory manner; it might be a path or it might be only one of those natural rutty passes, from one hill range to another, that are instinctively formed by the mountain cattle, when changing their pasture, or seeking the sheltered side of the uplands.

"I had now been nearly three hours in the mountains, and when the reader is informed that for the last four months I had been reading for a fellowship, at the rate of sixteen hours a day, without of course having taken twenty minutes' exercise during that time, he will not wonder that I began to feel both faint and feeble. I felt, besides, a grievous want of food, for I had taken nothing since four o'clock, at which hour the coach stopped for a tantalizing dinner at ——. In addition to my other terrors, the dread of perishing from hunger now came upon me, and I am satisfied that imagination, strengthened by alarm, made both the sensation and the dread resulting from it incomparably greater than under ordinary circumstances they would have been. Be this as it may, I soon experienced a sense of relief which it is impossible adequately to convey to the reader. In going up an ascent, I discovered that I was among a flock of cattle—and I can solemnly say, that the strength I derived from that simple fact could be understood by no human being who had not been in a situation similar to mine. I now felt as if I were safe—as if something belonging to man was near me—as if the great prerogative of social security was within call; this however I felt only in my spirit, for my body was weak, my knees tottering, and my physical strength almost gone. Indeed were it not for this most gratifying incident I do not think I could have proceeded much farther, from want of strength, but must have fallen down and perished. As it was, I followed the pathway or rut which went over a little ascent—and, behold, on cresting it, I perceived light, in what I supposed must have been a human habitation. The distance appeared to be about a quarter of a mile, but I cared not—I felt that my strength, aided by hope and the prospect of human intercourse, might sustain me until I reached the light in question. I accordingly pressed on, and in proportion as I approached the house, I felt my courage revive and my confidence return so strongly, that I said aloud, "where now is that voice that dared to whisper 'Chadwick' in my ear? and where is the hand that touched my shoulder?" The words were scarcely uttered when, in a close, firm, compact voice, I heard as before at my right ear my own name pronounced a third time—"Chadwick"—and at the same moment the pressure of a hand, as before, was laid gently upon my shoulder. I felt like jelly, and would have gladly sunk into the earth if I could; this was beyond the force of imagination or any coincidence that might arise from natural causes. But, heavens! what a slight cause for terror did it present, when compared with the terrific scene which I was doomed to encounter in the habitation I felt so anxious to enter.

"The house in question was now not more than two hundred yards from me; but, I must admit that short as the distance was, I would have given a million of money, had I been master of so much, to find myself within its walls. As it was, I felt disposed to lie down and die if I could, from exhaustion and terror; but the voice and the pressure on my shoulder drove me onward, and I found myself at length within a few yards of the door.

"Having knocked, I exclaimed, 'well, thank God, I am safe at last.' I heard a noise within—the door was quickly opened—and a handsome-looking woman of the humbler kind stood before me. 'Will you allow me to rest myself here for the night,' I said.

"Come in, Sir,' she replied.

"I accepted her offer—oh! with what ecstasy I went in, but before I did so, 'Chadwick' was once more pronounced in my ear, and the pressure distinctly felt upon my shoulder. The woman perceived me start as my name was uttered, but she immediately placed a chair for me before a good fire of mountain turf, and again looking in my face, she asked, 'was there any one along with you, Sir?'

"No,' I said, 'none; at least none that I am aware of.'

"Because,' she proceeded, 'I thought I heard another voice as you were coming in.'

"I strove to conceal my terrors, but still I felt a dreadful curiosity to hear more upon the subject; and I asked her, with parched tongue and gasping mouth, if she saw any one along with me.

"She said that, by the light of the candle, she thought she caught a glimpse of a person that she knew; but—and she got pale as she spoke.

"But what?' I asked with difficulty.

"I would rather not say who it was,' she replied, 'besides, I know it was only fancy—he being so lately before my eyes, too.'

"Who?'

"My unfortunate—no—no,' she proceeded, 'I saw nothing—I only thought I did.'

"Hunger, and the weakness resulting from it now overcame every other thought and feeling, and I asked her if she could give me anything to eat, that I might gain strength.

"Thank God, I can,' she replied, 'and indeed you have hunger, and more than hunger, in your face; you look to be at death's door, itself—but any how it was good fortune, I hope, sent you to me.'

"She then placed before me two or three large pieces of wheaten cake, some butter, and a jug of cold new milk; and, sooth to say, gourmands may talk as they will about luxury, but such an epicurean meal as that perhaps was never, or at least seldom made.

"Having amply satisfied my appetite, I felt my spirits revive and my fortitude return with a reaction proportioned to my former terrors; for there proceeds an excitement from a healthy meal, which—especially to the youthful—exhibits itself in an exhilaration of spirits that casts out all fear. I could now understand that "Chadwick" and the pressure on my shoulder, were merely the consequences of a warm fancy, wrought into a morbid feeling by the darkness and solitude around me, and a predisposition to over-excitement, occasioned by long and intense study. I had often, under the nervous exhaustion occasioned by hard reading and severe mental labour, seen my bed surrounded at night by faces of almost every hue of complexion and every expression of deformity and beauty. By reasoning on and analyzing these matters, I consequently regained both my fortitude and composure, and, so far as my mind was concerned, felt perfectly satisfied and well. It was different with my body, however, for without experiencing any disposition to sleep, I felt my limbs stiff and nearly helpless from unaccustomed fatigue,

"Whilst engaged in these reflections, so natural to one in my position, the woman of the house sat also in a ruminating attitude, smoking a pipe which from time to time she took out of her mouth; suspending, as it were, her enjoyment in consequence of some pressure of thought, after which she put it into her mouth again, slowly and abstractedly, and once more resumed her smoking.

"Thank goodness,' she at length ejaculated, 'thank goodness that he confessed it before he died. But sure, God help the wretch, every one knows he did it, and wasn't it by some crack his counsellor found in the law, that he escaped hanging.'

"Of this, as it was by no means designed for me, I did not feel myself justified in taking any notice. I understood nothing of the subject to which she made allusion, and I consequently felt no interest whatsoever in it.

"At length she rose up, and throwing a cloak round her shoulders and putting on a bonnet, she addressed me as follows.

""I hope," she said, "that it was Providence sent you to me this night; and I said so when I saw you. I'm going a distance of four miles to bring a young man—a friend of mine—here, that he may keep house to-morrow, till I let the neighbours know what has happened."

""Why," said I, "what has happened?"

""My husband," she replied very calmly, "was seized this evening with a cholic, and he's now lying a corpse in that room there," pointing to it as she spoke, "It's not lucky to have a corpse in the house without a livin' bein' along with it—because every one knows that when such a thing happens, the next of kin will die before twelve months. Now, I'm next of kin to him, and, if you hadn't come to the place, I might a' sot here this fortnight to come, before a livin' bein' would darken the door. Nobody liked to come next or near the house, knowing who lived in it."

""Why?" I asked, moved now by a peculiar interest, "who lives in it, or who did live in it?"

""Did you never hear," she replied, "of Darby Dogue?"

""Merciful God!" I exclaimed, "is it Dogue that murdered Murray's daughter from Glencuil, and who was saved from the gallows by a point of law?"

""The very same," she replied, "and it's a satisfaction at any rate that he acknowledged the murder to me this very evenin', a few minutes before he departed. As you were coming in," she proceeded, in a musing and uncertain tone, "I thought I saw—but that could not be, surely."

""What did you think you saw," I asked.

""Why," said she, "throth, I thought I seen him laying his hand upon your shoulder!"

"Contrary to what might be supposed, the tone of feeling produced by her words was anything but one of terror. So far from that, the idea of any community or intercourse, natural or preternatural, between me and the murderous ruffian her husband, filled me with indignation and defiance. I had heard of him, and of his infamous life and crimes, and as I was conscious of no secret guilt or other heavy offence against either God or man, I felt, in this instance, no fear whatsoever.

""Go, my good woman," said I, "bring your friend here, and be not uneasy on my account. I shall remain till your return—provided you are back by daylight, for after that, whether you come or not, I shall take my departure."

""I'll stay away only as short a time as possible," she replied, "but I can't be here in a hurry either, because the nearest livin' house to this is four miles away."

"She then closed the door after her, and, having first bade me good bye, she proceeded to fetch her friend.

"Gushes of momentary feeling, like mountain torrents, if they rise rapidly, subside as suddenly. The woman had not been long gone when I began wofully to experience this dreadful truth. Her last piece of information had not in any degree contributed to restrain either my indignation or defiance against the murderer, or to strengthen my recent composure. I felt myself alone in the house with his corpse, at a distance of four miles from any human habitation, about the hour of midnight, surrounded by solitude, and a silence that was deep as death. In proportion as the woman lengthened the distance between herself and the house, so did my fortitude diminish, until I began to feel my former terrors gradually gather round me once more. Silence is in itself a fearful thing—especially in such appalling circumstances as mine. I listened, with a hope to hear some casual noise that might break the death-like monotony of the place and the hour, by something that resembled human agency, but in vain. The silence remained still and unbroken—no motion—no life—no sound of any kind. The fire, though good and warm, was full of a dull and dreamy character, that added to the force of what I then experienced. There was neither cat nor dog in the house—nor anything visible possessed of life. What would I not have given, for instance, to have heard the voice of that little capricious companion of man—the cricket? But no, nothing was there to which the spirit—now oppressed and feverish by the unearthly stillness that was about me—could cling.

"Under these awful circumstances, is it to be wondered at that my terrors heightened apace? "Chadwick," and the pressure on my shoulder, now came back upon my imagination with tenfold power, and every moment I expected to hear the word once more pronounced in my ear, and the distinct pressure again turning me into jelly. The woman's parting words flashed upon me like the sudden glare of a spectre—she saw her husband's ghost, the murderer's ghost, lay his hand upon my shoulder at the very moment the supernatural pressure was made upon it, and my name pronounced! "Great God! is there, after all, a world of spirits?" I exclaimed silently to myself, "or why should the coincidence of her sight and my own sense of feeling take place in such a manner, without any knowledge of each other's impressions on either side!"

"I became now so fearfully oppressed with terror, that I durst not look round, nor behind me, lest I should find Dogue standing at my side. Nay, so deep was the influence of this grave-like stillness upon me, and the fear it occasioned, that I now felt afraid myself to break it, lest some corresponding sound from the room in which the dead man lay, might absolutely startle me out of existence. The only sounds I did hear were the violent palpitations of my own heart, which might easily have been heard in any part of the kitchen. To me, however, being only the result of my own terrors, they were anything but welcome.

"An hour and a-half might have passed in this indescribable agony of fear, when that occurred which even at this remote distance of time brings the cold and death-like perspiration to my brow. I had hitherto felt the silence lie upon me like a corpse. I found that the vacuum of healthy thoughts produced by it in my imagination, had been all filled up by the most frightful apprehensions of something dreadfully supernatural that was about to occur to me. The word "Chadwick"—the pressure—and the ghost of the murderer, had got possession of my whole being. I felt that I could not sustain this terrible excitement for anything like a lengthened period. The silence!—Oh, I had not long to complain of that! I was sitting, as before, with my eyes fixed in the fire, trying to disentangle my fancy from the associations of horror with which it was filled, when—Lord of life and safety!—what was that? hush!—Great God! I am thy creature, made by thy own hands, and consequently I look up to thee as my father and protector! Footsteps in the room where the dead murderer lay stretched! “This is my diseased fancy,” thought I, endeavouring to reason myself, fraudulently, as it were, into a fortitude which I could not feel. I listened again—there was nothing heard, and I began to feel something like relief; when, after a dead silence of about five minutes, I distinctly heard footsteps pacing to and fro the next room. I felt myself drawn round, as it were, by the tremendous force of my terrors—my hair stood erect—my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth—I stretched out my arms—the fingers of both hands spread out involuntarily, with a sense of horror. In this position, with my eyes rivetted upon the door, which was shut, I sat—all my soul, sense, and spirit centred in my eyes and ears. Silence! oh, it was now broken indeed! In this attitude, I say, I sat, when, for the third time, I heard the footsteps as before, pacing backward and forward through the apartment. I was now absorbed in one predominant and gigantic terror—that of hearing the foot approach the door, and of seeing the door opened. God of mercy and safety! and even this—however, to proceed: the footsteps, as I said, paced slowly and distinctly from one side of the adjoining room to the other, when—how shall I write it—I heard them clearly turn in the direction of the door; after which there was a slight pause, as if the being within was listening; at length, there was a fumbling at the door, from which, if it were to secure my salvation, I could not take away my eyes; the fumbling continued for a little; the door gradually opened, not widely, but a little—and a man wrapped in grave-clothes, having a face white with death—shrunk and crisped by the rigidity of the grave—the jaw hanging down—the eye glassy and without speculation, appeared, and seeming to look across at me, as well as the features I have described could be supposed to do, called, in a voice precisely similar to that which I had heard before, “Chadwick!” and at the same time he advanced towards me, and placing his stiff, bony hand upon my right shoulder, he returned again to the room, and shut the door.

“Human fortitude and endurance have their limits, and I ceased to suffer, for I had swooned.

* * * * *

“On recovering, I opened my eyes, and seated opposite me, on a chair, was the murderer, still in the habiliments of death. It is said that the wild energy, or I should rather think, the apathetic indifference which follows a swoon that has been occasioned by terror, is the highest point of human courage in those who imagine they have seen an apparition. This may be so, and I have little doubt, from my own experience on that occasion, that it is so—I felt that I should either die or speak. Without some intelligence or explanation, my situation could not be borne. On looking at the spectre, whose eyes, by the way, were intently fixed upon me, I perceived no change whatever on his features. The set expression of death had not been removed, and every lineament was frightful; but above all things, the eyes were certainly not of this world. That, however, which was most appalling were his hands—and no wonder, indeed, for from the wrists down they were of a blood-red colour—indicative, I suppose, of the murder he had committed. I sat up, and after many efforts, made several attempts to speak, but could not find voice. At length I was able to articulate in a faint and hollow whisper—‘In God’s name, what do you want, and why do you torment me thus?’

“‘To warm myself,’ he replied; ‘I am cold—cold; I’m not tormenting you,’ he proceeded, ‘and I’m not dead either; but you must assist me.’

“‘In the name of the living God,’ I replied, ‘I command you to speak the truth—are you living or dead?’

“‘I am both,’ said he, ‘I am living and I am dead; but you must ask me no more, for I can’t tell you—I’m not at liberty.’

“‘You died of the cholera?’

“‘I died of poison; my wife gave it to me. Now listen,’ he proceeded—‘She is gone to bring a guilty man—a man she is fond of—here this night. When they come, he will desire her, after some time, to go to that room, pointing to another, to take some rest; about half an hour afterwards, he will pretend to get sleepy, himself—‘I can’t keep my eyes open,’ he will say, ‘and I think I’ll lay down my head awhile, too.’ He will then follow her. Now, what I want you to do after they’ll be there a few minutes is, to give a short cough. You promise me this, or if not, you never leave this house but as a corpse; and mark me, neither eat nor drink from their hands, for they’ll poison you, too, if they can. If you promise this, the dead man will leave you to yourself, and trouble you no more.’

“‘I do not wish to make such a promise,’ I replied, ‘I know not—’

“‘Chadwick!’ he looked at me as the word was uttered—his long, bony, blood-red hands were visible, and the spectral gleam of the dead shone coldly and supernaturally in his eyes—he approached me once more, and placing that frightful hand upon my right shoulder, I felt as if I had been changed to ice—‘do you promise,’ he asked, in a voice whose hollow tones no pen could describe, nor any imagination conceive, without having heard it.

“‘I promise,’ I said faintly, for I was scarcely able to speak, and no wonder, for I again swooned away.

* * * * *

“On recovering, he was gone; the door was shut as it had been, and everything was silent as before. My mind had been now so completely exhausted, and my feelings so utterly worn out by what I had suffered, that I felt a comparative freedom from thought, and lapsed into a dull, lethargic apathy that was absolutely a relief to me. In this state I remained I know not exactly how long, when I heard the door open, and on arousing myself I found that the woman, accompanied by her guilty paramour—if what the spirit of the murderer said was true—had entered.

“‘This is the gentleman,’ said she, looking at me, ‘that was so kind as to keep house for me while I came for you.’

“‘The young fellow—who, though small, had a daring and sinister expression—looked at me for a moment, and I thought they then exchanged glances that seemed more significant than I could have wished.

“‘It was very kind of him,’ said the young man, ‘but after the trudge we’ve had, hadn’t you better get us something to eat, and to drink too, if you have it.’

“She lost no time in procuring refreshments, having previously produced, from under her cloak, a bottle of spirits.

“‘You will eat something with us,’ said the stranger, ‘it is customary on such occasions as this.’

"I declined it, however, on the score of having already satisfied myself, and besides pleaded fatigue, which I said generally took away my appetite, and this was the truth. 'Don't force the gentleman,' said the woman, 'I see he can't eat, but by-and-by he'll take a glass of something that I'll make him comfortable, and then he can have a good long sleep that'll cure him of his fatigue, poor gentleman.'

"Again they exchanged glances, which, indeed, I would not have noticed were it not for the mysterious warning I had already received.

"This I also declined, although she actually made the drink, which was composed of spirits, sugar, and some other materials that gave it a dark discoloured hue, and holding it to my lips, almost forced me to take it, under the guise of kindness and hospitality. Seeing that persuasion was of no avail she placed the glass over upon a shelf of the dresser, for I observed that neither she, herself, nor her friend attempted to taste it.

"After they had partaken of their refreshments, everything fell out according to the extraordinary intimation that had been made to me. In about half an hour the woman's head began to nod, now to this side and now to that, as if she had been completely overcome with fatigue.

"'Molly,' said the stranger, 'hadn't you better go to the bed in that other room and take a sleep:—no wonder,' he said, addressing himself to me, 'that she should feel both tired and sleepy.'

"In this I agreed with him, let his motive be what it might in making the observation; and, urged by his entreaties she accordingly went, as she said, 'just to throw herself on the bed for a start.'

"I can scarcely give expression to what I felt on seeing everything beginning to happen just as it had been foretold it would; but I need hardly say how intensely my interest in this matter deepened when I saw that in about another half-hour the stranger's head began also to nod, and ere many minutes he said, 'I can't keep my eyes open, and as there's a kind of shake down in another corner of the room, I think I'll lay down my head a while, too.' Having uttered these words he followed her into the room, and I once more had the kitchen to myself.

"I now hesitated how to act. Nothing could be less assumed or more natural than the manner in which sleep had overcome each of them; and indeed it was but reasonable that they should feel as they did, and as I myself would have felt under similar circumstances.

"'I know not what may happen,' said I to myself, 'nor do I think I ought to be accessory to the will or wish of a murderer's apparition,' I consequently had come to the resolution of not keeping a promise which, at best, was extorted by my terrors, when just at my ear, as before, sounded, 'Chadwick,' and again there was a cold pressure upon my shoulder, whilst almost at the same moment I heard the fearful footsteps in the room as before. I now felt myself urged by some peculiar power, to which, for the time, I was subjected, and without further hesitation I gave a cough,—a low, small, dishonest, and evasive cough, rather to fulfill the letter than the spirit of my promise, but judge of my astonishment when it sounded so loudly that it might be heard far beyond the house. The door of the room in which the corpse lay then opened, and as there stood a candle upon the dresser, its light became dim as he rushed past it through the kitchen, and opening the door of the opposite room he entered. In a moment or two I heard a scream from the woman which almost instantly ceased, and immediately after I could distinguish a heavy blow, as if given with some hard, round instrument, then a deep groan from the man, then another blow, and after that another and another, the groans diminishing in strength as the blows were repeated, until they ceased; after which the blows ceased also. I then heard a heaving struggle as of a person lifting a dead heavy weight, after which the door of the room again opened, and the first object I saw was the murderer, bearing the lifeless body of his wife's paramour hanging like a sack across his shoulder, the limbs and the head dangling, and the joints exhibiting all that frightful flexibility that results from sudden and unexpected death. He passed at once out of the kitchen door, bearing with him his inanimate burthen, as if, one would think, for the purpose of concealing it.

"I could neither bear this scene, nor the locality in which it took place, any longer. My powers of endurance were taxed until they almost ceased to preserve my consciousness. I arose, and as the door was open, I went out, and to my infinite satisfaction and delight perceived that the night had either cleared up and got lighter, or else the grey dawn of morning was beginning to break. Be this as it may, however, I was able clearly to see in the distance the mountain which overhung my father's house. To this I directed my steps with a speed and an energy more than human. Sweep after sweep of the mountain I passed as if lungs had not been necessary, for I felt neither exhausted nor fatigued. I was now animated only by one sole anxiety, and that was a hope to escape from the deadly eye, the blood-red hands, and ghastly face of the murderer's apparition. All at once, however, I felt a new horror supervene; an impression came upon me which I could not shake off, which was, that he pursued me. I was gaining the ascent of the hill that I have mentioned as being near my father's, when I thought I heard the noise of footsteps behind me, and on looking back, there he was within a few perches, gaining upon me rapidly. I felt my heart sink within me, and literally gave myself up for lost; but as I had only about eight or ten yards between me and the summit of the hill—I struggled on. The pursuit was now close—so close that I thought I heard his wild, unnatural pantings immediately behind me, when all at once, meeting me on the top of the hill, I beheld my three brothers, with eight or ten servants and neighbours who had been out during the greater part of the night traversing the mountains in search of me.

"Their providential appearance then and there was, I am certain, my salvation; as I felt by the dead sinking of my heart that I could not have survived a moment had my pursuer overtaken me. They all seemed startled at the wildness of my appearance, and indeed it was no wonder they should, as I question whether any one of themselves, had he passed the night as I did, would have looked less discomposed.

"The first thing I did on seeing them, and before any explanation took place, was to direct their attention to the red-handed murderer, or rather to his spirit; but it was in vain that I pointed him out to them and described him. They looked in all directions, especially towards that to which he was now retreating—but after rubbing their eyes, and using all the usual aids to sight, they assured me that they could not see him at all. This, of course, I believed, for I knew it could not be otherwise, but in the meantime it was a full assurance to me that the being I had seen, and conversed with, and been pursued by, was, in reality, the disembodied spirit of the red-handed murderer, Darby Dogue.

"Their appearance there at such an hour was both simply and naturally accounted for. It seems that Jemmy Buckley, a servant of my father's, had been in the town of —, where I left the coach in order to proceed home by the mountain road. Unfortunately he did not happen to see me, having been in another part of the town at the time I set out. Having been told however, some time afterwards, that I had arrived and taken the "old road," as it was called, he immediately started after me, but in consequence of the additional near-cut which I had taken by the old broken pathway across the moors, he of course missed me altogether. On arriving at home and not finding me before him, they guessed at once the path I had taken, and as they knew that unless I had gone astray I must have reached home long before; they got together a few of the neighbours and proceeded in a body to search for me. I, however, having completely lost myself, had gone in a different direction so far out of their way, that to find me in the course of that night was hopeless and impossible.

"This was on Tuesday; that is to say, we arrived home on Tuesday morning, a little after dawn. I felt very weak and feeble, and my mother on seeing me kissed me and wept, I suppose with joy at my unexpected return. My father, too, shed tears, and pressed his open hand affectionately on my head, exclaiming, 'poor Chadwick, you have read too much!' In consequence of my exhaustion they gave me a little wine and got me to bed.

"For the next forty-eight hours I don't remember much, having slept the greater portion of the time.

* * * why it is called Black Park House, and the legend about it." * * *

Having now given, from the manuscript placed in my hands by Dr. —, of Finglass, the above production of this extraordinary man, I think I cannot do better than annex the following letter to it, as a document sufficiently explanatory of its extraordinary contents:

MY DEAR DR. WEBSTER,

Finglass, October 12th, 1847.

You may remember the evening, not long ago, when I had the pleasure of meeting you at our friend, W——'s. On that occasion, I promised to place in your hands a curious MS., written by poor M——, with whose family you told me you were very well acquainted. You expressed much anxiety to see it, and I accordingly redeem my promise, by sending it to you. I need scarcely point out to you the necessity of changing the names, should the strange production be such as you can make any use of in a literary way. I am sorry to say that his case presents not the slightest hope of convalescence or recovery—on the contrary, the fine intellect with which he was gifted, has completely sunk to incurable fatuity. About two years ago, I asked one of his brothers who came to see him, if Chadwick had ever shown him this manuscript. He told me in reply, that his unhappy brother had read it for him; but said that the whole extraordinary account of what had occurred to him on the night of his return, was a complete hallucination—frightful, it is true, and full of the terrific—but still nothing but the creations of his own labouring and horror-stricken fancy. "Poor Dogue," he added, "who enacts such an awful part in the narrative, never was known to commit a murder in his life, nor any other crime offensive to society. He was a herd and caretaker, up in the — mountains, and has always borne the character of an honest, industrious, and inoffensive man. My poor brother certainly took refuge there on the night in question, and we were informed by Dogue and his wife that, as he lay upon their best and only bed, his groans and muttered shrieks, and tossings about, were dreadful. He escaped at day-break, and certainly met us, as he describes in the narrative; but we were able to perceive by the wildness of his manner—his trepidation, and the hollow gleaming of his eyes, that his intellect had become unsettled. As for Nugent and Rafter, their appearance, we think, was the first hallucination he had had. They went to Upper Canada, as I stated in my letter; but I suppose I need hardly add that neither of them was ever seen since in Ireland, unless in poor Chadwick's imagination." Such is his brother's account of this singular narrative, which probably is one of the most extraordinary that can be found in the annals of insanity.

Believe me to be, my dear Sir, with sincere respect,

Very faithfully yours,

W. M.

To Isaac Webster, Esq., LL.D.

I.

I AM come to revisit my youth's first asylum,
Where I learnt to bear patiently trouble and care:
I'd some very good friends, I had songs to beguile 'em,
I was twenty, my mistress was fond and was fair.
Not regarding the world, nor its wrongs nor its rights,
With no future before me, young, buoyant, and bold,
With footstep elastic I mounted six flights—
One is well in a garret at twenty years old!

II.

'Tis a garret indeed, and I wish you to know it;
And there stood my bed, rough with hill and with hole;
And there was my table; and see the young poet
Scored his lines on the wall, and his pen was a coal!
Reappear, ye gay pleasures, that earliest dawn'd,
Though time long has borne ye off distant and cold;
Ah how oft to procure you, my watch has been pawn'd!
One is well in a garret at twenty years old.

III.

Above all, my fair Lizzy, should here reappear
As she was in those days, fresh, and mirthful, and young!
It was here, that across the small window the dear
Her shawl for a curtain so oftentimes hung,
And her gown on our bed for a coverlet threw—
Oh, Love, have respect for its every fold!
Who paid for her wardrobe I then little knew—
One is well in a garret at twenty years old.

IV.

One day we were feasting, our laughter was loud,
And the chorus was raised, and the song was begun,
When we learnt by the shouts of the deafening crowd
That Napoleon the fight of Marengo had won!
Loud thunder'd the cannon! our song was renew'd,
And we praised the lov'd chief and his exploits so bold,
And we said that our France could be never subdued—
One is well in a garret at twenty years old.

V.

Let us pass from this roof where my faltering reason
The thoughts of those times so beloved cannot bear:
I freely would give all my life's coming season
For two months of such days and delights as then were!
For dreaming of glory, of love, and of pleasure,
And for selling our life for some joys quickly told,
And for fixing our hopes on some exquisite treasure,
One is well in a garret at twenty years old.

BERANGER.

The Last Baron of Cluan.

[Concluded.]

BUT on the morrow after the arrival of the French, the first to greet and welcome his former and never-forgotten companions in the French military school, was the young Baron of Cluan. Nothing could describe the cordiality with which he shook them by the hand as they approached him one by one, or the fervent outpourings of his full heart as he bade them welcome to his native land; all the kindness that he received from them, their parents, and families, in a foreign land came rushing on his memory, and the heaving breast and manly tear betrayed his inward emotion. But there was little time for indulging in such emotions as these, news and alarms of invasion on the southern and south-eastern coasts were daily circulated, by the partizans of William in order to distract the Royalists and create a division of King James's forces, who had concentrated his chief strength near Dundalk, to arrest his rival's march southwards on the city of Dublin. News, at this time, was spread of a large force being landed on the south coast of Wexford; immediately some regiments were marched southwards in order to strengthen the garrisons of Wexford and Duncannon and check the progress of the invaders in that quarter. Of this opportunity did the French officers gladly avail themselves, and among them the Count De Lauzun, of visiting the home and partaking of the hospitality of the young Baron of Cluan; it is needless to mention how exultingly his heart bounded at the thought of receiving such distinguished guests; and, above all, at the opportunity he now had of requiting, even in a small degree, their former civilities to him.

It was a lovely morning as the troops destined for the expedition took their way along the road which led towards Ross—a town about twenty miles distant from the city of Kilkenny. Fervent prayers were offered up for the success of the gallant strangers as they marched from the city. In the van rode Lauzun with his principal officers, accompanied by the Baron of Cluan; the dust had been allayed by a heavy shower during the night, they had therefore a full view of the enchanting scenery which presented itself on all sides, but chiefly between the two ancient borough-towns of Thomastown and Inistioge; this called forth, at intervals, the loud admiration of the foreigners. On both sides were gently undulating hills, their sides covered with green corn fields or rich pastures, or with ancient woods of oak and ash, and beneath them winded, in graceful curves, the clear waters of the Nore, whose banks here and there extended into broad alluvial meadows, where stood in grim repose some grey, embattled Norman keep, the owner of which for centuries ruled over the adjoining lands, and the no less warlike-looking, mouldering, and tenantless abbey, the erection of some penitent invader, who changed the plumed helmet and polished armour for the monk's cowl and sober habit. A little further these clear waters are compressed within steep and rocky yet richly-wooded banks, often, in former times, giving shelter and refuge to many a daring outlaw (and in latter times affording a retreat to that renowned and most enterprising of Irish freebooters, the never-to-be-forgotten James Freany). On the previous night, messengers, who were familiar with all the intricacies of the country, had been despatched to ascertain the truth of the report that an enemy had landed on the southern coast of Wexford. They came back bringing word, authenticated by letters both from the governor of Duncannon fort and the officer who commanded the garrison of Wexford, that the alarm was unfounded. Some Irish officers, who were desirous of joining their countrymen, had landed with a supply of ammunition at the fort of Duncannon. That was the sole cause of the rumour. This welcome and timely intelligence had arrived just as the troops had advanced within four miles of Ross. It was immediately resolved not to proceed any further, and the men were ordered to erect their tents, prepare food, and bivouac there for the night. Sentinels and outposts being placed, watch-fires being prepared, and the word given, De Lauzun and his fellow-officers adjourned to partake of the hospitalities of the young Baron of Cluan. High on a conical hill, almost immediately overhanging the Nore, stood the baronial residence of their host. It consisted of a square and strongly-built keep or castle, which seemed to stand alone, its out-offices being at a little distance, and concealed from view by a close clump of trees. They advanced to the castle through a long, winding avenue, thickly overshadowed by aged and wide-spreading trees, whose thick foliage and intermingling branches threw a sombre shade over the brilliant uniforms of the party as they rode along. When they had approached nearer and emerged into more open ground, a scene of the most picturesque beauty was presented to their view—here the Nore expanded into a broad and tranquil sheet of clear water, unruffled by wind or wave. The tide was fully in, though near the termination of its flow, it rises to the height of several feet, and all the woods and banks around were mirrored in its clear surface. On the left arose, like an inverted crescent, high towering over its adjoining woods, the steep and wooded declivity of Carrick-O'Neil, and on their right might be seen green and pastoral hills covered with flocks of bleating lambs and sheep, or fields of waving corn. The party were hospitably received by the youthful lady of the castle—she had been educated in a French convent, and therefore found herself at ease with her courtly guests. The luxuries of the table consisted chiefly of fish, fowl, and venison, whilst the palate of the French nobles was regaled with the choicest wines of Burgundy and Languedoc—the French fleet being at this time master of the sea. During the festivities of the evening, De Lauzun thus addressed his host—

“Well, De Geraldine,” said he (for thus was he called by his French acquaintances), “no wonder that even amid the sunny vines of southern France thy heart was yearning for thy home, for, truly, thou hast a pleasant and fair domain; but waken for us one of those soft strains which were the amusement of thy solitary hours, or rather, perhaps, one of those livelier airs which may, in turn, remind us of home and of the evening dance amidst the vineyards of merry France.”

The Baron accordingly took his harp and roused the memories of France for her gallant sons. After a short repose, the officers were aroused from their slumbers by the loud notes of the trumpet summoning the troops from their rest, being under orders to march by four o'clock the same morning. After their return to Kilkenny, the remainder of the day was spent in preparation for their departure next morning, in order to join the king who was then with the Irish army, encamped near the Boyne. Kilkenny, on the following day, presented a grand and exciting scene—thousands flocked in to witness the departure of the French, who were joined by several Irish regiments, all advancing in the same direction. The day was ushered in by the sound of trumpet and the loud roll of drums summoning the men to their several quarters. As the military procession slowly advanced along, they were heartily cheered by thousands who lined the way, intermingling with their loud huzzas blessings and prayers for their success. An Irish regiment of dragoons led the van—next came the field train, guarded by the Swiss—then the French—Bagnal's foot formed the rear; a body of gentlemen volunteers, mounted on their own horses; followed the regular troops, with the usual train, a motley group of sutlers, camp-followers, and rapparees. The events which followed require no particular detail; suffice it to say, that at the battle which ensued, the Irish army was outnumbered, outflanked, and routed. The dastardly conduct of James and the personal bravery of William not a little contributed to their defeat. The Irish army broke into several sections, and each made the shortest rout beyond the Shannon, with a determination still of maintaining the sinking fortunes of their pusillanimous monarch. They marched, by Kilkenny, to Limerick, and fortunate was it for the stately castle of the then hated Duke of Ormond that they had done so. It was preserved from the vengeance of the infuriated Irish by Count Lauzun, to whose orders that noble pile owes its preservation from the ruin with which it was threatened. Ormond was then in the camp of William, and was deeply grateful to the French commander for the services done him. Within its walls, in a few days after, was William, with his chief officers, entertained in almost regal splendour. Ormond wrote to De Lauzun, thanking him for what he had done, and making an offer of protection to any of his Irish friends whom he might choose to name. This offer was accepted by De Lauzun in behalf of his friend the Baron of Cluan, whose castle and estates were saved from pillage and confiscation through the interference of Ormond. Notwithstanding this protection and pardon, and the tender attachment he bore to his wife and home, he thought it not consistent with bravery or loyalty personally to avail himself of these advantages. He, therefore, resolved to stand or fall in the cause of king and country, in which resolution he was confirmed by the glorious (and notwithstanding the defection of the French allies) successful defence of Limerick. A winter of unparalleled sufferings and hardship was passed over by the Irish army; their hopes, however, were renewed by the arrival of other French auxiliaries under the Marquess de St. Ruth. Early in June both armies again took the field; the loss of Athlone disheartened the Irish: nothing, however, was omitted that could in any way repair the fault. The Baron of Cluan had despatched a favourite attendant, home, to his lady in Cluan, to inform her of his safety and of the hopes he entertained of final success—also with directions to bring with him, on his return, a favourite and powerful charger. This journey, then difficult and dangerous, did the faithful fellow perform with much cleverness and cunning; resting by day in lonely places and with persons whom he knew to be friendly to his party, and travelling, by night, over a country which he had previously trod in order to be acquainted with its by-ways, after some slight adventures he reached Limerick, and proceeded thence to the Irish camp, which was pitched on the height of Kilcommedan. Having given the countersign and passed the sentries, according to directions, he rode through the camp to the quarters assigned to his friend Colonel Grace, of Courtstown, and soon his eye caught the friendly pavilion in which his beloved master lay, being directed thereto by the pennon which waved at its top, displaying the armorial ensign of Grace—a red lion, rampant, on a white field. It is needless to say how joyfully his arrival was hailed by the Baron of Cluan, or how anxiously he enquired after the safety and health of his lady and friends.

There was now, however, in the Irish camp little time for other thoughts than those of preparation for the coming struggle. The scouts brought intelligence of the near approach of the English army, which, on the morrow, appeared fully in view. Distractions and dissensions weakened the spirit of the Irish army, whilst the most perfect unanimity directed the councils of the enemy, who, moreover, numbered fully 18,000 men; the number of the Irish forces actually engaged did not exceed 15,000, there was moreover on their side a considerable disproportion of cannon. After several hours spent in sharp skirmishing, the action, about five o'clock, became general; elated with success and confident of victory, the Irish general, St. Ruth, was heading a charge of cavalry, in full career, down upon the English right, when a canon-ball shot off his head; down he rolled a lifeless trunk, his death spreading dismay, terror, and confusion through the Irish lines—the result of which was a total defeat, and a bloody and unrelenting pursuit on the part of the enemy. In a desperate but vain effort to rally the fugitives, many gallant officers and gentlemen lost their lives; and among these, conspicuous by word and example, was the Baron of Cluan. In the struggle his hand was severed from his wrist; and, thus rendered powerless, a thrust of a sword-blade gave full vent to the fountain of his life's blood—he fell a lifeless corpse. His fall was witnessed by several of his own followers, and, with a cry of wild despair, was the severed hand picked up by one of them. This was he resolved to carry off, if possible, as a memorial of his beloved chief, at the same time remarking to one of his flying companions, in his native language, as he looked on the pale relic, "feach an mian bing a clair-seach."* The Baron's horse finding himself disengaged from his rider, dashed madly through the crowd, being bewildered in every sense, his eyes were dazzled with the fierce flash of the fire-arms, his ears stunned with the roar of the cannon and volleying of musketry, while his dilated nostrils snuffed in the sulphureous smoke and the maddening odour of human blood. Away and away careered he far off from the field of strife, and, as he instinctively took his road to the south, the light and hazy breeze rolled along the dull smoke and distant sounds of the yet unfinished fight, adding speed and strength to the frightened steed. The Shannon presented no obstacle to his fiery course—he stemmed its torrent, and the early dawn of the second morning found him trembling all over and covered with foam and dried and clotted blood, standing beside the castle gate of his native Cluan. The Baron's lady was the first to hear his footsteps, and, with eager haste, did she awake her domestics to ascertain the cause which brought such unexpected sounds to her ear at that unusual and early hour. To their horror they found the noble animal, which they instantly recognized, in the condition above described; the lady on viewing this dismal sight shrieked aloud, and fell into a swoon; she was carried almost lifeless into the castle—a few days of grief and mental agony closed her mortal career. Some few fugitives who escaped the field and pursuit, arrived home in Cluan and confirmed the sad tale thus mutely told; their descendants still occupy the same homes, and to one curious in traditionary lore will they, in their simple dialect, relate what they have heard from their fathers concerning the tragical fate of the LAST BARON OF CLUAN.

THE
Life and Death of Oliver Plunkett,
 PRIMATE OF IRELAND.

PART V.

On March 3rd, 1680, the Earl of Anglesey wrote to the lord lieutenant, "that Hetherington is sent over to Ireland to make good his information if he can, and that it is his majesty's absolute and unalterable pleasure (advised by all the council) to have every individual of the Popish clergy seized and imprisoned till they petition to be sent over seas, and promise never to return or practise against the state; for there is no other way to cure their madness, and that there are those in England who will apprehend them all." On the 17th, his excellency replied "that above a year ago two proclamations did issue against the Popish clergy, with promise of rewards to those that should apprehend them; and that if any in England will undertake it, they shall have the promised reward, and his thanks besides; and that to tell him of the insolent deportment and signal perfidy of the Popish clergy of Ireland is to preach to him that there is pain in the gout; and he protests that he would rather be rid of them than of that disease." Yet he was so far from believing what was sworn, much less what was said against them that he considered the whole plot as a pure fiction, sustained by the most violent and abandoned perjurers. Indeed the conduct of all those concerned in the detection and punishment of those who were accused of having been concerned in the Popish plot, can scarcely be put in stronger language than that which has been used by Charles James Fox, who was certainly more inclined to be their apologist than their accuser: "Although, therefore, upon a review of this truly shocking transaction we may be fairly justified in adopting the milder alternative, and in imputing to the greater part of those concerned in it rather an extraordinary degree of blind credulity than the deliberate wickedness of planning and assisting in the perpetration of legal murder, yet the proceedings of the Popish plot must always be considered as an indelible disgrace upon the English nation, in which king, parliament, judges, juries, witnesses, prosecutors, have all their respective, though certainly not equal, shares. Witnesses of such a character as not to deserve credit in the most trifling cause upon the most immaterial facts, gave evidence so incredible, or to speak more plainly, so impossible to be true, that it ought not to have been believed if it had come from the mouth of Cato; and upon such evidence, from such witnesses, were innocent men condemned to death and executed.

Prosecutors, whether attorneys or solicitors-general, or managers of impeachment, acted with the fury which in such circumstances might be expected. Juries partook naturally enough of the national ferment; and judges, whose duty it was to guard them against such impressions, were scandalously active in confirming them in their prejudices and inflaming their passions. The king, who is supposed to have disbelieved the whole of the plot, never once exercised his glorious prerogative of mercy. It is said he dared not. His throne, perhaps his life, was at stake; and history does not furnish us with the example of any monarch with whom the lives of innocent or even meritorious subjects ever appeared to be of much weight when put in balance against such considerations.*

Dr. Plunkett's trial will demonstrate that this is a most true and graphic description of the scandalous partizanship and even brutality of the judges; of the overbearing insolence of the prosecutors, who got witnesses put in gaol when their swearing did not come up to the mark; of the miserable prejudices and base subserviency of the jury, and of the wholesale perjuries of the witnesses who appeared against him. We may be permitted to give another brief extract from the same writer to put in a still clearer light the dastardly conduct of the king, who, like a genuine Stuart, abandoned his friends in their necessities: "In the prosecution of the aged and infirm Stafford, the king was so far from interfering in behalf of that nobleman, that many of those most in his confidence, and, as it is affirmed, the Duchess of Portland herself, openly favoured the prosecution. Even after the dissolution of his last parliament, when he had so far subdued his enemies as to be no longer under any apprehension from them, he did not think it worth while to save the life of Plunkett, Popish archbishop of Armagh, of whose innocence no doubt could be entertained. But this is not to be wondered at, since in all transactions relative to the Popish plot, minds of a very different cast from Charles's became, as by some fatality, divested of all their wonted sentiments of justice and humanity. Who can read without horror the savage murmur of applause which broke out upon one of the villains at the bar swearing positively to Stafford's having proposed the murder of the king.† Yet it is not possible that any one who heard the witness could have been ignorant that he was a perjurer.

These extracts will be extremely useful to the reader in the perusal of the trial of Dr. Plunkett. They will enable him to appreciate at their proper value, judges, juries, prosecutors and witnesses. I have preferred thus collecting them together at the commencement to introducing them into the trial itself, and thus breaking the continuousness of the narrative.

Dr. Plunkett, as we have seen, was committed to Newgate, in Dublin, on the 6th of December, 1679, for his religion alone, or as Sir Robert Sawyer, the English attorney-general expressed it at his trial, "for being an over-zealous Papist." For six months no other charge was openly preferred against him, but an abominable conspiracy had in the mean time been entered into, by abandoned men, to take away his life. The reality of the Irish as well as of the English plot must be proved by the shedding of blood, and he was the chosen victim.

The original discoverers of the plot, as they called themselves, were Edmund Murphy, parish priest of Killeavy and chanter of Armagh, and John Moyer and Hugh Duffy, Franciscan friars. Perhaps the most curious pamphlet in Thorpe's whole collection is one written by Murphy. It is contained, like the others already referred to, in the larger volume of the pamphlets from 1641 to 1690. The title of the pamphlet is "The Present State and Condition of Ireland, but more especially of the Province of Ulster, humbly represented to the Kingdom of England, by Edmund Murphy, Secular Priest, and titular Chanter of Armagh, and one of the first Discoverers of the Irish Plot. London, 1681." It is obscure and mystified, but at the same time it will enable us to delineate with considerable accuracy the early scenes of the tragedy which ended in the death of the Primate. The whole pamphlet contains but thirty-two pages, and from 24 to 29 are wanting.

This pamphlet proves that Murphy was throughout a most consistent character, for from a very early period of his career, he united in his own person, at the same time, the professions of priest, robber, and spy. The last of these occupations was disagreeable to the "great tory, Redmond O'Hanlon,* who made edict through the barony, that whoever went to hear Murphy, should for the first time pay one cow, for the second two, and for the third his life." After this he "hired a curate to officiate in his parish, and seldom or ever resorted there himself." This is his own version of the matter, and there can be no doubt that Hanlon had good cause to hate and fear him; but the real cause of his being obliged to hire a curate was, that he had been suspended first, and afterwards excommunicated by the Primate. Mac Moyer and Duffy were, as I have said, Franciscan friars, and had both officiated—the former as parish priest, and the latter as curate—in the parish of Fohart, not far from Dundalk, in the county of Louth. They were the bosom friends of Murphy, and, like him, spies and robbers. Although Mac Moyer swore at the trial that the Primate appointed him to the parish of Fohart in 1674, and the presumption therefore is, that it was at some other time, this date may possibly be correct. Neither he, however, nor his worthy coadjutor, were permitted to retain the appointments long, for upon their characters becoming known, the Primate suspended and excommunicated them, and they were both afterwards declared apostates by the provincial of the Franciscans. These facts were stated by Dr. Plunkett in his defence, and admitted by the parties themselves, but at what precise time they occurred cannot now be determined. It must, however, have been soon after the date of Mac Moyer's appointment to Fohart, for the Primate stated in his speech at the place of execution (July 1st, 1681), that he had endeavoured to reclaim these three priests for the last seven years. They themselves confirmed this in their evidence, by dating the plot so early as 1674. The Primate afterwards prevented these friars from "questing" in his diocese, on which account Mac Moyer and Duffy held him in the most deadly hatred, and the former could afford him no better name than Barjesus and Judas Iscariot.

Murphy waxed powerful amongst the tories, became the leader of a large band, planned the murder of Redmond O'Hanlon, whose place he desired to occupy, as well as to obtain the reward set on his head, and alarmed the quarters of the officers, Baker and Smith, who were stationed near Dundalk, and had denounced him as a robber. "Ensign Smith (says Murphy, in his pamphlet, pp. 22-3), made grievous complaints unto several gentlemen, that his house was in agitation to be burnt, and himself and family destroyed by the tories, . . . and that one Edmund Murphy, a priest, was the ringleader of this design; and having informed the deponent's father with these things, the father of the said informant sent for him, demanding the reasons and giving him sharp rebukes." Murphy, Moyer, and Duffy were, as I have said, spies as well as tories. The officers to whom they betrayed their companions were Captains Coult and Butler. Edmund Murphy had, as his assistants in treachery, his own brothers, one of whom was called Phelémy, and a relative, by name Hugh Murphy. The occupations of these individuals was as base as can be well imagined. Hugh Murphy stole the horses of his own associates, the tories, and priest Murphy's brothers brought them to Sir Hans Hamilton, who pursued all those that enquired after them. Besides stealing their horses, "the said Hugh Murphy did dayly send the state of the tories to the deponent (Edmund Murphy), who communicated it in writing to Captain Butler, by a certain damsel, to avoid suspicion." This is Father Murphy's own statement in his pamphlet, p. 24; yet he contradicts himself at p. 14, in the following manner: "That though the rumour had spread through the soldiers' report, all or most people were possessed that the informant received a large sum of money from the said Captain Coult, to bring in the heads of several of the chief tories and rebels, all which was spread abroad by means of lying fame." But his associates knew better than to ascribe the report to lying fame; and had it not been for the interference of one Cormack, or M'Cormack, an accomplice of Father Murphy's—whom it is greatly to be feared that unfortunate priest afterwards murdered, or was at least privy to his murder—they would certainly have killed both himself and Duffy as spies. "All the said Tories," he continues, pp. 14-15, "verily believed the report, except the said Cormucke, who well knew the informant's design (of murdering Redmond O'Hanlon); but the rest made solemn vows to kill the informant in the first place they met him. The informant getting intelligence hereof, betook himself to a habitation near Dundalk, where he continued a certain season; but one day going there to visit his parish, accompanied with one Fryar Duffee, as they passed the hill of Carricksticken, they were espied by the foresaid tories, among whom was the said Cormucke, and coming violently altogether upon the informant, he was thereat surprised; but Cormucke immediately interposed between the informant, and them making oath, that whoever should lay hands on the said informant should in like manner perish; and Cormucke, in like manner demanding what might be his crime, they told him he was a rogue, and had contracted with Captain Coult for a sum of money to bring in their heads; but the informant protested the contrary, and that he never mentioned their names to the said Captain (which indeed was true, for his only aim was to seize Hanlon⁴), whereupon they were satisfied, and the deponent admitted to resort to his parish."

* The name of Redmond O'Hanlon is still remembered in many parts of Ulster. Sir Francis Brewster gives an account of his death in a letter which will be found in Carte, vol. ii., p. 512. He says that Redmond O'Hanlon, or, as the French call him, Count Hanlon, was a scholar and man of parts, and so formidable as to keep two whole counties (Tyrone and Down) almost waste, making the peasants pay continual contributions. These contributions were generally levied in kind, or rather in cows, as we learn from Murphy's pamphlet. So terrible was he, that there was no travelling in the northern parts without convoys, and all the army in Ireland was not able to take him. At length, the Duke of Ormond, when all the rewards offered for his head proved of no avail, employed a Mr. W. Lucas to whom he gave such private instructions as procured him an interview with O'Hanlon. At this interview Lucas treacherously shot him through the heart on the 25th of April, 1681.

He was now once more taken into the confidence of the tories. The government had offered a large reward to any one who should take Redmond O'Hanlon, dead or live. Murphy had already engaged the robber Cormucke to assist him in killing the rebel chief, and he now imparted the design to another tory called Neale, or O'Neill. This person went to Connaught where O'Hanlon then was, and told him of the plot which Murphy and Cormucke had entered into against him. After the return of Neale he went to a public house, to which Murphy had invited him, as well as Cormucke, M'Ardle, and several other tories. A drunken brawl ensued, in which Cormucke was murdered. Murphy says, p. 21, that Neale shot him with one of his own pistols, asking "if he had the same design against him as against Hanlon," and that he (Murphy) "besought the brethren of the murdered man not to let their brother be unrevenged." However, this would appear to have been done solely to avert suspicion from himself, for he admits that Neale was not even suspected of the murder, and he quotes, in favour of the lawfulness of the deed, the authority of Ensign Smith's wife, who said "that her husband might have killed Cormucke at his pleasure since he became a tory." Murphy, who it would appear sometimes exercised his clerical functions amongst the tories, in defiance of his degradation, went to a house near where the murder took place "to christen a child (according to his own account, p. 21), and the deponent no sooner lighted off his horse, being come to the said house, but he was apprehended by the soldiers and taken into custody, where he had not been but till the next morning, ere he desired leave from the soldiers to go to Dundalk, and there stay in a certain inn till they came to the said town, which request was granted. The bailiff told him that he was taken for being with the said Cormucke at the time of his death; upon which answer the deponent told the said bailiff of the whole design (of killing Hanlon), and that Captain Butler was to have it effected by means of Cormucke, who was treacherously slain, and afterwards he gave bail and departed."

The invention of the Popish plot, about this time, opened up a new vein for the industry and ingenuity of Murphy and his associates. There is an unfortunate loss of four pages of Murphy's pamphlet which relates to this very period. But the opening passage of p. 29 lets us pretty clearly into the whole secret. From this we learn that Murphy had been taken into the counsels of Hetherington, who, according to Carte (ii. 498), was the Earl of Shaftesbury's "chief agent, manager, and instructor of the Irish witnesses brought to give evidence of the plot." Although the Primate was not apprehended on a charge of treason, it is clear that such a charge was in contemplation, for it was Hetherington who got him arrested. Murphy and Mac Moyer were at this time prisoners in Dundalk goal awaiting their trial, both for being the accomplices of tories and robbers, and one for being also a murderer. Hetherington wrote to Murphy that he had apprehended Plunkett, and that a habeas corpus would be moved to enable him to give evidence against the Primate. Murphy did not wait for a habeas corpus, but broke the gaol at once and fled to Dublin. His own way of relating the matter, is not a little curious. "Being informed," he says, p. 29, "by the same Mr. Hetherington, in a letter, that he had taken Plunkett, and that a habeas corpus would be ready for the deponent, which he no sooner understood but went (without taking notice of any person) with all the expedition he could for Dublin, and at his arrival acquainted several there how he had escaped the hands of violence." On the following day he saw the Duke of Ormond, to whom he accused the Primate of being concerned in the Popish plot, and the two officers who had got himself put in gaol, of being the friends and abettors of the tories. The duke paid no attention to his accusations against the Primate, and evidently told him that he considered them merely as a revengeful proceeding against Dr. Plunkett for having excommunicated him. The following is his own version of the matter: "The informant, immediately after this conference with the Duke of Ormond, repaired to Mr. Hetherington and related to him all the passages that had passed between them, particularly of the excommunication that was denounced against the informant, that malice was the original cause thereof, to which the said Hetherington replied, that it was almost impossible as well as improbable to have any justice done against the said Plunkett, by reason of his strong faction, nor in any other matters relating thereunto. The informant not taking much notice of the reply, informed the said Hetherington, if he would accompany the defendant to the north, he would produce evidence to prove the whole that before he had revealed, and more also," p. 29. Murphy having obtained a letter to Sir Hans Hamilton, set out to the north, "accompanied by Hetherington, under the denomination of a friar which had lately come from Rome, by which means he learned several matters relating to the plot and other affairs." It is strange, however, that these matters never came to light, for he acknowledges in the same page (30), that though he had the Duke of Ormond's warrant, he could get nobody to swear against the Primate or to confirm his plot, and that even "Sir Hans Hamilton would have nothing to do with it." The only result of this expedition was, a cock and bull story which he said he heard from the wives of the witnesses against the two officers, Baker and Smith—"that these witnesses were chained and scourged to sign an instrument for their own transportation."

Up to this period no one had suspected that Murphy or Hetherington had anything to say against the Primate, against whom no charge had been hitherto preferred but that of exercising his ecclesiastical functions; but the object of their expedition to the north having transpired, betrayed their designs against Dr. Plunkett. Hugh M'Kenna followed them to Dublin to denounce them as the authors of the Primate's imprisonment. He was exciting the people to the utmost against them, when Murphy, who had a very inventive genius, endeavoured to parry the blow by swearing that this Hugh M'Kenna had been sent by him to Hetherington with the treasonable papers of the Primate, and a bull which had never been delivered to Hetherington. This latter part was true enough, for they never had any existence. However, such was the audacity of these scoundrels at this time, that Edmund Murphy caused one of his relations, George Murphy, to arrest M'Kenna on this charge. The matter was investigated by the lord lieutenant and council, and Murphy's information pronounced to be totally false. McKenna was set at liberty, and Murphy once more thrust into goal in his stead. Hetherington fled to England; Hugh Murphy, who acted as Edmund Murphy's spy, was put to death by Lieutenant Baker with his own hand; he cut off his head, and obtained the usual reward for the head of a tory. The witnesses who were Murphy's associates, and had sworn at his instance against lieutenants Baker and Smith, and had promised to swear against the Primate, were prosecuted by these two officers for perjury and transported. The charges against the Primate were investigated before the privy council in Dublin, and proved to be utterly absurd; and it was said that a reward of £500 would be given to any one who would apprehend Hetherington. These facts are thus admitted by Murphy himself, with the exception of the investigation before the privy council, which Plunkett stated at his trial in London—"That the informant (Murphy) also hastening to Dublin to bring in more of the matter to my lord lieutenant, was drawing up his examination, when one Hugh Mac Canna made a proclamation throughout the city, that the informant was the cause of Plunkett's imprisonment, the which Hugh was soon after taken by George Murfy, for not delivering the papers of the treason when sent by the deponent, along with the bull, to Mr. Hetherington; by his hand is supposed to have delivered it to Plunkett, Smith, or Baker, but he was soon released, alleging the deponent accused none but such as were honest men. The informant being imprisoned, gave occasion to all the Primate's, as well as Smith and Baker's friends, to fill the town with all manner of scandalous and ignominious characters concerning the deponent; others came to prison, tempting him to petition to be transported to France. Understanding also that Mr. Hetherington was concerned in Plunkett's imprisonment, very diligent enquiry was made after him, a general report going up and down the city that two rogues, for their own interest, intended to take a pretended method to discover treason to the Duke of Ormond, hoping to have money for their reward; the one being taken, the other had escaped, and that £500 would be given to any that took him, and that the next week there was great hopes he should be proclaimed a rebel; some came to the deponent also, and promised him money and liberty to declare where the said Hetherington was."

* It was certainly false, as proved by p. 24 of his own pamphlet.

Here is his narrative of the death of his spy, Hugh Murphy:

"That the head of the forementioned spy, that the informant employed to look after the tories, was brought to the Duke of Ormond, as a piece of good service done by Lieutenant Baker, notwithstanding his being authorized by Sir Hans Hamilton and Captain Butler, to betray the tories under the pretence of corresponding with them, which he was allowed in. The manner of killing of the said spy was, when he was at his house sick in bed, Lieutenant Baker came and knocked out his brains with the but-end of a pistol or musket, and afterwards cut off his head. That afterwards the said Baker taxed the country for money for his head, as if he had been a proclaimed tory who never was concerned in anything, but as one employed to be serviceable against the tories."

The following is his narrative of the transportation of his own witnesses:

"That notwithstanding the deponent's petitions, the before-mentioned witnesses were transported by means of Sir John Davis. During the informant's imprisonment, arrived at Dublin, from the North of Ireland, a certain gentleman by name John Curfy, who was a stranger altogether to the informant, and being demanded the occasion of his coming to town, said he came to confirm the testimony of a certain priest; for this he added, he could confirm what the said priest had said, and related much more of the like kind. The said person being brought under the pretence of seeing the deponent, was clapt up in prison also, under the notion of several unknown actions for debt, and was threatened to be hanged by my Lord Chief Justice; and in that fright gave a bill of his hand for what was alleged to his charge, besides £10 that he paid down, and made protestations that he would deny that he had anything to say on the deponent's behalf; which done he was dismissed."*

It is not to be supposed that when Hetherington wrote to Dundalk goal to Murphy, he neglected to make a similar communication to Mac Moyer, who was confined in the same prison. We know not, however, whether he also broke the goal or was removed by a habeas corpus, on becoming a witness to prove the plot. However, after the general flight and dispersion which we have described as having taken place in Dublin, Hetherington, who had reached London, and who was aided by the bishop of Meath, prevailed upon Shaftesbury to have an order sent to the lord lieutenant to have all persons who had appeared as witnesses of the plot, whether they were then in gaol or at large, immediately sent over to England. In compliance with this order, Murphy, Mac Moyer, and the other witnesses who were confined in gaols, were set at liberty. They were received in England with all honour, got fine clothes and money, were examined first before the king and council, and then before the parliament. Their wildest fictions were received as Gospel truths, and they were sent back to prove them in Ireland. There, however, their characters were not quite so highly appreciated; and as Murphy and Moyer had neglected to take out their pardons, they were thrust into gaol, and Moyer, in spite of the cautions and interruptions of the crown lawyers and the judges, acknowledged at the Primate's trial that he was convicted of having supplied powder and shot to the robbers. As they were seized at the same time, and Murphy was also charged with this offence, it is almost certain that he too must have been convicted; but as he strove to avoid giving evidence against the Primate at his trial, the latter did not cross-examine him. Fresh orders were, however, transmitted from England to have the Primate tried for high treason, and for being one of the chief promoters of the Popish plot, and free pardon was granted to Murphy, Moyer, and all the other witnesses. What subsequently occurred will be best told in the Primate's own words—"Orders have been transmitted to Ireland," says he, "that I should be tried in Ireland, and that no Roman Catholic should be on the jury, and so it was in both the grand and other jury; yet, then when I came to my trial, after I was arraigned, not one appeared." The truth is, that the Primate's character was so pure, and that of his assailants so infamous, that no twelve men could be found in the whole kingdom who would not acquit him. The very accusation of such a man cast the utmost discredit upon the entire plot, and he declared truly at the commencement of his trial—"If I had been in Ireland, I would have put myself on my trial to-morrow, without any witnesses, before any Protestant jury that knew them and me."

* Murphy's Pamphlet, p. 32. Murphy's narrative abruptly ends here. It was written in 1680 but not printed until the beginning of 1681. Before the Primate's trial he had already repented of the conspiracy of which he was the prime mover at the time of which we now write, the spring of 1680.

The bubble of the Irish plot seemed at this moment to have burst. The phalanx of its supporters was completely broken, but these routed recruits of Irish plotters fled to England, where they were once more taken under the protection of Shaftesbury and the parliament. The lord lieutenant was commanded to send the Primate to London, in order that he might be tried in a land where neither his own purity nor the infamy of his accusers were known.* He set out on this fatal journey about the end of October, 1680.† He was immediately thrust into Newgate, and his confinement was of the most rigorous kind, for in the noble defence which he made at his trial, and which will be found further on, he says: "After my coming here I was kept close prisoner for six months, not any Christian was permitted to come to me, nor did I know anything how things stood in the world." Of the manner in which he spent these six months, Father J. Corker,‡ who attended him at his death, and administered to him the holy sacraments, writes thus: "After his transportation hither, he was, as you know, close confined, and secluded from all conversation, save that of his keepers, until his arraignment; so that here also I am much in the dark, and can only inform you of what I learned as it were by chance, from the mouths of the said keepers, viz., that he spent his time in almost continual prayer; that he fasted usually three or four days a week with nothing but bread; that he appeared to them "always modestly cheerful, without any anguish or concern at his danger, or strait confinement; that by his sweet and pious demeanour he attracted an esteem and reverence from those few that came near him."

But whilst this holy bishop, deprived of all earthly companionship, rejoiced at his situation because it enabled him to unite himself more intimately and uninterruptedly with his God in prayer and meditation,§ ruthless men were labouring strenuously in the service of God's arch-enemy, Satan, who wished to blast his fair fame, and to deprive him of his life by the most abominable perjury. Hetherington, Friar Mac Moyer, and Edmund Murphy, delivered for this especial purpose out of Newgate; Hugh Duffy, the apostate friar, and several other witnesses, were now in London to prove the Irish plot, and the Primate's participation in it. Notwithstanding the contempt with which they were treated in Ireland, "the parliament (says Burnett) believed them, and upon that encouragement it was reckoned that we should have witnesses come over in whole companies."¶ Nor did the promoters of the plot trust to the spontaneous zeal of robbers and murderers; for as Edmund Murphy and Hetherington had already scoured the north for witnesses, so also towards the end of 1680, Geoghan and Owen Murphy (whose characters we have already given under the hand of Ormond, in letters dated December, 1680, and January, 1681) beat up for hard swearers through the whole south, and especially through the county Tipperary, diversifying their present pursuits, by returning to their old, and, as Ormond calls it, their natural occupation of cow-stealers and robbers, whenever the occasion offered. Dublin, as his grace stated, swarmed with them, some going to London, others returning to seek new recruits, and all forswearing themselves. They occasionally found their way into Newgate, but had only to swear some new lie more monstrous than those they had already testified, and they were sure of a fresh pardon and of more valuable rewards. Their value seemed to increase in exact proportion with their infamy and recklessness.

All seemed now ready for the conviction of the Primate. The king and council had been convinced of his guilt, the parliament was horrified that such a monster was allowed to live, and a bill accusing him of high treason was offered to the grand jury in the winter of 1680-1. The witnesses who had established the plot were produced to sustain the bills; "but," to use the words of Burnett, "as the foreman of the jury, who was a zealous Protestant, told me, they (the grand jury) contradicted one another so evidently that they would not find the bill." The opinion of Burnett, a Protestant bishop, who was no friend to the Catholics—is so brief and important that I shall transcribe it entire:

"Plunkett, the Popish Primate of Armagh, was at this time brought to his trial. Some lewd Irish priests and others of that nation, hearing that England was at that time disposed to hearken to good swearers, thought themselves well qualified for the employment; so they came over to swear that there was a great plot in Ireland to bring over a French army and to massacre all the English. The witnesses were brutal and profligate men; yet the Earl of Shaftesbury cherished them much: they were examined by the parliament at Westminster, and what they said was believed. Upon that encouragement it was reckoned that we should have witnesses come over in whole companies. Lord Essex told me that this Plunkett was a wise and sober man, who was always in a different interest from the two Talbots, the one of these being the titular archbishop of Dublin, and the other raised afterwards to be Duke of Tirconnell. These were meddling and factious men, whereas Plunkett was for their living quietly and in due submission to the government without engaging into intrigues of state. Some of these priests had been censured by him for their lewdness: and they drew others to swear as they had directed them. They had appeared the winter before upon a bill offered to the grand jury; but as the foreman of the jury, who was a zealous Protestant, told me, they contradicted one another so evidently, that they would not find the bill. But now they laid their story better together, and swore against Plunkett that he had got a great bank of money to be prepared, and that he had an army listed, and was in a correspondence with France to bring over a fleet from thence. He had nothing to say in his own defence, but to deny all. So he was condemned and suffered very decently, expressing himself in many particulars as became a bishop. He died denying everything that had been sworn against him." Vol. i. p. 502-3.

Dr. Plunkett was again arraigned on the 3rd of May, 1681, in Easter term, but as he had been kept so close a prisoner up to this time, that he could not see even his own servant, it was impossible for him to have made the least preparation for his defence. As the witnesses and records on which he relied were all in Ireland, and some of them at 100 miles distance from Dublin, he desired until Michaelmas to prepare his defence. This the court refused; but after some consultation, allowed him until the first Wednesday in Trinity term, which was about five weeks. This time would be sufficient now, in this age of steam-boats and railways, but it was miserably inadequate in 1681; "when," as the Primate declared at his trial, "the servants whom he sent to Ireland, after being two days at sea, were cast back again and were then obliged to go to Holy-Head, from which place the winds being contrary, their passage to Dublin occupied thirteen or fourteen days." When the messengers did reach Dublin, the officers of the courts refused to give the records of the conviction of the witnesses who were to appear against the Primate, unless they got an order from England; and the Catholics who were to give evidence in his behalf, refused to go to England without a pass, lest they should be hanged for their pains.

Considering all these delays and obstructions, it is truly wonderful, that when he was again arraigned on the 8th of June, 1681, his witnesses should have arrived at Coventry. On the 7th—the day before that fixed for his trial—he moved on affidavit for twelve days more, that his trial might be put off to the end of the term. On the following day he renewed the application himself, but it was refused on both occasions. The conduct of the crown on this occasion, and also in refusing the records, proves that the object of his prosecutors was to deprive him of all means of defence, and to present him, as he himself expressed it, with his hands tied, before his prosecutors. He says, in his speech before he was sentenced, "That the records which were almost at hand, would have proved that some of the witnesses who appeared against him were indicted and found guilty of high crimes, some were imprisoned for robberies, and some of the witnesses were infamous people." He, moreover, told the judges, before his trial, that if they only allowed him a few days to bring his witnesses and records, he would defy earth and hell to convict him, and truly affirmed, both at his trial, and with his latest breath, that no man in Ireland would believe the charge against him, so absurd and impossible was it, even if he were himself to declare that he was guilty of it.

Yet however absurd and impossible the charge, it was evident from the first, that the Primate would be sacrificed to the base passions of the English people. The judges who tried him—Sir Francis Pemberton, lord chief-justice, and judges Dolbein and Jones—actually vied with each other in their partizanship, insolence, and brutality. The very first question he asked about the jury, was rudely repelled by the Lord Chief-Justice; and when he attempted to cross-examine the witnesses who appeared against him, he was interrupted and bullied not only by the attorney and solicitors-general, by two serjeants-at-law, and several other counsel, but by the three judges, who did not permit the witnesses to reply to his questions, but answered themselves in their place. Sometimes, when he pressed a question which might make a witness betray himself or contradict another, he was told by the court not to waste his time, lest he should not be allowed any to make his defence; and when one of the witnesses for the crown began to retract his former evidence against the prisoner, he was interrupted and clapped into gaol. It must be remembered also, that the barbarous policy of the law, at this period, did not allow him the assistance of any counsel,* although there was arrayed against him, in addition to the three judges, the attorney-general (Sir Robert Sawyer), the solicitor-general, Serjeants Jeffries and Maynard, Sir F. Withins, and Mr. Heath. There is a Mr. Jones also mentioned, but I suspect he is the same as Mr. Justice Jones.

The witnesses who appeared against the Primate were Florence Mac Moyer, Henry O'Neal, Neale O'Neale, Hanlon, Edmund Murphy, John Mac Moyer, Hugh Duffy, John M'Clave, and Owen Murphy. Of these, Florence Mac Moyer, the two O'Neals, and Hanlon, were laymen; John Mac Moyer and Hugh Duffy, Franciscan friars; and Edmund Murphy and John M'Clave, secular priests. The remaining witness, Owen Murphy, was most probably a layman, and one of the numerous gang of spies and robbers connected with the priest of that name. Edmund Murphy was so roughly handled on his first arrival in Ireland, after his discovery of the Popish plot to the king and parliament of England, that he did not choose to repeat his visit, and therefore when the thieves and robbers of Munster were to be tempted by rewards to swear against the Primate, he did not conduct the business himself in person, but sent this Owen Murphy in his stead. It will be remembered that Ormond mentions this fellow and Geoghan as fellow-labourers; and that Owen Murphy, who had been recommended by Hetherington to bring with him none but material witnesses, had brought from Tipperary a number of witnesses, who knew so little about "the plot," or the Primate, that he would have sent them home again from Dublin if they had not been his own tenantry. None of the witnesses whom he brought to London, were called at the Primate's trial, and though he appeared himself, he distinctly declared that he knew nothing but what he heard from Edmund Murphy. The Primate, whilst recounting, in his speech at Tyburn, the witnesses against him, does not mention or allude to Owen Murphy, who, in truth, gave no evidence whatever.

The two O'Neals were the puppets of the priest, M'Clave. They met in Virginia, in Cavan, according to the priest's swearing, in 1677, but according to O'Neal's, in September, 1678. M'Clave desired his lay-coadjutor to go to Dublin, and reveal the plot, which he did to Sir John Davis. The date of this revelation does not appear, but it certainly was not until after October, 1678, for although all the witnesses swore to their knowledge of the existence of the plot for several years before the government offered pardon for past crimes, and large rewards to any murderer, robber, or cow-stealer (which seems to have been a distinct profession), who would prove the plot, yet, by a strange coincidence, amongst so many loyal men, the Primate made each of them acknowledge at the trial that they had never mentioned it to any justice of the peace, to any one in authority, or to any man who could be believed on his oath, until the profession of an informer became more honourable, safe, and lucrative than that of a burglar. What faith Sir John Davis, to whom the revelation was made, reposed in stories from persons of this kind, may be gathered from the fact stated in one of the extracts which we have given from Murphy's pamphlet—that he caused a great many of the witnesses of the plot to be transported.

Hanlon, a vagabond scoundrel who had begged his way through all Europe, was produced to sustain the evidence of Friar Mac Moyer. This fellow's name is erroneously spelled Hanlet in the state trials, for the Primate calls him Hanlon in his speech at Tyburn, which was written by his own hand, and is therefore certainly correct.

The other layman who appeared against the Primate is Florence Mac Moyer. This witness is called Florence Wyer in the State Trials, and also in a letter from Lord Massarene to Sir George Rawdon.* The Primate, however, calls him Mac Moyer in his written speech, which he read at Tyburn; and, moreover, the Christian name of the only other Moyer or Mac Moyer who appeared as a witness on this trial, was not Florence but John. This is certain, because he explains in his evidence, which may be believed on this point, that though he was called Francis in religion, John was the name he obtained in baptism. Besides there was amongst the witnesses who appeared against Dr. Plunkett, a person called Florence Moyer or Mac Moyer, whose autograph is on the back of folio 103, of the celebrated Book of Armagh. A fac simile of this autograph will be found in Sir William Betham's "Antiquarian Researches," vol. ii. p. 260. It is as follows: "Liber Florentini Maire, June 29th, 1662." Sir William gives the date erroneously in the opposite page as 1629. The following notice of the Book of Armagh and of Florence Mac Moyer, will be read with interest. It is taken from the catalogue of the learned Humphrey Llyhd, and was transmitted to Dr. O'Connor by the Right Hon. C. W. Wynne.† "This MS. beyond all doubt, is very ancient, whether it be or be not partly in the handwriting of St. Patrick himself (as is stated at the bottom of p. 24), but appears very likely to me to be of a later age, and perhaps it is the text of the gospels which St. Bernard, in the life of St. Malachy, reckons amongst the monuments of the see of Armagh, and relates to have been the text of St. Patrick himself. By Usher and Ware it is called the Book of Armagh, but by the Irish The Book of the canons of St. Patrick; thus called (as I think) from the canons of the Evangelists agreeing with one another, begun in 626. This book was formerly held in great estimation by the ancient Irish, so much so, that the family commonly called Mac Maor, in English Mac Mayre, had their names from the custody of this book, for Maor in Irish is keeper, and Maor-na-ceanon is keeper of the canons. All that family were commonly so called, and they formerly held from the see of Armagh, eight town-lands in the county of—called the lands of Ballymaire, by the tenure of the safe keeping of this book, in whose hands it remained during many ages, until Florence Mac Mayre went to England, in the year 1680, that he should give evidence (which I should doubt the truth of) against Oliver Plunkett, D. D., the Roman Catholic prelate (primate?) of Ireland, who undeservedly, as is believed, was executed. But Mayre being deficient of money at his death, this manuscript was left as a pledge for five pounds; fortunately it afterwards came to the hands of Arthur Brownlow, Esq." It is still the property of his descendant, Lord Lurgan. It was left at the Irish Academy some years ago, but was afterwards returned to Lord Lurgan, the price he demanded for the manuscript (as I have been told) being considered too high.

It would be worse than useless to say anything on the absurdity and contradiction of the evidence given by these wretches. The business of each was to confirm the evidence of one of the priests. The Primate solemnly declared at the place of execution, that he never knew one of them. "As for the four laymen," he says, "who appeared against me, viz. Florence Mac Moyer, the two Neals, and Hanlon, I was never acquainted with them." Henry O'Neal acknowledged that he never saw Plunkett in his life, and Edmund Murphy declared that many of the witnesses against the Primate never knew him.

Of Murphy, John Mac Moyer, and Duffy, three of the four clerical witnesses, I have already had occasion to speak. The Primate says of them at his trial, "There were two friars and a priest whom I had endeavoured to correct this seven years, and they were renegades from our religion, and declared apostates." Besides they were spies, robbers, and one of them, most probably, a murderer. Florence Mac Moyer states in his evidence, that when Friar Mac Moyer returned to Ireland, after having disclosed the plot, he had a very narrow escape of being hanged. The other clerical witness is called Mac Legh in the State Trials, but his true name was M'Clave, as it is found in the Primate's speech at Tyburn. He had been a parish priest in the diocese of Clogher, but being suspended and excommunicated, took refuge amongst the tories in Cavan. This man and the two friars swore, against the Primate, the most monstrous and notorious falsehoods, as will be manifest to any one who will read their evidence. But unfortunate Murphy—the original discoverer of the plot, whom the attorney-general declared to have given the most powerful and satisfactory evidence before the grand jury—was touched with remorse for his detestable crime. He fled before the trial of the Primate came on, and concealed himself at the Spanish ambassador's, where he was captured and dragged to the King's Bench. He then strove to get the trial put off, on the pretence that his witnesses did not come, but in reality to allow those of the Primate to arrive. During his examination he fled out of court, and was with great difficulty brought back again. He declared, amid the interruptions of the judges, that the witnesses against Plunkett never knew him, and that they must be actuated by malice; for which declaration, and as a hint to any witness who should dare to say anything in favour of the accused, he was committed to Newgate.

These infamous and abandoned men were the only persons who could be induced to appear against the Primate, although everyone who was known to have the least ill-will towards him, was practised upon by the highest people in the country. The following letter, written by Lord Massarene to Sir George Rawdon,* only about a month before the trial took place, will show with how great diligence and perseverance the search was made:

"I desired that Neal O'Quin, the old friar, might come, because Mr. Bleeks assured me he knows all the whole plot and designs, and was an opposite to Plunkett, and of the same faction with Wyer (Florence Mac Moyer), and so far as I see Roland Mac Donnell, Brien O'Neill, and others, have had differences with Florence Wyer (Mac Moyer), who has them and others (they say) at malice, who he accuses, and those who are well-known to Sir Hans Hamilton, or Sir George Atcheson, to whom you may please to mention them. My opinion is, that if Neal O'Quin cannot come to us, for his age, that Sir Hans Hamilton should examine him, for he certainly knows a great deal, and you see none of the other friars that we have sent to take can be gotten, and those that come at us either cannot or will not confess the least; and, for my part, I really believe the Popish plot goes still on with the Romish clergy, who, you see, are still amongst us, yet, you see, will neither be taken nor appear.

"Your servant—M."

Dr. Plunkett's witnesses and records had not come, but just as the prosecution concluded, and he was about to commence his defence, a stranger courageously handed him a paper, on which were the names of David Fitzgerald, Eustace Commine, and Paul Gorman (erroneously spelled Gormar, in the State Trials). The Chief Justice demanded who gave him the paper.

The stranger stood up and said it was he, because he was told they were good evidence for Dr. Plunkett.

Lord Chief Justice—"Where are they?"

Stranger—"They are hard by."

The attorney-general cried out immediately for Eustace Commine, because he was one of those who had given evidence against the prisoner. This case was precisely similar to that of Murphy, and as Commine did not wish to keep this worthy's company in Newgate, he prudently fled. David Fitzgerald, it will be remembered, had declared that all he had sworn about the plot was false, and had endeavoured to induce the other witnesses, and especially those who appeared against Plunkett, to adopt a similar course. He also preferred his liberty to Newgate, and made his escape. Gorman, who alone appeared, was one of the witnesses about the plot, and the Primate was told that he would swear that Friar Mac Moyer had "allured and enticed him to swear against him." The poor wretch was so frightened, that he denied it. The next question, which regarded Mac Moyer's threats of wreaking vengeance on the Primate, the judge would not allow him to answer, crying to Plunkett when he proposed it, "Well, what of that?" Gorman, however, volunteered a good character of the Primate, declaring, that as he "had a soul to be saved, he vowed he had never heard of any misdemeanour of him." Justice Dolbein immediately demanded what brought him there, and although he produced the subpoena which the unknown stranger had most probably served on him, it is evident that he very narrowly escaped Newgate.

I shall now give this trial, entire, and I am convinced that no person can read it without admiring the dignity, the candour, and the true nobility displayed by the Primate in his defence which he was obliged to make single-handed, and totally unprepared, against three judges, who would scarcely suffer him to speak, six of the most eminent lawyers in England, and a host of perjured witnesses whom he was obliged to follow into a strange land, where his spotless character could not shield him, as in his own country, against the infamy of his accusers. Treason was only the pretence, the Primate's real crime was, to use the words of the English attorney-general, "That he was an over zealous Papist." He was considered the pillar of the Catholic Church in Ireland, and her enemies vainly imagined that if this pillar was destroyed, the sacred edifice would tumble to the ground. They knew not that the faith is immortal, and cannot be destroyed; that it is spiritual, and cannot be touched by mortal power; and that when the tyrant strikes his victim, he wounds not the faith, but glorifies and strengthens it, by the blood of a martyr. Never was this more clearly illustrated than in the case of Oliver Plunkett. His persecutors, despite of the pomp and display by which they were surrounded at his trial, sunk into utter insignificance when contrasted with the sublime dignity of one unfriended man. That scene recalls the early ages of the Church, when the Christian martyr stood alone and triumphant, in the midst of his pagan torturers, who could only reply to his arguments by depriving him of his life.

Sacred Poetry of St. Liguori

No. I.—ON THE LOVE THAT JESUS ENTERTAINS FOR OUR SOULS.

I.

Oh! happy the heart whose wild throbbings are o'er,
With the sweet shaft of love pierc'd thro' to the core!
Oh! happy the heart that can breathe its last sigh
For Him, for whose sake 'tis such rapture to die.

II.

Such the graces that bloom—such the splendours that shine
On the brow, lips, and eyes of this lover Divine,
That gems, stars, or flowers before but one ray
Of these features would fade into dimness away.

III.

Like a hunter He uses all arts and all wiles
To entangle the hearts of mankind in his toils;
And one touch of his shaft brings his prey to the ground
With love, dying for Him that inflicted the wound.

IV.

Every means he employs—assumes every disguise—
In wait for our hearts every moment he lies,
To unite them with his, by a bond that shall last
When time, earth, and heaven long away shall have past.

V.

At first a poor cold shiv'ring babe by his cries
To gain our hearts' sympathy fondly he tries;
And now a fair youth, 'neath the frail, humble shed
Of an artizan toils day and night for his bread!

VI.

Next he's seen like a criminal bleeding and bound—
His brow with a thick, thorny diadem crown'd;
And at length, amid throes that the racks and the fires
Of his saints ne'er surpass'd, agonizing expires!

VII.

And say where at last this sweet Jesus we find!
Neath th' appearance of bread, on yon altar enshrin'd;
And from thence, breathing love, he full oft goes in trace
Of the souls that aspire to fly to his embrace.

VIII.

He, in short, all a lover's fond stratagems knows,
Nor recks he what he in this toil undergoes;
Let him seize but that heart—win th' affection of this,
All his pains—all his griefs are forgotten in bliss.

IX.

Now he comes to his loved-ones all sweetness and grace
With a soft smile of love beaming over his face;
And now he appears stern, repulsive and chill—
These are arts to inflame them more ardently still.

X.

Long, long have I loved him—he it was that the flame
Of passion first kindled throughout this young frame;
Now this heart is his own, and he watches it over
With all the fond care and jealous eyes of a lover.

XI.

Cease then Oh vain world, thou no longer need'st deem
From me to obtain either love or esteem:
One object engrosses my heart and mind now—
More faithful—more loving—more lovely than thou!

No. II.—TO THE HOLY GHOST.

I.

FALSE hopes and pleasures of the world, begone!
Go and allure some less experienced breast;
Quit, quit my soul that now in God alone
Can hope to find what they have never known
Who trust in you—a life of peace and rest!

II.

Creatures adieu! well pleased I now resign
Whatever of airy good you can afford;
No longer I am yours, or you are mine.
Free—disenthral'd, my God! I'm wholly thine,
Reject me not, I pray thee, dearest Lord!

III.

Let thy pure love, my God! now fill my soul,
And to her every power its force impart;
There reign supreme—those vain desires controul
That in the mire of earth oft made her roll—
Oh! come sweet spirit! Come, possess my heart.

IV.

Oh heav'nly dews! that sweetly trickling down
Quench, as you fall, the flames of lawless love,
This heart each day still more enamour'd grown,
May it all love, but that of God disown—
Pour down, sweet dews! your showers from heaven above!

V.

O flame divine! that strong as thou art fair,
Dost glorify at once and fire the frame—
Come—come my cold and lifeless heart prepare—
And breathe love's purest, holiest ardours there.
O fire divine! my heart and soul inflame!

VI.

O boundless love! how blest the souls that now
In heav'n thy face in all its beauty see!
Oh! that my soul! thus happy too wert thou!
I'm sick of earth and all I see below—
Spirit of Love! now call my soul to thee!

"PENAL LAWS ENACTED AGAINST ROMAN CATHOLICS." By R.
R. MADDEN.

COMPLAINT has often been made that Ireland is overlooked, or dispatched by a brief notice, in English histories. You expect to find her occupy a respectable portion of the page, but she appears seldom, and then not in an attitude very flattering to national vanity.

Whether it be deliberate injustice, or a belief that there is no justice to be done, there is no doubt of the fact, that British historians, honest and dishonest, very generally mislead the reader when there is question of Irish affairs.

Of Mr. Madden's inclination to do justice to Ireland none of our readers can have any doubt, because he has already given proofs of historical research highly creditable to his Irish feelings. When it was announced that the author of the "United Irishmen" was preparing a history of the penal laws, we, in common with many others, believed that a great desideratum was about to be supplied; that we were to have a history of the Irish penal laws, as well as of the English; that both were not to be confounded; that the author would bear in mind that these laws were enacted by different parliaments, at different times, and were counteracted or aggravated in their operation by widely different causes; in one word, that a history of the English penal laws was not a history of the penal laws against the Catholics. But in the work before us we have not a history of the Irish penal laws. The difference between them and the English is not sufficiently kept in view; very many readers, of average information, might rise from the perusal of this work with the most erroneous notions of the state of the Irish Catholics during a large portion of that time which it includes.

It is far from our intention to say that Mr. Madden has not done well what he proposed to do. He has given an excellent epitome of the penal laws enacted in England, but he has yet left the field open for a good history of the penal laws in Ireland. The difference between the two classes may be best known from a single example.

The principal part of this work is devoted to the reign of Elizabeth. The penal laws then enacted in England, their operation, the number of their victims, their influence on the people and property of that country are chronicled with rigorous fidelity. You behold the penal system developed there in all its satanic deformity before Elizabeth had been summoned to her dread account. But how different was the case in Ireland during that time. Blood was shed in torrents. John O'Neill, the Earl of Desmond, and Hugh O'Neill appear successively in the field. Almost the whole landed property in the island changes masters, yet the penal laws of England were not enacted or enforced by the Irish Parliament. With the exception of the law of 1559, enforcing the royal supremacy, prohibiting the Mass, transferring the ecclesiastical property, there was no law enacted in Ireland against the Catholic church during the reign of Elizabeth. When Sir John Perrott, in 1585, attempted to assimilate the Irish penal laws to the English, he was defeated by the Irish Parliament and reproved by the queen. Even the laws of 1559 were, in some places, so much a dead letter that the Catholic deputies, in 1613, openly maintained before the king, that they had been clandestinely passed and never carried into operation. This exhibits a state of society widely different from the contemporary state of England, marked by characteristics which make it a subject apart, and abounding in materials of an absorbing and dramatic interest, such as few periods of our history possess. Elizabeth's Irish reign was persecution, famine, and blood—but in quite a different order from her English fashion. Her English penal laws were not enacted in Ireland before the year 1651.

Another salient difference between the English and the Irish penal laws is, the population for which they were made. The great majority of Englishmen gave up their old creed almost without a struggle; when Father Campion, mounted on a sorry steed, with his hands tied behind his back, and a large label, "Campion the Jesuit," flaunting on his breast, is paraded by slow marches from gaol to gaol, in market towns in England, there is hate, or laughter, or indifference—but not sympathy. The people know that he is to be racked and mutilated, and that for him the laws of King Edward, and the rights of Stephen Langton are to be no protection. English law they believe was never made for him. He dies unpitied by the crowd. No popular ballad embalms his memory; he lives only in the hearts of the faithful few who never bent the knee to Baal.

The case was very different in Ireland; even among those whom every tie of blood and language, and historic and political association bound to England. The English of the towns, and of the Pale, were not less firm in their fidelity to the Catholic church than the native Irish. The most intrepid champions of the Catholic faith were Anglo-Irish. They fought in Elizabeth's armies, and defended her crown; but a very cautious writer asserts, in 1609, that not sixty of them altogether had abandoned the Catholic faith. Leland, himself, acknowledges that Anglo-Irish priests were the principal support of Elizabeth's Irish power during a long period of her reign. Hugh O'Neill reproached them with their servility to the English tigress, the enemy of their faith, but in vain; they held Ireland for her against the native Irish; they were the English garrison, to their own ruin and the long suffering of their country. Now the conduct of those rival races, the identity of their religious, the antagonism of their political principles, the operation of penal laws on both, the means employed to reduce and Protestantise them are essential points for the consideration of the historian of the Irish Penal laws, but have, we need not say, little or no place in the history of those of England.

And if we look to the ultimate effects of penal laws in both countries, what a wide field for historic study in Ireland! The scene does not open with the Reformation: it is an old play with a new name: it is the old system of English rule in a new phase—the government of the many for the benefit of the few. It is said of William the Conqueror, that before his death he saw the fee of every acre in the hands of Normans, that all the high dignitaries of the church, secular and regular, were Normans, that all offices of honour and emolument were held by Normans, in a word, that England during his reign, and for a considerable period afterwards, was governed exclusively for the benefit of the sixty thousand Normans that followed William's banner to Hastings. This system of William was introduced into Ireland in 1172, and was perpetuated with all the authority of the English government. All the very great men who wrote on Irish affairs in the reign of Elizabeth, Spenser and Raleigh, and Sir John Davis and Bacon, English writers of every grade, from the political pamphleteer to the compiler of the ponderous folios of the "Liber Munerum Hiberniæ," are unanimous on this point, that Ireland was delivered over, during full four hundred years to the mercy of an Anglo-Irish oligarchy, the Burkes, and Butlers, and Fitzgeralds, and the other less "stout hunters before the Lord," that those oligarchs opposed with all their might every petition of the native Irish for equal laws, that they bearded and defied the crown, and arrested Edward I., Edward II., and Edward III. in the politic career of concession—that they governed Ireland for themselves. We do not intend to examine whether the unanimous judgment of the Elizabethan writers, on our Anglo-Irish oligarchs be just, or must not be in some degree modified. The judgment has been pronounced. The old system it was said should be abolished. Ireland, it was said by Sir John Davis, shall no more be governed for the benefit of an oligarchy. All must repose in tranquil security and plenty, under the shade of the British oak, and the protection of the English crown. There shall be no longer a distinction between different races of Irishmen, nor between Irishmen and Englishmen, since James I. has ascended the throne. These were the solemn auguries of the great lights of English literature; the morning stars that ushered in the auspicious era of the Reformation.

Now we should wish to see the history of those fair promises. A history of the Irish penal laws is imperfect without it. Most of the principles of those laws were as old as English power in Ireland. Monopoly in church, and state, and property, for the benefit of the Anglo-Irish oligarchy, was the soul of the English system before the Reformation; monopoly of the same for the Protestant oligarchy has been the system, with slight variation, to the present day. If the poor man, who is willing to work, starve—if the prudent farmer will not expend his money in improving lands of which he has no profitable tenure—if a Catholic Attorney-General pack a jury with all the dexterity of a Saurin or a Norbury—if there is no franchise in Ireland, and no real municipal institutions, and no adequate representation, it is because Ireland is still garrisoned for the benefit of the few—for the new oligarchy created by Irish penal laws. Now it is manifest that such effects have not been produced by the penal laws in England; they created no new aristocracy; their influence was totally different, and it would therefore appear to us that the history of the Irish penal laws must be a work in itself, unless we dismiss altogether from our consideration in a history of laws the grand object for which laws are said to be made—the good of the community.

A man of Mr. Madden's well-known abilities and diligence, could take up the Irish statute-book and mark down the statutes in order—divide the last 300 years into periods which are sufficiently marked, and which are nearly the same as those he has adopted for England. 1. War and persecution, from Henry VIII. to the death of Elizabeth. 2. Star chambers, priest-hunting, legal robbery, and rotten boroughs, to the first years of Charles I. 3. A lull until 1641. 4. The war of the confederates to 1650. 5. English penal laws, and Cromwell's robbery and sword to 1660. 6. Charles II. rewards the murderers of his father with Irish estates, and during ten years persecutes the Catholics; then a lull, and next the execution of Primate Plunkett. 7. James II. to 1690. 8. Violation of the treaty of Limerick; gradual progress of penal laws, until it was at length proposed that priests should be eunuchs. 9. First relaxation of the penal code. 10. Growing power of the Catholics. 11. Ending in the gradual formation of a Whig Catholic party, who enjoy the good things of government and take as little interest in the rights of the Irish farmer, or of the Irish poor who raised them to power, as the oligarchy whose power was destroyed by O'Connell. These are marked stages in the history of the penal laws, which created an oligarchy to which Ireland was sacrificed, and which still subsist in all their practical vigour against the Irish farmer and the mass of the Irish people. Why need Irish farmers ask tenant-right, or Irish labourers a right to have work, when Mr. Sheil is Master of the Mint, and More O'Ferrall governs Malta? The history of the Irish penal laws would be incomplete if it did not point out the influence of those laws in degrading many of the Catholic gentry, who fold their arms now that they are secure, and regard with the selfish feeling of the old slave, the exertions of their poorer countrymen to secure a small portion of justice.

If Mr. Madden were another man, and had not proved himself a stern historian, who is ever ready to do justice, it might be said that he abstained from giving a particular history of the Irish penal laws, because he was unwilling to revive topics disagreeable to the Irish aristocracy and to the established church. Such a motive could not, we are confident, have influenced him. There are many of our Irish litterati who would be influenced by it, who shrink with morbid terror from every topic that leads to the real cause of the misery of Ireland—namely, the establishment and history of the new aristocracy, and the new church. Conciliation, and union of classes and creeds, are most desirable, and worthy of great sacrifices, if there be any probability of securing them. But in the present state of the Irish world, and especially after the history of the two last years of famine, the grounds of hope for conciliation of what is called the aristocracy are so slight, that, for our humble part, we cannot but wonder at the simplicity which expects that any thing short of utter ruin can ever drive the Irish aristocracy to make common cause with the people. The real secret in our opinion of the wonderful popularity of Mr. Mitchell was, that he struck at the root of the Irish evil; he knew his country's history, and that she had been always governed for the good of an oligarchy, that it was so before the Reformation, and has been, and is, and will be, if the people do not endeavour to provide for themselves, without depending on an order which, from hereditary tradition, believes that the people have no business on this earth but to make idle gentlemen of them.

The truth is, it is now generally felt, that Emancipation is as yet a very partial and by no means national good. It has enabled Mr. Sheil to enjoy his salary and make a brilliant defence of English insolence to the Spanish nation, but it has not given food to the starving Irish, nor stopped the absentee drain, nor secured tenant-right for the farmer. The wreath of emancipator from social ills is yet to be won by whatever O'Connell heaven may raise up, either in an Irish or an Imperial Parliament; and when that emancipator comes it will not be from the ranks, or at least not with the sympathy of the aristocracy, nor of their church (which is the same thing as an establishment), because he must establish an adjustment of their rights to which they will not give a willing adhesion.

A good history of the penal laws would tell the Irish who were their real enemies, and help them to concentrate their energies in the right direction. It would teach the Protestant farmer and the Protestant merchant that they are now reaping, in provincial degradation and paralysed trade, the fruits of that penal system of which their fathers shared the exclusive benefits. How was the first French Revolution brought about? and what were the practical grievances that accelerated it? France, we are told by Whigs of all grades, was governed for the benefit of the aristocracy and the church. The peasant had no rights—the farmer was plundered—the patronage of the towns was in the hands of a bishop or a duke. That French Revolution, we are assured, nevertheless was a glorious event, notwithstanding all the horrors with which it was accompanied; but can any of those philanthropic, cosmopolite Whigs, those Don Quixotes of continental constitutions, have the effrontery to tell us that Ireland has not suffered more real misery in any one year of her chronic famines, than was suffered by all France in any ten years before her Revolution. What beneficial rights have the Irish farmers, or the Irish labourers? what right have they, or any Catholic, to the million sterling which is annually distributed among the clergy of half a million? Is it not a bitter mockery to tell a ruined province: seek no change, you are a member of the greatest empire on the earth; starve in peace—whether you be an Orangeman of Dungannon or a Papist of Skibbereen, are you not a British subject—remember your dignity and starve in peace.

The man must be very short-sighted who does not discern the form the Irish question is now assuming. It is no longer a struggle of Irish Catholics of all orders for political equality and rights, but a struggle of all Irish merchants, and farmers, and labourers against English misgovernment, and its allies, the great mass of the landed aristocracy. Most of those gentlemen are absentees, and never come within the circle of Irish influence, and if we can judge from their antecedents, they never will, as long as English law allows them the accommodation of an agent. A good history of the penal laws, commencing, as we proposed, with English dominion in Ireland, would teach the people to distinguish between the absentee and the resident proprietor, and would demonstrate to all, the precise amount of good they have derived from persecution and dissension. Of one thing we are quite certain, that in a true history of the penal laws, there could not be a single chapter for which we would not find an appropriate heading in the speeches delivered by Henry Grattan in the Irish Parliament. Protestant liberalism, in its highest modern flights, has never yet come up to the salutary maxims preached by his inspired eloquence in College Green.

As for the established church temporalities, it is a great pity that the agitation against them, fifteen years ago, was not continued. Their abolition was certain, and that would have conciliated the great mass of the Anglicans. By this time, the Irish middle classes, of all orders, would have been united against the common enemy, who has always profaned the gospel of love, both in ancient and modern times, by professing a regard for the interest of revealed truth, when it sought only the interest of England. Moreover, a history of the Irish penal laws would prove that what is called the establishment really did not endeavour during three centuries, to propagate the Protestant religion, but simply to enjoy the rich revenues, and be a pliant tool in the hands of English tyrants. Protestantism was more vigorous in France under persecution, than in Ireland under the oppressive protection of an overgrown secular establishment. We, as Catholics, should dread it much more as our antagonist, if it descended to the field armed with evangelical poverty, or respectable competence, than when it appears in its gilded chariots, and legal and military pomp.

A good history of the penal laws, then, such as Ireland wants, should be a text-book in the hands of all who desire to contribute their humble mite to the redemption of their country. It should be a commentary on the words of Edmund Burke:—"No country in the world has suffered for religion more than Ireland." No country in the world but Ireland has, during 700 years, been the pocket borough of an oligarchy, differing in name and creed—but still an oligarchy. No country in the world has suffered more from aristocracies than Ireland. The veneration for rank and high descent which combines so singularly, in the Irish character, with an imperishable love of liberty, must, in the ordinary course of events, be reduced to reasonable dimensions. It is unreasonable, because it is lavished on undeserving objects. It can be cured by judicious instruction, and a knowledge of the penal laws. It is a strong national characteristic of all the Celtic races, but the French have succeeded in correcting it, though of them, Amedeus Thierry calculates, that nineteen-twentieths are Celts. If the peccadillos of the French aristocracy, during a few reigns, were enough to cure Frenchmen for ever of undue regard for mere rank—of preference for the life or property of the rich man over the life or property of the poor man, surely there is enough in any one century of English government, in this country, to convert the nation to the practical belief that the life of the poor man is as valuable as that of the rich. It is not pleasing to contemplate the effects to which this reformation of national character may lead, but what other hope is there for this wretched country, where the Irish Whig organ and the Orange press unite cordially against seven-eighths of the people?—where a Catholic Attorney-General revives the worst acts of the worst penal times?—and the great Whig premier, at the head of the strongest Whig government, with full power to carry the sweeping measures of reform, social and political, imperatively required by Ireland, nibbles at encumbered estates and tenant-compensation, and transports all who "openly and advisedly" tell him that he is sacrificing the lives of the many, to the luxury of the few, that he is only setting the old words to a new tune:

As long as Ireland shall pretend—
Sugar-loaf-like, turned upside down,
To stand upon her smaller end,
So long shall live old Rock's renown.

The whole history of this last Whig ministry, indeed, entitles our national bard to the laurels of prophecy, for whether the Whigs be Catholic or Protestant, Irish or English, they are admirable conservatives of place:

As bees on flowers alighting cease their hum,
So, settling upon places, Whigs grow dumb.

Now a good history of the penal laws, if brought down to the present time, while it would teach us to give due credit to the Whigs for their past services, would prove to them that they must change their system, if they really wish to carry out the dream of their youth—the government of this country for the benefit of the people. The Whiggery we want at present is not places for rich men, who can live very well without them, but food for the poor, work for the able-bodied, justice for the tenant, a total change in the hereditary traditions of the Irish Office, a total sacrifice if necessary of the oligarchy, for the good of the people. At another time, we may produce several good Irish precedents for the maxim so badly acted on—that "Property has its duties as well as its rights."

But another, and perhaps the greatest advantage of a good separate history of the Irish penal laws would be, to fix the true meaning of those two words "Established Church," "Aristocracy," as designating things in England and in Ireland. The greatest errors in philosophy, and in politics, and in religion, have arisen from the abuse of terms. The same word often signifies very different things at opposite sides of the channel. Now our politicians, and especially many well-meaning Englishmen, are every day falling into gross blunders in political reasoning, from not knowing or remembering that the words "Aristocracy," "Established Church," are not univocal in England and in Ireland; they designate very different things on opposite sides of the channel, if, in estimating the identity or nature of any social or political institution, we must take into account the system of which that institution is a part, and the social and political ends for which it is intended. The words "Aristocracy," "Established Church," are, and ought to be, with all governors words of power in England; they are, with some shortcomings, of course, national institutions, and hence when poor Lord Shrewsbury, in one of his canonical epistles to the Irish Church, said, "The Irish Established Church must not be abolished, because the Irish aristocracy are strongly attached to it," it is easy to conceive the flood of evidence which these few words of the noble peer must have poured into the minds of the great mass of Englishmen in favour of this Irish Established Church. But a good history of the Irish penal laws would teach all honest men the fallacy of that sophism; it would point out the difference between the English and Irish institutions which are called by the same name. It would prove that of all the imposing claims which the English aristocracy has to its high place, the Irish aristocracy has not, and hardly ever had one, that whether you regard the Irish aristocracy in relation to the tenantry, or the labourer, or the artist, or the merchant, or the empire, it is to the English aristocracy what the monkey is to the man. It could be easily found that of this Irish aristocracy which is so deeply interested in the Established Church, not the one-third ever set their feet within an Irish church, except perhaps occasionally in gale times. It would be the duty of the historian of the penal laws to trace the history of the Irish aristocracy, and while he exposed without mercy those who abdicated their noblest duties, to do full justice to the few who were indeed the Corinthian pillars of the edifice, and that would be the most pleasing—the most important part of his duty.

This history should not be a mere chronicle of penal laws, and of its victims. The exaggerations of modern polemics have led many honest men to believe that during the penal days, the ascendant class were all tyrants, and the Catholics all crouching, sullen, blood-thirsty slaves, ungrateful for the occasional pity or justice extended to them by their masters. Now that is a false picture, it is opposed by cherished local traditions in every quarter of Ireland, which preserve to this day the memory of the good men who paid more attention to the laws of nature than to penal laws, and protected, in the hour of need, the oppressed Catholic or his priest. It is opposed to authenticated facts committed to print, centuries ago, by men who could not be suspected of trumping up a case for purposes of conciliation, because those very writers made it a crime in some Protestant bishops and law lords that they were indulgent and just to the people; that they were beloved by the people; and that their justice gave them too great an influence with the people. To find those examples—those lights for the darkly-shaded picture of the penal days, our historian need not cite the Earl-bishop of Derry, and the other heroes of '82. Let him go look to the days of Berkeley of Cloyne, or farther still, to Bedell of Kilmore, and examine how they stood with the people. They were stern, shall we say bigoted, Protestants; but they did not believe that persecution was the best way to Protestantize. They were kind and just to the people, and were beloved by them. It would be the most pleasing duty of the historian to produce these examples. They are more numerous than it is generally imagined, and are often found in quarters where it would be least expected. They prove what a resident proprietary could be in a happy island, and how well the Irish could combine firm adherence to their own faith, with respect for the religious opinions of others.

It is not to be denied that the long struggle for emancipation, and the bitter contests at elections, have contributed, with absenteeism and other causes, to evoke a spirit which threatens a total crash of the social edifice, and which cannot be subdued until all things find their level. The Whig Catholic must cease to believe that all is right because he holds a place; the Protestant must inscribe equality in all things on his banner, before we expect to enjoy peace in this land of strife. Human nature and clan-prejudices considered, this task will be as difficult for the Whig Catholic as for the Protestant, more difficult perhaps, the Whig Catholic star being in the ascendant. In the meantime—may the people be true to themselves. To 7,925,000 of the eight millions of Irishmen, Protestant or Catholic, it matters very little whether Whig or Tory have the distribution of places.

It is easier to suggest a history of the Irish penal laws than to write it. But it is a desideratum, and perhaps some of our hints may not be useless. In the meantime, we commend Mr. Madden's "Penal Laws" to the Catholic, that he may admire those men to whom he owes his faith—and to the Protestant, that he may know who has done the wrong, and is bound to repair it.

Paraguay and the Jesuits.

THE following chapter from the history of the Jesuit Fathers may not be unacceptable, at this present time, when the spirit of persecution is once more blindly raging against the order; and when the popularity and virtues of the Sovereign Pontiff, Pius IX., is unable to protect them from the violence of the Roman mob. It is certainly strangely unaccountable, for we ourselves have seen them within the last twelve months in Rome—their church crowded—their preachers admired—their confessionals thronged—the order seemingly more popular than any other religious body, the Capuchins excepted. Yet, within a few months they are compelled to abandon the Eternal city.

But Providence in permitting this has its own wise purposes—time will develop them. Perhaps it is ordained that once more they should carry the torch of faith among those who are in darkness, and the heathens be reclaimed by that zeal and charity which Christians cast from them. They may be destined to erect another Christian republic, more durable than that which we intend briefly to describe.

In the year of our Lord 1526, the celebrated Venetian mariner, Sebastian Cabot, sailed up the Rio de la Plata until he came to the junction of the rivers Parana and Paraguay. The latter he ascended about forty leagues: finding a people devoted to agriculture, he built a fort and formed a settlement among them. The inhabitants being of a peaceful disposition, he lived unmolested nearly five years; until, provoked very probably by the aggressions of the Europeans, they rose, destroyed the fort, and compelled Cabot to abandon the country.

A few years afterwards, a member of the royal household, Mendosa, sailed with an expedition of eight hundred men, and eleven ships. They arrived prosperously, and spent some days at Rio Janeiro. Mendosa gave up the command to his brother, who founded a town at the mouth of the Rio de la Plata, which from the salubrity of the spot he called Nostra Senhora de Buenos Ayres. An officer, named Ayolas, proceeded up the Paraguay, as far as the 24th degree of lat., lon. 58°, where he founded the town, now the capital of the country, Assumpcion, in honour of the Blessed Virgin. Leaving in it a garrison of one hundred men, with three hundred natives and two hundred Spaniards, he formed an expedition in search of the precious metals. But neither he nor his companions were ever seen again; they were treacherously destroyed by a daring, courageous tribe, the Paya-goes. With many vicissitudes, the Spaniards pursued their darling object of finding gold and silver; suffering much occasionally, and inflicting many evils on the natives of the discovered countries.

Paraguay lies between the 21st and 27th degrees of S. lat., 54th and 58th of W. lon. It is about 460 miles long, containing an area of 74,000 square miles, and, according to the late accounts, has a mixed population of 300,000 souls. The soil is fertile and well wooded, pleasantly diversified with verdant hills and vallies, and watered by many rivers. The climate is temperate, but damp. It produces rice, cotton, maize, tobacco, the sugar cane, and the yerba maté, or tea of Paraguay, which grows wild and abundantly in the dense forests of the north and eastern districts. It is as much consumed in a vast portion of South America as the tea of China is in Europe. As regards fertility, Paraguay contrasts favourably with the neighbouring districts of the Argentine republic. Nearly half the land is the property of the state. The immense estates and pastures possessed by the Jesuit fathers and the "reductions" were never alienated. In 1776, Paraguay formed a portion of the viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres; in 1813, it was proclaimed a republic, and threw off the Spanish yoke; in 1814, Dr. Francia contrived to get himself appointed sole dictator for three years, and shortly after for life. Since the death of that singular man, we have had little or no intelligence of the state of the nation.

In the year of our Lord 1586, Francis Victoria, a friar of the order of preachers, was bishop of Tucuman. The diocese confided to his paternal care was, at his election, in a state of great spiritual destitution, and stood much in need of zealous labourers in the vineyard of the Lord. The young had grown up without instruction—the old were careless of their duties—the sick died without the consolation of religion. Not a priest in the district was competent to make himself understood by the natives. Thousands of them, after they had been baptised and instructed in the elements of Christianity, from want of attention fell back into their old habits of barbarity and superstition. Moved at the sight of so much ignorance and crime, and anxious to apply a remedy to so great an evil, the good bishop wrote to the provincials of the Jesuits, both in Brazil and Peru, earnestly soliciting a supply of missionary fathers to assist him in his labours for the welfare of his flock. The Jesuits hastened to comply with his request. So great was the reputation they enjoyed in the new as well as the old world, that the inhabitants of Tucuman heard with delight of their coming, and the day on which the Fathers Francis Angelo and Alfonso Barsena, with a lay brother, entered Santiago, was one of universal rejoicing. The governor, Ramires de Velasco, with the chief nobility, the garrison, and the whole population went out to receive them; flowers were strewn, and triumphal arches erected in the streets through which they were to pass—“Te Deum” was chanted—a solemn thanksgiving, offered by the good bishop, and all hearts united in gratitude to the Most High, for what they deemed a spiritual favour from God.

The soil and climate of their new mission were fertile and wholesome; the country was populous, and numerous Indian tribes were scattered within its boundaries. The Spaniards had scarcely commenced to settle in the country when the zealous Franciscan, St. Francis Solanus, with other missionaries came from Peru. They baptised many thousands. But when Solanus was recalled by his superiors, the mission went to ruin. Some time after, a colony of docile, humble Christians was formed, by the labours of Father Lewis de Bolanos, among the people of Guayra; he governed them for many years, but age, infirmities, and the wishes of his superiors, called him from the scene of his labours. The germ of much good was left, though hidden for a while. The new missionaries immediately commenced their duties. Santiago contained nearly five hundred European families, among whom religion and its practices had been grossly neglected; but things quickly assumed a different appearance—the licentious were reclaimed—the weak strengthened—the guilty reprovèd—and the praises of God sung in crowded churches, which for a long period were neglected and empty. Father Barsena began his labours among the Indians of fifty villages, which were situated at a considerable distance from one another. He went about catechising, hearing confessions, baptising, consoling the sick, and so well disposed were the poor people, that in the space of nine months, he counted seven thousand well instructed neophytes, besides a vast number who had before heard the word of God. In addition to the missionaries from Peru, the venerable Anchietà (himself an apostle) sent from Brazil five new labourers—their names were, Juan Salónico, a Spaniard, Leonardo Armenio, an Italian, Thomas Fields, a Scotchman, and two Portuguese, Emmanuel Ortega, and Stefano de Grao. They were zealous and laborious: prepared by the example and guidance of Anchietà for the vineyard of the Lord. Of these five, Armenio and de Grao returned to Brazil; Ortega went to Corduba, and Salónico and Fields, at the request of the good bishop, went to Assumpcion. Both of them were men of fervour and dauntless courage in the cause of religion. They were received at Assumpcion with all honour and respect, and in a short time produced a very great reformation among its inhabitants of Spanish origin and descent. But they conceived that their mission called them to the poor wandering tribes who never heard of Christ or his religion; and accordingly they turned their thoughts to a distant district named Guayra. Leaving “Assumpcion,” they embarked in canoes, and sailing a considerable distance up the Paraguay, they disembarked on the right bank, and travelled one hundred and fifty leagues on foot before they arrived at the destination they marked out for themselves. At length they found themselves in the country named Guayra. It is a large tract, bounded on the south and west by the Parana and Uruguay, on the east it extends towards Brazil, and in the north it is defended by trackless woods and dense forests. The population was numerous, and, unlike the other Indian tribes, they lived in villages, but frequently abandoned them. They were governed by caciques, who were independent of one another; their authority was hereditary, but for the most part depended on personal merit. They were sunk in the deepest barbarity and superstition. On the birth of a child, the husband observed a rigorous fast of fifteen days, during which he neither hunted or spoke—believing that the life of the child depended on his observance of this custom. When about to give a name to a new-born infant, they usually sacrificed a prisoner of war, or if they had him not, waited till one was captured for that purpose;* after regaling him plentifully for many days, and giving him females as he wished, with great ceremony (says Charlevoix) they cut his throat. When dead every one present touched his body or struck it with a stick, and during this ceremony they gave names to their children. Afterwards, they cut up the body, parts of which were given to be taken home to make broth, and all partook of it, not excepting infants at the breast. When a young female came to maturity they placed her for eight days under the care of an old woman, who made her perform the most menial offices, submit to every drudgery, treated her harshly, tried her temper in every possible way; if she submitted mildly and cheerfully she was deemed fit to have charge of a family. On the death of their husbands, the women were used to fling themselves from precipices, sometimes killing, and frequently maiming themselves for life. Like most savage tribes, they had great faith in jugglers, fortune-tellers, and magicians—who were their priests and physicians. They believed them to have power of life and death, that they could gather information from the singing of birds, &c. But the people of Guayra, although sunk in such degrading customs, were the most docile of the many tribes of the country. Among them, Fathers Ortega and Fields commenced their work of love. They visited the Indian villages, and when these were abandoned, they followed the wandering savages among mountains, forests, and swamps. They were exposed to dangers—sometimes of starvation—of drowning—of being murdered by those they laboured to convert—their hopes were frequently frustrated—and their best efforts rendered unavailing by the avarice and cruelty of the Spaniards.

* Mr. Prescott, in his elegant history of Mexico, notices a similar sacrifice among the ancient Mexicans.

It was extremely difficult to make the poor Indians comprehend the distinction between the doctrines they were taught and the injustice of their Christian oppressors. Those holy men laboured for eight years with heroic constancy. Their reward was the number of converts. The journeys they undertook were difficult and arduous; nothing but love to God, and ardour for the salvation of souls, enabled them to persevere.

On one occasion, Ortega was travelling with some neophytes and catechumens, along a country enclosed between two rivers. Suddenly the waters rose to a great height, inundating the whole plain. For a considerable time he had to wade with the waters up to his waist, but at length, to save his life, he had to get into a tree. His companions did the same; but the tree they ascended not being sufficiently high, their cries pierced his heart; they were in danger of being drowned, and he unable to render them any assistance. The storm continued—the rain fell in torrents—the waters continued to rise—the thunder roared—the lightning played around them—wild beasts of all descriptions were swimming near, drowning, or trying to save themselves by grasping at trees. An immense serpent fastened on a branch of the tree in which was poor Father Ortega; fortunately it broke, and his assailant fell into the waters. For two days they had to remain in their forlorn situation, the tempest continuing with unabated violence, when about midnight one of the Indians swam to tell Ortega that the three Christian companions and catechumens were dying, and required his aid. In spite of every difficulty, he succeeded in reaching and baptising the catechumens, who were almost instantaneously drowned, as also the two neophytes. In his effort to reach them, a sharp branch of a projecting tree pierced his thigh, inflicting a wound which never healed during two-and-twenty years which he subsequently lived. On the same evening the storm abated. This holy priest was imprisoned for five months in Lima, many years after, on a charge made against him that he revealed the confession of a penitent; he was abundantly justified, for his calumniator confessed before witnesses, on his dying bed, that the accusation was false. Ortega died in 1622.

From the first entrance of the Jesuits into Paraguay and the adjoining nations, twenty-four years had elapsed. Little permanent good had been effected. Thousands had been baptised and taught the principles of religion, but, with the fickleness of savages, they easily abandoned the faith, at the instigation of passion or long-confirmed habits. A remedy was sought and found. In the year 1602, when our virgin queen was hanging, bowelling, and quartering Jesuits, missionary priests, &c., the celebrated Acquaviva, general of the society, sent Father Paez, a wise and prudent man, to make a visitation of all the houses of the order in this part of the world. He assembled all the missionaries in Tucuman and Rio de la Plata, which then included the long, rich tract of country, since known as Paraguay. After conversing with each, and getting all the information requisite, he told them that he approved but little of their mode of gaining converts. He condemned their custom of going from country to country—from one extremity of a district to another—he deemed that conversions which were the result of hasty impressions were scarcely of any value. Time and perseverance were, he said, required to perfect them. He pointed out how unavailing had been the labours of Francis Solanus, then living, whose life was passed in efforts similar to their own. "He had converted many tribes, but they quickly fell away, because they had no fixed dwellings." Paez then counselled them to change their system; and when it was practicable, he desired that they should try to induce the Indians to live together in larger numbers and fixed localities.

To commence the new system, Fathers Joseph Cataldino and Lorencana were sent, in 1604, to Assumpcion, where they were affectionately received by the entire population. Their popularity was, however, very short-lived, owing to the following circumstances.

Some of the tribes, located on the Paraguay, had murdered several Spaniards. An officer, sent with a body of soldiers, in place of going in search of the guilty parties, seized a number of Indians, who were allies, brought them to Assumpcion, and sold them as slaves. Father Lorencana, having failed by private remonstrance to prevent this injustice, publicly denounced the whole transaction from the pulpit. At first applauded, he was subsequently hated and distrusted for his anxiety on behalf of the oppressed Indians; so implicated were almost the entire population in deriving profit from unjust dealings with the natives. It was one of the numberless instances where the Jesuit fathers were persecuted for their care of the defenceless. About this time letters were obtained from the king, prohibiting any efforts to conquer or enslave the tribes of Paraguay. Those who were converted were not to be deprived of their liberty. The missionaries only were allowed to induce them to become vassals of the crown of Spain, since it was found that they alone made willing and obedient subjects of the Indians. In consequence of those letters, the governor conceded authority to the Jesuit fathers, Cataldino and Macerata, to govern the tribes they might hereafter convert. Those excellent and holy men almost immediately departed for Guayra, where the labours of Ortega and Fields had produced good fruits. Having ascended the Paranapane a considerable distance, they discovered two hundred families that had been taught the principles of the Christian religion and been baptised. They persuaded them to fix on a particular locality, and, having built a town, to live there permanently. The town they called Loretto. As they advanced still farther in the country, the fame of their benevolence, zeal, and charity went before them. They experienced the most warm and friendly reception from the Indians. They found it a difficult matter at first to persuade those poor people how much it would contribute to their welfare if they lived together. They succeeded, however, in convincing them that they and their children could be instructed with more facility—that they could more successfully defend themselves from their enemies—that their wants could be more easily supplied. At length the Indians began to arrive in such numbers at Loretto, that it was necessary to found a second town, which was called St. Ignatius.

Thus was commenced that system of conversion and Christian government, which will ever be dear to those who rejoice in the promulgation of Christianity, and the welfare of their fellow beings.

THE king's visit to Ireland. Triumphal arch in Sackville-street—the king's artificial shamrock, and the famine of 1822. George IV. and Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the advocate of the Irish poor. Delusions practised by the king—the Earl of Fingal made a Knight of St. Patrick—reception at court of the Catholic bishops. The underplot of "conciliation"—its hero, Abraham Bradley King—politics of the Orange place-hunters. A. B. King's conduct to his party—his declaration that "conciliation was a humbug!" Sir Edward Stanley and Mr. Purcell O'Gorman embrace in public. A contrast. Sir Edward Stanley's participation in D'Esterre's duel. Mr. O'Gorman as a duellist, proves his loyalty with his pistol. The duel with silver bullets. Mr. O'Gorman's wonderful escapes when under arrest as a leader of the United Irishmen. Character given of him by Viscount Melbourne.

"His Majesty landed in Ireland, and was received by all ranks of people with the highest enthusiasm. On the 17th (August), he made his public entry into the city of Dublin, in an open carriage, drawn by eight horses; his reception was very gratifying." Such is the brief manner in which an English author, Mr. W. Toone, in his Chronological Historian (vol. ii. p. 683), dismisses an event which was regarded by Irishmen, at the time, as one of the grandest epochs in the annals of their country! A temporary triumphal arch was erected opposite the Rotunda, and so as to be commanded by the view of the two streets that run at right angles with that building, and facing Sackville-street. Within this barrier, that is, on the side of Sackville-street, stood the civic officers, headed by the Lord Mayor, Sir Abraham Bradley King, whose duty it was to present to the king, the keys of the city, on a silver plate—and two very old, rusty keys they were—tied together with orange and blue ribbons. Here it was that, in presenting the keys, was typified the willing submission, the devoted attachment, and the ardent loyalty of the citizens towards the sovereign; and seldom has any sovereign seen a spectacle such as at that place presented to the eyes of George IV. One portion of this spectacle was too remarkable not to attract the admiration of all who looked upon it, and which even now rises up before the memory with all the vividness and distinctness of a scene which is, at the time it is admired, actually present before the spectator. From the top to the bottom of that most magnificent thoroughfare—Sackville-street—there were arranged in front of every house platforms, which ascended, range over range, from about five feet in height, up to the drawing-room windows, and on these were seated, almost exclusively, none but ladies, and all wearing light blue silk or tabinet dresses—the colour adopted in compliment to the king's visit—and I need scarcely add, that amid the excitement and the joy of such a scene, all seemed young, and all appeared beautiful—whilst over them, windows, and roof-tops, were crowded by persons waving white or blue handkerchiefs; the streets below, around, in the distance, Carlisle Bridge, all that could be seen of the quays, and of Westmoreland-street, were one mass of human beings, whose mighty voices were raised in an awful acclamation, that shook the nerves of the listener, as if the air were stirred with the concussion of a thunder-cloud.

It was whilst this enthusiastic burst of joy murmured in his ears, that the king pointed to an enormous shamrock which he wore, and pressed it to his heart! The shamrock was a mock one, and therefore, a fitting emblem of the false promises by which the unfortunate people were deluded. It was, in sooth, a proper type of the pretended feelings of sympathy by which they were then deceived. Long, long before that shamrock had been thrown by—perhaps trampled upon—it having, like the prayer-book in the hands of the dramatic Richard III., "served its purpose"—hundreds of those whose voices had been rapturously raised at the sight of it, had expired in the wilds of Connaught; had pined and withered away on the western coasts of Ireland—unpitied, unthought of, unheard!

I have no idea of so badly employing my own time, nor of so ungraciously and improperly intruding upon that of the reader, as to enter into a detail of the various exhibitions of his majesty, in the manifold places he visited—much less do I mean to recite the names of the great, of the noble, or of the "ignobile vulgus," whom he was pleased to receive at his levees and drawing-rooms. There were, however, one or two of these exhibitions which were rather of an awkward nature, and that manifested neither taste nor tact in their performance, particularly when contrasted with the previous and subsequent conduct of him who was the principal actor in them. These are deserving of a passing notice, and I shall advert to them as briefly as possible.

The first objectionable exhibition that was made of himself by George IV. was in visiting the public theatre, and "commanding" that there should then be performed for his amusement, a play and a farce, both certainly the composition of an Irishman—but that Irishman was Richard Brinsley Sheridan!—his Majesty's old friend and boon companion, Sheridan!!! The brave-hearted, the noble, the gallant, the witty, and the eloquent Sheridan, who had sacrificed much of fame, and even of character, in the service of his royal master, and who had received in return, ingratitude, penury, remorse, and shame. It was not merely a bold undertaking, but it was the audacious proceeding of an utterly heartless man, to face the people by whom that Sheridan was loved as a countryman, and honoured as a genius, and to know that he was sitting amongst them, of whom Moore had written, in reference to his conduct to Sheridan:

"And thou, too, whose life—a sick epicure's dream,
Incoherent and gross, even grosser—had pass'd,
Were it not for that cordial and soul-giving beam
Which his friendship and wit o'er thy nothingness cast."

The people were wandering in a mist of delusion at the time. They must either have thought that the king had been malign'd, or that he intended to make an offering of his penitence on the family shrine of his departed friend. Whatever the cause, the fact remains: the ungrateful sovereign was applauded—the compositions of the friend he had forgotten in the days of his need, were admired—the friend—the genius—the Irishman—the author—the advocate in Parliament of the poor of Ireland—was, in an assembly of Irishmen, forgotten.*

* Upon a debate on "The state of Ireland," R. B. Sheridan thus defended the Irish peasantry from the accusations then, as now, preferred against them: "We were told in England, that the unhappy Africans were insensible to the ordinary feelings of humanity, in order to render us indifferent to their sufferings, and to the custom of the slave trade. On similar motives, the character of the Irish peasantry is so foully misrepresented by men in this country, and in Ireland also." It was in the same debate he

The second mal-apropos, because deceitful, proceeding on the part of the king, was the bestowal of three yards of ribbon upon the Earl of Fingal, and making him what is called "a Knight of the Order of St. Patrick." This was a compliment which Lord Fingal, who was of the "old creed," neither sought, nor looked for from any new "Defender of the Faith." His Lordship, it may be well supposed, was content to die as he had lived, a sincere-hearted, simple, pious, Irish noble Catholic. The unlooked for compliment had a purpose in it, and the object aimed at was accomplished. The Catholics were deluded; for they regarded the circumstance as a manifestation of the anxiety of his majesty to place all classes of his subjects on an equality. It was, in their estimation, a foretaste of that emancipation which his majesty was eager to bestow upon them; but how egregiously they were deceived, the disclosures that have since been made as to the manner in which the Relief Bill was carried, fully prove, viz., that the bill was attributable solely to the perseverance and determination of ministers, and that it was not merely forced, but wrung from the reluctant hands of George IV.*—from him who had made the Earl of Fingal a Knight of St. Patrick! It was a striking instance of the system of gross delusion which was practised at the time, and to which I have before adverted.

A proceeding similar in spirit and intention to the bestowal of the knighthood on Lord Fingal, was his majesty receiving at court, the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic religion—as bishops. As bishops they presented their address—as bishops they appeared in their episcopal costume before the king—and as bishops they were replied to by him. And yet in the Relief Bill there was a penal clause against those very bishops! In the Act passed "by and with the consent of his majesty," the vain attempt was made by heresy to strip them of those titles, which, as bishops of the church in Ireland, belonged to them—which no usurpation by others, could take from them—and that no man-made law can deteriorate. Their reception however, in 1821, as the Catholic bishops of Ireland was a stated what was the policy that ought to be pursued in the government of Ireland. The words should be inscribed on the throne of every Lord Lieutenant. "The plan to set out with in Ireland for the relief of her people is the COTTAGE."—See Parliamentary Debates, vol. ix. pp. 1196-1197.

* "I moved," said Sir Robert Peel, "the Relief Bill in the House of Commons, on the 5th of March, 1829; but it is the fact that on the preceding day, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Lyndhurst, and myself, after a long interview with his Majesty, at Windsor Castle, felt it necessary, on account of his Majesty's scruples with respect to parts of the intended measure of relief, which we deemed indispensable, to tender our resignation of office. Those resignations were actually accepted, and we returned from Windsor, on the evening of the 4th of March, no longer ministers of the crown. In the course of the night, we were reinstated in office, having received from his Majesty the full authority which we required to proceed with the Relief Bill."—Speech of Sir Robert Peel, in the debate on "Want of Confidence in Ministers," January 31st, 1840. "Opinions of Sir Robert Peel," by W. T. Haly, p. 81. The words here quoted, I heard Sir Robert Peel give utterance to in the House of Commons. In the "Biography of Lord Eldon," by Mr. Twiss, there is given an account by Lord Eldon of his interviews with George IV. at the time of passing the Catholic Relief Bill. One extract will suffice. "The king," says Lord Eldon, "expressed his anguish, and pain, and misery, that the measure had ever been thought of, and as often declared, that he had been most cruelly and harshly treated—that he had been treated as a man whose consent had been asked, with a pistol pointed to his breast. What could he do? What had he to fall back upon?" See Campbell's "Ireland, Past and Present," appendix, pp. 610-15.

scene in the great drama of political deceit and cajolery which was acting at the time, for the benefit of the monarch and at the expense of the people. It was highly applauded, and passed off with almost universal eclat.

There was, whilst all this was going on, a curious scene enacted by minor performers. It was one not merely curious on its own account, but also from the consideration who the actors were, and what they had been. The underplot in the drama was "conciliation"—that is, one party ceased for the time to "insult and overbear," and the other to complain of the grievances under which they had long suffered. The great hero in this portion of the plot was Mr. Abraham Bradley King, the king's stationer, and then the Deputy Grand Master in the Grand Orange Lodge for all Ireland. He was the Davus in the comedy of "Delusion." Mr. A. B. King was at this time Lord Mayor of Dublin, and had, no doubt, received his cue for "Conciliation," and he most certainly "topped his part." It was well known that the usual display of orangeism would take place on the 12th of July. For the sake of "Conciliation," and for that only, Abraham Bradley King issued two proclamations, as Lord Mayor, against the dressing of the statue of King William, in College Green. The Deputy Grand Master of the orangemen did this! and he was well rewarded for it, as he was, in the first place, made a baronet, and, in the next, he had his patent, as king's stationer, renewed. This gave him a species of monopoly which could not be worth less than four or five thousand pounds—a pretty good reward for a little political hypocrisy.*

Abraham Bradley King was a conspicuous specimen of a class which has long flourished in Ireland, and is not yet eradicated from the soil. He was a place-hunter and a patronage-seeker, and as for a long time place was alone bestowed, and patronage solely conferred upon one small party in the country—and that the high Protestant or Orange party—I believe that he and his clique, in opposing Catholic Emancipation, were mainly moved by the consideration, that if any such measure were carried, it would be exposing them to a competition for place and patronage with their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. As the West Indian planter wishes to have the monopoly of the London market for his sugars, so did they desire to have the monopoly of the government favours to themselves. Sir A. B. King, Bart., for we must give him the title which his play-acting "Conciliation" conferred on him, was a place-hunter and patronage-seeker, and the great gift of a place-hunter and patronage-seeker is to have a constant tendency to shift to every quarter from which ministerial favour is likely to blow. It may be worthy to notice, in a few words, the career of this once illustrious place-hunter.

* Even the proclamation against the dressing of the statue was a pretence; for the statue was, as usual, dressed and decorated by the Orangemen in 1821. That which was, in fact, an incident that was, no doubt, beneath contempt, assumed importance when its object was taken into consideration. "The dressing of the statue" was the work of a bigoted faction, who desired thereby to insult the feelings of the great body of the people. See, as to this incident, "Memoir and Speeches of Daniel O'Connell," by his son, vol. ii. pp. 329, 332; Fagan's "Life and Times of Daniel O'Connell," vol. i. p. 264. The importance at one time attached to the "dressing of the statue" may be surmised from the fact, that an Irish refugee once made a claim for a large reward in Paris, from Bonaparte, because he had blackened the statue of King William, in College Green! This fact was stated to me by the late William Putnam McCabe, whose memoirs will be found in Madden's "Lives of the United Irishmen."

Sir Abraham Bradley King, Bart., was a tideswaiter upon government patronage, and no matter who was prime minister—that is, the disposer of good places—A. B. King was his “very obedient, humble servant.” In his time, he was, by turns, an Orangeman, a Purpleman (a shade even deeper than that of orange), a Conciliator, a Liberal, neither Liberal nor Orange, and then, to use his own expression, “threw off his surtout”—that is, laid by his pretensions to liberality and conciliation (having made as much of them as he possibly could), and last of all, he became an open and avowed “Brunswicker”—but even to the Brunswickers themselves he could not be faithful.

At the time that the intentions of the Duke of Wellington’s ministry were unknown—when it was strongly suspected that it was their wish that there should, through the means of the Brunswick clubs, be as strong a display as possible of “Protestant feeling” in Ireland, against the claims of the Catholics, a curious specimen of the cajolery, not to call it tergiversation, of A. B. King was then given.

A. B. King—assisted by two or more gentlemen, really sincere in their political principles—went round Dublin, for the purpose of procuring signatures to a requisition to the Lord Mayor (Alderman Montgomery,) to hold “a Brunswick meeting.” A most respectable requisition was made up—the willing assent of the Lord Mayor was given—the requisition was ordered for publication, and it was entrusted to A. B. King, for the purpose of being brought to the newspapers. In the intermediate time however—that is, between the completion of the requisition, and the day appointed for its publication—rumours had reached Dublin of the change contemplated by his Majesty’s ministers. Sir A. B. King became apathetic. News then arrived in Dublin, of the measures to be brought forward by the ministry, and Sir A. B. King immediately pocketed the requisition! The friends to the “good old cause” began to wonder why their names, titles, and dignities were not blazing away in print; they called on the Baronet, “he was out”—they called again, “he was not at home;” they then began to recollect how he had acted in 1821, and they fancied that he was playing upon their passions, and coquetting with their prejudices to serve his own private purposes. The “Brunswickers,” upon this, naturally became a little irritated with their “man of business,” for the mode in which he had neglected their concerns. They sent a peremptory message to him for the requisition. Sir A. B. King was taken suddenly ill, and was confined to his bed. The Brunswickers were enraged that he should be sick; and to his sick bed they sent a resolution, pledging themselves to expose the entire trickery he was endeavouring to practise upon them. This Resolution had the desired effect upon the sick politician; and whether it was owing to a chance report, that “the Duke of Cumberland had prevailed upon the king not to consent to the Relief Bill for the Catholics,” or whether it was a different cause that was able to resuscitate Sir A. B. King, it is impossible now to say, but at the meeting of Brunswickers (the requisition for which he had for some time cushioned) appeared the worthy baronet himself. He was, however, too ill to take a part in the proceedings, and “an affection of the chest” prevented him from delivering his sentiments! It was by the ministry of 1821, that the seeds of what was termed “Conciliation” were sown—it was by A. B. King they were carefully tended until they arrived at maturity—it was by A. B. King they were blasted—and it was by the same A. B. King subsequently declared, at a public meeting, that “Conciliation was a humbug.” The phrase, although not a polite one, was a very correct one; but assuredly, it could be as aptly applied to the man who profitted by it, as to the thing itself.*

Two other actors took part in “the conciliation humbug,” whose extraordinary appearance at a public meeting, together, was regarded with too much interest and curiosity at the time, to be permitted to pass into oblivion. These were Sir Edward Stanley, Knight, and Sheriff’s Peer, and Nicholas Purcell O’Gorman, barrister-at-law, and secretary to the Catholics of Ireland. One was a well-known Orangeman; the other had been “an United Irishman,” was a red-hot “Romanist,” a Radical, and an ultra-Liberal. These gentlemen, who were in appearance, manner, and mind, the very opposite of each other, did, in the face of a public meeting, preparatory to some “Conciliation dinner,” bestow a fraternal, cordial, long, and loving embrace upon each other! They did this, too, without laughing in each others’ faces. Sir Edward Stanley took from his person a silk scarf which thrice encircled his diminutive body, and endeavoured to fasten it round the full and capacious waist of Mr. O’Gorman—at the same time saying, that “he presented it to his new friend, as a symbol (or a sample, I forget which) of the lasting bond of union between all parties.” Mr. O’Gorman most graciously accepted the present, and promised—“to do as much for Sir Edward Stanley, another time.”

A more complete contrast there could not possibly be, between any two men, than between Sir Edward Stanley and Mr. N. Purcell O’Gorman, thus brought together in those marvellous times. Sir Edward Stanley was a small, weakly, timid, crafty-looking, little man—Mr. O’Gorman was large, burly, athletic, manly-looking. Sir Edward, by the side of O’Gorman, seemed to be a pigmy; O’Gorman, by the side of Sir Edward, appeared to be a giant. One had profitted by his politics, the other had lost by them. The one was the representative of a paltry, bigoted, and jobbing corporation—the other, the accredited officer of millions of men. One was no duellist—the other, a celebrated fire-eater; and great as the contrast was between these two gentlemen in all particulars, it was, in that which we have specified, most remarkable.

Sir Edward Stanley had been the second of the unfortunate D’Esterre, at the time of his fatal rencontre with Mr. O’Connell. I shall not here enter into the particulars of that most calamitous event, as every circumstance connected with it will be found fully detailed in Mr. John O’Connell’s book, as well as in Mr. Fagan’s “Life of Daniel O’Connell.”† I may, however, here add what was the statement made by the Dublin corporators, as to D’Esterre not having been able to shoot O’Connell. They accounted for it in this manner—they declared “that it was owing to the ‘bad handling’ of D’Esterre’s second—that Sir Edward

* We purposely draw a veil over the latter days of Sir A. B. King, and we would not even touch a corner of it, if it were not necessary to say that nothing could be more noble, more generous, nor more humane, because nothing more like a Christian, than the conduct of Mr. O’Connell to his old political opponent, King, when deserted by friends, and assailed by enemies. The letter of Sir A. B. King acknowledging this, is still extant.

† “Life and Speeches of D. O’Connell,” by his son, vol. ii. pp. 187, 195. “Life and Times of D. O’Connell, by W. Fagan, vol. i. pp. 136, 155.

Stanley being unaccustomed to affairs of the kind, and unused to the management of fire-arms, was naturally agitated by the novelty of his situation, and had rammed down the bullet into D'Esterre's pistol so badly that when D'Esterre was elevating it, to bring it to a level, the bullet rolled out, and actually came within a few inches of Mr. O'Connell's feet." Such was the report amongst Mr. D'Esterre's friends, and it was thus his missing O'Connell was accounted for. At that duel Mr. O'Gorman was present, and he it was who cocked the fatal pistol for his friend, Mr. O'Connell.

Sir Edward Stanley, I have observed, was no duellist; Mr. O'Gorman had been engaged in many duels. They were a portion of the evil customs of the times; and no man who took part in the affairs of life had the courage to resist the practice, and no one who ever complied with it, evinced greater intrepidity and coolness than Mr. O'Gorman.

When Mr. N. P. O'Gorman was a young man, in college, it was more than suspected that he was a leading member in the convocation of United Irishmen; and one or two intemperate and rash young men—"hot loyalists," as they fancied themselves to be—becoming acquainted with the rumour, had the temerity to question Mr. O'Gorman's sincere allegiance to his majesty, George III. For this, they were on the instant "called out," and a couple of awkward wounds, inflicted by Mr. O'Gorman's "constitutional" pistol, convinced them, their friends, adherents, and abettors, that "there was not a more firm and ardent supporter of the throne, than the young United Irishman." Mr. O'Gorman's loyalty, after passing through the fire of a couple of duels, was henceforward pure and unquestioned.

As a contrast to the manner in which Sir Edward Stanley had conducted himself, as second to Mr. D'Esterre, I may here mention the following circumstance, as it will be found characteristic of the coolness and manner of Mr. O'Gorman in "affairs of honour."

Mr. O'Gorman had agreed to act as the second of an attorney, who had been challenged by a person of the same profession. The attorney came to the ground with great spirit. No antagonist was there to encounter him; but there was an individual in waiting, to apprise Mr. O'Gorman and his principal that the gentleman would be positively there in fifteen minutes, as he had merely stopped to melt down silver spoons into bullets! "as the gentleman would fight with nothing else, because he never was sure of hitting his man with any other than a silver bullet." Upon hearing this message delivered, the hitherto courageous attorney turned pale—he trembled—and from that moment his courage, like that of Bob Acres, would not abide with him; and the more the danger approached, the less of that indispensable quality did he seem to possess. When the antagonist arrived, every particle of bravery had departed from the attorney. He was put, in an awfully tremulous state, in his place, and when Mr. O'Gorman turned his back, for the purpose of measuring the twelve paces, the attorney thought of the lines of Hudibras, as to the practicability of a fugitive from one field of battle having the opportunity of beholding another—and a "fight" upon "another day" he determined upon. He moved quietly and deliberately at first; but when he had got about thirty yards from the starting-post, he hurried away in double-quick time, and finally made a run for it. The antagonist and his second looked on with surprise, as long as the attorney confined himself to a walk—when he trotted, they were astonished—but when he commenced galloping, they cried out in amazement—"Look! look! Mr. O'Gorman, there is your friend running away."

"Where?" said Mr. O'Gorman, turning round, and not believing any such thing was within the bounds of possibility.

"There, Sir—look at him—he is nearly a quarter of a mile off by this time."

Mr. O'Gorman put his glass to his eye, and exclaimed—"That is he, sure enough; and, upon my word, he is running as fast as a hare."

"Come, Sir," said the antagonist, in a great passion, "this is trifling. Is this a proper way to treat a gentleman?"

"Pray, may I ask why you direct that observation to me?" inquired Mr. O'Gorman.

"Because you have brought out your friend to give me satisfaction for the injury he inflicted on me; and I must have it from him, or from you."

"My friend," replied Mr. O'Gorman, "has run off, and will not give you satisfaction; I conceive it to be my duty to take his place, and you shall have it from me. Hand me a pistol."

Mr. O'Gorman immediately took a pistol from the hand of his antagonist's second, and desired the word to be given. A gentleman who knew Mr. O'Gorman and the opposite party, came forward at the moment, and observed to them both, that "it was absurd in the one to require satisfaction from a gentleman who had never injured him, and it was ridiculous in the other to expose his life for a person who had shown himself to be a coward, a poltroon, and a rascal."

"Let Mr. O'Gorman say so," observed his antagonist, "and I shall be satisfied."

"As long as I stand here, I will say no such thing," replied Mr. O'Gorman; "you have demanded satisfaction from me, and I am ready to give it."

"I find I have been too hasty," said the antagonist, "I withdraw the challenge which I gave you, and request you to quit that place. I shall leave it to your feelings as a gentleman, to say what you please of the individual who brought you out as his friend."

"In that case," replied Mr. O'Gorman, handing back his pistol, "I have not the slightest hesitation in saying, that my friend is the greatest rascal, poltroon, and coward in existence, and the first time I meet him, I shall horsewhip him."

This was a threat which Mr. O'Gorman would most assuredly have carried into effect if the opportunity for doing so had been afforded to him; but "his friend" left Dublin the next day, and never afterwards returned to it. Many years after this occurrence took place, Mr. O'Gorman, in alluding to it, added, with his usual good-nature—"After all, I am certain the attorney would have fought very well, and extremely like a gentleman, only that he had heard of those rascally silver bullets."

There are few men who mixed in public life in Ireland, whose career was more eventful than that of Mr. O'Gorman. He, in his time, had his escapes from "rope and gun," and was exposed to perilous accidents, both by "flood and field." In the year 1799, he was confined in the goal of Ennis, as a state prisoner, for five months; and during all that time he was not certain of his life for one half hour. At the time of his confinement, it was reported that the French had landed, and an immediate attack on the town was expected. The governor of the gaol, upon this rumour reaching him, ordered two soldiers into the room where Mr. O'Gorman was confined, with directions to shoot him through the head on hearing the slightest disturbance. At another time, he was led as a prisoner to Connaught, under the escort of a body of dragoons. Mr. O'Gorman was, unfortunately for himself, put upon a very spirited horse, which becoming alarmed at some trivial circumstance, ran away with its rider, and the gallant commander directed his soldiers to take the seeming fugitive "dead or alive." The men literally obeyed the command, and, as they could not overtake by pursuit the horse on which Mr. O'Gorman was riding, there was not a man in the troop who did not discharge his carbine after Mr. O'Gorman. In a short time, Mr. O'Gorman was, by main strength, able to rein in his horse, and he returned to the party in pursuit of him, for the purpose of remonstrating in the mildest terms with the officer on the precipitancy of his conduct. He was subsequently introduced to the English general commanding the army in the Connaught district, as "General O'Gorman, the commander-in-chief of the Clare rebels." That gentleman received him into his house, and treated him with the greatest kindness and attention—an incident worthy of remembrance, as being a contrast to the conduct pursued to every individual, in those evil times, who either were leaders, or supposed to be leaders of the insurgents.

In 1821, the farce of "Conciliation" placed in a prominent position together, two such men as Sir Edward Stanley, the Orange functionary, and Mr. O'Gorman, the secretary to the Irish Catholics. To see two such men embrace each other in public, was, after all, a ludicrous exhibition.*

* In looking to Thom's Irish Almanac, and Official Directory, (1847), for the purpose of ascertaining the whereabouts of Sir Edward Stanley and Mr. O'Gorman, I find that the former, who was a great official personage in the days of Orangeism, was then living in a £45 rated house in Great Brunswick-street, and that Mr. O'Gorman was the owner of a £50 rated house in Blessington-street, that he was also a queen's-counsel, and assistant barrister for the county Kilkenny. I remember the late prime minister, Lord Melbourne, once saying of him, publicly, in the House of Lords, that "Mr. O'Gorman was the honestest man he ever met with."

Evenings with the Poets.

GEMS FROM AMERICAN POETS.*

THE English language has acquired a vast dominion by being the vernacular of almost the entire of the great Transatlantic republic. Every year it is carried further over the vast continent of America, by the star-spangled banner of the United States. Considering the late period, in the world's history, in which America commenced her career as a civilised nation, it was fortunate for her that she had not to make her own language, but that she found one already perfected and enriched by the noblest productions of genius. When we say the English language, we speak of it as the language of Ireland as well as that of England; for, deeply as we deplore the loss of the beautiful Irish tongue, to attempt to revive it now, as the common language of the country, would be at once the most hopeless and useless project that was ever attempted. Let us not be mistaken, we would have every word of its lore, which has come down to us, carefully preserved—we would have it learned by as many of our people as could do so conveniently, because it would remind them that Ireland was once a nation; but to go farther than this we consider an Utopian dream at the best, and, at the worst, a ridiculous absurdity.

We would not compare the English with the polished Latin, or the more copious and beautiful Greek—those two glorious and immortal languages which are all that remain of the heroism of Athens, or the grandeur of Rome. We would not even compare it with the soft Italian, or with the voluptuous Spanish; but it is equal to its rugged relative, the German of fatherland, and infinitely superior to the French, which we firmly believe will be adopted by the magpies and parrots, if they should ever form a national language. Perhaps, therefore, in the lottery of languages, America fared as well as if she had made one for herself; and by adopting the English she has at once acquired, not indeed a national, but certainly a vast and splendid literature. No person can more fully or more heartily concur with Dr. Johnson—himself a giant—than we do, when he says, that if all the books in the world were to be destroyed with one exception, and he were asked which he would retain, his answer would be—Shakspeare. Of course he speaks only of literary books, and not of the inspired volume. What America, therefore, has to do, is to create a national literature, and to pay off some of her debts to the old world. In this, as in every thing else, she has gone pretty much a-head, to use what may be called an Americanism. Washington Irving is one of the most pleasing writers in the language, and Cooper is certainly amongst the greatest of our living novelists. That she has not yet produced any one who can be called a great poet is not perhaps wonderful, for centuries have passed in civilised nations without such a phenomenon being witnessed. There are, however, in America several persons who write as good poetry as their European neighbours. At the head of these, confessedly stands Bryant, from whose pen we insert two very beautiful poems. We have also great pleasure in introducing Perceval, Willis, Brainard, and Mrs. Hale to our readers. Of this poetry, and we mean the remark to apply to all that we receive from the other side of the Atlantic, we would observe that it is not so American as we would wish. We do not mean to impeach the patriotism of the writers, for in truth we sometimes think them quite patriotic and boastful enough, but we do accuse them of borrowing their descriptions from books written in the old world, instead of looking abroad upon their own glorious continent. Much of the American poetry might have been written by a person who had never set his foot upon her soil, and this is a great imperfection which we hope that future writers will avoid.

American poetry is characterised by a trait which is also found in our own early poetry, as well as in that of Italy, Germany, France, and Spain. A great deal of it is upon Scriptural subjects. We do not blame this, but he certainly must be a very adventurous bard who does not fear to tread in the steps of Milton, and of Dante, and who writes Hebrew Melodies after Byron, and Loves of the Angels after Moore. Blank verse also appears to be much more favoured than rythms. The first poem we insert is in this kind of verse, and is philosophical and very beautiful:

Thanatopsis.

To him who, in the love of nature, holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language. For his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty; and she glides
Into his darker musings with a mild
And gentle sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness, ere he is aware. When thoughts
Of the last bitter hour come like a blight
Over thy spirit, and sad images
Of the stern agony, and shroud, and pall,
And breathless darkness, and the narrow house
Make thee to shudder, and grow sick at heart—
Go forth into the open sky, and list
To nature's teachings, while from all sorrows—
Earth and her waters, and the depths of air—
Comes a still voice. Yet a few days, and thee
The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course. Nor yet in the cold ground,
Where thy pale form was laid with many tears,
Nor in the embrace of ocean, shall exist
Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim
Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again;
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix for ever with the elements—
To be a brother to the insensible rock
And to the sluggish clod, which the rude swain
Turns with his share and treads upon. The oak
Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mould.
Yet not to thy eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone; nor could'st thou wish Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulchre. The hills
Rock-ribbed, and ancient as the sun; the vales,
Stretching in pensive quietness between;
The venerable woods; rivers that move
In majesty; and the complaining brooks,
That make the meadow green; and, poured round all,
Old Ocean's grey and melancholy waste,
Are but the solemn decorations all
Of the great tomb of man. The golden sun,
The planets, all the infinite host of heaven,
Are shining on the sad abodes of death,
Through the still lapse of ages. All that tread
The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom. Take the wings
Of morning, and the Barcan desert pierce;
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound,
Save his own dashings; yet, the dead are there,
And millions in those solitudes, since first
The flight of years began, have laid them down
In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone.

So shalt thou rest; and what if thou shalt fall
Unnoticed by the living, and no friend
Take note of thy departure? All that breathe
Will share thy destiny. The gay will laugh
When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care
Plod on; and each one, as before, will chase
His favorite phantom; yet all these shall leave
Their mirth and their employments, and shall come
And make their bed with thee. As the long train
Of ages glide away, the sons of men,
The youth in life's green spring, and he who goes
In the full strength of years, matron and maid,
The bowed with age, the infant, in the smiles
And beauty of its innocent age cut off,
Shall, one by one, be gathered to thy side,
By those, who, in their turn, shall follow them.

So live, that, when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To the pale realms of shades where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

BRYANT.

Here is a very pretty poem of a very different stamp, but it speaks to the heart of every one.

The Light of Home.

My boy, thou wilt dream the world is fair;
And thy spirit will sigh to roam;
And thou must go; but never, when there,
Forget the light of home.

Though pleasure may smile with a ray more bright,
It dazzles to lead astray;
Like the meteor's flash, 'twill deepen the night,
When thou treadest the lonely way.

But the hearth of home has a constant flame,
And pure as vestal fire;
'Twill burn, 'twill burn for ever the same,
For nature feeds the pyre.

The sea of ambition is tempest tost,
And thy hopes may vanish like foam;
But when sails are shivered and rudder lost,
Then look to the light of home.

And there, like a star through the midnight cloud,
Thou shalt see the beacon bright;
For never, till shining on thy shroud,
Can be quenched its holy light.

The sun of fame, 'twill gild thy name;
But the heart n'er felt its ray;
And fashion's smiles, that rich ones claim,
Are but beams of a wintry day.

And how sad and dim those beams must be,
Should life's wretched wanderer come!
But, my boy, when the world is dark to thee,
Then turn to the light of home.

MRS. HALE.

The next we shall insert is a pretty hymn to the Virgin.

To the Virgin.

O HOLY Virgin, call thy child,
Her Spirit longs to be with thee;
For threatening, lower those skies so mild;
Whose faithless day-star dawned for me.

From tears released to speedy rest,
From youthful dreams which all beguiled,
To quiet slumber on thy breast,
O Holy Virgin, call thy child.

Joy from my darkling soul is fled,
And haggard phantoms haunt me wild;
Despair assails, and Hope is dead:
O Holy Virgin, call thy child.

HILLHOUSE.

Percival is, after Bryant, perhaps the most beautiful writer of poetry in America; the following is from his pen:

The Coral Grobe

DEEP in the wave is a coral grove,
Where the purple mullet and gold-fish rove,
Where the sea-flower spreads its leaves of blue
That never are wet with falling dew,
But in bright and changeful beauty shine,
Far down in the green and glassy brine.
The floor is of sand, like the mountain drift,
And the pearl shells spangle the flinty snow,
From coral rocks the sea plants lift
Their boughs, where the tides and billows flow.
The water is calm and still below,
For the winds and the waves are absent there,
And the sands are bright as the stars that glow
In the motionless fields of upper air.
There, with its waving blade of green,
The sea-flag streams through the silent water,
And the crimson leaf of the dulse is seen
To blush like a banner bathed in slaughter.
There, with a light and easy motion,
The fan-coral sweeps through the clear deep sea;
And the yellow and scarlet tufts of ocean
Are bending like corn on the upland lea.
And life, in rare and beautiful forms,
Is sporting amid those bowers of storm,
And is safe when the wrathful Spirit of Storms
Has made the top of the waves his own.
And when the ship from his fury flies,
When the myriad voices of Ocean roar,
When the wind-god frowns in the murky skies,
And demons are waiting the wreck on shore.
Then, far below in the peaceful sea,
The purple mullet and gold-fish rove,
Where the waters murmur tranquilly,
Through the bending twigs of the coral grove.

PERCIVAL.

Here is a poem on that stupendous phenomenon, the Falls of Niagara:

The Falls of Niagara.

THE thoughts are strange that crowd into my brain,
While I look upward to thee. It would seem
As if God poured thee from his "hollow hand,"
And hung his bow upon thine awful front;
And spoke in that loud voice, which seemed to him,
Who dwelt in Patmos for his Saviour's sake,
"The sound of many waters;" and had bade
Thy flood to chronicle the ages back,
And notch His cent'ries in the eternal rocks.

Deep calleth unto deep. And what are we
That hear the question of that voice sublime?
O what are all the notes that ever rung
From war's vain trumpets, by thy thundering side!
And yet bold babbler, what art thou to Him,
Who drowned a world, and heaped the waters far Above its loftiest mountains?—a light wave
That breaks, and whispers of its Maker's might.

BRAINARD.

"Saturday Afternoon" reminds us all of our dear school-boy days. Here is what N. P. Willis has to say on the subject:

Saturday Afternoon.

I LOVE to look on a scene like this,
Of wild and careless play,
And persuade myself that I am not old,
And my locks are not yet grey;
For it stirs the blood in an old man's heart,
And makes his pulses fly,
To catch the thrill of a happy voice,
And the light of a pleasant eye.

I have walked the world for four-score years;
And they say that I am old,
And my heart is ripe for the reaper, Death,
And my years are well nigh told.
It is very true, it is very true,
I'm old, and "I bide my time,"
But my heart will leap at a scene like this
And I half renew my prime.

Play on, play on, I am with you there,
In the midst of your merry ring;
I can feel the thrill of the daring jump,
And the rush of the breathless swing,
I hide with you in the fragrant hay,
And I whoop the smothered call,
And my feet slip upon the seedy floor,
And I care not for the fall.

I am willing to die when my time shall come,
And I shall be glad to go;
For the world at best is a weary place,
And my pulse is getting low.
But the grave is dark, and the heart will fail
In treading its gloomy way,
And it wiles my heart from its dreariness
To see the young and gay.

N. P. WILLIS.

This is one of Brainard's best description :

The Deep.

There's beauty in the deep :
The wave is bluer than the sky ;
And, though the light shine bright on high,
More softly do the sea-gems glow
That sparkle in the depths below,
The rainbow's tints are only made
When on the waters they are laid,
And sun and moon most sweetly shine
Upon the ocean's level brine.
There's beauty in the deep.

There's music in the deep :
It is not in the surf's rough roar,
Nor in the whispering, shelly shore—
They are but earthly sounds, that tell
How little of the sea-nymph's shell,
That sends its loud, clear note abroad,
Or winds its softness through the flood,
Echoes through groves with coral gay,
And dies on spongy banks, away.
There's music in the deep.

There's quiet in the deep :
Above, let tides and tempests rave,
And earth-born whirlwinds wake the wave ;
Above, let care and fear contend
With sin and sorrow to the end.
Here far beneath the tainted foam,
That frets above our peaceful home,
We dream in joy, and wake in love,
Nor know the rage that yells above.
There's quiet in the deep.

BRAINARD.

We have only room for one poem more. It is from the pen of Bryant.

A Noon Scene.

THE quiet August noon is come,
A slumberous silence fills the sky,
The fields are still, the woods are dumb,
In glassy sleep the waters lie.
And mark yon soft, white clouds, that rest
Above our vale, a moveless throng ;
The cattle on the mountain's breast
Enjoy the grateful shadow long.
Oh ! how unlike those merry hours
In sunny June, when earth laughs out,
When the fresh winds make love to flowers,
And woodlands sing and waters shout !
When in the grass sweet waters talk,
And strains of tiny music swell
From every moss-cup of the rock,
From every nameless blossoms bell !
But now a joy too deep for sound,
A peace no other season knows,
Hushes the heavens, and wraps the ground,
The blessing of supreme repose.

Away ! I will not be, to-day,
The only slave of toil and care ;
Away from desk and dust away !
*I'll be as idle as the air.

Beneath the open sky abroad,
Among the plants and breathing things,
The sinless, peaceful works of God,
I'll share the calm the season brings.

Come then, in whose soft eyes I see
The gentle meaning of the heart,
One day amid the woods with thee,
From men and all their cares apart.

And where upon the meadow's breast,
The shadow of the thicket lies,
The blue wild flowers thou gatherest
Shall glow yet deeper near those eyes.

Come—and when, 'mid the calm profound,
I turn those gentle eyes to seek,
They like the lovely landscape round,
Of innocence and peace shall speak.

Rest here, beneath the unmoving shade,
And on the silent valleys gaze,
Winding and widening till they fade
In yon soft ring of summer haze.

The village trees their summits rear,
Still as its spire ; and yonder flock,
At rest in those calm fields, appear
As chiselled from the lifeless rock.

One tranquil mount the scene o'erlooks,
Where the hushed winds their Sabbath keep,
While a near hum, from bees and brooks,
Comes faintly like the breath of sleep.

Well might the gazer deem, that when
Worn with the struggle and the strife,
And heart-sick at the sons of men,
The good forsake the scenes of life.

Like the deep quiet, that awhile
Lingers the lovely landscape o'er,
Shall be the peace whose holy smile
Welcomes them to a happier shore.

BRYANT.

A few Words about Quebec.

No succeeding impression can efface that which is made by a first approach to Quebec. The majestic St. Laurence, whose banks look like contiguous countries—the crowds of freighted vessels labouring upwards to enjoy a momentary suspension of their pilgrimages, and to send forth the countless wanderers who have no inheritance but hope ; the towns ranging along on either side in panoramic beauty—distance, while softening their outline, imparting to them a species of continuity; the churches, with their tin-plated spires and roofs glowing with the reflection of a Canadian sun—and the “great old woods” stretching away into the horizon, where they look the guardians of civilization or the ramparts round the domain where nature holds her primitive dominion. The entrance by water to Constantinople is not more magnificent nor more beautiful. * * * * “And a ha-a-alf” were the first words which we heard on awakening, which we did amid the infernal noises of swabbing and splashing, and heaving and hallooing—the latter from the less respectable ships which for a moment stood in our company. We made a hasty toilette and ran upon deck. Such a scene! The Unicorn, such was our steam ship named—and, by the bye, there is no more comfortable vessel nor more attentive master than the happy-faced and accomplished commander—the Unicorn was sailing through a small forest of masts; she curvetted, ran, backed, wound gently to the right, and again to the left. She seemed like a general on a tour of inspection through his subordinates. Cheers and salutes, jokes, nods of recognition, as if the wayfarers in the various ships had been old friends; music, mimicry, and all the forms which springing hopes assume after long depression, made the view around us full of excitement and interest. We passed the sailing vessels as if they were at anchor, consequently our contemplation of them individually should be brief. But we recollect one—it bore the personification of our national character. Seated on the fore-castle of an emigrant ship, and looking down upon a gathered crowd of his hapless countrymen, who smiled back upon his effort to enliven them in their wretchedness and dreariness of spirit, was a frieze-coated, knee-breeched, straw-hatted, stout looking son of our poor land, might and main playing on a jew’s harp. Alas, wretched people!—The ignorant misrule of centuries has sent them forth like the Scandinavians of old to fly “before the face of the robber,” with broken spirit and blasted character to earn the bread of sorrow from the interest of strangers. The forest vanishes before the sinewy arm of the “lazy” Alt; towns and cities rise like magic creations before the enduring toil of the “savage” Irishman; domestic security is enshrined in the faith of those whom home malice brands as the unprincipled enviers of property and position; and yet the thriving millions who stand redeemed from the opprobrium of selfish defamers, the demonstration of natural virtue and gross wrong, cannot protect their country from the reiteration of Anglican calumny which explains its own emaciating tyranny by aspersing its victims. There is a growth in nations to which the decline of bad government is commensurate. O’CONNELL saw it in the distance when he emblazoned upon his banner the resistless legend of “Peace and Order.” If no blight is invoked to paralyze or weaken her progress—

if no mistake anticipate or misdirect her growing energy—Ireland will soon “right her wrongs” by a power which never failed in its mission—the virtue which God crowns, operating upon the selfishness of which England is never oblivious.

Were we not pressed for time and space we should call attention to the wretched condition of the emigrants who periodically depart from our shores, and find a confirmation of their former misery in the sickness engendered by the voyage and the poverty which gripes them at its close. As it is, we shall only say that the havoc which death and infirmity often makes on board these receptacles of starvation, contagion, and carelessness, called emigrant ships, is sufficient to bring a curse upon the land that drives its progeny into such dire extremity. We shall yet, we hope, devote a paper to the subject of emigrant ships; and though humanity has done much to expose and ameliorate the condition of the passengers, we feel assured that much remains to be accomplished before half the evils are remedied, and to be written before half of them are known.

We would willingly commemorate the occasion which brought us into contact with some of the cleverest and wittiest, most humorous, intelligent and contemptible people we ever saw; but we have not the space. Of the last-mentioned class was—as of course should be—an officer in the queen’s service; and of the former, a young American, whom in all our wanderings we have never forgotten. He had left his great country filled with the prejudices of sectarian education, and travelled into Syria, Egypt, Greece, Italy, and England. Wondrous were the changes wrought by the relics of bygone days; they had—like the bones of a buried prophet—made him live a new life and a noble one. “The Nile’s dark waters” purified his soul: “St. Sophia” winged it for a flight to the home of a brighter intelligence than his college masters had ever pointed out; and the “lone mother of dead empires” raised her consecrated hand to draw aside the veil which passion hangs before the soul’s native vision. He returned a man—he had left simply an American. He spoke Italian, French, Latin, modern Greek, and knew a host of things beside. A stern republican, too, he was. We sympathised in many things, if not in our notions of government. Our views of England coincided—our admiration of nature, books, the St. Laurence, and our contempt of the “Officer of the Guards” all precisely equipoised one another. The officer wrapt in his cloak and in himself of an evening, or leaning over the rail, or lounging in the cabin during the day, looked horrors if any one came “between the wind and his nobility.” The American, who drank water with his toast for breakfast, and, disdained all “ardent liquors,” wine included, was therefore a most suspicious person to come near the supercilious epaulettes. In fact, we had been all wofully snubbed, and might have been to the end of the chapter, had not the gallant son of Mars met the name of our young traveller inscribed in a handsome volume of Dickens's "Humphrey's Clock." The book, or the name, or both, became a placative—the military man raised his eyes, and absolutely smiled—smiled not even condescendingly, but kindly—familiarly.

"This your's, sir, I presume?"

"Yes, sir."

And the American very quietly, in a most gentlemanlike way, just as if the official had been handing it to him, took his book and turned away. He snubbed the guardsman! Ever since we have liked the young fellow, and no wonder.

The young republican and ourselves stayed at the same hotel—it may be some week or ten days after we had parted with the "officer of the guards." Intending to visit Niagara together, our sight seeing was in common, and our roads of inquiry lay very generally in the same direction. My companions cloth cap, shirt-wristed, economically-cut summer frock, turned down shirt collar, and turned-up wristbands, as if he had only just left his own house, made him always look "quite at home;" another reason made ourselves pass rather unobserved, or, where observed, procured for us a cheerful welcome. Convents, places of public education, hospitals, colleges and churches were freely opened to our inspection, and kind priests and gentle nuns were our constant cicerones. Many discussions which had been during our brief voyage suspended through deficiency for reference, became renewed in the Canadian libraries, and we became every day more interested in the son of the "star-spangled banner." Every hour was filled with incident well worthy of remembrance and duly noted down. Anticipation was constantly freshened by the true enjoyments of soul.

We were alone in the evening—late. Having been to hear Braham—the veteran prince of tenor-singers—sing his glorious "Scots wha ha'e!" we were, in all probability, dreaming of the "days that are over," and, if any minstrelsy could unbury dead memories, Braham's appearance and voice, though changed, would draw back the veil from "the long faded glories" of the past.

A knock was given at our door, and the American's servant presents himself.

"Mr. ——— would speak to you for a moment, on business of importance."

"Very well."

In a few minutes we found ourselves in our new friend's bed-room. A sudden call from home had changed his route and deranged all the plans which we had been for two weeks concocting. We were not a little gratified—our self love to be sure—to contemplate the sensibility with which the announcement was made, and the regrets which accompanied it. Our young friend sat at his table, his tablets open, and the end of his pencil-case upon his lip.

"I sent for you, Sir, as I said, on a matter of importance to myself. We may not meet again. Your modesty cannot be offended by my request, and my conduct will not be affected by the restraint which might arise if our intercourse were frequent. I sent for you, then, to request that you would discover to me any defects of character which you may have noticed in me during our brief and very happy intimacy. I pledge my honour I shall correct them."

I was astonished, as well I might, less so however than if any man whom I had ever known should make the same request. It was the true outspoken language of a free mind that had determined upon approximating to the "image and likeness of God." I think the incident honorable almost to the nation of the young and handsome stranger, and a striking illustration of the energy which ever attains to greatness because ever worthy of it. We endeavoured to excuse ourselves—but excuse was vain and refusal impossible. The steady, self-prized republican noted down in his book, item by item, the results of lynx-eyed surveillance—no doubt increased by the pride of the censor and the position of patron in morals. Whatever may have been our defects, they were not those of carelessness. We almost wondered at our success in developing our views of weakness in our friend—weaknesses which we declare we had, in many instances, not thought upon before.

"Very well, Sir," said our companion, and he quietly clasped his aforesaid note-book, and placed it in his breast-pocket—"your lessons shall be remembered and my defects corrected, I promise."

In the course of this conversation, we learned that the young fellow had devoted himself to the stormy path of a political career; and never has there been a man who more earnestly entered upon a preparation for his country's well being. He had inherited some twelve thousand dollars a year; his age was somewhere about one-and-twenty, and, from his earliest recollections, he had longed for the hour of maturity, only because he should then be able to serve his native land. He had made a most respectable college curriculum—had spent much time abroad—lived on bread and water, animal food and cigars—was thoroughly imbued with the writings and spirit of the best English and French poets and statesmen; and now, at an age when folly leads its votaries in this pauperised province to curse, by their passions, the people whom they have beggared by their extravagance, his study was to make a GREAT PEOPLE more happy. Without adopting the mild theory of the fanatics of modern Ireland, we must say that free institutions are the parents of self-sacrificing patriotism and true manly dignity. We will not name the distinguished object of these remarks, but will just add that the hour in which, some two years subsequently, we saw him after a return from Russia (having determined upon making himself perfectly acquainted with trade and law before he opened his career) was one never to be forgotten. The casual knowledge of this one character solved every mystery connected with the majesty of the STATES OF AMERICA.

We shall not describe Quebec. Moored at the base of its mighty ramparts we called to mind "the glory and the chivalry" that bled for England's supremacy and for "la belle France." Wonderingly we wound around by the then narrow way which had been left after the falling in of a portion of the hill, and the destruction of much valuable property and more valuable life. The old part of the city had been traversed, and we began to enjoy the new. The "habitans" reminded us of an elder and purer day of French faith, morals, and natural character. The priests flitting by in their cassocks and broad-brimmed hats, ever running on their errands of mercy, told us we had lighted upon a stronghold of the "universal Church." The convents rising round us with their flashing minarets, and the churches, whose bells were just tolling the hour for the sacrifice which is offered "from the rising to the setting of the sun," warmed the heart with a ray of the world to come. We felt no surprise that "Quebec" is a household word to the heart of the Irish peasant.

We sought the earliest opportunity of obtaining an introduction to the archbishop, the Most Rev. Dr. Signay. His grace has all the simplicity and dignity of the ancient nobility of his fatherland. Every moment he won a sympathy, and bound you to him by a feeling that made you imagine yourself in the presence of a man whom you had fondly known. He unites intense labour with great piety, and extreme modesty with deep erudition, and is the idol of his clergy and of his people. England may govern his people by right—he does so himself in fact.

It is a beautiful sight to see Monseigneur, in the midst of his priests, in his little garden after his frugal meal. His sweet smile and ready observation—their affectionate bearing, brightened by respect, equally distant from fear and familiarity; the godliness which seeks the skies and the sunshine for its habiliments rather than the apprehensions of self love and the moroseness of pride—every quality which you may ambition or admire in a great dignitary, you may find in him. Our remembrance of his grace and his clergy are among the sweetest of our transatlantic reminiscences.

* * * * *

We find that we must pause midway. The "Canadian Question" and Canadian Catholicity are among the most instructive topics which could engage an Irish reader. We are compelled to suspend them.

We cannot better close than by the following statistics. They have been furnished by the most courteous man, and one among the most accomplished clergymen whom we have ever met, M. Cazeau, secretary to the archbishop:—

The diocese of Quebec originally comprised all North America, with the exception of the English colonies forming that portion now called New England, Mexico, and California. This territory was raised to an apostolic-vicariate in 1657, and to a diocese in 1674. The first titular was the Right Rev. Francis Montmorency Laval, of the illustrious house which bears that name.

Not long since, the diocese of Quebec comprised all the British colonies in North America; but now it is reduced to the districts of Quebec, the Three Rivers, of St. Francis, and of Gaspé, in East Canada. In 1844, it was made an archdiocese, whose titular has for suffragans, the bishops of Montreal, Kingston, Toronto, Bytown and Hudson's Bay. Since the establishing of the archdiocese, which is still of some extent, the following dioceses and vicariates have been formed of it:

1. Newfoundland—Raised to a vicariate in 1796, and to a titular diocese in 1847.
2. Kingston—Do. in 1826.
3. Charlotte's-town and St. Edward's—In 1829.
4. Montreal, East Canada—In 1836.
5. Toronto, East Canada—In 1841. This see is now vacant by the demise of its pastor, Michael Power, born at Halifax, Nova Scotia. His lordship died last summer of fever, caught while administering the consolations of our holy religion to some of his emigrated countrymen.
6. Halifax, Nova Scotia—In 1843.
7. Arichat, Nova Scotia—In 1845.
8. New Brunswick—In 1842.
9. Hudson's Bay—Raised to a vicariate in 1844, and to a titular diocese in 1847.
10. Origon—Made an apostolic-vicariate in 1843, and in 1846 an archdiocese, whose titular has for suffragans, the diocese Walla-Walla, and of Vanconoeur, created same year.
11. Bytown—erected in 1847. The Rev. Father Guignes, superior of the Oblat. missionaries of Mary, in Canada, shall be its first titular, and will be consecrated next month.

The diocese of Quebec contains 114 parishes, almost each of which possesses an elegant and spacious church. These parishes have been erected by the archbishop, who assigns their limits, and the civil authority confirms, nearly always, that which the ecclesiastical sanctions.

The diocese presents to the zeal of missionaries, a great many newly established localities called missions, in which thirty-two chapels have been built, while waiting to erect others, as the population may require. These churches and chapels are maintained by the piety of the faithful, and provided with everything essential to the divine worship.

His Grace, Joseph Signay, archbishop of Quebec, is assisted in his government of the diocese, by his Lordship, Piere Flacien Turgeon, coadjutor, cum futura successione, and by six vicars-general.

The inferior clergy is composed of 202 priests, twenty-four of these are employed in imparting classical and theological instruction; and the others in the direction of the parishes, hospitals religious communities, and the propagation of the faith among infidel savages.

A monastery of the Oblats carry on a most fruitful mission on the borders of the river Saguenay. The sciences, classics, and theology, are taught in the seminaries of the metropolitan, of Nicolet, and of St. Anne.

The Christian Brothers have established two flourishing houses, in Quebec and Three Rivers, and instruct gratuitously.

In virtue of the legislature, instruction is amply given to the people.

The Ursuline ladies have two establishments, in Quebec and Three Rivers, for the education of ladies; and the ladies of the Hospital-General of Quebec have a boarding-school to which numerous young females resort, to receive the advantages of a distinguished education.

Three hospitals are maintained by cloistered religions. The Hotel Dieu, the Hospital-General of Quebec, and of Three Rivers, by the Ursuline ladies.

A female academy is conducted by the ladies of the Congregation, who have a numerous school in the suburbs of St. Roch. This institution has four houses of education in the country in which young females are taught.

There are in the diocese, three uncivilized villages—the first, Ristigouche, is partly inhabited by the Inienas, the remainder being scattered through Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; the second, St. Francis, on the river of that name, contains the remains of the nation Abenakis; and Loretto (the third), seven miles from Quebec, is inhabited by the wreck of the great and brave Hurons who were so cruelly maltreated by the Iroquois. Three priests labour among these savages, who shall be, in a little time, savage but in origin and poverty, for their character, language, and customs, yield before those of the people with whom they are in daily intercourse.

The Propagation of the Faith was established in the diocese, in the year 1837, and united to the general work in 1843. Its yearly produce, more than £2000, are employed for the most part, agreeably to the assessments of the central councils of Lyons and Paris, in support of the missions of the diocese, particularly those made annually among the savages. Missions are yearly made among the savages of Santany, of Abbetibbe, and of Noose, on Hudson's Bay; the Fêtes de Boule, or Round Heads, to the sources of St. Maurice, nearly 500 miles, then among the Montagnais and the Naskassis, who inhabit the country north of the St. Laurence, and lower down than the Saguenay.

These stations that speak different dialects are the wreck of the great nation Algonquinus, so famous in the origin of the country, and who inhabited a great part of the north-west of North America.

The Irish emigrants who arrive yearly in Quebec, reach West Canada, or the United States, where they find a milder climate, and more in accordance with that of their native land.

In Quebec, the Irish Catholic congregation is numerous and respectable, and occupies four priests. Irish families have established themselves in twelve localities of the diocese, where they form the greater part of the population. Everywhere these brave Irish maintain a sacred remembrance of their unhappy country, and prove themselves attached to the faith of their ancestors.

*St. Peter's College, Agra,
January 28th, 1848.*

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,

I have the happiness to inform you that we have arrived safely at the end of our journey. Though it was very long and sometimes fatiguing, yet we have accomplished it without sickness or accidents of any description, and are now, as you may perceive from the heading of this letter, settled in his lordship's college. Our travelling from Bombay to Agra was very slow, continuing from the 21st of November to the 7th of January. The roads are in many places bad, and the mode of conveyance very indifferent. On some days we could not travel more than ten miles, owing to bogs or rivers. Sometimes we would be two or three hours in a bog-hole before we could extricate ourselves, and frequently we would be hours crossing a river. But we had nothing to fear by day or night. The natives would not injure us, and the wild beasts would be scared away with a light or a little fire. To make things more secure, however, we kept a gun and pistol near us, and Mr. Rodney always kept a sword belted at his side during the night. We met with many marks of kindness from several English officers, and were sometimes indebted to their kindness for a tent during the night. There are but few Catholics among them. We passed one station where there were about thirty, and as we had all the jurisdiction required, we remained three days with them, hearing confessions, the Catholics being too few to support a priest. They had not seen one for ten or twelve years, and many of them had not gone to confession since they left Ireland, which in some cases had been fifteen years. We met with a most fatherly reception from Doctor Borghi, who is to us a real father. He is everything that we were led to expect, and everything that we can desire. His new cathedral is really a grand building, equal, if not superior to any chapel in Dublin. The convent adjoins it, and contains about twenty-four nuns. They have under their charge about 120 children, all boarders. His new college will be finished against Easter, and will accommodate 300 at least. It is, I think, 400 feet long and 40 broad. The present college only accommodates thirty boarders, so that many of the Catholic children attend Protestant schools. These he wishes to accommodate in the new house, and expects to have Protestant children too. He destroyed their female school within the last two years, by the convent school, and he anticipates the downfall of their academy as soon as his college is finished. Mr. Rooney and myself were conducted to the present house last week by the two bishops, and installed in our respective positions. Our entire time is to be devoted to the instruction of youth, having no missionary duty to perform. Only a sermon every Sunday in our turn is expected from us. There is attached to the house another priest, and two English teachers. We have as yet, but three students intended for the Church, the other children are for the world. The most of our pupils are of Irish parents. Many of them are of dark complexion. Some are Portuguese, some French, and we have even two Armenians. The present college is in a beautiful situation, on the banks of the Jumna, a little distance from the town, and surrounded by two large gardens. The celebrated Targe is on the opposite side of the river. Adjoining our college is one belonging to the Bramins, but they do not in any way molest us. We see them every day, as our house is on higher ground. As we are two miles from the cathedral, the bishop sends for us on Sunday to assist at the cathedral, and to spend the day with him, he has all the neighbouring priests that day to dine with him, and he talks to them all in their several languages with fluency—the French, Italian, and English; he is also acquainted with the Hindoostanee, Persian, and Russian languages. The ceremonies are conducted with great exactness in his cathedral; on every Sunday there is a solemn mass; after the gospel an English sermon, and at the close of mass one in the native language. On week-days there is a sermon every morning in Hindoostanee, for native Christians. The church is provided with a set of joy-bells which toll every hour; also with an organ and two pianos, to assist the choir. The children here have sweeter voices than those at home, and in general have a good taste for music. The priests here all belong to some religious order, and all wear their habits in the discharge of their duties. We follow the Roman Breviary, and are permitted to recite the matins, &c, after two o'clock, as usual. There are but few conversions among the natives lately. It is very hard to make good Christian, of the old people, so his lordship is lending his entire strength towards the education of the children. Those in high offices are very much prejudiced against us, but the bishop is fully able for them. He has succeeded lately in obtaining salaries for the military chaplains, to the amount of about £120 a-year each, notwithstanding all their opposition. I am sure you will be glad to hear that Mr. Rooney and myself are as happy as possible; we almost imagine we are in Drumcondra yet, we live so retired, occupied in a great measure, only with our studies, and a few classes, and a sermon every fortnight. I trust that all the superiors of the college are in good health, especially the Rev. Mr. Moriarty, whose health I hope is perfectly established. I suppose you have provided successors to fill our vacant places in the college, if so, tell them they have nothing to fear from the long journey, and they will not be sorry for adopting Agra for their future home. Wishing you a happy new year, and desiring to be remembered to the Rev. Mr. Moriarty, and the other superiors of the college,

I remain, Reverend and dear Sir,

Yours very truly and affectionately,

NICHOLAS BARRY.

*St. Peter's College, Agra,
February 1st, 1848.*

MY DEAR FRIEND,

You may recollect, before we separated at Drumcondra, a mutual promise to be correspondents for the future. To fulfil my part of the engagement, I had, while at Bombay, commenced a letter to you, but had not time to finish it; so I deferred it till my arrival in Agra.

I hope you do not find this year as lonesome as you feared; in any case it will soon be over. You may see from the heading of this letter, our present situation in Agra. We are nothing less than professors, having scarcely any other duty outside the walls of the college. India is a country which I am sure you will like, when you shall have been accustomed somewhat to the ways of the people, and to their extraordinary habits. The present season is delightful, like April in Ireland as to the degree of heat, but like Autumn on account of the ripe fruits, and the green leaves of the trees.

Agra is a venerable old town; it is all built of brick and cut stone; it is crowded with Hindoo temples, and with mosques, and is, perhaps, the centre of idolatry in India. It is more like an European city than Bombay, or any other I have seen while travelling through the country. There is an immense fort, which is strongly garrisoned; but the most beautiful piece of architecture is the Targe, built by the Mussulmen over the tombs of their princes. It is the most splendid building in India, and, perhaps, the richest in the world, as the interior is marble, inlaid with jewels and precious stones. The people here are far more civilized than we imagined: we have nothing at all to apprehend from them. They give us the salaam, as they call it, when we are passing them. There is far less notice taken of us here than there would be in Dublin, were we to appear in the same dress. We always wear the soutane and cap, even when out riding (you must know we have a fine young horse for recreative purposes), but as Mr. Rooney does not fancy riding, his lordship is to purchase for him a small car, called here a buggy. As to our duties, they are not too oppressive. There is another priest in the college, and two English teachers. We devote four hours each day to class; the remainder of the time is at our own disposal. We preach every Sunday in turn at the cathedral, and this is our only duty outside the college. We have plenty of time for study, and a little society of our own, without interruption. We do not pay any visits, as it is against the custom of the clergy here, nor are we troubled with many. Mr. Rooney never studied half so hard. He is seldom in bed before eleven, and we rise at half-past five. We have not followed, as yet, the custom of the clergy here, in wearing long beards, nor do I think we will—shaving is not of great trouble to us, as there is a barber attached to the college. I have had no direct news from the Madras men yet, but I saw a letter which was written by a Madras priest, to one of our nuns, in which he speaks of their arrival, and of the appointments of Messrs. Gough and Riordan. I am in daily expectation of a letter from Mr. Doherty. If Madras be as fine a place as Agra, you will not be sorry for having adopted India as your future country.

We stopped a fortnight at Bombay, with Dr. Miguel, the vicar-general, and were sorry for leaving it so soon. There was a great deal of kindness shown to us by the good people of that place. Tell Mr. Mackesy that his relations are all well, and his two little cousins are about coming to Agra for their education. They were very anxious to keep us in Bombay. An Irish priest there would have something to do. We had a solemn mass for Doctor Fortini, last week. He died a short time after our departure. While in Bombay, I saw him often, and spent my last night there in his house. I suppose Dr. Whelan will now return to Bombay. It is a fine mission, very rich, but a great deal to be done. The last few days we remained there, we had not a single moment to spare from hearing confessions. We had a convert while there—a Miss Forbes, who kept a Protestant boarding-school in the city.

The English and Irish live in great splendour in India, and are far more formal than the people at home. They are more exact about their caste than even the natives themselves. The man who has a few rupees a-month more than his neighbour, would scarcely invite that neighbour to his table. You seldom see an European on foot; he has either his palanquin, his horse, or his carriage, with a retinue of servants. They do not like even to go to the same side of the chapel with the natives. In our cathedral there is one wing for the natives solely. The Protestants are more prejudiced here than even at home. They can allow nothing to pass. They are continually carping at the bishop's new establishment. But it is not much wonder, for the pupils of the female Protestant school have nearly all left it, to be educated at the convent, and his lordship expects the boys' school to share the same fate, as soon as our college shall have been prepared. As an instance of what these people are capable of doing, I will mention one fact. On the opening of the convent school, some hundreds of copies of Maria Monk were procured, and industriously circulated amongst the people. But it would not do; people are too wise now-a-days to heed such trash: their school has gone down, and ours is flourishing beyond expectation. We read in the newspapers of the great distress at home, and are most anxious about the issue. We expect to hear of rebellion or something dreadful by the next post. We have two London papers here for our own use—The Tablet and The Times; so that we have all the news about home, and both sides of the question. There is no paper worth reading in the north of India. The Delhi Gazette publishes everything against us, and will receive nothing in our favour, and the Agra paper is a mere list of publications; there is the Catholic Herald in Calcutta, however, and it contains plenty of news. We get it every week. I have not heard a single word from any of my fellow-students, or a word about them, since I saw you; I will therefore, be most anxious to hear from you. Hitherto, while travelling, I have had so much care and anxiety on my shoulders that I have scarcely been able to think of them at all, but now that I am again leading a studious, retired life, I often think of my old friends.

Yours, most sincerely and affectionately,

NICHOLAS BARRY.

THE

Life and Death of Oliver Plunkett,

PRIMATE OF IRELAND.

PART VI.

THE 5th May, 1681, in Easter Term, Dr. Oliver Plunkett was arraigned at the King's Bench bar, for high treason, for endeavouring and compassing the king's death, and to levy war in Ireland, and to alter the true religion there, and to introduce a foreign power; and at his arraignment, before his plea, he urged for himself that he was indicted for the same high treason in Ireland and arraigned, and at the day for his trial the witnesses against him did not appear; and therefore he desired to know if he could be tried here for the same fact. The Court told him that by a statute made in this kingdom, he might be tried in the court of King's Bench, or by commission of Oyer and Terminer in any part of England, for facts arising in Ireland; and that his arraignment there (he being never tried upon it) was not sufficient to exempt him from being tried here; because till a trial be passed and there be a conviction or acquittal thereupon, an arraignment, barely, is no plea; for in such cases the party is put twice in danger of his life, which only is the thing the law in such cases looks after to prevent. He then desired time for his witnesses, which they told him he could not do till after plea pleaded; whereupon he pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon the country for his trial. And after some consideration had about time to be allowed him to bring his witnesses from Ireland, the Court appointed the day for the trial to be the first Wednesday in next term, which was full five weeks time.

Accordingly, on Wednesday, the 8th of June, in Trinity Term, he was brought to his trial; and proclamation, as in such cases is usual, being made, it proceeded thus:

Clerk of the Crown—Oliver Plunkett, hold up thy hand; those good men which thou shalt hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between, &c.

Plunkett—May it please your lordship, I have been kept close prisoner for a long time, a year and a-half in prison: when I came from Ireland hither I was told by persons of good repute, and a counsellor-at-law, that I could not be tried here; and the reasons they gave me were, that first the statute of Henry VIII., and all other statutes made here, were not received in Ireland, unless there were an express mention of Ireland in them: so that none were received there but such as were before Poyning's Act. So I come with that persuasion that I could not be tried here, until at my arraignment your lordships told me it was not so, and that I must be tried here, though there was no express mention made of Ireland. Now, my lord, upon that, whereas my witnesses were in Ireland, and I knew nothing of it, and the records upon which I very much rely were in Ireland, your lordship was pleased to give me time from the fourth of the last month to this day; and in the mean time, as your lordship had the affidavit here yesterday, and as Captain Richardson can testify, I have not dispatched only one, but two to Ireland, into the counties of Armagh, Dublin, &c., where there were records very material to my defence; but the clerk of the crown would not give me any copy of any record at all, unless he had some express order from your lordship. So that whether it were that they were mistaken or wilfully refused, I could not get the records which were very material for me. For in some of those records, some of those that accuse me were convicted of high crimes, and others were outlawed and imprisoned, and broke prison; and there were other records, also, of excommunication against some of them, and I could not get the records unless your lordship would instruct me, in some way or other, how I could get over them that are most material for my defence. The servants that I sent hence, and took shipping for Ireland, were two days at sea and cast back again, and from thence were forced to go to Holyhead, and from Holyhead in going to Dublin they were thirteen or fourteen days, the winds were so contrary; and then my servant went about to go into the counties of Armagh and Derry, that were one hundred miles from Dublin and Meath and other places: so that in so short a time, my lord, it was morally impossible for them to have brought the witnesses over; and those that were ready to have come would not stir at all unless they had a pass from hence, because some of them were Roman Catholics, and they had heard that here some were taken prisoners that were Roman Catholics, and that none ought to come without a pass; and they being witnesses against the king they might be clapped up here and brought into very ill condition; so they sent one over that made affidavit.

Lord Chief Justice (Sir Francis Pemberton)—It was the affidavit that was read here yesterday.

Plunkett—So that, my lord, I conceive your lordship will think I did it not out of any intent to put off my trial; for Captain Richardson is here, who knows that I writ by the post and desired them to come over to the Captain, after they were landed; so that I depended upon the wind and the weather for my witnesses, and wanted your lordship's order for the records to be brought over, and that their examination might be brought into court, and their own original examination here might be compared with it. So I humbly beg your lordship's favour, the case is rare, and scarcely happens in five hundred years, that one should be in my circumstances. I am come here, where no jury knows me, nor the quality of my adversaries. If I had been in Ireland, I would have put myself upon my trial to-morrow, without any witnesses, before any Protestant jury that knew them and me. And when the orders went over that I should be tried in Ireland, and that no Roman Catholic should be on the jury, and so it was in both the grand and other jury; yet there when I came to my trial, after I was arraigned, not one appeared. This is manifest upon the record, and can be proved.

Lord Chief Justice—There was no prosecution of you there.

Plunkett—But, my lord, here is no jury that knows me, or the quality of my adversaries; for they are not a jury of the neighbourhood that knows them, and therefore my case is not the same with other cases. Though I cannot harbour, nor will not, nor ought not, the least conceit of hard measure or injustice, yet if I had not full time to bring my records and witnesses all together, I cannot make my defence. Some were there then, some far off, so that it was a miracle that in six or seven counties they could do so much as they did. But they got in seven or eight of them, yet there were five or six wanting. Therefore, I beseech your lordship, that I may have time to bring my records and witnesses, and then I will defy all that is upon the earth, and under the earth to say anything against me.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you, Mr. Plunkett, it is in vain for you to talk and make this discourse here now; you must know that by the laws of this kingdom, when a man is indicted and arraigned of treason and felony, it is not usual to give such time; it is rare that any man hath had such time as you have had—five weeks time to provide your witnesses: if your witnesses are so cautious, and are such persons that they dare not, or will not venture for fear of being apprehended, or will not come into England without such and such cautions, we cannot tell how to help it; we can't furnish you with witnesses, you must look to get your witnesses yourself. If we should stay till your witnesses will come, perhaps they will never come here, and so you will escape out of the hands of justice. Do not be discouraged in this, the jury are strangers to you, peradventure, but they are honest gentlemen, and you shall have no others upon your jury; and you may be confident that if there be not some fact proved against you that may amount to treason, you shall be discharged; there are persons that understand so much, and we will direct them so much. You shall have as fair a trial as if you were in Ireland; but for us to stay for your witnesses or send you back to Ireland, we cannot do it. Therefore you must submit to your trial. We heard your affidavit yesterday, and we did then tell the gentleman that moved it, as much as we tell you. You are here to be tried, look to the jury, and except against them if you will.

* From the State Trials, vol. viii.

Plunkett—My lord, I desire only to have the favour of some time, some time this term.

Lord Chief Justice—We can't do it.

Clerk of the Crown—Swear Sir John Roberts.

Plunkett—I humbly present this to your lordship, I am then in imminent danger of my life, if I cannot get ten days to have my witnesses over; I desire I may have but to the 21st of this month, and then, if they do not come, you may go on.

Lord Chief Justice—We cannot do it, you have had five weeks time already.

Plunkett—I desire but a few days.

Clerk—Sir John Roberts take the book, look upon the prisoner; you shall well and truly try, &c.

Plunkett—My lord, I desire to know, whether they have been of the juries of Loughorn, or the five Jesuits, or any that were condemned.

Lord Chief Justice—What if they have? That is no exception.

Then the jury was sworn whose names follow: Sir John Roberts, Thomas Harriot, Henry Ashurst, Ralph Hunknall, Richard Goure, Richard Pagett, Thomas Earsby, John Hoynes, Thomas Hodgkins, James Partherict, Samuel Baker, William Hardy.

Clerk of the Crown—Oliver Plunkett, hold up your hand. You of the jury look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his charge.

"He stands indicted by the name of Oliver Plunkett, late of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, doctor in divinity, for that he is a false traitor against the most illustrious and most excellent prince and sovereign lord, Charles II. by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, and his natural lord, the fear of God in his heart not having, nor weighing the duty of his allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, from the cordial love, and true and due natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, do and of right ought to bear, utterly withdrawing and contriving, and with all his might intending the peace and common tranquillity within the kingdom of Ireland, as also of this kingdom of England, to disturb, and war, and rebellion against our said sovereign lord, the king, in the kingdom of Ireland, that being the dominion of our said sovereign lord the king, in parts beyond the seas, to stir up and move, and the government of our said sovereign lord the king, there to subvert; and our said lord the king, from his royal power and government, there to depose and deprive; and our said sovereign lord the king, that now is, to death, and final destruction to bring and put; and the true worship of God within the said kingdom of Ireland, by law established and used, to alter for the superstition of the Romish Church. The first day of December, in the reign of our sovereign lord, Charles the Second, now king of England &c.; the two-and-thirtieth, and divers others days and times, as well before as after, at Dublin, in the kingdom of Ireland, in parts beyond the seas, with divers others false traitors unknown, traitorously did compass, imagine, and intend the killing, death, and final destruction of our said sovereign lord the king and the ancient government of this said kingdom of Ireland aforesaid, to change, alter, and wholly to subvert; and him our said sovereign lord the king, that now is, from the crown and government of his kingdom of Ireland aforesaid, to depose and deprive, and the true Protestant religion to extirpate, and war and rebellion against the said sovereign lord the king there to move and levy. And to fulfil and accomplish his said most wicked treasons, and traitorous compassings, imaginations and purposes aforesaid, he, the said Oliver Plunkett, the said first day of December, in the above said two-and-thirtieth year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, in parts beyond the seas, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously did assemble and gather together himself, with divers other traitors unknown, and then and there devilishly, advisedly, maliciously, subtly, traitorously did consult and agree our said sovereign lord the king, that now is, to death, and final destruction to bring, and from his crown and government aforesaid to depose and deprive, and the religion of the Romish Church into the kingdom of Ireland aforesaid, to introduce and establish. And the sooner to fulfil and perfect his said most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes, he, the said Oliver Plunkett with divers other false traitors unknown, then and there advisedly, maliciously, and traitorously did further consult and agree to contribute, pay and expend divers great sums of money to divers subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, and other persons unknown; to procure them, the said persons unknown, our said sovereign lord the king that now is, traitorously to kill, and the Romish religion into the said kingdom of Ireland, to introduce and establish. And that the said Oliver Plunkett, and other traitors unknown, afterwards, to wit, the said first day of December, in the two and thirtieth year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king aforesaid, at Dublin aforesaid, in the kingdom of Ireland aforesaid, within the dominion of our said sovereign lord the king, with force and arms, &c., unlawfully, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously did receive, collect, pay, and expend divers great sums of money to divers persons unknown, the said false traitors in their treasons to help and maintain, against the duty of his allegiance, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, that now is, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statutes in that case made and provided.

To this indictment he pleaded Not Guilty.

Mr. Heath—May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is an indictment of high treason against Dr. Oliver Plunkett, the prisoner at the bar; and it sets forth, that in the two-and-thirtieth year of the king, at Dublin, in the kingdom of Ireland, he did compass and imagine the death of the king, and to deprive the king of his kingdom of Ireland, and to raise war to extirpate the Protestant religion in the kingdom of Ireland, and to establish the Romish religion there. And it sets forth further; that for the accomplishment of these treasons, the defendant with several others did meet together at several places at Dublin in the kingdom of Ireland, and elsewhere, and at these several meetings did consult and agree to put the king to death, to raise war, to extirpate the Protestant religion, and set up the Romish religion. And the indictment further sets forth, that to accomplish these treasons, the defendant did raise great sums of money in the kingdom of Ireland, and did get several persons to contribute several sums for these treasons, and that the defendant with others did disburse several sums of money to several persons to persuade them and entice them to be aiding and assisting in these treasons and to recompense them for them. To this indictment the defendant hath pleaded Not Guilty. If we prove these things you are to find him guilty.

Serjeant Maynard—My lord, we will quickly come to the evidence, But, in short, you have heard his charge is as high as can be against the king, and against the nation, and against all that is good. The design and endeavour of this gentleman was the death of the king, and the destruction of the Protestant religion in Ireland, and the raising of war; and to accomplish this we charge him, that there was a confederacy made, assemblies and consultations had to these ends and raising money to accomplish it. Gentlemen, Dr. Plunkett was made as we shall prove to you, as they there call him, Primate of Ireland; and he got that dignity from the Pope upon this very design. He did by virtue of that power, which he thought he had gotten, make out warrants, significations, I know not what they call them, to know how many men in Ireland could bear arms from sixteen to sixty; he raises taxes upon the people and the clergy there. But, my lord, the particulars will best fall from the witnesses that we shall call and prove it by, and we need not make any aggravation; for such a thing as this cannot be more aggravated than it is.

Attorney General (Sir Robert Sawyer)—May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, the character this gentleman bears as primate, under a foreign and usurped jurisdiction, will be a great inducement to you to give credit to that evidence we shall produce before you. We shall prove that this very preferment was conferred upon him upon a contract that he would raise 60,000 men in Ireland, for the pope's service, to settle popery there, and to subvert the government. The evidence that we shall give you will prove how it leads to destroy the king; and, I take it according to the resolutions that have been, to raise war in the kingdom, and to introduce a foreign power, will be certainly evidence of an attempt and machination to destroy the king. As soon as he was in possession of his primacy he goes about his work. There are two great means necessary to be provided, men and money: for men, having this great spiritual jurisdiction, whereby, indeed, all that are under it are become slaves, he issues out his warrants to all the clergy of Ireland, to give an account and make return from the several parishes, and all the men in them above fourteen and under sixty. And returns were accordingly made by them, that he might accordingly take a measure what men to pick out for the service. The next thing was money, my lord; and your lordship takes notice that when the mind is enslaved the purse nay all the body bows to it. He issues out his warrants to his clergy to make a collection of money; in all parts great sums were levied, and, when they were levied, we shall give you an account by our proofs that several sums were issued out and sent into France to further the business. There was also provision made of great ammunition and arms; and we shall prove in particular several delivered out by this gentleman's order, to carry on this thing; and to go through stich with this business, he takes a view of all the several ports and places in Ireland where it would be convenient to land; for they were to have from France an auxiliary force, and upon this view he pitched upon Carlingford as the place. We shall prove the several correspondences between Rome and him, and France and him, and several messengers employed, and monies issued out from time to time for their maintenance. This will be the course of our evidence; and we will begin first with some that do not speak so particularly to this doctor, but prove there was a general design in all parts of the kingdom of Ireland to bring in the king of France, and extirpate the Protestant religion. And then we shall call the particular persons to the particular parts against him. First we shall call Florence Mac Moyer* (who was sworn).

Solicitor General—Are you sworn, sir?

Mac Moyer—Yes, sir.

Solicitor General—Pray give the court and the jury an account of what you know of any plot in Ireland, to introduce the Romish religion, or to bring in the French king.

Mac Moyer—Yes, I know there was a plot both before Plunkett's time and in his time; for it was working in the year 1665 and 1666, but it was brought to full maturity in the year 1667. For then Col. Miles Rely (O'Reilly) and Col. Bourne were sent to Ireland from the king of France, with a commission to muster as many men as they could, promising to send an army of 40,000 men with a commission, upon St. Lewis's day in August next, following†, to land in Carlingford, to destroy all the true subjects, to destroy the religion as it was established there, and to set up the French king's authority and the Roman Catholic religion. And one Edmund Aryle, that was a justice of the peace and clerk of the crown, sent for all the rebels abroad in the north to come up into the county of Longford, and they marched into the head town of the county, and fired the town; the inhabitants fled into the castle: then they came up to the gaol thinking to break it open, and by setting the prisoners free to join then with them; but there Aryle was shot—received a deadly wound, and dropt off his horse—and they fled. So then, when they were without the town, one Charles Mac Canal alighted and took away all the papers out of his pocket; which if they had been found would have discovered all‡. This occasioned Col. Bourne to be suspected; and being so suspected he was taken prisoner and turned to Newgate in Dublin. Then Col. Rely fled away again to France, and the plot lay under a cloud during the life of Primate Rely (Edmund O'Reilly), the prisoner's predecessor. This Primate Rely died beyond sea. Then many of the Popish religion would have had the primacy conferred upon one Duffy,§ but the prisoner at the bar put in for it; which might have been opposed if the prisoner had not engaged and promised that he would so manage affairs that before the present government were aware he would surprise the kingdom, provided the Pope and king of France would send a competent army to join with theirs for the effecting of it. So the first year of his coming over I was in the friary at Armagh; I was an acquaintance of the friars, and they invited me; and one Quine told the prisoner that they thought Duffy would have been primate. Said he, it is better as it is; for Duffy hath not the wit to do those things that I have undertaken to do; meaning that he did undertake to supplant the Protestant religion to bring in Popery and put the kingdom under subjection to the king of France.

Solicitor General—How do you know that?

Mac Moyer—Those were the words, and the meaning I knew before, because I had heard it talked of.

Lord Chief Justice—Who was the first of these primates you speak of?

Mac Moyer—Edmund Rely; he set this business on foot first.

Lord Chief Justice—About what?

Mac Moyer—About calling the rebels together out of the north when they came to Longford.

Lord Chief Justice—What year was that?

* I have already stated that this witness is called Wyer in the State Trials. He was a layman and keeper of the book of Armagh.

† It is the 25th of August.

‡ If they had been found, of course they would have proved everything. It would not, however, have been in this instance a legal fiction to have carried out the axiom, "de non existentibus et de non apprenitibus idem sit judicium;" for from the character we have already given of the witnesses, it is manifest that no such documents ever existed.

§ This was Dr. Duffy, a most excellent man, who was appointed Bishop of Clogher some time after Dr. Plunkett had been made primate. He is, of course, an entirely different person from Duffy, the Franciscan friar, who was one of the witnesses against the primate.

Mac Moyer—It was in 1667.

Lord Chief Justice—When died he?

Mac Moyer—He died a little while afterwards.

Lord Chief Justice—Then Duffy would have it conferred upon him?

Mac Moyer—Yes, after Rely's decease he would have it conferred upon him; and there was a contention between him and the prisoner, who did engage he would bring things to that full maturity, that before the present government were aware he would do the work.

Lord Chief Justice—How do you know this?

Mac Moyer—I know this because I had an account of it from certain school-fellows that were with me in Ireland, then studying in Rome; they wrote this to me desiring I would take a good heart with the rest of my countrymen, and assuredly in a short time the kingdom would be relieved, and the Irish restored to their former patrimonies.

Lord Chief Justice—This you speak of their information. What do you know of your own knowledge?

Mac Moyer—All that I know is, he coming into the friary of Armagh.

Lord Chief Justice—About what time?

Mac Moyer—It is either ten or eleven years ago, and there was a fast then, and I was invited by the friars, being their acquaintance; one Quine, one of the friars, told him——

Lord Chief Justice—Told whom?

Mac Moyer—The prisoner, that he did expect Duffy would have been primate; but the prisoner made answer, it is better as it is, for Duffy had not the wit to manage the things that I have undertaken for the general good of our religion.

Lord Chief Justice—Now tell me this: what things were those he had undertaken? Did he explain himself?

Mac Moyer—No farther than those words: but I did conceive this was his meaning; because I knew partly of it myself, knowing of the former plot.

Lord Chief Justice—I ask you only what words came from him; and you say they were that Duffy had not the wit to manage what he had undertaken for the general good of their religion.

Mac Moyer—Yes, and then again, in his assembly kept by him, he charged his inferiors to collect such several sums of money as he thought fit, according to the several parishes and dignitaries, to assist and supply the French forces when they came over.

Lord Chief Justice—How know you that?

Mac Moyer—I have seen the money collected; and I have seen his warrant, "subpena suspensionis," to bring it in, to redeem their religion from the power of the English government. Again there were those rebels that went to Longford——

Lord Chief Justice—What time were those collections?

Mac Moyer—Nine years, eight years, seven years ago, and the last year of all.

Lord Chief Justice—Then it was several times you say?

Mac Moyer—Yes, and he procured the Macdonnells a piece of money out of the exchequer, pretending to do good service to his majesty; but he sent them for France, meaning they should improve themselves, and bring themselves into favour with the king of France, and come over with the French king to surprise Ireland. This one of the rebels told me. So I have seen the prisoner's letter directed to the grand tory Flemming, desiring that they should go to France and he would see them in spite of all their enemies in Ireland safe ashore; and Flemming should return again a colonel to his own glory, and the good of his country.

Attorney General—Do you know his hand?

Mac Moyer—Yes, as well as my own. I have seen Captain O'Neal, son of General O'Neal, coming every year into Ireland and carrying three regiments to the French king into France; and he used to come over to Ireland every year to get a recruit; and he did get my brother to go with him, and so much importuned me that I could hardly withstand him: but I did not yield to his desire. He told me it was to improve me for my good, to improve myself in military discipline; and then I should return to Ireland a captain under the French king to surprise the kingdom and settle the popish religion; and then I should be restored to my estate.

Lord Chief Justice—Who told you this?

Mac Moyer—Captain O'Neal. And, in the meanwhile, says he, I hear Dr. Plunkett is the only man intrusted in Ireland to make these preparations, and get things ready against the French king's coming, who is to land at Carlingford.

Attorney General—How often were you in the Doctor's company?

Mac Moyer—Not very often?

Plunkett—I never saw him with my eyes before in my life.

Mac Moyer—I have seen him in the priory the first year that he came over to Ireland; and you know the meetings held at George Blyke's house in the Fives; and I have seen him in his own house.

Justice Dolbein—How came you to know the prisoner's hand?
Mac Moyer—Because I was well acquainted with his hand, seeing his hand among the priests.

Justice Dolbein—Did you ever see him write?

Mac Moyer—Yes, in the priory and in his own house.

Justice Dolbein—How often?

Mac Moyer—Not often.

Justice Dolbein—How often?

Mac Moyer—Ten or a dozen times. I should know his hand from all the writing in London, if it were among never so many; let me but see it, I will know it.

Lord Chief Justice—Have you ever heard him own himself primate?

Mac Moyer—Yes, my lord, he writes himself, "Oliverus Armacanus Primas et Metropolitanus totius Hiberniæ"—that is his style.

Lord Chief Justice—Who did he say made him primate?

Mac Moyer—The pope, my lord.

Lord Chief Justice—Have you heard him say so?

Mac Moyer—Yes, I heard him discourse of it in the priory.

Attorney General—He was a public officer, and they might well know his hand.

Lord Chief Justice—I believe any body that hath seen us write but a little would soon know our hands.

Mac Moyer—His hand is as well known over Ireland as mine is among my acquaintance.

Lord Chief Justice—Well, go on.

Mac Moyer—During the time of his imprisonment, I have received his commands to many of his inferior dignitaries, commanding them "subpena suspensionis," to bring in the monies assessed for bringing in the French army; and that there was no better time than the time of his imprisonment to bring it in.

Lord Chief Justice—Who were they, you say, that were commanded "subpena suspensionis"?

Mac Moyer—Since his taking, I have seen in the time of his imprisonment his commands to his inferior dignitaries, not to be forgetful of the monies that were assessed towards the supplying of the French army; and that there was no better time to bring in the French than when he was in prison.

Lord Chief Justice—How long ago was that?

Mac Moyer—The 1st of February, 1679. The second and last of it was in July and November last.

Lord Chief Justice—And this was to bring in the money?

Mac Moyer—Yes, to supply the French army. And that there was no better time than during his imprisonment, and they should not be so much suspected.

Lord Chief Justice—And these mandates you have seen under his hand?

Mac Moyer—Yes, I have, my lord.

Attorney General—What do you know of his summoning or issuing out these warrants for lists of men?

Mac Moyer—I have not seen any of the warrants; but the priests have told me they were commanded by his warrants, to let him know how many there were in all their parishes from sixteen to sixty.

Attorney General—You say you never saw the mandates?

Mac Moyer—No, I did not.

Serjeant Jeffries—What do you know about the prisoner's viewing the ports?

Mac Moyer—I have seen him going about from port to port; to Derry, to Carrickfergus, Corily, Down, and Carlingford, and all about.

Serjeant Jeffries—When he went to take a view of those ports, can you tell to what purpose he did it?

Mac Moyer—Yes, I heard it among the church, that he went on purpose to view the sea ports, to know the strength of all the garrisons, to see which was the most convenient way to bring in the French army.

Serjeant Jeffries—Did you ever speak with the prisoner at the bar about his going?

Mac Moyer—No.

Serjeant Jeffries—What place did he pitch on as most convenient?

Mac Moyer—Carlingford.

Attorney General—Were you in the prisoner's company when he viewed the ports?

Mac Moyer—I have seen him go to and fro; I did not go all the circuit round with him.

Plunkett—Did you ever see me at Carlingford?

Mac Moyer—No.

Plunkett—Did you ever see me at any other of the ports?

Mac Moyer—I have seen you at Hamilton's, coming back from Derry. Do you not remember that you lodged at Sir Geo—

Plunkett—I never lodged there in my life.

Sir Francis Withins—Have you anything more to say concerning the plot in general?

Mac Moyer—No, in general, I have not.

Serjeant Jeffries—He hath not only given an account of the general plot, but fixed it upon the prisoner.

Attorney General—Dr. Plunkett, will you ask him any questions?

Plunkett—You say you remember you saw me at my first coming as primate, ten years ago; and that you were at the priory when I was there?

Mac Moyer—Yes.

Plunkett—You were invisible to me.

Lord Chief Justice—If you will ask any questions do; but do not make these kind of observations.

Plunkett—Tell me this, why did you not acquaint some justice of the peace then with what you knew, that which you had heard seven years ago?

Mac Moyer—When I first knew it, I was as willing to have it concealed as they.

Lord Chief Justice—What is your question, Dr. Plunkett? Pray tell it us.

Plunkett—He says, my lord, that ten years ago I had such a design in hand, and he knew the money was collected for these very ends, and he knew of the design from that same Captain O'Neal whom I employed and sent abroad; and that I had a design to bring in the French at Carlingford, and went about to all the ports in Ireland and pitched upon that as the most convenient; and yet it is so inconvenient for the bringing in a foreign force, that any one that knows any thing of the maps of the world will easily conclude it otherwise. But I say, my lord, why did he not tell some justice of the peace that I was upon such a design, but let me live in Ireland ten years after, and never speak of it till now?

Lord Chief Justice—What say you to the question?

Plunkett—When he saw me all the time, and to the time of my taking prisoner and never said one word; for I was a prisoner six months only for my religion,* not one word of treason spoken of against me for so many years; why did not he acquaint some justice of the peace with it before.

Lord Chief Justice—What religion were you of then?

Mac Moyer—I was a Roman Catholic.

Plunkett—And are you not so now?

Mac Moyer—Yes, I am so.

Justice Dolbein—Therefore it will be no wonder that you did not discover it.

Serjeant Jeffries—But I ask you why did not you discover it all this time?

Mac Moyer—Because I was a papist myself: the first that did discover it, he and I did consult about it, I had him charged to do so, and I had set him to work; but he was ill paid for having discovered it: you got him to be trepanned, that he hath gone in danger of his life for it.

Plunkett—Who is the man?

Mac Moyer—Moyer.†

Sir Francis Withins—Call Henry O'Neal (who was sworn) What know you of any design in Ireland to introduce the Popish religion?

O'Neal—In August, 1678, bishop Tyrrel‡ came with forty odd horsemen to Vicar-general Brady's house and alighted at the door; and he gave them there an oath, which they took willingly and freely, from hand to hand, to forward the Popish plot against the Protestant religion, to make an end of them all in an hour, from end to end of Ireland; and said he I will come, within ten days, with an order from the lord Oliver Plunkett; and you need not be afraid for the lord Oliver Plunkett and I have sent some gold and money into France to get men and bring them from France over sea, and do not fear; this will go on in one hour through all Ireland, from end to end. In September, 1678, a little while after the same meeting, I was in a place which they call Virginia, in

* This clearly proves what we have already stated against Ardekin, Haris, De Burgo, &c., that the primate was apprehended for exercising his clerical functions.

† This was Friar Mac Moyer, or Moyer. What Florence Mac Moyer alludes to here is this: when Friar Mac Moyer returned to Ireland in 1680, after having given evidence about the Popish plot, before the king and privy council and the parliament, he was seized, tried, and convicted, at Dundalk, of having supplied the Tories, robbers, and rebels with powder and shot. He would have been hanged but for the interference of the bishop of Meath and the Earl of Shaftesbury.

‡ Bishop Tyrrel had lately succeeded Dr. Duffy in the see of Clogher.

the county of Connaught,* where they took a priest, he is here, and he was with me, and desired me to come up to Dublin and discover this, and then I did discover it to Sir John Davis, which is all that I can say. For this Plunkett, I never saw him in my life.

Mr. Jones—You were a Papist then?

O'Neal—Yes, I was.

Mr. Jones—Are you a Roman Catholic still?

O'Neal—Yes, I am.

Mr. Jones—And were you acquainted with these orders?

O'Neal—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice—How came you to know of this oath?

O'Neal—I was in the house with them; I was one concerned to take my oath with them, and I durst not but take the oath.

Lord Chief Justice—Had you the oath of secrecy given you?

O'Neal—Yes, and so this priest commanded me to go along to Dublin and discover it.

Sergeant Jefferies—What is his name?

O'Neal—John M'Leigh.†

Sir Francis Withins—Do you know any other transactions about the plot?

O'Neal—No, I will not swear, for all the world, more than I know.

Sir Francis Withins—Then call Neile O'Neal (who was sworn). What do you know of any designs carrying on in Ireland against the government and the Protestant religion?

N. O'Neal—I will tell you all I know; I was at Vicar Brady's house, the 21st of August.

Lord Chief Justice—What year?

N. O'Neal—1678. And bishop Tyrrel came with 40 horsemen to the house, and went into the house and discoursed a little while; and they took their oaths every one round, to keep secret the plot to destroy the Protestant religion and the Protestants, that they might have their estates again. And he said they did not need to fear; for said he you have a very good man to assist you, and that is the Lord Oliver Plunkett, and you need not fear but it will go through all Ireland.

Attorney General—Will you ask him any questions?

Plunkett—Why did you not discover it before?

Sergeant Jefferies—Were you a Roman Catholic at that time?

N. O'Neal—Yes, and am so still.

Mr. Paget (jurymen)—I desire he may be asked how he came to be there?

Lord Chief Justice—You say, I think, this was at Vicar-general Brady's, how came you to be there?

N. O'Neal—I was there several times before that; for my nurse or my foster mother (I do not know which, you may understand best) was housekeeper to him.

Lord Chief Justice—Were you required to take the oath?

N. O'Neal—No, my lord, I was acquainted in the house; I had been there two or three weeks before.

Plunkett—Why did you not tell it to some justice of the peace?

Lord Chief Justice—He was a Papist, and so he is now.

N. O'Neal—There were many there that were wiser than I, that did not discover it.

Lord Chief Justice—How old are you?

N. O'Neal—I believe about twenty-two years old.

Lord Chief Justice—And this was but in 1678.

Attorney General—Swear Owen Murfey (which was done). Come, what say you?

O. Murfey—Mr. Edmund Murfey discovered the plot; he went to our lieutenant-Baker and did discover the plot to him, that there was a design to bring in the French.

Lord Chief Justice—Speak out aloud; I cannot hear you.

O. Murfey—All I know is from Mr. Edmund Murfey—

Lord Chief Justice—What do you know of your own knowledge?

O. Murfey—Mr. Lieutenant Baker told me that he did hear of the French.

Lord Chief Justice—Speak what you know yourself.

O. Murfey—If it please your lordship, this is more; I saw that evidence that Edmund Murfey did produce in Ireland, when he was sent to the gaol there; but without trial or anything.

Attorney General—Then swear Hugh Duffy (which was done). Speak loud, and tell my lord what you know of this plot and the prisoner: you know the prisoner, do not you?

Duffy—I know him? yes, I know him well enough.

Lord Chief Justice—What say you more of him?

Duffy—My lord, I say I have seen this Dr. Oliver Plunkett raising several sums of money to carry on this plot; sometimes 10s. per annum, sometimes 20s.

Solicitor General—Of whom?

Duffy—Of all the priests in Ireland; of every priest according to his pension and parish.

Lord Chief Justice—In all Ireland?

Duffy—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice—And towards the proceedings of the plot?

Duffy—It was given to his agent which was at Rome, and for carrying on the business.

Attorney General—How came you to know this?

Duffy—I was servant to Dr. Duffy, who was infinitely beloved by this man. He was father confessor to the queen of Spain. There was nothing that happened between them but I was by all the time.

Lord Chief Justice—Were you chaplain to him?

Duffy—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice—You are a Papist, then?

Duffy—Yes.

Attorney General—This man is a friar, my lord.

Lord Chief Justice—Were you in the company with them?

Duffy—Yes I was.

Lord Chief Justice—What did pass there?

Duffy—About the plot; how they could confirm the plot: and this man Plunkett said he could prevail with the king of France, and the other with the king of Spain.

Attorney General—Pray acquaint my lord particularly when this was, and in what place, and what they said?

Duffy—It was in 1673, 74, and 75, at his own house and at . . . * he kept three or four Jesuits there, and a matter of a hundred priests.

Attorney General—What passed in the company?

Lord Chief Justice—Who else was there?

Duffy—The discourse, my lord, was always about the plot, how they could contrive the matter between them; and so they did conclude afterwards to raise so much money upon several priests, all the priests in Ireland, sometimes 20s. sometimes 40s.

Lord Chief Justice—A-piece, do you mean?

Duffy—Yes.

Attorney General—What discourse had they about the French at any time?

Duffy—Yes, a hundred times; he talked several times that he did not question but he should prevail with the king of France not to invade Spain; and I have seen his letter to Cardinal Bouillon, to expostulate with him about the king of France, why he should wage war with the king of Spain who was a Catholic, but rather should come and redeem Ireland out of its heretical jurisdiction.

Attorney General—Did you see the letter?

Duffy—Yes.

Attorney General—Why do you know his hand?

Duffy—Yes, I know it as well as I know my own; I know it if there were a thousand papers together.

Attorney General—And what was the import of it, pray?

Duffy—That Cardinal Bouillon should prevail with the king of France not to invade Spain; and the contents of the rest of the letter were, that he did admire he should not rather wage war with the king of England, who hath been an apostate, and help their poor country that was daily tormented with heretical jurisdiction.

Attorney General—How came you to be in France? Were you employed?

Duffy—I went to France to live there in a convent.

Plunkett—Did Cardinal Bouillon show you my letter?

Duffy—Yes.

Plunkett—What year?

Duffy—1667.

Attorney General—Pray Sir, you were speaking of raising money—

Duffy—Yes.

Attorney General—Did you see any precept about it?

* There is an omission here, but the whole story is the grossest falsehood. That the poor primate who had never above £60 a-year, who lived in a little cottage in which was a room not seven feet high, which he used for a library, should have an establishment in which he kept "Three or four Jesuits and a hundred priests, for the purpose of hatching a plot," is so outrageously absurd that one can only wonder how any court could continue to listen to a swearer who paid as little regard to probability as to truth itself.

* Virginia is in the county of Cavan, and province of Ulster. It is needless to point attention to the absurdity and impossibility of what this witness means. He gives no evidence against the primate, "whom he never saw in his life." It is wonderful how he escaped when Sir John Davis transported the witnesses of the plot, sent to Dublin by Murphy. Probably he never saw Sir John.

† He is called M'Clave by the primate, in his speech at Tyburn.

Duffy—Yes, I have seen several precepts; I was curate to one Father Murfey; and while that man was with Dr. Oliver Plunkett and other Jesuits, I did officiate in his place, and he sent his letters to me to raise 40s. and 20s. a time, several times.

Lord Chief Justice—You, yourself?

Duffy—Yes.

Attorney General—What for?

Duffy—It was to send to Dr. . . . * who was at Rome.

Attorney General—Did you send any money that you know of?

Duffy—Yes,

Attorney General—Tell what time you gave the money yourself?

Duffy—In 1673, 74, 75.

Attorney General—Where?

Duffy—At his own dwelling-place, at—

Justice Jones—Of what quality was the prisoner amongst you?

Duffy—He was primate of all Ireland.

Justice Jones—Under whom?

Duffy—Under whom? Under the pope.

Justice Jones—How do you know he was so?

Duffy—We had it in his writings.

Lord Chief Justice—Did he style himself so in his letters?

Duffy—Yes, if he wrote but to the least man in the country, he would write "Oliverus Armocanus, primos totius Hiberniæ."

Lord Chief Justice—And so you always understood him?

Duffy—Yes.

Attorney General—Were you present at any of the general consultations or meetings?

Duffy—Yes, I was.

Attorney General—What number might meet at that time?

Duffy—Five hundred men and women.

Attorney General—Where was this?

Duffy—At Cloud's.†

Attorney General—What was the occasion and design of that meeting?

Duffy—Confirmation from the bishop.

Attorney General—And what was done there besides?

Duffy—The second thing was, that the gentlemen of the three counties should conclude together about this matter.

Lord Chief Justice—About what?

Duffy—About joining the French and Spaniards together.

Justice Dolbein—Where was that meeting?

Duffy—In the County of Monaghan.

Justice Dolbein—Was the prisoner there?

Duffy—Yes, he was the chief man.

Lord Chief Justice—When was this?

Duffy—In 1671, to the best of my knowledge.

Justice Dolbein—Were you there yourself?

Duffy—Yes.

Attorney General—What was the transaction of that day, besides the sacrament of confirmation?

Duffy—It was agreed that the gentlemen of Armagh, Monaghan, and Connaught,‡ should join together; and then they went into a private council to get a list of all the officers that were in the last rebellion, and those that lost their estates.

Attorney General—How do you know that? Did you go into the consult?

Duffy—Yes, I was in the same consult myself, and was as willing to proceed in the matter as any one in the world.

Lord Chief Justice—Where was this?

Duffy—Within two miles of Clouds (Clones), at one Father . . . house.

Lord Chief Justice—Was that at the time when there were so many persons met? Pray speak again what was done there besides confirmation?

Duffy—Why they were withdrawn aside into a garden, some stood up, and some sat down; and Oliver Plunkett stood in the middle of them all as a prelate, and every one kneeled down before him and kissed his hand.

Attorney General—What was then said?

Duffy—Then they did consult and gave special order to some of them to get a list of all the officers in the late rebellion, and that lost their estates, and that they should be more forward than others to proceed in that wicked design.

Lord Chief Justice—What was that design?

Duffy—To destroy all the Protestants together.

Attorney General—Was it to mingle the Irish and Spanish and French army together?

Duffy—Yes, it was.

Attorney General—Did you hear the prisoner speak about it?

Duffy—Yes, and he made a special mention there, concerning our own faith and religion.

Attorney General—Was there any mention of money at that time?

Duffy—It was that every man of them that could dispose of money, should provide some for those gentleman that would soon come into Ireland.

Sergeant Maynard—Who were those gentleman?

Duffy—The French army and the Spanish army together.

Attorney General—Were you at any other meeting?

Duffy—No.

Attorney General—After he was taken, do you know of any order he sent out to gather money?

Duffy—Yes, at the assizes of Dalkeith;* I think it is June two years ago he was apprehended—

Attorney General—Indeed he was first apprehended as a very busy Papist.

Duffy—I have seen two or three several orders to raise money for the same purpose; and that it was the only time to bring the matter to an end, when he lay in gaol himself.

Attorney General—Was that the effect of the letter?

Duffy—Yes, and that the French and Spanish kings should take the advantage that now offered whilst he was in prison.

Justice Jones—You say some money was sent to Dr. Cray?

Duffy—Yes.

Justice Jones—To what end?

Duffy—To comply with this design.

Justice Jones—Where was that Dr. Cray?

Duffy—He was at Rome; he was made a bishop there.

Attorney General—Who employed him there?

Duffy—This man employed him always.

Lord Chief Justice—What was his name?

Duffy—Cray.

Justice Jones—You say some of the priests paid 20s., some 40s.?

Duffy—Yes.

Justice Jones—Did the lay-gentry agree to pay nothing?

Duffy—I don't know for the gentry.

Lord Chief Justice—But I think you paid something yourself?

Duffy—Yes, I paid for two or three years myself.

Lord Chief Justice—And that was for the design?

Duffy—Yes, for the French and Spanish army, and all the purposes together.

Attorney General—What do know you of any precept to be given in of all sorts of persons of such an age?

Duffy—I gave a list of the age of every person from sixteen to sixty.

Attorney General—By whose order?

Duffy—By his order.

Serjeant Jefferies—To whom did you give it?

Duffy—To Dr. Plunkett.

Serjeant Jefferies—That is, to the prisoner?

Duffy—Yes, out of my own precinct.

Attorney General—Had you had any order from him?

Duffy—Yes, it was directed to the parish priest, and I being curate in his place, received the order.

Sir F. Withins—To what purpose was it?

Duffy—To know what men in Ireland were able to bear arms.

Justice Jones—What was the number contained in your list?

Duffy—250.

Justice Jones—What, in one parish?

Duffy—Yes.

Serjeant Jefferies—What was the parish's name?

Duffy—Coghan.†

Attorney General—Do you know anything of his going to view the ports?

* Dundalk is here meant. The primate was not taken at the assizes at all, nor in June, but in December, and as this was notorious the Attorney General gives the witness a hint not to commit himself. He also states the cause of his first apprehension which, as will be observed, is the same as that mentioned by the primate himself.

† The real name of this parish is Fohart, as I have already stated. It is situated near Dundalk, in the county of Louth. He was also Duffy's curate in Killeavy, at another period.

* The person whose name is here omitted, was Dr. Creagh (Cray) who had been the agent of the Irish bishops in Rome. They had not any agent however, in Rome as the primate states on the trial, for seven years previously, because they were not able to support one. Dr. Creagh was bishop of Cork, and afterwards translated to Dublin.

† This ought to be Clones, in the county Monaghan, where the primate confirmed in 1671. There was then no bishop in Clogher, as Dr. Duffy was not appointed until shortly afterwards.

‡ As already stated, this ought to be the county of Cavan in Ulster.

Duffy—I accompanied him to Carlingford.

Attorney General—Did you.

Duffy—Yes, in person I did.

Sergeant Jeffries—What did he say?

Duffy—He went round about the place where some of the custom ships come in; there was a great castle there near the sea, and he went to view the place, but could not get a boat. And there was a great talk of Carlingford to be one of the best havens in Ireland; there was no great garrison at the place, and any ship might come to the gates of the town, and surprise it, being a little town.

Attorney General—What did he conclude upon that?

Duffy—That he might get the French army to land safely there.

Attorney General—What do you know of delivering any ammunition and arms?

Duffy—He did send some of this money to get ammunition and arms into Ireland.

Plunkett—You say you were Murfey's curate: can you show me such institution as you say came to you to raise money?

Duffy—I could have brought them but thought it needless.

Plunkett—Can you name any other person I received money from?

Duffy—I have seen your paper of the county of Monaghan.

Plunkett—Have you seen any of them pay any money?

Duffy—Yes, I have seen twenty of them pay money.

Justice Dolbein—Why, are you acquainted with this man. Are you not Mr. Plunkett?

Plunkett—My lord, I believe I have seen him?

Justice Dolbein—Don't you know he was chaplain to bishop Duffy?

Plunkett—No, I never was in his company.

Sergeant Jeffries—Pray tell him what time of the year it was that you were at Carlingford?

Duffy—It was at the end of 1677 and the beginning of 1678.

Attorney General—Pray, if you can recollect, was you once or twice or twenty times in his company?

Duffy—As I am a Christian, I have been a hundred times in his company? And when you were creating priests, you would always send for me to be present; and I wonder how the man should forget himself.

Plunkett—I do not say I have not seen him, or that I am a stranger to the man; but in the company of bishop Duffy I never saw him, nor I never sent him orders to pay any money; and if he did pay any money he might show the order.

Sergeant Jeffries—If he did pay any money you did ill to take it.

Attorney General—Pray let him have fair play to ask any questions.

Solicitor General—Tell how you came to remember that you saw him at Sir Nicholas Plunket's.

Duffy—Dr. Duffy did send me to Sir Nicholas Plunket's, and I met Dr. Plunkett as I was coming out of the city. I had been half a year at the Spanish ambassador's, and he sent me for Ireland again, and then I lived at the convent in Dublin; and then when I knew that he would come to town I went to Rings-end, where the ships came in, to meet him.

Plunkett—You say you were with me at my house?

Duffy—Yes.

Plunkett—If you were you were invisible: but I ask you, why did you not tell this to some justice of the peace?

Justice Dolbein—Good Mr. Plunkett, he tells you he was as willing to forward it then as you.

Lord Chief Justice—How came you now to change your mind?

Duffy—I went into France in 1677, and I was not there a year altogether; but when I have seen how the poor people were brought into such slavery by the French king, I thought of it and had rather the devil should reign over us than the Frenchman.

Justice Dolbein—He gives you a very good, rational account why.

Duffy—I have been at Sir Nicholas Plunket's, where there fell some variance about something this man had done to Father Duffy. Says bishop Duffy, I might have had you drawn and quartered if I were as ill a man as you; and I might have been primate of Ireland if I would have undertaken those things that you undertook. Upon that, says Sir Nicholas Plunket, What is that? Why, it was said, it was to raise 60,000 men in Ireland at any time whenever the French or the Spanish king should wage war with England, Scotland, and Ireland. And this man did confess before my face, to Father Duffy, that it was not only to exalt himself but all the Romish clergy and all the gentry that had lost their estates.

Plunkett—Mr. Duffy, one word with you: is not this out of malice to me for correcting some of the clergy?

Duffy—You had nothing to do with me, for I was a friar.

Attorney General—Swear Edmund Murfey (which was done). Tell your whole knowledge of Dr. Plunkett and of the Irish plot.

Murfey—May it please you, my lord, I was one of the first discoverers of this plot; but of nine witnesses I have but one in town.

Lord Chief Justice—Well tell your own knowledge.

Murfey—Now I beg your lordship, as to Dr. Plunkett, that you will respite it till next term; I could bring ten witnesses.

Attorney General—Do you speak your own evidence?

Murfey—I refer it to the king and council what evidence I have given.

Lord Chief Justice—Do not trouble yourself, be directed a little. You are here now to speak what you know concerning any treasons or any other matters against the king, done by Dr. Plunkett; speak your own knowledge, for as to the other witnesses we do not call you.

Murfey—If I be called in question for this evidence—

Attorney General—Come, Sir, you have been at the Spanish ambassador's lately, answer my question; have you ever been with Dr. Plunkett in Ireland?

Murfey—Yes, Sir.

Attorney General—Have you ever heard him own himself primate of Ireland?

Murfey—Yes, titular primate.

Attorney General—Under whom did he claim that authority? Under the king or under the Pope?

Murfey—I think he could not be under the king at all.

Attorney General—Under whom then?

Murfey—It must be either the king or the Pope.

Lord Chief Justice—Answer me directly, did he claim to be titular primate under the Pope?

Murfey—I suppose he did.

Lord Chief Justice—Was he reputed generally so to be?

Murfey—Yes, my lord.

Attorney General—Mr. Murfey remember what you swore before the grand jury: pray recollect yourself whether that be true, and tell all.

Lord Chief Justice—You are upon your oath, you must speak the truth and the whole truth; you must not mince or conceal anything.

Sergeant Jeffries—Were you sworn before the grand jury?

Murfey—I was sworn before the king and parliament.

Sergeant Jeffries—Did you give in any evidence to the grand jury?

Murfey—Yes I did.

Sergeant Jeffries—Was that you swore before the grand jury true, upon your oath?

Murfey—I can't say but it was.

Sergeant Jeffries—Repeat it; tell my lord and the jury what it was, and tell the truth.

Murfey—I have forgot it.

Attorney General—Why then I would ask you a little; you remember I was by, and it is no laughing matter.

Murfey—You will find it so.

Attorney General—What do you know of any orders issued by Mr. Plunkett to raise money from the priests?

Murfey—I know there were orders, and I took the orders myself in my hand.

Attorney General—From whom had you those orders?

Murfey—From another and not from him.

Attorney General—Under whose hand were those orders?

Murfey—They were from the primate.

Attorney General—Did you see any order under Plunkett's hand for raising money?

Murfey—No, but under the vicar-general's, by his authority, as I suppose.

Attorney General—Upon your oath did you not swear before the grand jury that you saw the orders under his hand?

Murfey—No, I did not, or I was mistaken, for it was only by his direction.

Attorney General—Pray had you any converse with Oliver Plunkett about the raising of the money?

Murfey—Oliver Plunkett about the raising of the money?

Attorney General—Yes, that is a plain question.

Murfey—It was about other matters I conversed with him?

Attorney General—But did you converse with him about money?

Murfey—No, not about money.

Attorney General—Upon your oath did you converse with him about bringing in the French?

Sergeant Jeffries—Declare the truth, come.

Lord Chief Justice—Come don't trifle; what discourse have you had with the prisoner about raising of money or bringing in the French? Either of them, sir?

Murfey—I know this, if the Duke of York and Duke of Ormond had proceeded according to their intentions it was a general expectation, at the same time, that all the French and Irish would come and fall upon the English nation, as I understood.

Lord Chief Justice—Pray answer the question directly: you must not come and think to trifle with the court, you must speak the truth, you are sworn to it. You must not come to quibble and run about to this and that, and t'other, but answer directly, have you had any discourse with the prisoner about orders for raising of money in Ireland?

Murphy—Yes, I have seen orders from his vicar-general for the raising of money.

Lord Chief Justice—Hath he owned them to be by his direction?

Murphy—Not before me, but others he has.

Attorney General—Have you seen any money paid to him?

Murphy—To whom?

Attorney General—To Plunkett?

Murphy—To the vicar-general I have.

Lord Chief Justice—But to Plunkett.

Murphy—None to Plunkett.

Lord Chief Justice—Have you had any discourse with him at any time about the raising of money which the vicar-general gave order for?

Murphy—I have had discourse with the vicar-general.

Lord Chief Justice—Sir, don't trifle; have you had any with him?

Murphy—Yes, I have had some discourse with him.

Lord Chief Justice—Tell me what this discourse was?

Murphy—I think it was about this: if the Duke of York and the Duke of Monmouth fell out together, that he had some men to raise about the matter, and if the Duke of Monmouth would raise the Protestant religion—

Attorney General—You see he hath been in Spanish hands.

Lord Chief Justice—Were you a Protestant, sir?

Murphy—No, I am a priest.

Sergeant Jeffries—This to seek yet.

Murphy—I am indifferent whether I be a Protestant or priest.

Attorney General—My lord, he is a priest in orders, and so hath acknowledged himself.

Murphy—Yes, I am a priest, but it makes me forget myself to see so many evidences come in, that never knew Plunkett.

Lord Chief Justice—Sir, you refuse to answer those questions that we put to you here.

Murphy—What I said before the parliament I answer punctually.

Lord Chief Justice—You are asked questions here and produced as a witness; will you answer directly or not?

Murphy—Yes, I will.

Lord Chief Justice—Then let me hear what discourse you had with the primate Plunkett concerning any money raised by him or his vicar-general.

Murphy—May it please your lordship, first of all I did not impeach primate Plunkett, but the officers and justices of the peace.

Justice Jones—Had you any discourse with him, yes or no?

Murphy—That he should find so many Catholics in Ireland if the Duke of York and the Duke of Monmouth fell out.

Justice Jones—Why it plainly appears what you drove at, at first, to put off his trial if you could.

Lord Chief Justice—The Papists in England have been at work with you.

Sergeant Jeffries—I perceived this gentleman was very busy looking upon his hat, I desire he may be searched, if he have no paper about him.

Attorney General—Mr. Solicitor and myself heard the evidence he gave before the grand jury.

[Then he went out of the court, and would scarce be persuaded to come back again.]

Attorney General—We both heard him, and he gave the fullest evidence, much fuller to all instances and particulars of this high treason, much fuller than Duffy, to the grand jury. Afterwards, about three weeks ago, the trial coming on, he ran off, and lay hid; I took a great deal of pains to find him out, and sent messengers about; at last I heard he was got to the Spanish ambassador's, I sent and they spied him in the chapel; but the Spanish ambassador's servants fell upon the messengers and beat them, the ambassador was first sent to about it, and his excellency promised that he should be brought; and when he was found, he told me but the last night, that all he had sworn before the grand jury was true, and he was ready to make it out again.

Lord Chief Justice—And now he says he knows not what he said then; pray take notice of that.

Murphy—I told the grand jury this, that my lord Plunkett had a design to get 60 or 70,000 men in Ireland if the Duke of York and the Duke of Monmouth should fall out.

Attorney General—Did you tell a word of that to the grand jury?

Murphy—Yes, Sir, or I was mistaken.

Attorney General—Not one word of that did he then say.

Lord Chief Justice—Do you own this man, Dr. Plunkett, to be of your religion?

Sergeant Jeffries—Do you know this Seeker?

Plunkett—He says himself he is indifferent to be a Protestant or a Papist.

Sergeant Jeffries—I will only try you by one question more, for you are sought out, and, it may be, you may be found: do you know how many men he was to raise in Ireland? remember what you said to the grand jury.

Murphy—70,000 men.

Lord Chief Justice—What were they to do?

Murphy—For establishing, if occasion should be—

Sergeant Jeffries—Establishing, establishing what?

Murphy—Of the Romish religion.

Sergeant Jeffries—Well, so far we have got 70,000 men to establish the Romish religion: what, was Plunkett to do this?

Murphy—As far as I understood.

Justice Jones—And you understood it by himself?

Murphy—I received letters from the vicar-general to get so much money collected, and as soon as I got the letters to my hands I sent them to a privy counsellor.

Lord Chief Justice—Do you not know that he was engaged to assist the French army?

Murphy—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice—Do you know that he did endeavour to bring them into Ireland?

Murphy—I had a correspondence in France at the same time—

Lord Chief Justice—With whom?

Murphy—With one Mac Carty.

Lord Chief Justice—And do you know that he had correspondence in France?

Murphy—He had correspondence with Dr. Cray and others in France, as I understand by others.

Justice Dolbein—Was the end of that correspondence to bring men from France into Ireland?

Murphy—Yes, so far as I understand.

Justice Dolbein—You understood the letters when you read them, did you not?

Murphy—I know not how these people came to swear this business whether they had not malice against him—

Attorney General—Well, Sir, pray give you your evidence, we will take care of the rest.

Justice Dolbein—I reckon this man hath given the best evidence that can be.

Lord Chief Justice—Yes, it is evidence that the Catholics have been tampering with him.

Sergeant Jeffries—I desire he may be committed, my lord, because he hath fenced from the beginning (which was done accordingly).

Attorney General—Swear John M'Leigh (which was done).

Sir F. Withins—Tell my lord and the jury what you know of any plot in Ireland to bring in the French.

Mac Lehigh—I was a parish priest in Ireland in the county of Monaghan, and Dr. Oliver Plunkett received several sums of money in Ireland, and especially in the diocese where I am. I raised some of it, and paid him 40s. at one time, and 30s. another time, in 1674 I paid him 40s., in 1675 I paid him 50s., and it was about July, and it was for the better advancement of the French coming in.

Mr. Jones—Did he tell you that the money was to be employed that way?

Mac Lehigh—Yes, that the money was to be kept for arms and ammunition, for the Roman Catholics in Ireland.

Lord Chief Justice—Before you paid it, did you receive any order from him?

Mac Lehigh—Yes, I received an order "subpoena suspensionis," and there was a public order throughout Ireland, or we would not pay it; nay several would not pay it and they were to be suspended.

Plunkett—Can you show any of the orders under my hand?

Mac Lehigh—Yes, I can show them but only they are afar off, I did not expect to have them asked for.*

* This Mac Lehigh, or M'Clave, (as he is called by the primate, in his dying speech at Tyburn), is another innocent, who like Duffy did not bring the treasonable orders which he had under the primate's hand, because he did not expect they would be called for. Every one who knows anything of Catholic discipline will at once see that what this fellow alleges about the power of the primate to suspend, at his pleasure, priests not of his own diocese, and even bishops, is outrageously false. We see here one of the numerous Plunkett—Have you no superiors of your own?

Mac Legh—Yes, but you being lord primate you could suspend bishops and inferior clergy together.

Plunkett—When was this?

Mac Legh—In 1674 and 1675.

Plunkett—What is the reason you kept it so secret all this while?

Mac Legh—In the year 1677,* I did discover it to one Mr. O'Neal whom I sent to Dublin to discover the plot. I was in France myself, my lord.

Plunkett—How many years is it since you returned from France?

Mac Legh—In May, in the year 1678.

Plunkett—Why did you not speak all this while till now?

Mac Legh—I did send one Mr. Henry O'Neal to Dublin, for I durst not go, lest I should have been suspended and excommunicated.

Attorney General—This is the priest that Henry O'Neal speaks of.

Lord Chief Justice—Is not this a very good reason? If he had come to Dublin to discover, you would have suspended him.

Plunkett—But, my lord, then he might have shown my suspension, and brought me into a "præmunire."

Sergeant Jefferies—If you please, doctor, let us who are for the king, have done with him first. I would ask you another question, Sir, were you at one Vicar Brady's house?

Mac Legh—Yes, I was.

Attorney General—Tell what was done there?

Mac Legh—There was bishop Tyrrel came there with 40 horse-men, well mounted and armed; he came into the house about 10 in the morning, and staid till about 11 at night, I was very much among them, and was as willing to be of the plot as themselves.

Attorney General—Tell what was done there.

Mac Legh—There bishop Tyrrell said he had orders from doctor Oliver Plunkett, and others, to partake of the plot to bring in the French and subvert the government in Ireland, and destroy the Protestant religion and the Protestants.

Attorney General—Was there an oath given?

Mac Legh—Yes, they were all put to their oaths, which they did take willingly to keep it private during their lives time, and the reason was, they were to have their estates during their lives time.

Sergeant Jefferies—Now tell us when this was?

Attorney General—My lord, Henry O'Neal and Phelim O'Neal speak to the same purpose.

Sergeant Jefferies—Do you remember whether Henry O'Neal was there? Did he take the oath of secresy?

Mac Legh—Yes.

Attorney General—What do you know of any letters from Plunkett?

Mac Legh—In France I landed at Brest, and going through Brittany I met with bishop Tyrrell and Dr. Cray, who was my lord Oliver Plunkett's agent, and duke John of Great Brittany came into them, for he heard of these two bishops being lately come out of Rome, sent for them, and I being a priest of Tyrrell's diocese, I went along with them, and they were well accepted, and he showed Dr. Oliver Plunkett's conditions with the king of France, which was this: to get Dublin and Londonderry, and all the sea-ports into their own hands, to levy war and destroy the Protestant religion, and that they should have him to protect them during his life-time.

Lord Chief Justice—Did you see those conditions?

Mac Legh—A copy of them I did; the governor of Brittany did show them to the bishop.

Sergeant Jefferies—What language were those conditions in?

Mac Legh—They were in Latin, Sir.

Sergeant Jefferies—Was Edmund Murfey put out of the diocese?

Mac Legh—Not as I know of.

Lord Chief Justice—What do you know of his being primate? Upon what condition was he made primate?

Mac Legh—He was made primate by the election of the king of France. And upon his election he made those conditions with the king of France, to raise men to join with the French to destroy the Protestant religion.

Justice Jones—You know that man, Dr. Plunkett?

Plunkett—Yes, my lord.

instances in which the primate was not allowed to exercise the poor privilege of asking the witness a question. Even when the Lord Chief Justice incautiously asks when a certain imaginary meeting took place at Vicar Brady's, the witness is allowed to evade it lest he should contradict others.

* It will be seen, by referring to Henry O'Neal's evidence, that he swore this communication was made to him in September, 1678. But this is a small matter amid such a heap of perjuries.

Attorney General—Will you ask him any questions?

Plunkett—None but what I asked the others.

Justice Dolbein—Then if that is all, he hath given you a good answer to that already, he was as forward then as the rest.

Attorney General—Then swear John Moyer (which was done).

Justice Jones—What do you know concerning any plot in Ireland, and Dr. Plunkett's being in it?

Moyer—I knew him first, my lord, to be made primate of Ireland, engaging that he should propagate the Romish faith in Ireland, and to restore it to the Catholic government; and I know the time by relation that I come to Rome, within two months after his being made primate of Ireland, upon the same conditions that have been related to you; and I was brought into the convent of St. Francis in Rome, by one Father —, and this father was very intimate with Cardinal Spinola; and when he used to go abroad, he used to carry me along with him as a companion, and then I found several of the Romish cardinals say that the kingdom of Ireland should come under the Catholic government, by the way and means of the lord primate Plunkett.

Attorney General—What do you know of yourself?

Moyer—As I was then from Rome, I happened to come into a convent of the order of Franciscans, and there came out of Ireland a young gentleman of the family of the O'Neals, who hath been my lord primate's page.

Plunkett—I never had a page.

Moyer—You termed him so, my lord, in Ireland, and as I came, this young man had a packet of letters with him, as though they were commendations, to enter into the College De propaganda Fide, directed to the secretary of the college. And thinking them to be letters of commendation, an old father, called one Thomas Crawley, and I, thought it not prejudicial to open the seal; and the contents were these, I translated them five years ago, and here are the contents following; if you please they may be read, I will do my best to read them in English, the original were in Latin, and some phrases in Italian. And when I was surprised with Mr. Murfey the last year, and taken suddenly, all my papers were taken away before I could return back again, by the soldiers and the Tories. I only kept a copy of this letter I had in English, as near as I could, and if I did not diminish anything by the translation, upon the oath I have taken, I have not put anything in it but what the contents of the letter were.*

Lord Chief Justice—Was that letter under his own hand?

Moyer—My lord cannot deny that.

Plunkett—Do you know my own handwriting?

Moyer—Does your lordship deny that I know your hand?

Plunkett—Pray, Sir, will you answer it?

Moyer—Yes, I do, very well.

Plunkett—When did you leave Ireland?

Moyer—I will tell you that, my lord, it is some fourteen or fifteen years ago.

Sergeant Jefferies—You were giving an account of the letter, read it.

Moyer—There is the contents, "Illustrissime Domine;" it was directed to Seigneur —, who is now secretary of the College De Propaganda Fide (so then he read his paper).

Solicitor General—You say you translated that out of a letter under the prisoner's own hand?

Moyer—Yes, I translated it immediately, and to prove it, I have statutes which his lordship made in the general national council, which are under your own hand, my lord.

Solicitor General—When did you make this translation?

Moyer—Five years ago.

Solicitor General—Where did you make it?

Moyer—I made it out of the original in Ireland.

Solicitor General—Where is the original?

Moyer—When I was taken by Mr. Murfey and Mr. Hetherington, the last year, the soldiers and Tories came and took them away, with other papers I had of the same business.

Lord Chief Justice—Was the paper you translated from of his handwriting?

Moyer—No, my lord, the paper I took this out of was a copy of the original.

Lord Chief Justice—Was the original of his handwriting?

Moyer—Yes, it was.

Lord Chief Justice—When did you take it?

* This witness has a new excuse for not producing the treasonable papers of the primate. As we have seen, he was himself a convicted robber, and the latter was as clearly an invention of his own as the interpolation of the statute, by which, as will be seen a little farther on, he makes the allowance of the agent of the bishop, to their agent at Rome, £500 instead of £50. The judges, as usual, act most outrageously here.

Moyer—It was in Latin and Italian, and I translated it afterwards.

Lord Chief Justice—And the English father, you say, made bold to open it?

Moyer—Yes, because he thought it was a letter of recommendation; but the original of the statutes made at Clouds,* I did take the original and give a copy to the page.

Lord Chief Justice—Have you the original here?

Moyer—Yes, my lord, under his own hand.

Plunkett—That is another thing.

Lord Chief Justice—But we would know that other thing.

Serjeant Jeffries—My lord, I desire that he would produce it, it is his own handwriting; see whether his grace can deny it.

Moyer—The signing of it is his own handwriting; I got the writing along with the letter, and thinking to have a copy of the one as well as the other; it was the statutes I got, and I never knew I had them till I was in Madrid in Spain.

(Then the paper was shown the prisoner.)

Plunkett—My lord, it is my hand.

Moyer—Indeed, my lord, it is your own hand.

Serjeant Jeffries—He owns it.

Moyer—And there is an order in those statutes, wherein Ireland was bound to send so much money to Rome upon such a design.

Then the witness read the title in Latin.

Justice Dolbein—Look out that clause for the raising of the money.

Moyer—My lord, it is that I look for, Cum tot clero in Hibernia necessarium sit.

Justice Dolbein—That is but negotia generally.

Serjeant Maynard—That was to solicit their affairs.

Attorney General—It is £500 in the whole.

Plunkett—Is it £500?

Moyer—It is in figures a 5 and two 00.

Plunkett—My lord, this is counterfeit, it is put in by other ink.

Justice Dolbein—Like enough so.

Lord Chief Justice—Nothing more ordinary, you leave a blank for the sum, and then, maybe, you put it in with other ink.

Justice Dolbein—How much do you say was the money, Dr. Plunkett?

Plunkett—My lord, every agent that is kept at Rome hath a maintenance, as all countries have their agents at Rome.

Justice Dolbein—How much was it?

Plunkett—It was £50 a-year.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you, Mr. Plunkett, consider with yourself, 50 or 500 in this case is not five farthings difference, but the money was to be raised by your order.

Plunkett—Aye, but whether it was not raised to this effect. There is never a nation where the Roman Catholic religion is professed, but hath an agent for their spiritual affairs at Rome, and this was for the spiritual affairs of the clergy of Ireland.

Serjeant Jeffries—And the letter was for spiritual affairs too, was it not?

Plunkett—I desire nothing, that is a truth, every nation hath an agent, and that agent must be maintained; and the reason is this, because we have many colleges beyond sea, and so there is no country of Roman Catholics but hath an agent at Rome.

Lord Chief Justice—You had better reserve yourself till by-and-by, to answer that and the letter together, for this is but a small part of the evidence.

Attorney General—About this letter you were speaking of, pray will you tell what fell out about it?

Moyer—I will tell you how it fell out afterwards. Then I came along into Marseilles, in France, and there were two captains that had as much notice as I had in that letter, for they were discoursing, that they would advance themselves in the French king's service, and hoped that by the king of France's help to have the Roman Catholic faith set up in their own country; why that discourse passed off for I was mightily afraid of any such thing, because I was of another opinion; for perhaps I might think the Roman Catholic faith would flourish as well as ever it did, and hoped so as well as anybody else, but not by the sword. As I came to Madrid, there came one Hugh O'Donnel, son to ——— O'Donnel, with letters of recommendation, and those letters were to entitle the young man, earl of Tyrone; and likewise that his majesty the king of Spain should help him for Ireland, according to the form of the letters he had. And then as I came for Ireland, speedily after these came letters of recommendation to me, that I should present myself to my lord primate, to hear confessions, and be heard preach. I came to his lordship, at his own house, the 9th of December, 1674, and there he kept me several hours, and approved me; and the copy of the approbation I have to show. And after a long dispute, we went aside and went to look Father Patrick, and then he showed me such and such things. And after a long discourse, I told my lord primate I saw your lordship's letter, which you sent by young O'Neal, in such a place, and he showed me the contents of it, and I said, Ay, my lord, it is a good intention and design, if it can be done without bloodshed; then my lord mused a little, and he said, Well, Father Francis (which is my name in religion, my Christian name was John), pray will you keep it secret? Well, my lord, said I, you need not fear; for, said he, whatever I have done herein was not for my own good, but for the public good of the Catholics. Well, said I, it is well. Then he does commend me into the parish of ——— * where this Mr. Murfey here was to put in a bull, that I had from my lord primate, which bull was brought here last year; and there he proffered me high promotions if I would further such things, and solicit such gentlemen as I knew would be private in such business, such as were old commanders, among my friends and relations. Shortly after this I saw Plunkett, and bishop Tyrrel, and Con O'Neal, practising to bring the soldiers ready for Ireland, as soon as they could get opportunity. This Captain Con O'Neal coming to the place where we kept our priory, and he and his brother were sons to General O'Neal. And there Captain Con comes in the night-time and lodges with us, and discoursed with his brother and I, because I was his companion beyond sea, about these matters, that he expected my lord primate and bishop Tyrrel's coming thither that night to make some proposals about the church and other affairs. After ten o'clock or thereabouts my lord primate and Bishop Tyrrel came, with others in their company, and there they and Father O'Neal did consult amongst themselves, that they should send Captain Con to France, and to Barcelona, with such and such instruments; and sending those instruments away, Captain Con departs the country, and goes for France soon after; and speedily my lord primate undertook that he and Bishop Tyrrel should view Munster and Ulster, and other parts of Ireland, to see how affairs stood. Soon after, my lord primate calls a general provincial council, and sends out his orders to levy such and such taxes and subsidies, and warrants to all the parish priests, that they should give them new lists, to know whether the numbers they had sent to Rome before would comply with that list. And then O'Neal went to view the forts of Charlemont and Dungannon, whilst those lords did collect the money: the orders I have seen with my own proper eyes, and his own man confessed before the council in Ireland, that my lord gave them under his hand.

Serjeant Jeffries—What year was this?

Moyer—It was in 1676, to the best of my remembrance.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you, Sir, was this at a provincial meeting?

Moyer—Yes, my lord, a general national council, to send over instruments, to tell them that they were ready to assist any foreign army that should help on the design.

Lord Chief Justice—And to raise money?

Moyer—Yes, my lord.

Justice Dolbein—Have you paid him any money?

Moyer—I believe 30s.

Justice Dolbein—It was not a secret thing then, but openly done by them.

Moyer—Yes, I saw them when they came with orders; there were four priests, and they had a great cloak-bag, going with orders up and down.

Serjeant Jeffries—Why were you exempted?

Moyer—Because I am a regular priest

Sir Francis Withins—You say you saw the orders for raising money, how do you know for what it was to be employed?

Moyer—It was there specified down,

Plunkett—Can you show any of the orders?

Moyer—I could not take them, they did not concern me.

Sir Francis Withins—How was it specified?

Moyer—To levy so much money per priest. I cannot remember the particular sum, but that every priest should give so much towards our agent in Rome, to solicit their business, and forward it.

Lord Chief Justice—What year was it?

Moyer—1676.

Lord Chief Justice—Was any of the money specified for raising an army, or bringing in the French?

Moyer—It was both for the agent and to summon a national council, to get things ready prepared to entertain and accept the French army, when it should come. I am not so good in expressing myself in English.

Lord Chief Justice—Your sense is good, it is no matter for your expression.

Mr. Jones—What more do you know?

* There is a blank here in the State Trials, but Killeavy, as we have seen, was Murfey's parish.

* Clones, in Monaghan.

Moyer—I know that he had the same council, and that they did agree upon the business, and this I know by one Patrick Bourne and I being willing that this wicked action should be hindered, sent to the next justice to discharge myself of it, which justice was as favourable to the business as my lord himself was.

Lord Chief Justice—Will you ask him any questions, Mr. Plunkett?

Plunkett—I desire to know when he left Ireland?

Moyer—I cannot tell how to remember the years, but I think it was in 1662 or '63, to the best of my remembrance it was sixteen or seventeen years ago.

Plunkett—When did you return?

Moyer—I came back in 1674, and you know it, my lord.

Plunkett—Very well; when did you see the letter with the young man in Capronica?

Moyer—In 1672.

Plunkett—How then did you know my hand, which you had never seen?

Moyer—I have seen it several times, to several instruments to Seignor; and I have seen several other letters of your hand.

Plunkett—How did you know my hand?

Moyer—I cannot positively say I then knew your hand, but according to relation, I heard it from those cardinals I conversed with at Rome.

Lord Chief Justice—But now you are acquainted with his hand, is it the same hand that you have seen up and down in writings with his name to?

Moyer—Yes, my lord, it is the same hand.

Serjeant Jefferies—Look you, Sir, when you came back again and told him you had seen such a letter under his hand with O'Neal, did he own it to you?

Moyer—Yes, he did own it, and that he did not do it for his own benefit, but for the public.

Serjeant Jefferies—Did he desire you to be secret?

Moyer—Yes, he did, and to be discreet, and he would see me highly promoted. And my lord, you sent proposals to me to give me £100 that I should not prosecute you, according as they told me, and they gave me one guinea in hand for it.

Lord Chief Justice—Some of it came to the hands of Murfey, I believe.

Plunkett—My lord, I cannot say anything to this; my hands are tied, because my witnesses are not here. My lord, if I had my witnesses and records I did not care for all those witnesses.

Lord Chief Justice—But you know you had time to bring them.

Plunkett—My lord, I desire to know whether this be his bond (showing the paper to Mr. Moyer)?

Moyer—Yes, I believe it is.

Plunkett—I desire it may be read.

Moyer—Yes, I am very well satisfied it should.

Clerk of Crown reads—"For my reverend Father Anthony, guardian of Armagh, your letter and citation." It is dated in July, 1678.

Plunkett—He can read it himself.

Clerk of Crown—Read it right (the paper being delivered to him).

Moyer—My lord, I pity him with all my heart, that a man of my own function should be brought into question for such things as these are (he reads): "Very reverend Father-guardian (it is dated 1st July, 1678), your paternal letter and citation homeward, I did instantly peruse. As for my lord Oliver Plunkett, I wrote a letter to him, the day before I saw your reverence last, that he might cause my fame, which is as dear to me as my life, to be recalled, or I should cause his name to be fixed at every public place, which, by the Almighty, I will do, nature and all reason compelling me to do it."

Plunkett—My lord, I say this, he says he came to my house when he came over, and I imparted this secret to him, yet you see I had denounced him through my whole diocese, and he here calls me by all those names of Elymas, Simon Magus, and Baryesus, and it is impossible if I had communicated to him such a secret, that I would deal so with him.

Justice Dolbein—He does not say you imparted this secret to him; but he says when he told you of the letter, you answered him, but you seemed surprised, and answered first.

Lord Chief Justice—You resolved to flatter him there, and told him you hoped to see him the best of his order, highly promoted.

Justice Dolbein—How came you to fall out, Moyer?

Moyer—When first they had this meeting at Brontry, seeing a cloud a-coming, and dreading a war, and the consequences of it, I went and applied myself to Sir ——— Hamilton, one of his majesty's privy counsellors in Ireland, and I gave in all my informations the 7th December, 1676.

Justice Dolbein—And thereupon he denounced you excommunicated?

Moyer—Yes, and afterwards, when he saw I was in communication and familiar with those privy counsellors, then he was certain I had discovered the matter, and then he got a great many devices to get the letters out of my hand.

Plunkett—You shall see under his own hand all the stratagem of this, if I had my witnesses here, you should then see under his own hand upon what account he fell out with me. Pray, my lord, ask him if this other letter be his hand.

Moyer—I believe it is my own hand.

Lord Chief Justice—Read it.

Moyer—(reads) "Very reverend Father-guardian," (then speaking) my lord, you know that I was loth to discover myself, being among people knowing of the plot.

Lord Chief Justice—Well, read it over.

Moyer—(reads) "The 23rd of April, 1678, I was somewhat comforted by your letter. But now I hope your reverence hath considered what wrong I have sustained by my envious adversaries' calumnies, only for standing, as I have a soul to save, for your rights and privileges, as also for endeavouring to save my native country's ruin and destruction.

Justice Dolbein—Read that again (which he did).

Plunkett—Observe that I was his adversary for standing for the rights and privileges of the friars.

Justice Dolbein—As also for endeavouring to hinder his country's ruin and destruction.

Lord Chief Justice—The one and the other were the reason of your falling out.

Moyer—(Reads on).

Moyer—I was, my lord, I confess, a begging friar, and stood up for the privileges of the friars.

Plunkett—Did you write any process to Rome against me?

Moyer—No, I never did.

Plunkett—My lord, does he not say I was in disgrace at Rome?

Moyer—No, nothing of that.

Lord Chief Justice—I don't hear it, but what if he did? What is that to the purpose?

Plunkett—To show his contradictions; now he says I was great in Rome, and but then in his letter he says I was in disgrace at Rome. Now he says all that he had against me was for his friars, and to hinder the destruction of his country, because I hindered the friars to beg there, is the destruction of the country as he was doing there. Upon that he fell out with me, and upon that his own superiors sent this order.

Lord Chief Justice—We can't meddle with your superiors' orders, they are nothing before us.

Serjeant Jefferies—My lord, I think for the present we have done our evidence.

Plunkett—My lord, to show what was part of the falling out, I would ask him if he was indicted for any crime and found guilty by a jury?

Moyer—That was for discovering, for I discovered it before.

Plunkett—My lord, he confessed he was convicted for giving powder and shot to the rebels.

Justice Dolbein—No, he does not say so; produce the record if you have any such thing.

Moyer—To satisfy the court.

Serjeant Jefferies—Look, Dr. Plunkett, if you will ask him any questions that by law he is bound to answer, do it in God's name, we will not interpose; but if you ask him any questions that may tend to accuse himself, we must tell you he is not bound to answer them.

Plunkett—He hath been convicted and found guilty, he will confess it himself.

Lord Chief Justice—He is not bound to answer such a question.

Moyer—It was a tory swore against me, that you did absolve.

Justice Dolbein—Don't tell us a story of your tories.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you, Mr. Plunkett, don't misspend your own time, for the more you trifle in these things, the less time you will have for your defence. I desire you now to consider and well husband your time for your defence; what have you to say for yourself?

Plunkett—My lord, I tell you I have no way to defend myself; in that I was denied time to bring over my records, and my witnesses, which are ten or twelve. And if I had them here, I would stand in defiance of all the world to accuse me; but I have not sufficient time to bring over my records and my witnesses, and I am brought here out of my native country. Were I in Ireland, there both they and I should be known; but when I was to be tried they would not appear, and it is all false, and only malice. These men used to call me Oliverus Cromwellus, out of spite.

Serjeant Moynard—You are very like him, a destroyer of the government.

Serjeant Jefferies—Were you not acquainted with him?

Plunkett—This is all I can say, if I had my witnesses here I should make my defence.

Lord Chief Justice—There are some things, that if you can give an answer to, you will do well to do it, for they stick close to you. They do testify against you here, that you did undertake to raise a body of men in Ireland—70,000 men they speak of, out of your own nation, and all these were to join with the French, for the introducing the religion of the Romish church into Ireland, and settling that again there. And that you, in order to this, did take a survey of all those Roman Catholics that were able to bear arms, from sixteen to sixty; and there is plentiful evidence, that you did go a circuit there to peruse all towns, and see which might be most convenient for taking in and entertaining the French, and landing their forces; and Charlemont you did design that for one strong place to be taken, and Dungannon for another, and that you did design the French army to land at Carlingford, and all that was with you tells the reason you gave, why that should be the place, that they might come up with a burthened ship to the very gates of the town; that you did, in order to the entertaining these foreign forces, raise money; that you did send out your orders sub-pena suspensionis to all that were of the Roman clergy, and that this money was received, several of them testified that they paid it to you, and this man hath seen great numbers of persons pay money to you upon these accounts. All these are treason; what say you to them? It does impart you to consider what answer you can give.

Plunkett—My lord, first, as to the first point, I answer that I never received a farthing of money out of my own district, and but for my own livelihood, and that I can prove by those that have received it for me, and I never received over three-score pounds a-year in my life, unless some gentleman would now and then give me 10s. for my relief. For, my lord, this is the way in Ireland, every priest hath so many families allotted to him, and every Roman Catholic family gives 2s. a-year (as they that profess that may know), and the priests give some who are superior over them, in my own district, some 20s., some 30s., and I never got so much in my life as to maintain a servant, and this was attested before the council in Ireland.

Justice Dolbein—Ay, but the witnesses say you sent out of your own district, into another bishop's diocese, to collect money.

Plunkett—My lord, I say I could never get so much as to keep a servant, and till now I never got a farthing out of my own diocese, unless I have been called to an arbitration, or some such thing, it may be for my journey—forty or fifty miles—they would give me something for my maintenance. If you should find anything else I will be content to suffer; and if my evidence were brought from Ireland, there is nothing but what would be made clear, both under their own hands, and by records, and that is all well known, and was attested in his presence, before the council in Ireland; which three-score pounds was a very small thing to maintain me, and I never had above one servant, and the house I lived in was a little thatched house, wherein was only a little room for a library, which was not seven foot high, where once this fellow came to affront me, because I hindered him from begging, and that is for the money. For the men, I defy any one that ever saw me make a list of men in my life, or can produce any list made by my order. I was never in my life at Kingsale, at Cork, at Dungannon, at Limerick, &c., or those parts of Munster which were the chief ports where the French should come in, and not in Carlingford, which is in the narrow seas in Ulster, which any one that knows the world will judge to be a very improper place for the French to land in. It is all one as to say that the French should come in at a poor place, where they could get nothing, it being at the narrow seas, and they never saw me there in their lives.

Lord Chief Justice—Yes, one does say he was with you.

Plunkett—Well, one does say he saw me there, but if I had my witnesses here, I could prove he was a friar, and declared an apostate by his own provincial, as this gentleman is; and because I hindered them to beg in my districts, therefore they have this malice against me, that is all. Well, my lord, that is for that, I was never in my life in Connaught, and they cannot say I took any list in Ulster, nor was twelve miles in Munster in my life. But thus, my lord, sometimes there would be, as our way is, so many families assigned to every priest (and this is the plain truth), this priest complains to me of the inequality, my companion near me hath 150, and I have but three score, which I must rectify; though I never knew but one of these complaints. And if I had my witnesses from Ireland, and the records, I would defy all these witnesses together. For my sending to Rome, I never had an agent in Rome for these seven years past, because I was not able to maintain him, and indeed it was a great shame to us, because there is never a community of friars that hath a college beyond sea, but hath some agent at Rome.

Lord Chief Justice—It is a shame to have one there, not to want one.

Justice Dolbein.—Well, if you have witnesses I cannot tell what to say.

Plunkett—If I had gotten but to the latter end of the term, I had defied them all together; and your lordship should have seen under their own hands what they were.

Lord Chief Justice—You forget this all this while, your own letter wherein this matter is, that you had searched the towns and considered it.

Attorney General—He does deny there was such a letter—he does not own there was such a letter.

Plunkett—I, my lord, I never did write such a letter. And that young man that he speaks of, I could prove, if I had my witnesses, that he never was in my service or company in Ireland, nor writ any letters by him.

Lord Chief Justice—Did you never send any letter by one O'Neal?

Plunkett—No, my lord, he went over a begging.

Moyer—This young man's brother-in-law will testify that he was your lordship's page.

Plunkett—I have three witnesses that he came there begging, naked, and was sick three months, and went over a begging, and was at Rome as a straggler.

Moyer—Colonel Hanlet (who came in).

Sir F. Withins—Did you know Neal O'Neal?

Hanlet—Yes.

Sir F. Withins—Whose servant was he?

Hanlet—My lord, Plunkett sent him to Rome; he was sent there with his letters, and I saw the young man and his letters.

Mr. Jones—Did he come a begging there?

Hanlet—No.

Plunkett—Where did you see him?

Hanlet—At Mantz.

Plunkett—Where is that?

Hanlet—In France.

Plunkett—And you saw him with my letters?

Hanlet—Yes.

Plunkett—And this man says the letters were opened at Caprasina, because he thought they were letters of recommendation.

Hanlet—Why he went that way afterwards; and they were not opened when I saw them.

Serjeant Jefferies—Did you know he was the doctor's servant?

Hanlet—Yes, he was.

Plunkett—Did you see him in my service?

Hanlet—I saw him in Mantz.

Justice Dolbein—How do you know he was the bishop's servant?

Hanlet—Because he showed me his letter.

Lord Chief Justice—Was he owned for his servant, and was he taken for his servant?

Hanlet—Yes.

Plunkett—Did he go on foot or on horseback?

Hanlet—He went on foot.

Plunkett—He was in a poor condition in a place not four miles from Rome; that I can prove.

Lord Chief Justice—Did he beg as he went?

Hanlet—No.

Lord Chief Justice—Mr. Plunkett, if there is any question you will ask of the witnesses, or if there be any evidence you would give yourself, this is the time for the doing of it; if not, we must leave your case to the jury, who have heard the evidence all along.

Plunkett—Only this, my lord: your lordship sees how I am dealt with. First and foremost, I have not time to bring my witnesses or my records, which, if I had, I would not weigh one farthing to leave my cause with any jury in the world. Besides all this, I am brought out of my own native country, where these men lived and I lived, and where my witnesses and records are, which would show what these people are. I sent by the post, and did all that I could; and what can I say when I have not my witnesses against these people, that may swear anything in the world? You cannot but observe the improbability of the thing in itself, and unto what a condition I am brought. My lord, my life is in imminent danger, because I am brought out of my own country, where these people would not be believed against me.

Solicitor General—My lord, I think this matter lies in a narrow compass, the evidence hath been long: I would only repeat the short heads of that which hath been given at large. He is indicted for a conspiracy to kill the king: the overt act is an endeavour to introduce a foreign power into Ireland, to raise an army and levy war there; and the proof of it hath been very full. The proof in general, that there was a "plot" to introduce the French, is plain by all the witnesses; and the proof, in particular upon this person at the bar, hath been as plain as any thing can be. They proved to your lordship in general, that there was an expectation that the French should come in; that there was an invitation of Florence Wyer, the first witness, to go over into France, and speedily he should have a command upon his return in Ireland; that there were preparations; for this appears by the oath of secrecy given to several men. Forty men that came along with Bishop Tyrrel to keep it private during their lives. And there was a farther proof of that general conspiracy by Duffy; that when there was a general meeting of so many thousand people for confirmation, there was, by the gentlemen of that meeting, a secret consultation how to carry on the design, and how to look out the old officers in the late rebellion, and to see what posture they were in as to the management of this design; and this comes more particularly to the prisoner, who was by at this consultation, so the witnesses do tell you. But that that comes nearer to him, is, that he did issue out orders for the raising of money; and that he did raise money pursuant to those orders, and did receive money for that very purpose: this is proved by three witnesses, Duffy, and Mac Legh, who paid the money, and by Moyer, the last witness, who saw him receive it from several persons. This is positive upon him; nay, they say farther, that there was a list made of the several men in the several parishes that were able to bear arms, upon occasion, from sixteen to sixty; and there was a list of a matter of three score thousand men that were ready, upon any occasion, to rise for this purpose; and this list was delivered over into the hands of the prisoner at the bar. There is one witness, Duffy, that says farther, that he saw a letter under his hand in France, to the Cardinal Bouillon, to invite the French king into Ireland; and he did wonder that he should spend his time and blood in wars against Spain, which was a Roman Catholic, and not come into Ireland to extirpate the heretics. And this letter is confirmed by another letter which was sent by Moyer, a copy of which is produced, which he translated from the original in Latin; and the letter was sent to Rome by Neill O'Neal, whom the prisoner says he had no concern for, but to give him some recommendations.

Plunkett—I gave him no recommendations.

Lord Chief Justice—No; he says he did not give him any, nor sent any letter by him.

Solicitor General—Then he urged that he went along begging by the way; but it is proved he was sent by him, and sent with letters, and that by his brother-in-law, who met him at Mantz. And it is proved by Moyer, who saw the letter opened, taking it to be but a common letter of recommendation; he read the letter, and took a copy of it, and translated that copy, which translation is enough to verify all the matter which the witnesses have sworn; for it is agreeing to what he said of Cardinal Bouillon in his other letter, that it was more proper for the Catholic princes to agree together and extirpate heresy, than to vary amongst themselves; that now was the time, for there were three score thousand men ready to rise upon such an invasion. This is the substance of the letter, and this proves fully the conspiracy this man was engaged in, his receiving of money, his listing men, and his invitation of foreign princes. And this is fully proved.

Serjeant Maynard—And to his viewing the ports, too.

Solicitor General—It was likewise agreed that Carlingford should be the port, and it is like enough to be the port, for it is a very large port, that ships of the greatest burthen may come up to the town, and the town itself but a weak town. This is the substance of the evidence, and this is proof enough, we think, to convict any man of this fact.

Serjeant Jeffries—My lord, I shall trouble you but with one word that hath been omitted. I think it is a cause of great example, and that thing which the prisoner views to make his excuse, hath been answered, by a favour and indulgence from the court, in a very extraordinary manner. For inasmuch as this gentleman would make it a very hard case, that he is brought out of his own country, and hath not his witnesses; it is very well known that by a particular favour of the court, which is not usual in these cases, he had between five and six weeks time for preparation for his trial: so that truly, or to what does appear, I think all the witnesses that have been examined are witnesses to be credited, except you gentlemen, of yourselves, can convict, upon your own knowledge, these persons of any misdemeanor, which I think you cannot much less of perjury. But besides the witnesses we have produced, all which speak to the plot in general, and four of them fix it upon the person at the bar; they speak particularly, and every one agrees in circumstances, and that other, that spoke mincingly, I put it upon him, it is the greatest evidence that can be. For that person thus could come before a grand jury, and there be the main witness, but when he comes here, must be secured and pumped to discover the 70,000 men. And I suppose you did observe how difficult it was to know of him whether this person was primate of Ireland, or whether it were from the authority of the king or the pope; a very probable thing that he should be such a one as the king designed to be primate and superintendent of Ireland. Further, my lord, I desire to take notice of too, that Wyer, the first witness, fixes four particular things upon the prisoner at the bar, which have not yet been taken notice of. First, he fixes a discourse with another person, that was competitor with him for this very office—Bishop Duffy—and he gives the reason why he was admitted into the office rather than the other—because he was a man of greater ability to carry on the design; and though he does not give you an account of the designs, yet the rest of the evidence do, and make it to be the design then carrying on. Another thing is, he tells you of the sending one into France, that was to come back again in order to this design. I think his name was Mac Donnell, and then the great tory, Fleming, and he were to come back again, colonels in the army that was to be raised. The next person that fixes it upon him is Han O'Neal* and he gives the plainest circumstances, that at a time in August, when Bishop Tyrrel came to the house of one Brady with so many men well equipped with such and such arms, and took the oath of secrecy; he himself, but not only he but the other priest, Mac Legh, was present at the same time, and took the said oath, and he does tell you that that very priest was sent to Dublin to discover it that very time, and so he hath fixed the person, and time, and the business they came about. Then Mac Legh comes and tells you the same thing in every circumstance; but, says the prisoner at the bar, and would make it to be a great objection, how chance that they have concealed this all the while, and not discovered it to some justice of the peace? Why, says one, I was under your jurisdiction in that place, that is the very reason he gives wherefore he durst not; and, says another, I was concerned and as earnest as the prisoner or anybody else, but going into France, I observed the slavery that all the subjects were under, under the tyranny of that king, and apprehending that the same king was to come into Ireland by the means of these gentlemen, I was concerned at it, and had rather the devil should reign over us than such a one, and therefore I will discover it. And he said very well, I think that he had rather have the devil to reign, for it seems to be him or one in his shape that reigns after that manner. And there are two persons that swear to the very year that they were obliged to raise the money and swear positively they saw his orders "sub pœna suspensionis." I do not know whether they meant hanged or suspended from their office, but it seems it was so terrible that it made them pay twenty shillings a-piece for three years successively. And there is another gentleman that tells you that out of a small living wherein he was concerned only as a curate to a third person, it had been paid two or three times, and another, though he was exempt himself from the payment, yet so great a confidant was he of the prisoner's at the bar, that he was present when he saw thirty or forty pay this tax, and whereas the prisoner at the bar would make it thought a strange thing that he should raise so much money, who had but a house seven foot high, it seems there is above that thatched house a chapel.

Plunkett—There is no chapel.

Serjeant Jeffries—But now, my lord, that which substantially proves what these witnesses say, is the letter that is sent to Rome, to the secretary of the College de Propaganda Fide, which is the last letter that the last gentleman speaks of, wherein he does particularly take notice that he had taken care to raise such monies, and view all the ports and places of strength. And, my lord, that which is a very great circumstance to back the evidence of the first letter to the French cardinal, Bouillon, which was taken notice of by the first witness, and there is such a passage in this too, that the Catholic princes should not spill one another's blood, when they might better employ it here in Ireland for the propagation of the faith; this last letter takes particular notice of this very instance too, that instead of drawing their swords against one another, they had better come to promote the Catholic faith in Ireland. These four witnesses are punctual and precise in every particular circumstance of the case and against them there is nothing but the common objections; If I had such records and witnesses here I could make my defence, that is, if he had those things that he has not, he might appear to be another man than he is; but I am sure as it appears upon the evidence that hath been given by all the witnesses, there is a plain proof and a full proof of every treason laid to his charge.

Plunkett—My lord, I desire these witnesses may be called (giving in a paper).

Cryer—David Fitzgerald, Eustace Commynes, and Paul Gorman.

Lord Chief Justice—Who gave him this paper? He had it not before.

Stranger—I was told that these were good evidences for Dr. Plunkett, and I gave him the names.

* Henry O'Neill was the second witness.

Lord Chief Justice—Where are they?

Stranger—They are hard by.

Attorney General—Where is Eustace Commynes? for he was one that gave in evidence against the prisoner.

Then Paul Gorman appeared.

Lord Chief Justice—What would you ask him?

Plunkett—I desire to know of him whether Mr. Moyer did allure and entice him to swear against me?

Gorman—Indeed, my lord, he never did.

Lord Chief Justice—Will you ask him any more?

Gorman—But this, my lord: Mr. Moyer and I were in discourse, and he said if there was law to be had in Ireland he would show Mr. Plunkett his share in it.

Lord Chief Justice—Well, what of that?

Gorman—I did come out of Ireland to reveal what plots the Irish had against the king; and as for this Mr. Plunkett, as I have a soul to save, I never heard of any misdemeanor of him.

Justice Dolbein—How came you here to-day?

Gorman—I was summoned.

Justice Dolbein—By whom? Was it the Attorney General or Plunkett that summoned you?

Gorman—There is the summons.

Serjeant Jefferies—It is a common subpoena.

Plunkett—I never sent for him.

Gorman—It was not against you; they knew I had nothing against you; I thought you did more good in Ireland than hurt, so I declare it.

Lord Chief Justice—Have you any more witnesses? If Fitzgerald or Commynes will come, we will hear them.

Plunkett—My lord, I have not any more witnesses.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you, gentlemen of the jury, this gentleman here, Mr. Plunkett, is indicted of high treason; and it is for conspiring the king's death, and endeavouring to bring the French army into Ireland for to invade that kingdom, and to plant the Romish religion in that kingdom. You have had evidence against him, that hath been fully examined. And these things do seem to be very plain by the witnesses, that he himself hath taken a commission or a grant, or what you will please to call it, from the pope, to be primate of Ireland; that he hath taken upon him to make laws as the provincial; and that he hath undertaken and endeavoured to settle the popish religion in that kingdom; and in order to that, he hath invited the aid of the French army; and that he hath, for the better landing of them, looked out what places were most convenient for them; that he hath set a tax upon the clergy within his province, for the facilitating of all this and for the making preparations for the entertainment of this army. This the witnesses testify against him, and that there were some towns, as Dungannon and another town, that were to be betrayed to the French. Now you must consider concerning these witnesses; if you believe the evidence that hath been given, and which had been repeated by the king's council, and if you believe that he did design to bring in a French army to establish the Romish religion there again, and that he took upon him to raise money for that purpose, surveyed the ports, and made provisions, as the witnesses speak of, and was in that conspiracy—you must find him guilty. I leave it to you, it is a pretty strong evidence, he does not say anything to it, but that his witnesses are not come over.

Plunkett—I can say nothing to it, but give my own protestation, that there is not one word of this said against me true, but all plain romance. I never had any communication with any French minister, cardinal, nor other.

Then the jury withdrew for a quarter of an hour, and being returned, gave this verdict:

Clerk of Crown—Oliver Plunkett, hold up thy hand. How say you, is he guilty of high treason, whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Foreman—Guilty.

Plunkett—Deo gratias, God be thanked.

Then the verdict was recorded, and the court arose, and the keeper went away with his prisoner.

On Wednesday, 15th June, 1681, Oliver Plunkett was brought to the bar, to receive his judgment.

Attorney General—My lord, I pray your judgment against the prisoner, Oliver Plunkett.

Clerk of Crown—Oliver Plunkett hold up thy hand: thou hast been indicted of high-treason, thou hast been thereupon arraigned, thou hast thereunto pleaded Not Guilty, and for thy trial hast put thyself upon God and the country, which country hath found thee guilty; what hast thou to say for thyself, why judgment of death should not pass upon thee, and execution be thereupon awarded according to the law.

No. III.—TO JESUS IN THE SACRAMENT OF THE ALTAR.

I.

The hour is come—He may not stay—
The Saviour from the world must part—
That world, to wipe whose stains away
Cost the last life-drop of his heart.

II.

But can He leave the souls he loved
And ransom'd at a price so dear,
Far, far from Him and heav'n remov'd,
To pine all sad and lonely here?

III.

Ne'er, ne'er to see His face again,
Till in a world of love and bliss,
His presence should reward the pain
His absence long hath caused in this.

IV.

Oh, no—his ardent, boundless love
Hath found by ways ineffable,
Tho' thron'd in realms of light above,
To be for ever with us still.

V.

How could a soul that fixed on Him
Her ev'ry wish—her ev'ry thought—
Seek thro' a world so cold and dim,
Nor ever find the spouse she sought?

VI.

For ever near us He remains,
That all who seek Him soon may find;
To dwell ev'n on yon shrine He deigns,
Within that narrow space confin'd.

There breathing love's intensest fires
By night—by day your Saviour lies—
There with those sacred flames inspires
The soul that to embrace him sighs.

And thou, my soul! essay to tell
From that recess what shafts of flame
The heav'nly archer wings so well—
How keen their smart—how sure their aim.

IX.

Yes, ev'n though to this shrine you go,
With hearts that with no ardor burn,
Trust me, you'll find these hearts shall glow
All fire, all love, at your return.

X.

But oh! what joys 'tis yours to prove,
Blest souls! that to his arms repair
With hearts that glow with mutual love,
No tongue but your's can e'er declare.

And would that in this vale of death,
For ever near Thee I could be,
Since Thou, this lowly guise beneath,
For ever dwellest here with me.

Oh! grant when closes life's short scene,
In heav'n to see thy count'nance shine,
No veil of earth or sense between—
All bright, all glorious, and all mine!

But be for ever near in life,
Nor other boon, O Lord! I crave;
Assist me in my last great strife,
And light my path-way to the grave!

The night his tender form I first caress'd—
Oh! how the sight of all his opening charms
My ravish'd soul with fullest rapture blest!

Of all that follow'd, prais'd, admir'd before;
All mock the fiery pangs with which he burns—
All throw into his cup one bitter more.

VIII.

Almighty Father! who so lov'st thy Son,
How from thy starry throne can'st thou behold
This bloody, ruthless deed of murder done,
And thou thyself so unconcern'd and cold?

But, ah! what do I say? th' Eternal Sire
Sees our huge weight of guilt upon Him laid,
Nor on Him will He cease to pour his ire
Till the last gasp be o'er, and all be paid.

X.

My Son! my Son! I see thy fleeting soul
Begins already to the skies aspire;
Would that thy parting hour I could console,
Or at least view thee in these arms expire!

XI.

But, ah! no soothing balm can I impart—
Nor mine to catch thy last expiring breath—
My grief but rends still more thy bleeding heart,
And clouds with deeper gloom the hour of death.

XII.

Love, then, fond souls! love Him with heart and mind,
Whose bosom glows with love's immortal fires;
Well pleased for you his life hath He resigned,
And nothing but your love in turn requires.

RECOLLECTIONS, CONFESSIONS, ADMISSIONS, AND AVOWALS
OF AN

Irish Parliamentary Reporter.

By WM. B. MAC CABE, Esq.,
Author of "A Catholic History of England."

"There's hope, a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year."
SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet, act 3, scene 2.

CHAP. VI.

A chapter on the "glorious memory." The toast given at the Mansion House during the king's visit.—Alderman Darley.—Mr. Brie of the Morning Chronicle.—The king's departure from Ireland.—An enthusiastic poet.—The only change effected by the king in Ireland.—The "glorious memory" and Earl Talbot.—The lord-lieutenancy lost.—"The glorious memory"—the mode of proposing and drinking it at Corporation dinners.—Mr. Sutter and Alderman Archer.

THE fraternal embrace of Mr. Purcell O'Gorman and Sir Edward Stanley in the view of the public, who knew that they were old political opponents and never could be personal friends, was a ridiculous piece of play-acting, got up in honour of the king's visit. Ridiculous however as it was, it could not be regarded as equal to all the noisy declamation and nonsense that were spoken and written about the same period, with respect to poor Alderman Darley, "vino gravis," proposing "the glorious memory" on the same night that the king honoured the Mansion House, as the guest of the Dublin corporation.

There were, I know, some honest men in the unreformed corporation of Dublin, and Alderman Darley was one of them. I remember to have seen him on the seat of justice. I remarked how he acted as a magistrate, and it is but justice to his memory to add, that I never saw a more fair, honest, and upright man, nor one less likely to draw a distinction between two individuals, because they belonged to different parties. As a friend he was sincere, and as a companion he had been always spoken of as honest, candid, kindly, and trustworthy. Alderman Darley had all his life-time attached himself to a party—he had profited by it. That party, in his opinion, embraced within its narrow limits all that was good, and great, and loyal. That party was beneficial to him, and, ergo, held Alderman Darley by a very simple process of reasoning—"what is good for me, must and ought to be good for everybody else." The "glorious memory" was the symbol of the alderman's party, and the honest alderman, "hot with the Tuscan grape," and inflamed with loyalty, was determined to let the king know what a dashing, roaring, rollicking, and "loyal" set of fellows his majesty had the satisfaction of dining with; and despite of Bradley King—who had "his surtout" on at the time—he did give the "glorious memory," and hundreds were gloriously drunk with joy and champagne when they heard it given, and they made the Round Room ring again with their enthusiastic cheers. The Catholics at the time designated this incident "an insult to his majesty;" even whilst the worthy alderman imagined he was offering to royalty that which ought to be regarded as the very essence of delicate flattery; as the alderman naturally enough thought, that but for him of "the glorious memory," George IV., instead of dining that day in Dawson-street with the Dublin corporation, would have been a petty elector, chewing saur-kraut in some corner of Germany—perhaps a good husband, instead of a junketting widower—an honest man, and not "the first gentleman in Europe."

A great outcry was raised against Alderman Darley, which was increased by the knowledge of the manner in which Mr. Bric was treated when he interfered, for the purpose of preventing the toast being given. Mr. Bric afterwards became known as a member of the Catholic Association. He was at the time of the king's visit, one of the parliamentary reporters for the Morning Chronicle. It was in that capacity he was invited to the dinner, and holding such a situation, he certainly had no right to interfere in the course of events which it was his sole duty to describe as an impartial narrator. If he were wrong in stepping beyond the line of his duty, the ruffianism and brutality of his assailants gained for him the sympathy and support of the Catholics, and Mr. Bric had full and ample revenge of his adversaries, by publishing the correspondence which subsequently took place between them and himself. With the outrage upon Mr. Bric Alderman Darley had nothing to do; he was full of loyalty, and very full of wine, and he proved both by proposing his old favourite, "the glorious memory." When he stated the plain facts of the case, he was forgiven, and the attempt that was made to deprive him of his situation as police magistrate was unsuccessful. Numbers of the Catholics rejoiced that it was so, because they were aware that none could fill it better, nor discharge its duties more honestly.*

What a specimen of the times was this pother, made about drinking a toast at a late hour in the night! For the orangemen not to drink "the glorious memory" was "conciliation!" For the Catholics not to say a word of the evils to which they were subjected, was "conciliation!" Not to be teased by the impertinence of wrong-doers, not to be bored by the complaints of the wronged—such were the things wished for by "the good easy king" from his Irish subjects! Alderman Darley exposed the delusion, and if the Catholics were not mad at the time, they would have taken advantage of the lesson which the alderman, unintentionally, gave them. They did not, however, attend to the warning. The king heard no complaints, he therefore had nothing to redress; and he left the Irish shore amid the tears and regrets of his tender-hearted, bamboozled Irish subjects!

Never was there such a hullabaloo as when George IV. took his departure from Ireland. Hills, and rocks, and fields were covered with a multitude, to bestow a parting look and a farewell benediction upon him. It seemed as if Ireland could never bear to be deprived of such a jewel of a king, and when the royal boat pushed from the shore, many hands clung to it, and one enthusiast actually swam after it, swearing he never would let the king go until he had got one shake more of the royal fist. It was bestowed upon him, and the man returned to the shore, and his garments were dripping with wet; he swore an oath that now that the king had shaken him by the hand, he should never let a bit of soap wash it again. I knew the enthusiast well, and he showed me a song which he had composed and printed for the occasion, and the merits of which may be surmised from the first stanza, which, to the best of my recollection, ran as follows:

* In "The Lives and Times of the United Irishmen," by my friend Dr. Madden, there will be found many statements of the cruelties and iniquities perpetrated by men holding the commission of the peace in 1798. The name of Alderman Darley is frequently introduced; but it is never mentioned except to show either that he faithfully performed his duty, or that he acted with humanity.

"Oh! let our shouts reach Britain's shore,
Let Britons know that we adore,
And that we'll die, as oft before,
For George—great George, our King!"

The king departed; his sole balm for the evils of Ireland was the quack medicine of Doctor Sidmouth, who wrote that unmeaning piece of nonsense afterwards known as "the parting letter."

I should not, perhaps, omit to state that his majesty, before he left us did effect one most material change in Ireland. The name of the little village of Dunleary was changed by him into that of KINGSTOWN!

The king departed; but not many weeks had passed away when the representative of royalty in Ireland—the Earl Talbot, to whom the worthless letter of Sidmouth had been addressed—dined with the Dublin corporation, and drank that toast, "the glorious memory," for proposing which Alderman Darley was on the point of being removed from the magisterial bench, and that it was the very excess of "conciliation" on the part of the orangemen, not to mention whilst the king remained in the country. The circumstances naturally excited a great sensation. The Catholics were annoyed that they should be so soon undeceived; and they were enraged with the viceroy for thus suddenly betraying the trickery that had been practised upon them, and to which they ought never to have submitted. The scheme was blown upon; the plot discovered. It was not, however, convenient for the government, at the moment, to demonstrate to the Irish what complete dupes they had been; and Earl Talbot was deprived of the lord lieutenantancy, not merely because he drank "the glorious memory," but because he had, by so doing, shown himself to be a clumsy, open-mouthed politician, and therefore an unfit instrument in the hands of the Castlereagh school of statesmen.

All that can be said as good of Earl Talbot, as lord lieutenant, was that he was married to a most amiable, kindly, and benevolent lady, who died in Dublin; and all that can be said of evil regarding him is, that when about to take his departure, he, instead of bestowing them in charity upon the poor, sold a large stock of potatoes at high prices. He was sincere in his bigotry, but his dulness prevented him from being mischievous. He vegetated in the midst of a bad system, and when removed, he was missed neither by friend or foe—if indeed he had made either the one or the other during the period that power was exercised by him in Ireland.

"The glorious memory" sent one lord lieutenant out of Ireland, and brought in another. Apparently a more harmless combination of words there could not be than those composing this celebrated toast—at least as I have always heard them given at many of the corporation official dinners. I have often been present when it was proposed, and received with acclamations, yet could never catch more of it than this:

"The glorious, pious, and immortal memory of the great and good king William."

I am aware that there have been additions innumerable put to the toast; and Sir Jonah Barrington, in his miraculous and incredible "Memoirs," specifies some of them; but the toast, as I have stated it, was proposed in public companies, and was certainly the form employed when it was drunk by Lord Talbot at Alderman James's dinner. There was, however, a manner in giving it which plainly proved how much it was loved and cherished by the party of which it was the watch-word. "The glorious memory" was always followed by the tune of "the Boyne Water," and the company were standing when the toast was given. At the corporation dinners, Mr. Sutter—a tall, gaunt, sober, hard-thinking, severe-looking man—generally acted as fugleman. When the first bar of the air reached his ears, his rigid muscles became un-bent, and a smile relaxed those features upon which nothing mirthful apparently could long repose. In accordance with the air he gave three distinct claps with his hands. This was immediately followed by the entire company, who kept perfect time to the air. To any one at a short distance, and out of view of the actors in this ridiculous scene, the noise produced had somewhat the same effect as quick, distinct, and regular platoon firing; and to me, who of course never took part in the exhibition, it always had a most comical appearance—to see, for instance, two, or three, or four hundred men, having reasoning faculties, and being possessed of common sense, starting up, and while a certain tune was playing, belabouring one hand with another, as if their lives, fame, and fortune depended upon the noise they could produce! But comical as the scene I have described was to an impartial observer, its ludicrous effect was marvellously heightened whenever Alderman Archer was present.

Alderman Archer was a fat, round, funny-looking little man—about five feet four inches in height, and nearly the same in breath; with an eye that was always rolling in mirth, and a mouth that was ever expanded with a broad grin. Whenever he heard "the glorious memory" given, he started up in his chair, in order that he might attract the observation of the entire company. Unlike the rest, he seldom let his hands touch each other, except at some very striking passage; but he twisted and twined his pudgy body about as if he were a posture-master, or rather like a cymbal-player in a military band; and thus he kept on grimacing, and dancing, and pirouetting about until the tune had concluded. When the spectator recollected that the individual who was thus making an exhibition of himself, was a high civic dignitary—the treasurer of a great corporation, an acting and an active magistrate, it is probable that, however bitter his feelings might be, he could not refrain from laughter. When party tends to make its votaries ridiculous, the enmities of its opponents may be speedily lost in pity or absorbed in contempt. For my part, I never felt the slightest animosity to the orangemen for giving the toast of the "glorious memory," once I witnessed their conduct and demeanour when seeking, as they fancied, to hail it with all due and fitting honours.

Acta Sanctorum.

THE BOLLANDISTS.—HENSCHENIUS.

NO. VI.

THE crowning glory of the Bollandists would be wanting had they escaped persecution. When God designs the foundation of any great work, the world reels beneath his hand. But the agitation only consolidates the edifice, and whatever be the commotions raised against it by the petty passions of man, it survives and flourishes.

The Bollandists had to encounter at their first step the most serious embarrassments. Their project was received with indifference by many, while others complained that they were too slow. Even among their own brethren they found contradiction, and saw their cautious superiors prescribing the narrowest limits for the original plan.

Encouragement came, but its enchantment was now dissipated by a thousand petty, local troubles, which appear in many private letters of Father Henschenius. When he saw himself received with all the honours of a triumph at Rome, he remembered with amazement, the Flemish jealousies which impeded, though they could not stop the progress of his work.

When he returned, buoyant with hope, suddenly the establishment of Blaese, the Protestant printer, who was to publish the Acta, was burned to the ground. War, plague, and famine, followed immediately. Once more the whole work was about being abandoned, but the Bollandists bent for a moment to the storm, and soon resumed their labours. It was one of the many trials which was to teach them never to despair.

That trial came immediately from the hand of God. But those which they were to undergo from men were far more persevering and bitter. By a singular coincidence, the most celebrated works, that is, the historical episodes on the Dagoberts, the bishops of Maestricht and Tongres, the patriarchs of the east, the charters, and martyrologies, were those which involved them in the most severe and protracted controversies. Was this intention intended by God to restrain the hagiologists within the strict line of their plan, and deter them from those labours which had exposed them to such trials?

Thus their greatest literary discovery was the signal for their enemies to rise. In 1635, Henschenius found the first notice of that unknown king Dagobert. Bollandus was delighted, but in his simplicity he communicated the fact to some of his friends. Father Labbe spoke of it in Paris; the news came to the ears of D'Hevoural, Lefevre, Chantereau, and the Valois. But from that moment there was a jealous rival in wait for Henschenius.

Nineteen years later, that is in 1654, Henschenius presented his famous "diatribe" to his provincial, and published it in 1656. Two years afterwards, the month of February was published, and the acts of St. Sigebert established the discovery beyond the possibility of doubt. Henschenius had told his provincial, Father Dickens: "I was the first that opened up a passage through an unopened country, which had been rendered impassable by bog and snow. True, I may have contracted some mire on the road, my foot may have occasionally sunk in the quagmire, but then I gained my point; I found that there were three Dagoberts—after the lapse of five years, I was the first to distinguish them." And this was admitted by every one except Adrian Valois—a singular, and not very scrupulous savant, if we may judge from the indiscreet "Valisiana" of his son, and from the following incidents:

As a preface to the second volume of his history, which he published in 1658, he made an attack on Henschenius, accusing him of having plagiarized both from the dead and the living; he hints at some mysterious correspondence, and claims for himself the honour of having discovered Dagobert, and consequently, the bishops of Maestricht. "Let our hagiologist," he says, "content himself with the honour and glory which can be acquired by the lives of the saints, provided he publishes them without note or comment, he must be content to divide honours with us." But it would not be easy to divide the three Dagoberts.

Four years later, the two rivals met in the library of Clement. Father Labbe and D'Hevoural had planned this interview. It lasted two hours, and ended, according to Henschenius, in an apology from Valois.

But what was the reparation for the wrong? In 1663 he published an obscure old satire against court-tezans and monks, and introduces at the close, without any preface, date, or address, a letter, in which he claims the priority of discovery more boldly than ever. "Dear reader," he says, at the end, with the greatest composure, "I dare not withhold this information from you any longer; I avail myself of the first opportunity of communicating my notes to you, lest, as it often happened, another should anticipate me, and reduce me to the miserable necessity of reclaiming my stolen property. Take, dear reader, the fruit of my lucubrations, and adieu."

This is one of the most daring instances of literary piracy on record. But why was this very letter republished in 1741, without note or comment, in the collection of Dom Bonquet, among the monuments of the history of France? Why did the "Journal des Savants" of 1697, in contradiction of the same journal in 1670, support the pretension of Valois? How is it that before and after that time, and even to our day, the claims of Henschenius are either denied, or only partially admitted, or the honours given to Mabillon, whose only claim was, that he fixed by an unedited authority, the precise date of the martyr-king's death? For Mabillon this was sufficient glory, but it is to be regretted that so stern and competent a judge should have evinced such complaisance as to divide the honours between Henschenius and Valois. He was under obligations to Valois, but party spirit was the motive of the others—Jansenism was at the bottom of their literary decisions—and justice and truth suffered by its influence.

About the same time, it happened that Papebroch and Henschenius were making a short excursion for some pious purpose, along the banks of the Meuse. As they were passing from Epternach to Luxemburg, their horses took fright, and Henschenius, who was then recovering from an attack of illness, fell, and seriously injured one of his legs. Papebroch, who attended him constantly a whole month at Luxemburg, spent his leisure hours in the museum and literary collection of the learned Father Wiltheim. Here he conceived his first project of a work "De re Diplomatica." A dispute with Pere Mazon excited him to the work, and in a short time he published, in 1665, as a sort of relaxation, his "Propyleum Antiquarium."

The principal part of that work is controversy on historical documents. In the first, part he subjects to critical examination the vellum documents of Horreen, Lobleés, Manbeng, Eyham, and St. Denis, with the caputular archives of Paris, Strasburg, Noyer, and Cambrai. He thus brought down on his head a whole host of monks and canons together. In the second part he breaks a lance with the Carmelites; and in the third, he dissects most unmercifully a martyrology of Brescia.

Here was more than enough to raise three or four tempests. It gave rise to the celebrated "diplomatic war," which lasted more than a century, but immediately after the first skirmish, Papebroch extricated himself happily from the battle, by capitulating nobly to the famous "Re Diplomatica" of Mabillon. The two leaders having thus made peace, all appeared tranquil, but the paradoxes of Father Hardouin soon fanned the smouldering embers into a flame. The alarm was first sounded from Spain by Don Peroz; some of the most celebrated men of Italy, Holland, France, and Germany, were soon engaged in the contest, and even from 1785 to 1790, Von Meiem and Ochollises, with true Germanic obstinacy, were still in the field where the combatants had engaged more than a century before.

The contest with the Carmelites was more brief, but infinitely more anxious. It endangered the honour of the Bollandists; it put their very existence at stake; it caused great commotion even in the high places, and cost Fathers Papebroch and Jennings a load of trouble, and unceasing anxiety and exertions, during twenty years, besides two journeys to Rome, and the almost total suspension of their labours during seven of the most critical years. It was at this time that the acts even of St. Louis of Gonzaga could not be prepared at their proper day. A note was inserted that the historian of the saint was then at Rome, on urgent business connected with the Bollandist society.

The contest had been opened by the Franciscans of Louvain, in defence of a martyrology, which was, however, abandoned ultimately by the most respectable men of the order. The Carmelites appeared next, and urged their point with more pertinacity. Their grand pretension, namely, that their order could be traced back through a regular and unbroken succession, to the prophet Elias, could not stand the strict test of criticism. Neither Mabillon nor Leibnitz could venture to decide the point; Papebroch decided it peremptorily, and with the greatest apparent ease. He provoked a storm of replies from the Carmelite convents in various quarters; works were written, the very titles of which show the warlike spirit of the writers: there were "Watchtowers," and "Ramparts," and "Arsenals of the Prophet's Order," and "His Heroical Rule;" there were also "The Jesuit Harpocrates giving advice how to hold one's peace," "The apple of discord," the "Nihilum Jesuiticum," "The new Ishmael, whose hand was against every man, and every man's hand against him; or Daniel Papebroch set in the pillory," by John Camus; in fine, there was "Daniel Papebroch bombarding the city of the saints in their own acts." "Whence arises this wrath of the white-mantled brothers of Mount Carmel?" asked Prince Ernest, landgrave of Hesse, who had lately been converted; "send me," he writes to Papebroch, "the passages which have excited those anchorites of the old and new testament. Our modern Franciscans and Carmelites, whether they be successors of the great Baptist or not, have at least the ardent wish to bring down fire from heaven."

And certainly they had nearly succeeded in their attempt. The case was referred to Rome; all the Acta was submitted to the Inquisition, and an accusation, drawn up in due form, was presented to Innocent XI. The position of the combatants was soon changed—the Bollandists being on the defensive, and responsible for the entire work, through all its ponderous dissertations. How is it possible they can escape, and that in fourteen folios, containing many dissertations on delicate points, Rome could not find anything to condemn.

Jennings was despatched to Rome, where he was detained full ten years, during which he was hardly able, though assisted by the zeal of his brethren and the numerous friends of the Bollandists, to ward off a condemnation. He succeeded at last in avoiding danger from this point, when suddenly the storm broke forth in another quarter.

His adversaries after this defeat secretly employed their most powerful influence with another inquisition, which was more accessible to them than the tribunal at Rome. On the 14th of November, 1697, the censors of the Spanish inquisition pronounced a decree of condemnation, with several very severe comments on the work condemned. All the damning notes of theological censure were lavished with profusion in this decree. It was published throughout Spain, translated into various tongues, and circulated in all quarters of the Church. Placards were posted up on the Jesuit museum at Antwerp, announcing, in monster type, to the astonished brethren the sentence which had fallen on them so unexpectedly. The first copy fell into the hands of Father Papebroch, who read it with a composure which he, in vain, endeavoured to impart to his alarmed fellow-labourers.

Rome was now the only resource, Papebroch was confident that he could justify himself in the face of the world—in the capital of the Church. He insisted earnestly that the whole case should be once more subjected to a rigorous examination, that the propositions should be, without delay, either definitively condemned, or the Spanish censures unconditionally revoked. But the examination of so voluminous a publication would supply work for many years to the Roman tribunals, which are ordinarily so slow; and moreover, there were some really weak points, such as those passages in the "apparatus" on the popes, which treated some of the Conalvus very cavalierly. After three years' negotiation, a judgment-sentence was obtained, implying a tacit disavowal of the condemnation or rather that it should not be admitted as authoritative. On the 28th of May, 1698, the second congregation declared "that both parties could and ought to be ordered not to discuss the question farther."

Both parties having been thus compelled to renounce hostilities, Papebroch fell dangerously ill. Believing that his last hour was come, he dictated, in presence of witnesses, a protestation which betrays in every line, the anguish of his soul, and yet his perfect resignation. "After forty-two years' labour," he says, "assiduously consecrated to the illustration of the lives of the saints, and hoping now to go join them in heaven, I have but one earthly petition to make, namely, that the holy Father, Clement XI., be earnestly intreated to grant me now, at the hour of my death, what I have asked in vain from Pope Innocent XII.—that is, either to receive at once a justification from the charges made against me, or to be admitted to make a retraction. A Catholic I have lived, a Catholic, by God's grace, I die—I have a right also that men should know I died a Catholic, which they cannot, so long as the decree of the Spanish inquisition is considered just and authoritative, and men read therein that I have taught in my works three hundred propositions for which I have been condemned."

Papebroch made an application to an old friend and fellow-labourer in the Vatican library, and the Allate

Francesco Albani, but afterwards cardinal and pope. But neither this friendship in high quarters, nor another visit of Jennings to Rome, nor fifteen years' negotiation and correspondence between Antwerp and Madrid could shake the obstinacy of the Spanish inquisition. Papebroch died in 1714, the very next year the condemnation was retracted. The justification came too late to soothe the sorrows of the venerable man—it was but another ornament added to his funeral honours.

Compared to this long contest, all the others were trifles, and need be only cursorily mentioned. An abbé of St. Affre defended the martyrology of Brescia. Natalis Alexandre denounced Papebroch on the subject of the office of the Blessed Sacrament. Laderchir, the continuator of Baronius, endeavoured to excite against them all the oratorians of Italy. The Minims had also some complaint to make about some points in the life of their founder, St. Francis of Paul. Saxius criticised some errors in the lives of St. Gervais and Protas. Montfaucon assailed Sollier on the subject of St. Athanasius' death. Don Bonillard wrote anonymously bitter articles on Sesuad, directed against Du Sollier also. Again, Father Cuiper, when treating of St. James the greater, unconsciously found himself involved in a serious question which agitated all the Spanish schools. But he was more fortunate there than in his dispute with the Dominicans, who would maintain, at all hazards, that the founder of their order was of the noble family of the Guzmans. In this controversy, many of the most learned French Dominicans entered the lists, and Father Mamati, in his annals of the Dominicans, inserted on the subject fifty folio pages, adorned with all that profusion of apostrophe and choice epithets which characterizes the pleadings of the sixteenth century, or the paladins of the thirteenth.

It was a singular exhibition, that all the religious orders should thus have been successively engaged against the Jesuits. The contests had their advantages and disadvantages, and were productive of good and evil, both of which remain even to our time.

This active emulation between all the great religious societies developed powerfully the energy of the Church and of the learned world. The man acquired a new life when he stood forth, backed by his brethren, as the representative and advocate of the whole society; and these societies, profiting by the assaults made against them, adapted themselves better for good. It is certain that the Bollandists turned to account the opposition that was made against them. The great contest with the Carmelites turned on a most important point, namely, the rival schools of criticism—the old and the new—both in extremes, and between which the Acta of the Bollandists were the safe medium. Papebroch inclined towards the new school, and perhaps, if not opposed by the Spanish inquisition, he might have gone too far. The vigilant control thus kept over every quarter of the world by enlightened judges, who were independent and disinterested, was a safeguard for learning—a high tribunal of the intellectual world. A revival on a grand scale, of those ancient scenes when the tribes of Greece, assembling to witness the games of the circus, marked a new era in their calendar of time, by inscribing an additional name on the marble of Olympus.

But passion is always in extremes, and our combatants were lavishing their blood and strength, not in days of peace, and under the friendly eyes of brothers and fathers, but under the enemy's fire, in the hour of danger, when their country was expiring, where the citadel was hemmed round and dismantled, and their watchword should have been "Pro aris et focis." These contests were often useless, and were they not perniciously exhausting that strength which was required elsewhere? And even after peace had been proclaimed, did there not remain a vast feeling of hostility which precipitated more envenomed contests, and by those ever-recurring intestine broils, brought on the sacrifice of some victims? Was not the world soon to behold, not the hagiologist merely, but a great learned society, loaded with the anathemas of the whole world, and exhibited as Ishmael in the desert, as armed against all and attacked by all.

It is told of one venerable old man, the last survivor of a great religious order, that whenever the suppression of the Jesuits was alluded to in his presence, he always maintained a mournful silence.—When once pressed to tell what was, in his opinion, the cause of the suppression, "the jealousy of their brethren," was his only reply.

The controversy against the Acta Sanctorum continued down to the suppression of the Society. The last remarkable reference we find to the Bollandist museum is from the pen of a learned traveller, who visited it in 1774. "Religion and learning," he says, "have erected for themselves a temple, which stands to this day in the greatest splendour, in the city of Antwerp. It rose gradually, but in majestic proportions, under the care of men of the first order, and if it have not already attained absolute perfection, it is because centuries are necessary to perfect a work which aspires to immortality. I know not whether there has ever been erected a literary establishment planned with greater wisdom, where the labourers succeed each other without interruption, and enjoy the tranquillity and ease so indispensable to study and the sciences. This establishment was so constructed that it might last for ever, and it would be still existing if anything on this earth was exempt from the stroke of fortune and the destroying hand of revolution."

This traveller was Dom Anselm Buthod, grand prior of Luxeuil, who was destined, some years later, to be driven from his own beautiful solitude, and die an exile among the ruins of that museum which had so lately elicited his warmest admiration. He had written as if under a presentiment of the events that were coming on. Their tale is briefly told.

On the 20th of September, commissioners appeared in the emperor's name, on the same day, at the same hour, at all the houses of the Jesuits, to read the bull of Clement XIV. and the letters-patent of Maria Theresa announcing the dissolution of the society. Churches, colleges, libraries, archives, sacristies, all were locked, sealed, and confiscated. When the philosophers praised the act, did they forget all their eloquent denunciations of the kings who suppressed the Templars?

All the most celebrated of the Bollandists and the chief historian of Belgium was thrown into prison, and confined two years.

A committee was deliberating during five years on the fate of the others; on one day it decided "that the 'Acta Sanctorum' does not appear adapted for diffusing instruction and aiding the progress of human knowledge." Next day "it admits that the work enjoys a very respectable name in the literary annals of Europe—Boyle and the encyclopædia have praised it." A third time they change—"and will entrust the work to men on whose principles they can depend." But in the meantime, the museum at Antwerp was changed into a military school.

Kaunity had sense enough not to take upon himself the odium of a total suppression, and Maria Theresa being also well inclined, both accepted the generous offer of an abbot of Condisberg, who volunteered to support the Bollandists. But this indulgence was not given without a condition which destroyed the original plan of the Bollandist work. The acts, it was said, "should be given without any commentary, except on questions or facts of importance;" acts already published were not to appear, unless "in very extraordinary circumstances, and for very special reasons;" nor "more inedited acts, unless they be entirely authentic." A few extracts would be enough to prove that they were not authentic—and with regard to inedited but authentic acts, the miracles must be always noted down as not supported by respectable authority.

The museum was transferred to Condisberg in 1778, and yet in spite of all those changes, which should naturally place an insurmountable obstacle to the rapid progress of the work, the Bollandists were loudly assailed for going so slow. An imperial order was issued, that a volume should appear every year, and that the whole work should be concluded in ten years; and should the writers sink under the labour or renounce it, they were to have no successors.

In 1780, Condisberg itself was suppressed, with all the other abbeys, by a new ukase of that Tartar khan, known in European history as the emperor of Germany, Joseph II. The Bollandists were then transported, as if in derision, to an old establishment of the Jesuits, to prepare them perhaps, by the sorrowful associations of their position, for the fate of their departed order.

In 1788, an ecclesiastical commission was appointed to deliberate on the continuation of the Acta. On this occasion it was decided that the Bollandist was valuable merely as a sort of historical repertory—overcharged with enormous details that can never be interesting to the learned world. "It is astonishing," they add, "that when the Jesuits were suppressed the government could have been induced to burthen itself with so absurd a collection. It is more than time to have an end put to it."

On this report the Aulic general decreed the suspension of the pensions, and no more acknowledged the society of the Bollandists. The fatal term was fixed for the 1st of November—All Saints' Day—for that was the day on which the philosophers would celebrate their triumph, as the confiscation of the property of the French clergy was enacted on All Souls' Day.

But the justice of God was beginning to be felt, and all Belgium was ready to rise in arms. Joseph II. had merely time to sell the Bollandist museum by auction. Besides 200,000 florins for the Bellarmine and Bollandist collections, and 16,000 florins, the amount of the pensions withdrawn, and the sale of one third part of the printed books, he got 21,000 florins from the abbot of Jongerloo for whatever remained of the museum.

Providence watched over these precious relics; they were offered to Dom Gertest, but he could not receive them without exposing them to the flames which destroyed his own abbey, De Pont Blais. Dom. Chevreux was urging their translation to St. Germain des pres ; but all the scourges—war, fire, devastation and monopoly, avarice or confiscation, would soon have destroyed them there.

Jongerloo was the post where they were deposited, and when emperors, kings, and philosophers, had carried their persecution there, and expelled the monks, some farmers and illiterate peasants kept, under their humble thatch, those literary treasures which are now preserved under the guardianship of royalty, learning, and religion, not to appear, we hope, until the holy year has been completed—the crown and glory promised, on this earth, to the saints.

The Nuptials.

A TRUE TALE.

CHAPTER I.

EMMA was young and beautiful ; fresh and smiling as the first blush of rosy morning ; her eyes were large and of a deep blue, surmounted by jet black eyebrows, arched in nature's most bewitching form, and fringed with lashes that appeared envious of the gazer's admiration, so long and luxuriant were their veils, shading her sweet and gentle orbs. Her colour, habitually pale, was on this occasion even more than ordinarily pallid, and her whole countenance betokened an extreme melancholy. Sadness appeared to reign undisputedly in her young heart, and her eyes, constantly fixed upon her watch, announced an intense anxiety with regard to the fleeting moments.

"Eleven o'clock, and Alfred comes not," she murmured, with a profound sigh. "Oh ! I shall certainly not willingly allow him to absent himself for the future. And yet how loath he was to leave me, and how affectionately he caressed me, ere he departed, and how often he turned back again to make his adieux. I hope no accident has occurred."

Such were the thoughts of this deserted young creature, who had now been six weeks a wife, and who had unhappily yielded to love's sophistry, and had eloped with the object of her first affections. 'Twas said that Alfred (a young man of wealth and family) was a roué, but certain it is that he so far inveigled the affections of this innocent school-girl, that he induced her to turn aside from the lessons of obedience she had been previously taught, and gained her consent to a hurried and a private marriage.

Presently she heard a hasty step ascending the staircase, a flash of joy passed over the brow of Emma, who rushed towards the door.

"What, can it be you, Mr. Barrington?" she exclaimed ; "what is the matter, you are pale? Where is Alfred?—where is my husband? Answer me quickly."

"Emma, if you were told that your husband, in despite of the vows of love that he has sworn to you—in despite of the oaths of fidelity and constancy that he has so oft breathed in your ear, had become a traitor and a perjurer, what would you do? Would you love him still? And if there was a witness of his perfidy—one who would revenge your wrongs, would you deem his services worthy of gratitude?"

"Oh !" said Emma, in a burst of anguish, "such a jest as this is unworthy of you ; 'tis a refinement upon the most aggravated cruelty ; Alfred could not be unfaithful to me ; no, no, 'tis a monstrous fabrication, an atrocious calumny, and I will not believe it," and a flood of tears fell profusely from this afflicted young creature.

"Emma, I grieve to see you weep ; one so worthless merits not these pure tears."

"Who has told you that he is worthless?" sobbed forth Emma.

"You still doubt, Emma," exclaimed the friend of her husband ; "know you for whom he has sacrificed you?—you who thought that his love was all your own. Go and see who watches by his pillow, who staunches his blood and dresses his wound. And how has he received that wound? He looks not for your care to restore him to health, he has only prepared sorrow for you, not even one word for her to whom he has so often said—'Emma, I love you—you are my life—without you existence would be an unendurable burthen—you are the air which I breathe, and without which I should cease to exist.' Do you still weep for the hypocrite from whom the mask is fallen. Emma, you are deserving of a more fervent love than he could offer you. Once, when you were free, I offered you such a love, and you repulsed me with scorn, and forbid me your presence. But I endured all, because I loved you with such intensity."

Barrington might have spoken for hours, without fear of interruption.

The young wife's tears had ceased. One idea alone occupied her mind, and that idea was that a rival was lavishing her caresses upon Alfred. A strange brilliancy shot from her eyes—"Leave me," she cried ; "Mr. Barrington, leave me, I command you. If I am ignorant of being the dupe of a traitor, I will not be the credulous victim of a hypocrite. Leave me, again I say."

The young girl trembled ; one would scarcely have supposed that under so fragile and gentle an exterior, so much energy and womanly pride would develop itself, but contending emotions were too much for her, her eyes became fixed, a fearful pallor overspread her face, and she fell motionless upon a seat.

CHAPTER II.

Concessions had been made and accepted, confidence restored, and peace had again visited the bosom of Emma.

One morning in May—the sweet and balmy month of May—Alfred and Emma, wrapt up to ecstasy by their attachment to each other, walked happily along, Emma leaning upon the arm of her husband, and gazing upon him with fondness.

"I think, Alfred, you are not quite so pale to-day as you have been of late ; are you suffering as much with your shoulder?—but, methinks, 'tis getting stronger."

"Oh yes, Emma, it will soon be quite well, and yet for the last three months, since that cursed duel, I have suffered a great deal. Oh ! my Emma, how lucky it was that God conducted you, my guardian angel, to me at that time, otherwise I should have died without seeing you, and you would have cursed my memory—you would have abhorred my name, and perhaps might have taught the child whom I hope soon to clasp to my heart in transport, to execrate its father ; but heaven, always merciful, willed it otherwise, and inspired you with the desire and the courage to come to me, to minister to all my little wants, to watch with a wife's fidelity at my pillow, to lavish words of hope and consolation into my heart when all the world had abandoned me. And during that time how much you, my beloved, must have suffered? you did not allow yourself a single moment's repose. At my least sigh or half-uttered moan, you were there watching, like my ministering angel—depriving yourself of every earthly comfort for me."

"Why are you so incessantly recalling the little that I was able to do at that mournful period? you really only make me ashamed that I was not capable of performing more."

"Oh yes, you may say what you like, but I saw you at times, when you were not aware that I was watching you. I saw that you wept when you fancied me sleeping, and that you would instantaneously call forth your sweetest smile to greet me on awaking. Can I ever forget this heroic devotion?"

The gentle girl, blushing, said, "Duty was my only instructor, and although, my beloved Alfred, you have been rather unwise in dispensing your property, yet you will soon be able to pay mortgagees, and then we shall know better how to value wealth. Besides, your uncle has promised that he will appoint you his secretary, which, if you obtain, will leave us nothing to wish for. We shall both practise industry, and if we are not able to amass a fortune for our child, he must work in his turn and assist us, and learn to love and respect us. What do you say, love, is not this a smiling perspective?"

"Yes, Emma, love, we shall all love each other. My uncle will do all he promises, and when once I get my foot on the first step of the ladder, believe me, I shall mount quickly, and to an exalted position too."

"Oh! do not be ambitious, dearest; ambition is a passion that hardens, and finally destroys the finest feelings of the heart."

The next day Alfred received a letter from his uncle, and in two days after he was installed in his productive occupation.

CHAPTER III.

A short time after Alfred's installation into his new employment, he was sent by his uncle on an important mission to Naples. For some time, Emma continued to receive repeated letters containing assurances of the most tender and solicitous affection.

"My beloved Alfred," she would exclaim, "with what intensity he loves me! I was wrong in suspecting him, and he so good and affectionate; and yet I feared he might forget me."

In a little time the letters of Alfred became less frequent, and Emma fancied that when they did arrive, they breathed less of tenderness than they were wont to do, and in her answer she reproached him with this. Alfred replied briefly, that his occupations were such that it was a bore to be obliged to write letters. Emma wrote mildly and soothingly; Alfred replied not. The time was now approaching when she expected to become a mother, she therefore wrote, to remind him of this fact, and besought of him to return to her as soon as possible, but Alfred came not.

After fearful mental as well as bodily suffering, the deserted young wife gave birth to a son. All her sorrows were forgotten when this hapless creature first saw her babe; she pressed it to her heart, and covered it with kisses. For an instant she forgot her abandonment and the perfidy of Alfred. The means he had left her were becoming exhausted; up to this time she daily looked forward to the return of her husband, and although occasional doubts of his constancy now and then presented themselves, yet she always dismissed them, and felt that she was doing gross injustice to her fond Alfred by entertaining them for a moment.

Emma now wrote to say that her little treasury was quite exhausted, and that she required fresh supplies in order to procure necessary nourishment for her lovely boy.

When Emma received the reply to this letter, an apprehension of dread ran through her veins, for she felt that her happiness in this world depended upon its contents. At last, by a burst of energy, she broke the seal, and read these words:

"Tis in vain any longer to deceive you, Emma; the marriage which was performed between us, was gone through, not by a clergyman, but by a disguised friend of mine. Circumstances render it impossible that I can any longer protect you. I send you what you require—a check, and trust that you will live happily.—Farewell.

ALFRED.

"Gracious God! do I not deserve all this for out-raging, as I did, the ties of duty and obedience? Oh! Alfred, your sentence is just, I feel it; but it overwhelms my weak brain. All is then finished for both mother and child. What a silly dupe I was, to believe in man's fidelity? Oh, Alfred! and with what alluring colours did you not gild our future, and what a happy home you tore me from, to plunge me into this misery. And yet how can he reconcile to himself the vows of love and fidelity he has so oft sworn to me, and calling heaven to witness his truth? But God wills that he should abandon me, as I abandoned the good precepts of my youth for him. And what has he not reduced me to?—to be an object of scorn and contempt, not alone to the whole world, but to myself also. Oh! have I deserved this from you, Alfred?"

After exhausting herself in vehement exclamations, Emma became more calm, shattered as she had been by so violent a shock, tears abundant and bitter relieved her aching brain.

The next day was dark and gloomy, as if mourning for the wreck of the young mother's hopes, and although the weather was cold and piercing, yet a female, lightly clad, was seen to emerge from a house, and step softly to the neighbouring post, where she safely deposited a letter—this female was the heart-broken Emma. Then fearing that her precious babe might arouse, she hastened back, and hurriedly entered. A man was standing in the room, holding the infant in his arms. On hearing the light footstep, he turned round, and Emma exclaimed "Mr. Barrington, you here!"

Barrington started when he saw the pale and careworn countenance of the once blooming and joyous girl, he told her that having lately returned from abroad, he several times desired to see her, but as he had nothing agreeable to communicate, he thought it better to avoid the explanation, until a consideration of the cruelty of suspense induced him to take courage, and assuring her that nothing but the intensity of his friendship could induce him to make so disagreeable a disclosure, concluded by stating that Alfred was about being married to a countess, with five thousand a-year, but that the lady was about five-and-thirty years of age.

Emma had sufficient command over her feelings coolly to demand when he thought the marriage would take place.

"In a month from this," replied Barrington; "In a month," she repeated, musingly, and instantly the features of the young girl became animated, as if a sudden and irrevocable resolution had been formed.

CHAPTER IV.

The cathedral clock of Naples had just chimed and forewarned the expecting multitude that the hour of twelve had arrived. The church was brilliantly lighted, and crowded with the faithful, many of whom were drawn thither by curiosity, whilst others approached the holy shrine from motives pure and praiseworthy. The cause of the unusual excitement was that a marriage was about being solemnized, and a marriage in high life too, which wears a more attractive aspect than the poor and unobserved nuptials of the great masses of the struggling and hard-working population. On a sudden a female entered, of wild and haggard appearance, who although in the first blush of youth, yet bore the traces of premature decay and early sorrows. She rushed through the crowd, and ascending the altar steps, deposited something wrapped in a quantity of clothes, at the feet of the priest. She then placed herself before the kneeling couple, upright and fearless as an unwelcome phantom. Alfred at first did not recognize the author of this unseemly disturbance, for his were the nuptials that were about receiving the benediction of the priest. He recognized her not, so wild had her gentle eyes become, so attenuated her once matchless figure, so deadly pale was that once rosy cheek. This poor and wasted being was after walking fifty miles on foot, living upon her tears, and nourishing her infant with blood rather than milk. This weak and hapless being had arrived at the end of her journey just in time to enact the scene we have just described. Alfred looked and started. Emma fixed her large eyes, which appeared to become larger and wilder, upon the object of her heart's young devotion, then she glanced towards the female figure, thickly veiled, that knelt beside him, and lastly, she looked round and smiled upon the astonished congregation.

When she saw the church, radiant as it was with hundreds of brilliant lights, a terrible convulsion passed across her pale face, a fearful, hysteric laugh burst harshly upon the ear, and her countenance became painful to look upon. She tried to speak, but could not, the intensity of her suffering choked her utterance. For an instant she remained motionless as a statue, then turning towards the altar, she ascended the steps, and kneeling stooped, and taking her infant, which she had deposited there, clasped it to her bosom, and with wild and haggard looks passed out through the affrighted and astonished crowd, who murmured in pitying accents, "Poor thing! she is mad."

At the same instant, the young bridegroom, who had been kneeling before the altar, suddenly arose, and penetrating the crowd, followed in the direction of the young female, for he had recognized her, and could no longer doubt as to her identity. Alfred—the proud, the ambitious Alfred—was subdued, on seeing the deserted wife and helpless infant; and he now only saw her as the Emma of his first, his earliest love: he thought of her alone as the fond and faithful guardian of his sick bed—and now, for the first time, the feelings of a father took possession of his heart. And this was the first meeting with his child, and he was the cause of the misery and destitution of its unhappy mother.

"Emma, my own loved Emma! pardon and speak to me," he cried, rushing wildly after her.

He saw her slight and attenuated form passing rapidly before him, and he redoubled his speed in order to overtake her, at the same time calling loudly upon her. But madness had added speed to her tottering frame, and she flew heedlessly on. Having reached the end of the street, she had gained the bridge—a horrible idea now crossed Alfred's mind, he saw her mount the parapet, and without an instant's prevarication, dash herself and her helpless baby from its summit. A piercing cry escaped him, which was answered by a scream from the water, of "Alfred, Alfred! save my baby." Breathless and without a moment's thought, he precipitated himself after her, and both disappeared without a struggle.

The next day two bodies were discovered by the early fishermen, one was that of a female, attenuated and sparingly clad, having upon her finger a ring, on which was inscribed these words, "Alfred to Emma;" the other was the body of a man, dressed with care and elegance, and who was at once recognized as the young and fascinating bridegroom who had the preceding morning entered the church with such a proud and elastic step.

Reader, my tale is not imaginary, but is true as it is sad, and may contain a salutary moral to the young and unsuspecting. The curse of disobedience was upon the hapless Emma, it embittered her young life, and sent her, a maniac, to a foreign land, where an untimely death relieved her from her misery.

Paraguay and the Jesuits.

THE fame of the missionaries began to spread among the wandering tribes. Wherever they went, they were received with open arms, they were hailed by the poor Indians as saviours, their exhortations were listened to, and proselytes were so numerous, that they conceived it possible to form a Christian republic, guided and governed by the law of God, and far removed from the conventional forms of the old European states. The task, though difficult, and beset with obstacles, was not impossible. They commenced in good earnest, by soliciting the approval and authority of the Spanish king. They stated in a memorial to the king and council, that the reasons why Christianity made so little progress among the savage nations, and why those who had received the faith and been baptized, so frequently and so easily fell back to their old superstitions and erratic habits, were—their cruel treatment by the Spanish settlers, who neglected no occasion of profiting by rapacity; who seized and sold them as slaves, ground them to the earth, by forcing them to labour; and by their licentious conduct and unprincipled demeanour, undid what the missionaries effected by advice, zeal, and charity. To save those who had been baptized, and to convert others, they deemed it necessary to remove the Indians from the example and control of the old colonists. They therefore prayed authority to form into a Christian state the nations they might hereafter convert; that they might be allowed to govern it, subject to the Spanish crown. They also prayed for enquiry into the present grievances of those already converted, and redress against their oppressors. At this period

Spain and its extensive dominions were under the sway of the third Philip, a humane but indolent monarch. He approved of the project, and gave it the full sanction of his authority and by rescript commanded that no one should maltreat the Indians, or injure or interfere with those holy men in their labours for humanity and religion. This rescript was frequently confirmed by his successors; but the distance from home, the all-corrupting desire of wealth, the comparatively defenceless nature of the Indians, the jealousy towards the Jesuits, rendered those humane commands of no avail in numberless instances. This authority to govern those whom they converted or succeeded afterwards in converting, was a source of disquietude and trouble to the Jesuits. It subjected them to innumerable quarrels, vexatious calumnies, imputations of avarice and ambition. They encountered hunger and thirst, and frequently death, for the sake of the ignorant and benighted savages. They were required like their divine master. They had but one object—God's glory—and this they pursued, heedless of the applause or the hatred of the world.

To remedy the evils complained of by the Jesuits in their memorial, a royal visitor, Alfaro, was sent from Spain, with full directions to enquire, and on ascertaining the truth of the allegations, to make such changes in the laws as would leave the Indians no reasonable cause of complaint. His dispositions were at first favourable to the oppressed, and he drew up and promulgated some regulations on their behalf, but he met with so much opposition and found it so difficult to induce the parties interested in the continuance of the abuses to submit to his views, that he abandoned or mitigated them. He sailed up the Paraguay, through rich vallies, thick woods, and verdant banks, and as he approached Assumpcion, he was met by a bark covered with green boughs and flowers, bringing the son of the cacique of the Guaycurus, who wished thus to compliment him, and sought permission to pay his respects in person. This was caused by the rumour that the visitor was friendly to the natives, and that the burthens under which they laboured would be lightened. The result, however, was contrary to their just expectations. After a year or two, things returned to their old courses. The Spaniards and their descendants were as cruel and overbearing as ever. They claimed a right to the country and authority over its inhabitants. They endeavoured to conquer them, to reduce them to submission by force or fraud; they hunted them through their forests, they used every means in their power, sometimes by promises of protection from their enemies, sometimes by treaties, which they violated as soon as made; sometimes the missionaries themselves advised submission, to avoid bloodshed.

Before the formation of "reductions" in Paraguay and most of the neighbouring Spanish American possessions, the subjected natives were kept in what were termed "encomiendas." They were of two descriptions: when the natives were subdued by force, they remained (like the Russian boors) serfs of the soil, they could not be sold, nor were they, in general, treated badly; they were supplied with food and raiment. If the natives submitted willingly, they were allowed a sort of municipal government, but the chief was always a Spaniard. The males, between eighteen and fifty, were bound to labour for two months in the year. Women and children were exempt from work, except for their own profit. In the third generation, they were entitled to their freedom. But this system, which was not meant to be oppressive, was never fairly carried out, and up to the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits, avarice and fraud contrived by one pretext or another to continue the natives in slavery, mitigated or augmented according to the caprice of their masters. Alfaro promised to abolish the system, but he never did so. He endeavoured, on the contrary, to combine the system with that which the Jesuits were beginning to found. He wished that they should take charge of three Indian settlements, of over one thousand inhabitants each, on the banks of the Guarambare; but the fathers declined. They said the Indians never could be persuaded that the yoke of Christ was light, while those who professed to be his followers treated them so hardly and mercilessly. A capitation tax on every free coloured man, of three dollars, was imposed. It was subsequently extended to females, and to enable them to pay it, they were placed under the protection of some rich Spaniard or ecclesiastic, to whom they became serfs. Scarcely anything was gained from this visit, save the confirmation of the royal decree: that the Guaranies and the Guaycurus should not be submitted to the encomienda system, but that to the society alone should be confided the task of teaching, civilizing, and making them subject to the crown of Spain.

By the labours of Fathers Cataldino and Maceta, four reductions were built and populated in 1614, but as yet the number of Christians was not very great. Many of the savages came through curiosity, and again went away, when they found the necessity of restraining themselves, and submitting to order. Many came to avoid the cruelty of the Spaniards and the Portuguese, to get food, and could not be prevailed on to remain when their temporary necessity was supplied. It therefore became necessary to use some caution and reserve with those who were to be received. Another reduction was formed at a place called Itapua the following year, by the labours of Father Gonzalez. This same year there came from Europe, by the permission and command of the General Vitelleschi, a reinforcement of thirty-seven missionaries, with the celebrated Father Viana at their head. This holy and zealous missionary was born at Navarre, and devoted himself to the missions. He was universally esteemed and beloved. When about to leave for the new world, the chiefs of his native place invited him to pass through the town, anxious to see him once again, but like St. Francis Xavier, who would not visit his parents, he declined the honours intended for him. He was informed that if he consented, his nephew, who was in prison, would be set at liberty, but he replied that if his nephew was innocent he ought not to suffer—if guilty, he wished not his freedom. By the arrival of those fathers, some of the towns which were in great spiritual destitution, were supplied with pastors, and from them professors were chosen for the colleges of Buenos Ayres, Santa Fe, and St. Michael.

A contagious disease broke out in the old "Reductions," which carried off very many of the converts; but this was a less source of trouble than the infamous conduct of the inhabitants of the Spanish town of Villarica, who neglected no opportunity of seizing and making slaves of the poor Indians, in spite of laws and regulations. To avoid their mal-practices, the fathers broke up the "reductions," and removed with their poor people to the other side of the Paranapane and Pirape, but they soon discovered that in avoiding one evil they fell into a far greater one, when they approached the Portuguese territory, and came near the district where the town of St. Paul was built. This town and its infamous population effected so much evil, wrought so much destruction, was so fatal an obstacle to the zeal of the Jesuits, that, it is necessary to make special mention of it.

In the year 1554, a small town was built in lat. 23° 30 south, and lon. 46° 30 west. The district around was called Piratininga; the air is good, the soil fertile and rich, it produces wheat and sugar canes, the people were mild and gentle. The town was built on a steep rock, and was almost impregnable from its position. Deeming it advantageously placed, the climate being wholesome, and the population inoffensive and submissive, Father Nobrega left St. Vincents, removed his seminary and college, and having arrived at his destination on the eve of the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, he called his new church after the apostle, and in the course of years the town itself was named St. Paul. The labours of the fathers for some time were eminently successful; many of the Indians were converted. But by degrees a sad change became apparent; licentiousness, and almost a general corruption of morals took place, convicts flying from justice, robbers skulking from detection, desperadoes, murderers, freebooters of all nations, Spanish, Dutch, Italian, and Portuguese flocked into the town, which became the terror of the neighbouring country, not alone of the poor defenceless Indians, but also of the European colonist, and the docile inhabitants of the "reductions." When force failed, the people of St. Paul had recourse to every sort of fraud and deceit. It has been calculated that in their lawless expeditions they despoiled the country of over 2,000,000 of people. One of their most successful methods of entrapping the Indians was, to assume the dress of the Jesuits and imitate their manners. Pretending to be preachers of Christianity, they erected crosses; they made presents and exhorted their hearers to embrace the Christian religion. When they had attracted numbers, they led them to some spot which they said was more convenient for teaching and residing, where the people found themselves surrounded by armed ruffians, who carried them off to hopeless slavery. A considerable time elapsed before the Jesuits could persuade the wandering tribes that they were not the authors and actors in those depredations. They plundered equally—the Spaniards and the Portuguese—and were utterly regardless of all laws, human and divine, except the indulgence of rapacity and violence. They were indefatigable in their expeditions in search of slaves and mines. A herd of Indian slaves repaid amply their fatigues. They detested the Jesuits with a most malignant hatred, as being the chief obstacle in their iniquitous career.

In the year 1623, the "reductions," which had been founded on the banks of the rivers Parana and the Uruguay, were under the control of Father Gonzales, a man of zeal and prudence. He resolved to explore the latter river in the hopes of finding a still more extensive field for his labours. The attempt, however, only partially succeeded. The Uruguay, one of the great arms of the Plata, is over eight hundred miles long. At its source, in lat. 27° 30, it is a mere streamlet. It receives, however, in its course many small rivers, and gradually it enlarges its bed till it becomes in some places seven and at its mouth four miles wide. The navigation is very difficult, nay, almost impossible, on account of the many rocks, rapids, and falls, except at the time when periodical inundations occur. It abounds in fish, which the natives shoot with arrows. Birds of the richest plumaged well on its banks. Wild beasts, the leopard and the tiger, were also to be found; and the inhabitants, almost as wild, exercising their courage and skill in hunting them. It is full of islands, which then were covered with brushwood and thickets.

Some of the Indians on its banks, having heard of the Jesuits and their "reductions," came to Itapua, which Father Gonzales had formed, and having satisfied themselves of the happy state and comforts which the new Christians enjoyed, made so favourable an impression on their countrymen, that two "reductions" were formed. At this time the province of La Plata was separated from Paraguay, and formed a distinct government. So favourably disposed were the people, who as yet had been visited along the Uruguay, that Father Gonzales resolved to explore its whole course. In 1627, he entered a mountainous district which extends nearly six hundred miles. It is within fifteen leagues of the Brazilian sea, and about eight days' journey from the river Uruguay. It is called the Tapè, is intersected by many rivers, beautifully diversified in its scenery, and rich and fertile in its produce. The bird seen most frequently was the guirape, of white plumage; its note was like the sound of a bell. An animal remarkably singular frequents the eastern part of the country, it is about the size of a sheep, with the ferocity of a tiger. The Indians were generally afraid of it, as from its speed it is very difficult to escape its pursuit; should refuge be taken from it in a tree, Charlevoix says, that it remains gnawing at the trunk till it falls, and the victim is devoured immediately—it is called the "Ao" in the language of the country. The people of Tapè were a colony from Guayra. They spoke the same language and were mild and docile in their manners. Like all mountaineers, they were attached to liberty; they disliked strangers, lest they might seek to enslave them. They readily embraced the Christian religion and a considerable number of "reductions" were formed among them in the course of years.

About forty miles east of the Uruguay, the indefatigable Father Gonzales, with his associate Father Rodriguez, were, in 1628, engaged in teaching and reclaiming a tribe called the Caaroans. They were a branch of the Indians of the Tapè. The fathers were gradually overcoming every difficulty. The people, in great numbers, were coming to the Faith, and abandoning their former mode of living. Great hopes were entertained of the conversion of the entire population. But there were many among them who hated the Jesuits, and their daily increasing authority. The chiefs of many localities, the jugglers seeing their own influence decaying, formed a conspiracy which caused much evil. An Indian named Potivara, who had been living some time in one of the Jesuit reductions, and had deserted on account of the restraints imposed on him, was the chief agent. The "reduction" of All Saints was in course of erection, a new church had been just finished, when the conspiracy broke out. Gonzales was after celebrating the holy sacrifice of the Mass, and was giving some directions regarding the raising of the bell into its place, when he was set upon and murdered. A violent blow on the head felled him to the ground, another shattered his skull to pieces. Father Rodriguez almost immediately shared his fate—he was not separated in death from him with whom he laboured in life. Their remains were dragged about in triumph, the church was burned and the rising town destroyed. But the triumph of the murderers and their accomplices was of short duration; the Christians of the neighbouring towns and villages assembled in force—they were assisted by a body of Spanish horse—they attacked the infidels—killed numbers—made prisoners of a great many, and broke their power irretrievably. During their short-lived success, the combined natives sought to unbaptize any of the converts that fell into their hands. The chief dressed himself in the priestly vestments, and removed the baptism by scrubbing the head with hot water, and scraping the tongue to remove the salt placed on it. Gonzales is described as a man of great holiness and untiring zeal; he was born at Assumpcion, and had toiled for nearly twenty years in his labours of charity. His body, and that of his companion, were brought to Concepcion. They were consigned to their mother earth with great honours, with the most imposing ceremonies—the solemn ritual, the glorious music of the church were in requisition. The heart of Gonzales and an arrow with which it was pierced were forwarded to that eternal city, where so many relics and memorials of the great and holy exist. In memoria eterna erit justus.

This victory gave only a short breathing time to the new Christians. Far greater misfortunes awaited them. In 1629, the desperadoes of St. Paul sent an expedition against the "reductions." Up to this time, about twenty-one had been formed in the provinces of Uruguay and Guayra, and the blessings of order, peace, and religion were changing the whole country. The Panlistas first assailed the "reduction" of Incarnation; very many of the inhabitants escaped into the woods, but a great number of those who were employed in the environs were carried off. The Jesuit Father Montoya* followed those wretches, accompanied by numbers whom he induced to take up arms for the rescue of their brethren. He pursued them to their camp, which he entered with undaunted resolution; he represented to them that unless they gave up their prisoners the whole country would be up in arms, and that not a man would be allowed to escape. His intrepidity and courage so terrified the enemy that he recovered all his flock, and led them back to their homes.

Many of the "reductions" were at this period in a very tottering condition; they required all the care and attention of the fathers to keep their inhabitants fixed in their good resolutions. It was extremely difficult to eradicate their old customs and superstitions, and there was no greater obstacle to their improvement than the incessant turmoil which the Panlistas and the inhabitants of Villa Rica created by their slave hunts. Another very great difficulty was the influence of their jugglers, and many who were well disposed to the Gospel were seduced by their artifices. The overland journey from Brazil to Paraguay was expressly forbidden to all persons, no matter how exalted, lest the Spaniards or Brazilians should commit excesses, and thereby endanger or hinder the good work which was being accomplished by the fathers with so much toil and zeal. In spite of this regulation, Lewis de Cespedes, the newly appointed governor, made an exception in his own favour and came to Loretto. While there he received the greatest respect and obedience; he expressed himself highly pleased with everything he saw, yet either would not or could not afford them assistance against their inveterate enemies, who, he was aware, were preparing another inroad among those poor people. He had scarcely left, when the wretches assailed the "reduction" of St. Antonio; they murdered those who resisted—they carried off the young—they abused the women. Many fled to the church, but it was no protection. The town was destroyed. Father Mola appealed in vain to the miscreants—he represented the iniquity of their conduct—he threatened the vengeance of God and man; he might as well have preached to the stones. The greater number of the inhabitants were carried off in chains; but in the course of the journey a considerable portion of them made their escape back to the town, where they found their pastor overwhelmed with grief and stupified by misfortune. He led them with him to the "Incarnation;" but he was nearly murdered during the journey—the Indians having begun to suspect that possibly he might have been in league with their enemies. The reductions of St. Michael, Jesus Maria, and St. Paul, were also attacked, plundered, burned—their churches profaned—their inhabitants butchered, or carried off to slavery—prayers, supplications, threats, every effort that courage or compassion, love or zeal for religion could inspire were made by the Jesuits in defence of their children in Christ. But in vain. Of the poor Indians, those who died in their peaceful homes were the happiest; those who survived were hurried off to lives of wretchedness. They perished in hundreds before they arrived at their destination—the markets at Rio Janerio. The young and old met the same destiny—death or slavery. Some died from over-toil, others from hunger, and exhaustion. As long as charity, intrepidity, tenderness, unbounded zeal, dauntless heroism continue dear to humanity, so long should the memories of the Jesuit Fathers Montoya, Mola, Emmanuel, Morato, Maceta, Salazar, be cherished. Their names are little known save to some curious student or zealous admirer of the order to which they belonged; but their reward is far greater than transitory applause or perishable fame.

Guayra was the first province in which the Jesuits had sought to establish a Christian republic. They were eminently successful. They commenced their labours for that object in 1609, and in 1629 they had a well-organized community, amounting (according to Father Charlevoix) to 100,000 people. Their towns were as well built, as clean, and as well kept as any of the Spanish settlements. The inhabitants were as well conducted, nay, were far more so than the Spaniards. They were infinitely better Christians. But there was no longer any security for those poor people; they were unable to protect themselves, and the Spanish governor refused to defend them. It was finally determined to emigrate to some distant locality, where they could live unmolested. All the "reductions" in Guayra had been destroyed save two, St. Ignatius and Loretto. Their united populations amounted to about twelve thousand people. They gathered provisions, they constructed over seven hundred boats for the navigation of the Parana, and the signal for departure being given, they strip the churches and their houses of everything they could carry with them. They embarked and sailed safely for a few days, till they arrived at the falls, which for thirty leagues, render the river no longer navigable.

It was planned at first to carry their canoes until they again arrived at the navigable portion of the stream, but the Paulists having heard of the emigration, after destroying the abandoned town, were in close pursuit of the fugitives, and there was no alternative except to abandon their vessels, which, in a few moments, were shattered to atoms by the violence of the current. They then commenced their journey on foot, each man took his staff and bundle. Women and children, young and old, had to force their way through thickets and forests, unknown and untrodden, save by wild beasts. Their sufferings were so great, that a pestilence broke out, which carried off great numbers. They suffered greatly from hunger. After a most harassing journey, the survivors arrived at a small river, a tributary of the Parana, where, in a rich country, watered by many streams, under the care and guidance of Father Montoya, who never left but shared their toils, they rebuilt the towns of Loretto and St. Ignatius.

Local Memoirs of Ireland.

SWORDS.

It has been frequently observed, that no city in Europe, perhaps in the world, can boast of such varied and interesting environs as the metropolis of Ireland. Their beauties, however, are comparatively little explored, and the historical associations of the localities which are occasionally the objects of a holiday visit, are, for the most part, terra incognita even to educated Irishmen. Long has it been the cherished hope of many a faithful heart, which beats high with holiest aspirations for the weal and glory of the dear old land, to remove this stigma from our national character; and although at present all around wears an aspect of the gloomiest—no mortal ken perceiving a safe resting-place beyond our wide sea of sorrow—hope, the comforter, tells us, that the time will come, perhaps speedily, when Ireland, regenerated, shall guard with jealous pride, the names and histories of her saints and heroes, and leave no spot unnoticed which has been consecrated by their presence and their labours. We hope, indeed, to see the day when the history of every locality in Ireland, from the earliest to the latest period, will be unfolded, and become one of the safeguards of our nationality, by preserving the memories of heroic and pious deeds, and by inspiring the souls of Irishmen with a holy hatred of oppression and a love of true freedom.

Among the several pleasant localities within easy access of Dublin, few present more objects of historical and antiquarian interest than Swords. Like many towns and villages which were flourishing places in the last generation, the “pot-walloping borough” is rapidly declining. The immediate cause of decay in this instance is the near proximity of the Dublin and Drogheda railway, which has removed the high road of traffic from the old town. Few persons could now recognize in the silent and almost deserted village, the turbulent scene of an Irish election fifty years ago. The “Anchor Inn,” the scene of election contest, when Swords returned two members to the Irish parliament, is as silent as if the sounds of discord and faction never echoed within its walls. The “Harp” is unstrung, and the “Black Bull” roars no more with noisy merriment. The office of “portreeve” of this “walled and good town” of the sixteenth century is now a sinecure, in the gift of the Protestant archbishop of Dublin; and Mr. D’Alton quaintly informs us that the stocks “intended for the refractory portion of the seneschal’s subjects are now the usual roost of the village poultry.” We are not quite certain whether Peter Early continues his usual “welcome.” Rome and Garryowen rose, “culminated” (as our moralizing friend, Dr. Lyons, would say), and fell; so Swords had its day of glory, and is now no more than a shadow of its former self. Successive waves of civilization passed over it, each undulation changing the character of the town, but still preserving it. The march of steam seems likely to soon annihilate it. Henceforth we must look for the memorials of its past state in historical books and monuments. ’Tis now time we should betake ourselves to such serious investigation.

Swords is situated about seven miles from Dublin, on one of the old leading roads from the metropolis to the north of Ireland. It is about two miles north of Malahide, from which town it is an easy and a pleasant walk. The aspect of the village is ancient and picturesque. The first object which meets the visitor’s attention is the site of the old abbey, with the bell towers of its church, and a round tower surmounted by a cross. No other vestige of this once extensive monastic establishment now remains. The Protestant parochial church stands upon a portion of its site, and rejoicing, as it does, in most of the architectural absurdities of the nineteenth century, superadds the offence of being built out of the materials of the ancient abbey. Within this church there are some monuments. Those of Dean Scardeville and Dr. Hewetson, dean of Christ Church and vicar of Swords, are conspicuous. They, however, possess little artistic merit, and are not of ancient date. This is probably the site of the church said to have been founded in this locality by St. Columba, in the early part of the sixth century, around which, in process of time, a town sprung up, bearing the name of “the city of St. Columbkille.” We are told the saint gave the church a missal written by himself, which for centuries was preserved with pious veneration.

Aftentimes saw this foundation extend to a considerable monastic establishment; and Swords, with its several chapels, wayside crosses, and holy-wells, presented the aspect of a town of the middle ages. The solemn procession which conveyed the bodies of Brian Boromhe and his son Murrrough to their last resting-place, after the victory of Clontarf, halted here for a night, whilst the monks chanted their orisons for the eternal weal of the mighty spirits who had departed; and then proceeded to Duleek in Meath, whence it was accompanied by the brotherhood of that monastery to Armagh, the final destination of the remains of the illustrious dead. It must have been a grand sight, that funeral procession of a victorious monarch, who, in a short reign, had knit the discordant elements of Irish society into a kingly host for the defence of fatherland. The memory fondly dwells on the career of that great Christian king and warrior, but on no scene of it with greater interest and pride than that with which it closed for ever. The imagination can well picture to the mind the gorgeous though mournful array which accompanied his remains to their narrow home. The uplifting of the corpse of the venerable veteran; the bearing of it aloft by his loving subjects and faithful companions in arms; the commencement of the picturesque train of kerns and gallowglasses; their arrival at the gates of Swords; the slow and solemn approach of cowed monks and vested priests, with the symbol of man's only hope, and burning lights borne before them; the rich and mellow swell of hundreds of voices in the grand old offices of the Church—all form a subject on which the imagination loves to dwell, and which we hope a national art will one day embody with its utmost skill.

The church of Swords still continues a prebend of St. Patrick's cathedral. Several persons of distinction and even foreigners have enjoyed the honours and emoluments of the "golden prebend." Amongst the latter the names of William of Wykeham, the celebrated bishop of Winchester and builder of the cathedral of that diocese, and Brande, Cardinal of Placentia, are found.

Andrew Sall,* whose "doleful fall" is lamented by Bishop French, obtained this prebend in 1675 as the reward of his apostasy. The rectory of Ardmulcan and the chantership of Cashel were likewise added to the premium, and "he who would have died a beggar," says Dr. O'Connor, "had he remained a Catholic, lived to 1612 in affluence, purchased by the trade of religion." The fall of this celebrated divine at an advanced period of his life, furnishes scope for melancholy and humiliating reflection. He was born and educated in the faith, at an early age was admitted a member of the renowned society of Jesuits, in their most glorious days; professed divinity and moral theology successively at Salamanca, Pampeluna, Placentia, and Tudela: and finally, was deemed worthy of the office of superior of the mission of his order in his native country. In the sixty-second year of his age he retired to his native city of Cashel, "to spend," as he himself writes, the remainder of his days unknown, to prepare better for the long day of eternity." It was in this retreat he unfortunately yielded to temptation, occasioned, it may be, by his becoming acquainted with Dr. Price, the Protestant archbishop of Cashel. The year following he abandoned the Church "wherein for a tyme he shined like a small starr in virtue and learning," and for the remaining eight years of his life prepared for the "long day of eternity" by enjoying the reward of his mournful apostasy.

Leaving the church-yard, and crossing the rivulet which runs through the village, the eye is attracted by an extensive mass of ruins, which once constituted the palace of the archbishop of Dublin. It contained within its bounds a chapel dedicated to St. Columba, and all the appurtenances of domestic buildings of its era. Time and vandalism, however, have played sad work with this once fair and extensive pile. Nothing now remains but the extensive wall, with vestiges of a few of the old watch-towers, a gate, and a window. The area circumscribed by these at present forms an orchard. The parliament of the pale sat frequently within those walls, and a gable yet standing is popularly said to mark the chamber where its sage deliberations were actually held. There formerly existed a chapel dedicated to St. Bridget, in the immediate vicinity of the palace, and a cross called "Pardon Cross," to which the mediæval privilege of sanctuary was allowed. But the advance of "civilization" has removed those memorials of our fathers' ways.

* Historical Works of the Right Rev. Nicholas French, bishop of Ferns. Duffy's Library of Ireland.

Our annalists are disposed to assign a high degree of antiquity to the town of Swords. The "Four Masters" inform us that one of the companions of Heremon founded a fortress here. Be that as it may, it is quite certain that a town existed here in the tenth and eleventh centuries, which was often the prey as well as the home of the Danish invaders. In 1192, the archbishop of Dublin obtained a patent for holding an annual eight-day fair in the town, on the feast of St. Columbkille, and in 1197 king Richard granted it a charter of incorporation. Swords returned its first members to parliament in 1585, from which period till the time of the union it continued to send representatives to the Irish parliament. It then lost its electoral privileges, and received as compensation the sum of £15,000, which was vested in trustees' hands for the education of the children of the poorer inhabitants of the parish.

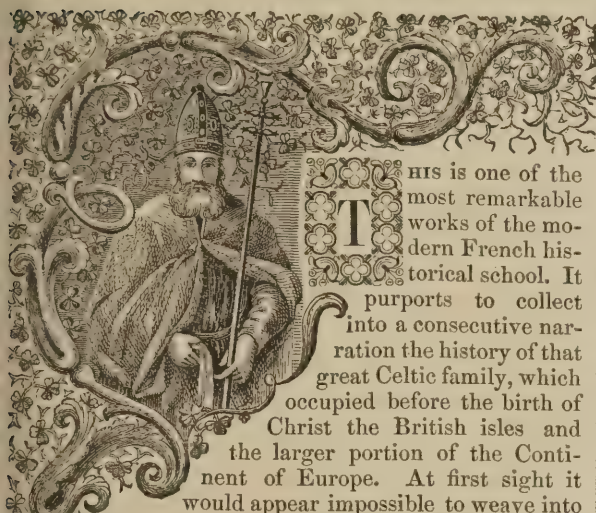

The leading Anglo-Irish Catholics of the pale assembled in Swords on the 9th of December, 1611, to form a league for the preservation of their lives and properties. On the following day, the lords justices issued their warrant, commanding these gentlemen and their adherents to separate, and summoning nine of their leaders to appear before them at the council by "ten o'clock the next morning, to show the cause of their assembling together in that manner." The confederate Catholics immediately replied, "that they were constrained to meet there for the safety of their lives, which they conceived to be in no small danger, having been forced to forsake their dwellings on the last Tuesday at night, by the rising out of horse-troops and foot-companies, who, on the said night killed four Catholics for no other reason but because they bore the name of that religion, and that they had been before put into many fears by certain intelligence given them of unexpected attempts against their lives. Wherefore they desired ardently to be in some certain way assured by their lordships of the safety of their lives, before they run the hazard thereof, which was the only motive that hindered them from manifesting that obedience which they knew to be due to their lordships' commands." This answer not being pleasing to the justices, they sent Sir Charles Coote, with a considerable force, to reduce the Irish army. On his approaching Swords, "he found the access to the village strictly blocked up, yet so managed the attempt as he soon forced them to flight, beating them out of their fortifications, and killed two hundred of their men, without any considerable loss on his side, more than Sir Lorenzo Cary, second son of the Lord Falkland, late lord-deputy." Sir Charles Coote having completely routed the confederates, returned to Dublin. In the subsequent forfeitures, many of the old Anglo-Irish Catholics lost considerable portions of their property. This was the beginning of the movement of the Catholics of the pale in the "rising of 1641," commonly called the great rebellion. From this event to the time of the legislative union, Swords was remarkable for little more than the bribery and riotous scenes practised at the elections by the "pot-wallopers" of the borough, as the respectable persons possessing the elective franchise were called, being only the Protestant inhabitants six months resident previous to the election.

Within a short distance of the town are the ruins of Glassmore Abbey, Turvey, the ancient seat of the Barnewalls, and other objects worthy of attention, which may form the subjects of another day's ramble.

Histoire des Gaulois.

PAR AMEDEV THIERRY.

THIRD EDITION.

THIS is one of the most remarkable works of the modern French historical school. It purports to collect into a consecutive narration the history of that great Celtic family, which occupied before the birth of Christ the British isles and the larger portion of the Continent of Europe. At first sight it would appear impossible to weave into one story the scattered notices of the Celts, found in the classic authors, their contests with Rome and Carthage, their successful invasions of Africa and Greece, and the foundation of a Celtic or Gaulish kingdom in Asia Minor. But with the aid of the old traditions of Gaul, and of those islands, supported by copious extracts from the classics, the author is enabled to overcome the difficulty, and to give a sketch little inferior to what might be expected from a condensation of a series of native annalists. There are, of course, occasional links wanting in the chain; conjecture may occasionally usurp the place of history, the primeval tenants of the Celtic forests may not appear so clearly before us, as their sons pouring over the Alps and desolating the fair fields of Italy, or making the last glorious stand for their independence against the first of Cæsars; but there is yet an ancient history of the Celts, and as no other uncivilized nation of ancient Europe has the slightest claim to.

The interest taken by M. Thierry in his task, is not that which the British antiquarian would feel for the Celtic race, which the sword of the Saxon drove from the plains of Britain to the mountains of Cumberland, Cornwall, and Wales. The French, that great people who have ever been for good or ill, the most powerful agents in European life, are a Celtic people. They may not, it is true, be "idle" and "lazy," and "filthy," and "spiritless," or "cowardly," or have any of those odious qualities which a brutal and ignorant press represents, to a proud and gullible populace, as the inclinable attributes of Celtic nature. Yet they are Celts, and our author, not denying that like other races they have their faults, glories in the fact that the French are Celts. Of the present population of France he computes, that nineteen-twentieths are of that race, a fact that the great Anglo Saxon of the English press may have some difficulty in accounting for. For could it be possible that a horde of Celts now reigns over the fair plains of Normandy and Anjou, and Bretagne, once held by the Anglo Norman, who has thus lost a territory larger and richer than England itself! The worst vices of the Celt are the spawn of English tyranny.

The first edition of "The History of the Gauls" appeared in 1828, and the third edition from which we quote was published, revised, and augmented in 1845. During the long interval many criticisms appeared which were sometimes unfavourable, but left the general statements in the work unimpeachable. The reader will find in the preface to the third edition, an enumeration of the principal critics, the points which they urged, and the modification which the author introduced in some of his statements on final revision and discussion of antagonist arguments. It is not our intention to follow him in his arguments, but simply to give a few sketches of the results to which they conducted him.

When Cæsar invaded Gaul, that country was held by three races: the Celts or Gauls, properly so called, the Aquitani, and the Belgæ. The first and last were the same family, differing slightly in language and manners; the Aquitani resembled the Iberian race, the ancient inhabitants of Spain, whose language it is now generally believed was entirely different from the Celts. The remains of it still found in the names of places between the Pyrenees and the Garonne, establish, in the opinion of Humboldt, its identity with the language yet spoken in the Basque provinces of Spain.

The first irruption of the Celts from Gaul was about 1600 years before Christ, vol. I. p. 6. Hordes of adventurers swept in succession over the Pyrenees, pushed their conquests to the pillars of Hercules, conquered half the kingdom, and bequeathed their name to the North Western Peninsula, now known as Gallek or Gallicia. From the admixture of the conquered and conquering races, arose the people who appear so frequently in Classic history as the Celtiberi. The ancient tradition that the Irish race came from Spain, and that they spoke a language which was not a pure, but a mixed language, is, perhaps, confirmed in some degree by this Celtic settlement in Spain, while the date is as far back in the night of time as the most sanguine seanachy can desire.

Under the pressure of invasion from the North, or by intestine convulsions, the Gauls cross the Alps a few centuries later (vol. I. p. 9), and after a bloody contest with the Siculi, who then held northern Italy, drove their antagonists into the Island of Sicily, and portions of the country south of the Tiber, about 1354 years before Christ. The region north of that river, to the foot of the Alps, became the spoil of the conquerors, who founded there three kingdoms or confederations, namely, Is-Ombria, Sil-Ombria, and Oll-Ombria. The manners and customs of those conquerors, their arms, and general features, are exactly such as Cæsar found in the parent country, in the first century of our own.

While the Gauls were thus seeking a settlement in Italy, the Phœnicians, entering by the Rhone, extended their conquests along the banks of that river, and left after them in national tradition the fabulous halo of glory and civilization, that encircles the name of the Tyrian Hercules. Under the sway of these strangers it was said, forests were cleared, marshes drained, towns arose, and the comforts and elegance of civilized life were diffused in the heart of the country. They were constantly at war with the mountaineers and other barbarous neighbours; but during five or six hundred years they maintained their ground, until the colonies shared the fortune of the parent country, a small remnant of them falling under the power of the Rhodians.

While the mother country was thus losing the Phœnicians, a powerful and highly civilized race from Greece, called the Raseni, had crossed the Illyrian Alps, and, forcing their way through Is-Ombria and Oll-Ombria, they effected a permanent settlement in Sil-ombria, the present Tuscany or Etruria. By superiority in arts and arms they gradually subdued the Ombres or Gauls of northern Italy, or drove them to the mountains or marshes; but, unlike other conquerors of the day, they did not extirpate the conquered or expel them from their country if they were willing to share with themselves the benefits of their superior civilization. The Gaulish hut, or wooden ramparts, soon disappeared before the stately cities of the ancient Etruria; but the national characteristics of the Gaulish race were still preserved, long after the principal monuments of Tuscan grandeur had disappeared. "The inhabitant of the Ombrian mountains was long distinguished from the other inhabitants of Italy by the good qualities and defects generally attributed to the Gaulish race; his valour was brilliant and impetuous, but he was accused of wanting perseverance. He was irascible, quarrelsome, and fond of single combats, and this passion had led to the establishment of the trial by combat. Some of their old maxims, which have come down to us, give us an idea of their notions of morality. 'They believe,' says Nicolas of Damascus, a writer who appears to have specially studied their character, 'that it is disgraceful to live in slavery, and that in war there ought to be but two courses for a man, namely, to conquer or die.' Notwithstanding their adoption of Tuscan customs the lower classes of the people preserved something of the old national costume and arms; the double gais or lance, after the Gaulish fashion, was always the favorite weapon of the Ombrian peasant." p. 17.

After a period of about 400 years from the invasion of the Raseni, Gaul was attacked on the north and south-east. The Phocians effected a settlement at the mouth of the Rhone, about 600 years before Christ, and transplanted to their new creation, Marseilles, the arts and commerce of Greece. But a more terrible enemy appeared in the north—the formidable Kymri or Cimbri, a Celtic nation (as M. Thierry proves), but long separated from the advanced guard of the same race, which first opened the westward way to the shores of the Atlantic. Issuing from their forests on the shores of the Black Sea, they followed the course of the Danube, and arriving in Germany, separated into different confederations, one occupying the peninsula of Jutland, another (the Boii) the Hercynian forest, and a third the Belgæ, resting on the frontiers of Gaul. The leader of those who entered that land was Hesus or Esus, so famous in Gaulish traditions as a hero and subsequently a god. Superior in civilization to the Celtic brethren of the first race, they gradually possessed themselves of the entire western shores and the south, being divided from the old settlers by the Cevennes of Languedoc and the great plateau of central Gaul. According to the constant tradition of the country the religious system known as Druidism was for the first time established by these invaders. Gradually it developed itself and took root in those parts of the country where the political power of the conquerors never extended, but preserved in every place strong traces of its eastern origin. How many of the original Gauls may have found refuge in England or Ireland from the Cymri, our historian does not say; but the tide of emigration once more set in for Italy.

During the convulsions caused by these conflicts the Alps were crossed by hordes of adventurers, who found in the scattered remnants of the old Ombrian population brothers in language and manners, and auxiliaries in a combined attack on the usurping Etrurians. In a brief time Etrurian civilization disappears from the rural districts of the greater portion of northern Italy. The towns alone remain in many places, either by successful resistance or the toleration of the invaders. How they could survive, or what portion of civilization might remain in Italy it is easy to conceive, had not an arm stronger than the Etrurian—the arm which always conquered the Gauls, but never without resistance—arrested their progress, and drove back from the city of the seven hills the barbarian tide. The contests of those Cisalpine Gauls with the Roman republic, the glory and reverses of the long battle from the siege of Clusium to the final reduction of Cisalpine Gaul as a Roman province, are schoolboy recollections of every reader. Our limited space confines us to the expeditions of the Gauls to the east, and their fortunes in the Carthaginian armies under the walls of the great rival of Rome.

Between the year 400 and 350 before Christ, one of the Cymri confederations which three centuries before had settled north of the Rhine, crossed that river, and after subduing the original Gauls and the Kymri of the first invasion, succeeded in establishing two kingdoms in the south of France. Tolosa was their principal capital, and the point from which they started in their invasion of Greece. They were called in their own language Belg, and by the Greeks and other strangers, Bolg, Volg, or Volk. Departing from Gaul to the banks of the Danube, they marched along the course of that river, where they found along the valleys of the Alps, and to the frontiers of Greece, nations of their own language, some of which had already come in contact with the Greek empire at the period of its highest power. During an expedition of Alexander the Great against the Scythian tribes near the mouth of the Danube, some Gauls, attracted by curiosity or the desire to see so great a hero, visited his camp. They were received kindly by the king, surrounded by his court, with all the pomp and magnificence which could awe the spirit of the proud barbarians. While he sat with them at table, he asked them, through his interpreter, "What is the thing you fear most in this world?" He expected a complimentary allusion to himself, but they answered, "We fear nothing, if the heavens do not fall; but, nevertheless, we value the friendship of such a man as you. Alexander concealed his mortification, and turning to his courtiers, observed that this was a proud race, but concluded a treaty of peace and alliance with them before their departure.

Alexander had no sooner departed than the "proud race" left a terrible proof of their courage and ferocity in the heart of Greece. During the convulsions that followed his death they offered their services to the Greek republics of Peleponesus and Hellas, but were rejected with contempt. The King of Macedon received them with more favour, and sent vast numbers of them to the aid of some of his royal friends in Asia. But the Gauls, received into his own pay, soon began to feel their power, and, aided by their countrymen, to act as masters. Bolg, one of their commanders, summoned Ptolemy to pay an enormous ransom in gold to save his kingdom from plunder, and on refusal, prepared to enforce the demand by the sword. Both parties prepared for battle. Ptolemy, according to the Greek tactics, placed his cavalry and light infantry on the wings, and in the centre the heavy infantry in phalanx, armed with long spears. The phalanx was the glory of the Macedonian army. To it Philip and Alexander, and the successors of that conqueror, owed their principal victories. But that formidable body could not resist the headlong impetuosity of the Gauls; after a terrible contest it was broken; the elephant which carried the king fell pierced with a thousand pikes; the king himself was taken alive, and torn in pieces, and his head carried on the end of a pike in presence of the wings which still held out. The route soon became general. The greater part of the army was slain or taken, but the fate of the captives was more horrible than those who had fallen in battle. Bolg ordered the handsomest and strongest of them to be offered up in solemn sacrifice; the others were bound to trees and pierced with the pikes of the Gauls or the sword of the Cymri.

The most memorable feat of the Gauls was the sack of Delphos and the pillage of the temple. Having ravaged Macedonia and Thessaly, where the inhabitants raised up their arms to implore the shades of Philip and Alexander in vain to protect them—they penetrated, notwithstanding their defeat at Thermopylæ, into the heart of Greece, through the defile of Ceta. Brenn or Bran, one of their leaders, marched at the head of 60,000, to Elatea, on the banks of the Cephissus, distant only a short journey from Delphos. The thought that strangers and barbarians should profane and pillage the most sacred sanctuary in Greece, frightened and afflicted the Greeks, some of whom endeavoured to direct the invader from his object by superstitious alarms; but he laughed at their attempts, and on the second day appeared in sight of the city. That city stood on the side of one of the peaks of Parnassus, in the middle of a vast natural excavation, surrounded almost completely by precipices, but not protected by any walls or fortifications, as they were not deemed necessary. The kind of amphitheatre in which the city lay had the power, it was said, of re-echoing the slightest sound; this echo being multiplied by the numerous caverns in the sides of Parnassus, thunder, or the noise of a trumpet, or even the human voice, was reverberated, and was prolonged with wonderful power. This phenomenon was attributed by the vulgar to the spells of the tutelary deity of the place, whose temple, magnificently built of Parian marble, rose over the city towards the north. Brenn, halting at the foot of the mountain, pointed out to his soldiers the grand monuments of gold glittering around that edifice. One night was allowed for preparation; no time was to be lost, as Phocis and Bœtia were rising in the rear, threatening to cut off all hope of retreat; and the Gauls themselves were breaking through all discipline. The place was inaccessible except by one steep rock. Brenn drew out his troops in order of battle, told them once more all the treasures they had before their eyes, and those which were in the temple, and then gave the signal for the assault. The onset was impetuous, but the Greeks resisted firmly. From the top of the steep ascent they hurled down showers of stones and arrows on the assailants, but after repeated charges, the Gauls, mounting on the bodies of their companions, closed the pass, burst into the city, and soon the oratories around the temple, and the temple itself, were pillaged and destroyed.

“It was the month of Autumn; and during the combat one of those sudden storms, so common in the mountains of Greece, suddenly burst over the city, accompanied by violent showers of hail and rain. The priests of Apollo, seizing this incident, appealed to the religious terrors of the Greeks. With haggard eye and dishevelled hair, and like men possessed, they ran through the city and among the soldiers.” “The god is come,” they cry; “we have seen him; he is here; we saw him descend through the dome of the temple, which was cleft under his feet.” Such a sight, the appeal, the lightning and thunder, roused the courage of the Greeks; they rushed once more on the invaders, who, like themselves, had been struck with religious feelings, and imagined they felt the pavement of the temple trembling beneath their feet. Victory declared for the Greeks. The Gauls retreated in confusion to their camp, where, during the night, they suffered great loss from the constant assaults of the enemy. But Brenn might have yet turned the scale had he not received a dangerous wound. The signal for retreat was given, and through a country up in arms the relics of the barbarian host fought their way back to Thermopylæ, thence through Thessaly and Macedon, until they arrived at the northern limits of the latter kingdom. Here they divided the plunder, and separated into two bands. One settled on the northern side of Mount Scarus; of the other, one party returned along the Danube, and brought home to their native town Tolosa, in Gaul, the spoils of Greece, and hung up the ornaments of Delphos in the temple of their own God Belen; the other party marched towards the east, and founded the kingdom of Gallo-Greece, in Asia Minor.

The reader will ask, were those old Irish legends, which represent the Firbolgs or Bulgæ, returning from Greece, derived from the classic authors, or were they really a dim recollection of a fact, preserved by tradition. We smile when we read Keating's account of the adventures of our wandering progenitors; yet it is remarkable, that almost all the countries in Europe, whence the Irish bards said the Irish Celts came, were really at one period or another before the Christian era, the scene of the exploit or services of the Celtic race.

On the return of the Gauls from Delphos, they found Thrace in possession of Comontor, a Gaulish chief. Those who did not take the valley of the Danube, soon found means, under the conduct of two leaders, to pass the Bosphorus and Hellespont, and revel in the luxuries of rich tributes paid by the Greeks of that delicious clime. At first they were introduced as mercenaries into the kingdom of Bithynia, but as in the former case in Greece, they soon became masters. Having invited over large bodies of auxiliaries from their countrymen in Thrace, and more distant regions of Europe, they divided into three bodies, and in order to remove all cause of division among themselves, arranged the portion which each horde was to hold after the intended conquest of Asia Minor. One selected the Hellespont and Troas, another Eolis and Ionia, while the third held the tract west of Mount Taurus, to the waters of Rhodes and Cyprus. This arrangement completed, the conquest was soon effected, that is to say, the Gauls levied tribute of money on all the towns, provisions, in the rural districts, but never interfered with the internal administration of the country, except in case of resistance. There were committed those terrible ravages which have been transmitted by the Greek writers, as the “inflictions of Mars, that terrible God of the Gauls.” Young virgins committed suicide to escape the horrors of captivity; and though there is no detailed account of the conquest, Thierry collects so many incidental references, that the reader can easily conceive the misery of a highly civilized race, while under the sway of one whose only profession and civilization were war and plunder. So great was the terror of the Gaulish name, that during a long period after the year 278, A.C., no king in Asia would venture into the field without a band of Gaulish auxiliaries. The king of Syria himself, was their tributary for a time, and none in Asia Minor, before Attalus, king of Pergamus, dare to dispute their demands. In Memphis, 4000 of them had nearly succeeded in changing the dynasty of Egyptian kings. But this plenitude of Gaulish power, though supported by constant supplies from Europe, was overturned by arising en masse of the oppressed population. Antiochus, king of Syria, encountered the Tectosagi, one of the conquering hordes, and having defeated them in a pitched battle, followed up his success, and drove them beyond the banks of the Halys, where they settled, selecting the ancient city of Ancyra as their capital. Attalus of Pergamus, thirty-five years later, having formed a general league against the two remaining bodies, succeeded in compelling them to take refuge in the same quarter, which thenceforward was known as Galatia, or Gallogreece. There St. Jerome, 500 years later, heard that very language spoken, which he had heard when a boy, used by the inhabitants of the territory of Treves.

The history of the kingdom of Gallogreece, the singular compound of Gaulish customs and Greek civilization, the oak-grove of the Druid and the Phrygian mother of the gods, the wars of the Galatians against the kings of Syria, and in those of Antiochus and Mithridates against Rome, are told in M. Thierry's best style. The power of the Galatians was first broken by the Romans, under the consul Manlius; and so great was the credit which this victory gave the Roman name in the east, that Judah, herself, in the embassy sent to Rome, mentions it as one of the most splendid proofs of Roman valour.

Our limited space excludes all notice of the part taken by the Gauls against Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, and also in the Carthaginian wars. It is wonderful how the author has been able to connect the scattered fragments of the history of his race, and relate the grand feats of Gaulish arms in the ancient days, with as much spirit and interest as if he were engaged in the wars of the French republic, or the magic glories of Napoleon.

In perusing those interesting volumes, one cannot help being forcibly struck with the similarity of ancient Irish customs, to those which the Gauls exhibit in every clime whither M. Thierry tracks them. The antiquaries of the last century, under the influence of the eastern mania, found proof positive that the Irish were Persians or East Indians, or Phœnicians, if they saw but the least analogy between an Irish and an Eastern word, or an Irish and Eastern custom. Here, however, in the history of the Gauls, the analogies are frequent and conclusive. The names of the tribes are sometimes the same in both countries; their gods are often the same, as well as their dress and arms, and the good and bad features of their national character. He would be a bold man who would undertake to unravel the mythic history of ancient Ireland, and the succession of her colonies, by the movements of the tribes of Gaul; but he is not a wise man who expects to find elsewhere a better collateral illustration 'of our national antiquities, than can be found in southern Gaul, or that portion of Spain which 1600 years before Christ was occupied by a Gaulish colony, which mingled with, without being lost in the subjugated Iberians.

The Gauls were stout and tall; white complexion, blue eyes, hair brown or fair, and generally tintured so as to have a bright red colour. It was worn long, sometimes floating down the shoulders, sometimes tied in a crown on the top of the head. The common people wore their beards, the nobles shaved, except the upper lip.

All the tribes wore the bracæ, which were worn loose in the south, tight, by the Belgæ of the north; a vest with sleeves, made of striped stuff, descending to the middle of the thighs; and a large cloak or "sagum" striped liked the vest, or ornamented with flowers, and superbly bordered with gold and silver, completed the costume. The "sagum" fastened under the chin by a metal clasp. The Gauls were fond of showy dress. In the earlier ages they thought it unworthy of their courage to wear defensive armour, but by communication with the Romans and Greek colony of Marseilles, they gradually adopted some foreign tactics, without, however, abandoning their own principal weapons.

These Celts, so brave in the field, evinced also a decided taste for many of the arts of civilized life. They soon rivalled their masters, the Phœnicians and Greeks, in the working of mines, and exported large quantities of pure ore ready for the smithy. The Bituriges had the pre-eminence in iron, the Ædii in works of silver and gold. M. Thierry enumerates many useful inventions, of which the credit was universally allowed to the Gauls by the ancients. Perhaps some of our public instructors of the English press might enlighten their ignorance and reform their estimate of mere Celtic character by glancing at these pages.

We cannot close this brief notice without expressing a hope that some person well acquainted with the legendary and authentic history of ancient Ireland would collate Gaulish customs and history, as given by Thierry, with the history and customs of the different tribes that settled in Ireland. The result, we are confident, would be to settle for ever the old theory of direct colonization from the East, and to place the chronology of Irish history on a more firm basis than any author has yet been able to give it.

THE Life and Death of Oliver Plunkett, PRIMATE OF IRELAND.

[Conclusion.]

Plunkett—My lord, may it please your lordship, I have something to say, which, if your lordship will consider seriously, may occasion the court's commiseration and mercy. I have, my lord, for this fact, been arraigned in Ireland and brought to trial there. At the day of my trial all the witnesses voluntarily absented themselves, seeing I had records and witnesses to convince them evidently, and show what men they were, and the prepressed motive that they did bear to me; and so finding that I could clear myself, evidently they absconded themselves: from the day of my trial no Christian appeared; but hither over they came and pronounced that I should be brought hither, where I could not have a jury that knew the qualities of my adversaries, or who knew me, or the circumstances of the places, times, or persons. The juries here, as I say, were altogether strangers to these affairs, and so, my lord, they could not know many things that conduce to a fair trial, and it was morally impossible they should know it. I have been accused principally and chiefly for surveying the ports, for fixing upon Carlingford for the landing of the French, for the having of 70,000 men ready to join with the French, for collecting money for the agents in this matter, for assisting of the French and this great utopian array. A jury in Ireland, consisting of men that lived in that country, or any man in the world that hath but seen Ireland in a map, would easily see there was no probability that that should be a place fit for the French to land in. Though he never was in Ireland, yet by the map he would see they must come by the narrow seas all along to Ulster, and the rocks and such places would make it very dangerous; and, by their own confession, it was a poor town, and of no strength—a very small garrison, which had not been so if it had been a place of any consideration. And where I had influence only upon one province, as is well known, though I had the title of Primate of all Ireland, as the Archbishop of Canturbury hath of all England, yet the Archbishop of York did not permit him to meddle with his province; and it is well known by the gentry there, and those that are accustomed to the place, that in all the province of Ulster, take men, women, and children of the Roman Catholics, they would not make up 70,000. This, a jury there, my lord, had known very well, and therefore the laws of England, which are very favourable to the prisoner, have provided that there should be a jury of the place where the fact was committed, as Sir Thomas Gascoigne, as I have heard, had a Yorkshire jury though he was tried at London. And then, after my coming here, I was kept a close prisoner for six months; not any Christian was permitted to come to me, nor did I know any thing how things stood in the world. I was brought here the 3rd of May, to be arraigned, and I did petition your lordship to have some time for my trial, and I would have it put off till Michaelmas, but your lordship did not think fit to grant so long, but only till the eighth of this month, when my witnesses, who were ready at the sea side, would not come over without passes; and I could not get over the records without an order from hence, which records would have shown that some of the witnesses were indicted and found guilty of high crimes—some were imprisoned for robberies, and some of the witnesses were infamous people; so I petitioned, the 8th of this month, that I might have time for but twelve days more; but your lordship thought, when the motion was made, that it was only to put off my trial; and now my witnesses are come to Coventry yesterday morning, and they will be here in a few days; so for want of time to defend myself in, I was exposed to my adversaries, who were some of my own clergy, whom, for their debauched lives, I have corrected, as is well known to them. I will not deny myself, that as long as there was any toleration and connivance I did execute the function of a bishop; and that, by the 2nd of Elizabeth, is only premunire and no treason. So that, my lord, I was exposed, defenceless, to my enemies; whereas, now my witnesses are come over, that could make all appear. I did beg for twelve days time, whereby you might have seen, as plain as the sun, what those witnesses are that began the story and say those things against me. And, my lord, for those depositions of the 70,000 men, and the monies that are collected of the clergy in Ireland, they cannot be true, for they are a poor clergy that have no revenue nor land—they live as the Presbyterians do here; there is not a priest in all Ireland that hath, certainly or uncertainly, above three score pounds a year, and that I should collect from them forty shillings a piece for the raising of an army, or for the landing of the French at Carlingford, if it had been brought before a jury in Ireland, it would have been thought a mere romance. If they had accused me of a premunire for the exercise of my episcopal function, perhaps they had said something that might be believed; but, my lord, as I am a dying man, and hope for salvation by my Lord and Saviour I am not guilty of one point of treason they have sworn against me, no more than the child that was born but yesterday. I have an attestation under my lord of Essex's hand concerning my good behaviour in Ireland, and not only from him, but from my Lord Berkley, who was also governor there, which the king's attorney saw; but here I was brought—here I was tried, and not having time to bring my witnesses, I could not prove my innocence as otherwise I might. So that if there be any case in the world that deserves compassion, sure my case does: and it is such a rare case as I do not believe you will find two of them in print, that one arraigned in Ireland should be tried here afterwards for the same fact. My lord, if there be anything in the world that deserves pity, this does; For I can say, as I hope for mercy, I was never guilty of any one point they have sworn against me; and if my petition for time had been granted, I could have shown how all was pre-pense malice against me, and have produced all circumstance that could make out the innocence of a person, but not having had time enough, and being tried, I am at your mercy.

Lord Chief Justice—Well, you have nothing further to say in bar of judgment: you have said all you can?

Plunkett—I have nothing further to say but what I have said.

Then proclamation was made for silence, while judgment was passing upon the prisoner.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you: Mr. Plunkett, you have been here indicted of a very great and heinous crime—the greatest and most heinous of all crimes, and that is high treason; and truly yours is treason of the highest nature—it is a treason in truth against God and your king, and the country where you lived. You have done as much as you could to dishonour God in this case; for the bottom of your treason was your setting up your false religion, than which there is not anything more displeasing to God, or more pernicious to mankind in the world. A religion that is ten times worse than all the heathenish superstitions;* the most dishonourable and derogatory to God and his glory, of all religions or pretended religions, whatsoever; for it undertakes to dispense with God's laws, and to pardon the breach of them. So that certainly a greater crime there cannot be committed against God, than for a man to endeavour the propagation of that religion: but you, to effect this, have designed the death of our lawful prince and king; and then your design of blood in the kingdom where you lived, to set all together by the ears, to destroy poor innocent people, to prostitute their lives and liberties, and all that is dear to them, to the tyranny of Rome and France, and that by introducing a French army. What greater evil can be designed by any man? I mention these things because they have all been proved against you, and that you may take notice and repent of them, and make your peace with God by a particular application for mercy for all these faults; for it seems to me that against God, your prince, and fellow-subjects you have behaved yourself very ill, designing very great evil to all these: and now it hath pleased God to bring you to judgment. I must tell you, peradventure, what you urge for yourself might introduce pity if it were to be believed; that is, that you are innocent, and had witnesses to prove it: but we cannot suppose any man innocent that hath had a legal and fair trial, and a trial with as much candour to you as your case could bear, or as, perhaps, any man in such a case ever had. You had time, upon your request, to send for your witnesses to help you in your defence, and to prove your innocence, if you could have done it; time long enough to your own content; you yourself thought it so at the time it was given. To give a prisoner, under your circumstances, five or six weeks' time to send for witnesses, is not usual: we could have put you upon a present defence, and hurried you out of the world by a sudden trial if we had had any design against you; but we go on in a fair way, and with legal proceedings, and with such a respect to you as in such a case could be used, for we gave you all the fair hearing and liberty that you desired to have. Look you, as to what you urge, that your trial was in this kingdom, whereas your defence was in another; that is a thing that does not become you by any means to object, for you have had a trial here by honest persons, and that according to the laws which obtain in this kingdom, and that, too, in Ireland, which is by a statute not made on purpose to bring you into a snare, but an ancient statute, and not without precedents of its having been put in execution before your time, for your own country will afford you several precedents in this case, as O'Rourke and several others that have been arraigned and condemned for treason done there. So that you have no reason to except against the legality of your trial. You say, now you have witnesses that could prove all this matter;

* Surely nothing could be more beastly than for a judge thus to express himself concerning the religion of the vast majority of Christians—a religion which had been professed by the ancestors of the very man who so foully and falsely assails it. We are accustomed to hear a great deal about the cruelty of the Spanish Inquisition, but I defy the revilers of Catholicity to discover any grand inquisitor who reviled his victim in so brutal a fashion, because he would not exchange for a novel worship, the faith of his Christian ancestors. But even this is almost surpassed by the brazen effrontery of what this impartial judge asserts a little further on—that the prisoner had had a fair trial! He even makes it a matter of great condescension, that after dragging the prisoner out of his own country to be tried in a strange land, he was not “put upon a present defence and hurried out of the world by a sudden trial.” It was, moreover, utterly false that the prisoner thought, even at first, that the time allowed him to prepare his defence was sufficient, for he then asked till Michaelmas, which was refused; and when, through the ingenuity of his enemies, his witnesses and records did not arrive, he would not be allowed twelve days more, but was hurried to judgment before they reached him.

why that lies in the mouth of every man that is condemned to say; but pray consider with yourself what regard ought to be given to this. We cannot help it if your witnesses do not come: you may remember they wanted not time nor opportunity to come over; but you told us they would not come unless they had a pass-port.

Plunkett—My lord, they got a pass to come over afterwards, and so in eight days they came hither.

Lord Chief Justice—You might have provided yourself if they wanted such a thing. In the first place, nobody is bound to give it them, much less could you expect it for them without asking.

Plunkett—I could not get the copies of the records, neither by any means, unless I had an order from the council, and they would not give that order, unless your lordship appointed it.

Lord Chief Justice—We cannot tell that; you should have petitioned in time.

Plunkett—How could any one foresee, unless he was God Almighty, that they would deny it, or that he could not get out a copy of a record, paying for it, without a petition. All the friends I had told me, upon motion there, it might be had; but here I have it under the lieutenant's and council's hands that they would give no copy of records without order from home, which, before I could know it, it was impossible for me to have them ready against my trial.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you, Sir, I do speak this to you, to show you that those objections which you mean to make against your trial, have no weight at all; but in this case it is not the jury that are so material as the witnesses themselves. I appeal to all that heard your trial, if they could so much as doubt but that you were guilty of what you were charged with. For, consider, here were persons of your own religion, the most of them priests, I think almost all of them in orders.

Plunkett—There were two friars, and a priest* whom I have endeavoured to correct seven years, and they were renegades from our religion, and dastard apostates.

Lord Chief Justice—Look you, Sir, they gave an evidence very home to your matter; you had liberty to examine them, and they gave you a rational account of anything you asked. Let me put you in mind of one thing. You made exceptions to one's evidence (and indeed that was very much of your exceptions to all), why he did not reveal this in all that time? Truly he told you he was of your mind till he went into France, and saw what slavery and mischief you endeavoured to introduce upon his and your countrymen, and this his spirit rose against, to see what a condition Ireland was like to be brought into. And pray did he not give you a full answer to your question?

Plunkett—I had sufficient witnesses to prove he was an apostate, and was chastised by me, and therefore had prepensed malice against me.

Lord Chief Justice—Therefore I have spoken this to the satisfaction, I hope, of yourself and all that hear it. I do now wish you to consider you are near your end. It seems you have lived in a false religion hitherto; it is not too late at any time to repent, I wish you may have the grace to do so. In the meantime, there is no time for us here to grant you any kind of mercy, though I'll tell you we are inclined to pity all malefactors: whoever have done evil we are inclined to pity them, and wish heartily that they may repent, as we do, that you may of what you have done. But all we can do now is to say what the law says, and that is to pass judgment upon you.

Plunkett—May it please your lordship to give me leave to speak one word. If I were a man that had no care of my conscience in this matter, and did not think of God Almighty, or conscience, or heaven, or hell, I might have saved my life, for I was offered it by divers people here, so I would but confess my own guilt, and accuse others. But, my lord, I had rather die ten thousand deaths than wrongfully accuse anybody. And the time will come when your lordship will see what those witnesses are that have come in against me. I do assure your lordship, if I were a man that had not good principles I might easily have saved my life; but I had rather die ten thousand deaths than wrongfully to take away one farthing of any man's goods, one day of his liberty, or one minute of his life.

Lord Chief Justice—I am sorry to see you persist in the principles of that religion.

Plunkett—*They are those principles that even God Almighty cannot dispense withal.

Lord Chief Justice—Well, however the judgment which we must give you is that which the law says and speaks. And therefore you must go from hence to the place from whence you came, that is, to Newgate, and from thence you shall be drawn through the city of London to Tyburn; there you shall be hanged by the neck, but cut down before you are dead, your bowels shall be taken out and burnt before your face, your head shall be cut off, and your body be divided into four quarters, to be disposed of as his majesty pleases, and I pray God to have mercy upon your soul.

Plunkett—My lord, I hope I may have this favour, of leave for a servant and some few friends I have to come to me.

Lord Chief Justice—I think you may have liberty for any servant to come to you. I know nothing to the contrary.

Plunkett—And some few friends that I have in town.

Lord Chief Justice—But I would advise you to have some minister to come to you, some Protestant minister.

Plunkett—My lord, if you please there are some in prison† that never were indicted on account of any crime, and they will do my business very well; for they will do it according to the rites of our own Church, which is the ancient usage; they cannot do better, and I would not alter it now.

Lord Chief Justice—Mr. Richardson, you may let his servant come to him, and any friend, in your presence, to see there be no evil done, nor any contrivances that may hereafter have an influence upon affairs.

Justice Jones—Be you present, or somebody.

Plunkett—My servant, I hope, may come without his being present.

* Nothing surely could be more noble, or more heroic than this language of the illustrious martyr.

† There were several priests confined in prison along with Dr. Plunkett, against whom there was no other charge than that of having received orders in the Church of Rome. But the person under whose spiritual guidance the Primate placed himself was Father James Corker. He was educated in the Benedictine monastery of Lambspring, in the territories of the Duke of Brunswick, in Germany, of which he first became a monk, and afterwards abbot. He returned to England, where he acted as chaplain to a widow lady for twelve years, but on the breaking out of the Popish plot, was accused by Oates, apprehended, and cast into prison as one of its contrivers. He was tried in July, 1679, on a charge similar to that of which Dr. Plunkett was afterwards convicted. Oates and some others appeared against him, but he was acquitted. Still he was detained in prison, and on the 17th of January, 1679—1680, new style—he was tried for having received orders in the Church of Rome, and of this charge he was convicted (Dodd's Church History, vol. iii. p. 488-9; the edition from which I quote was printed at Brussels, in 1742.) On the same authority (p. 283) it is stated that Father Corker was in prison under sentence, when Dr. Plunkett was there. He was afterwards reprieved, but at what period Dodd does not say. It must, however, have been after the Primate's execution, for Father Corker states, in a letter which will be found a little farther on, that although he and Dr. Plunkett could write to each other after the arraignment of the latter, yet their letters were read, transcribed, and examined by the officers, before they were delivered to either of them; but that after his condemnation they had free intercourse by letters, by means of his man, who had leave to wait upon him alone in his chamber. Consequently they must have been both in prison after the Primate's condemnation, or his man, who remained there with him, could not have delivered their letters to them. Besides, Father Corker says that "when Dr. Plunkett was carried out of the press-yard to execution, he turned him about to our chamber windows, and with a pleasant aspect and elevated hand, gave us his benediction." These windows must have been those of the prison. Besides, if Father Corker had been free, he would undoubtedly have gone to the place of execution. The venerable Father adds, immediately after the words already quoted: "How he composed himself after he was taken from hence, you yourself can give a more exact account than I." "From hence" evidently means from the prison, and the whole passage clearly implies that Father Corker, being confined there at the time, could not be present at the execution. We have a reason for being exact on this point which shall be stated presently. When the Primate then speaks of the priests who were in prison at the time of his condemnation, and who "had never been indicted on account of any crime," he alludes, most probably, to Father Corker's "comrades," whose prayers he asks, in a letter which will be found in the text. He may have also included Father Corker himself, who was at this time accused of nothing but of being a priest. Father Corker lived until several years after the Revolution (Dodd, vol. iii., pp. 488-9).

* The two friars were Mac Moyer and Duffy, and the priest was Mac Clave or Mac Legh. Another priest, Edmund Murphy, was called on to give evidence against the Primate, and was put into gaol because he retracted the perjuries which he had previously sworn before the parliament, and the king and council. This recantation was the more annoying because he was the first discoverer of the first plot, and the first framer of the absurd calumnies which brought the Primate to the scaffold.

Lord Chief Justice—Yes, yes, his servant may be with him alone. Well, Sir, we wish better to you than you do to yourself.

Plunkett—God Almighty bless your lordship. And now, my lord, as I am a dead man to this world, and as I hope for mercy in the other world, I was never guilty of any of the treasons laid to my charge, as you will hear in time; and my character you may receive from my lord chancellor of Ireland,* my lord Berkeley, my lord Essex, and my lord Ormond.

[Then keeper took away his prisoner.]

We cannot trust ourselves to make any comments upon a trial, the iniquity of which is only surpassed by the atrocious murder that followed. It is a double murder, to make a conviction procured by hired perjurers the pretext for depriving a man of his life. The nation of whose fanatical bigotry Oliver Plunkett was the victim, became horrified by its own act in the moment of its consummation. His noble conduct at the place of execution extorted the warm admiration of his enemies, and convinced the most credulous partisans of the Popish plot that when the Primate was put to death, the blood which flowed was not that of a false traitor, but of an innocent, loyal, and heroic Christian bishop. On the 1st of July, 1681, the last victim of the Popish plot, and the last martyr who was directly put to death for the Catholic religion in these countries, died at Tyburn; and the immense concourse which assembled to triumph over its victim, wept and blessed him. No historian of any party has had the hardihood to say that he was guilty of the crimes with which he was charged; but on the contrary, they have all united in reprobating the iniquity of his trial and the barbarity of his death. I have already had occasion to quote the testimony of his contemporary, Bishop Burnet, of Charles James Fox, and of several others to this effect. To these I shall now add a few others:

"In the meantime," says the continuator of the chronicle of Sir Richard Baker (p. 710), "came on the trial of Dr. Oliver Plunkett, popish titular archbishop of Armagh, who called himself primate of all Ireland. He was a worthy and good man, who, notwithstanding the high title given him, was in a very mean state of life, as having nothing to subsist on but the contributions of a few poor clergy of his own religion in the province of Ulster, who having but little themselves, could not spare much to him. In these low circumstances he lived, though meanly, quietly and contentedly, meddling with nothing but the concerns of his function, and dissuading all about him from entering into any turbulent or factious intrigues. But while the Popish plot was warm, some lewd Irish priests, and others of that nation, hearing that England was disposed to hearken to good swearers, thought themselves qualified for the employment. So they came over with an account of a plot in Ireland, and were well received by Lord Shaftsbury. They were also examined by the parliament, and what they said was believed. They were very profligate wretches, and some of the priests among them had been censured by Plunkett for their lewdness; so partly out of revenge, and partly to keep themselves in business, they charged a plot upon that innocent, quiet man, so that he was sent for over, and brought to trial. The evidences swore that upon his being made primate of Ireland, he engaged to raise sixty or seventy thousand Irish, to be ready to join with the French to destroy the Protestant religion, and to get Dublin, Londonderry, and all the sea-ports into their hands; and that besides the French army, there was a Spanish army to join with them, and that the Irish clergy were to contribute to this design. Plunkett, in his defence, alleged the improbability of all that was sworn against him; which was apparent enough. He alleged that the Irish clergy were so poor, that he himself, who was the head of the whole province, lived in a little thatched house, with only one servant, having never above sixty pounds a-year income; so that neither he nor they could be thought very likely to carry on a design of this nature. But the fact being positively sworn against him, and the jury unacquainted with the witnesses' characters, and the scene of action, he was brought in guilty, and condemned. It is said that the Earl of Essex was so sensible of the injustice done him that he applied to the king for a pardon, and told him that the matters sworn against Plunkett were so absurd in themselves that it was impossible for them to be true. But the king answered in a passion, 'why did you not declare this, then, at the trial? it would have done him some good then; but I dare pardon nobody,' and concluded with saying, 'his blood be upon your head, and not upon mine.'"^{*}

Eachard after stating that Plunkett had an attestation of his good conduct, under the hands of Essex and Berkeley, who had been lord lieutenants of Ireland, adds that:

"He has been assured by an unquestionable hand that the Earl of Essex himself was so sensible of the poor man's hardship, that he generously applied to the king for a pardon, and told his majesty the witnesses must needs be perjured; for these things sworn against him could not possibly be true."[†]

After this follows the conversation between Essex and the king in the very words which have been already quoted from the continuation of Baker's Chronicle.

The Primate's character is sustained not only by the impossibility of the charge which was preferred against him, and the infamy of the abandoned wretches who sustained it by their perjuries—it is vindicated not only by the concurrent testimony of writers whose prejudices were strongly opposed to him; but it is, moreover, placed beyond the reach of suspicion by the unanimous attestation of all the chief governors who ruled in Ireland almost from the period of his first arrival in the country. He arrived in 1669, when Lord Robarts was lord lieutenant. He was a "puritan, sour and cynical," and made every effort to arrest the Primate, simply for being a Popish dignitary. He knew nothing of Dr. Plunkett, who dare not come out of his hiding-places during the Robarts administration, and, in fact, although some of the witnesses swore that he was appointed Primate to carry out some wonderful "design" in favour of Catholicity and against Protestantism, and heaven knows what besides, yet not one of them charge him with any overt act before 1672 or 1673. Lord Berkeley succeeded to the lord lieutenancy in May, 1670, and he in his turn gave way to Essex, and Essex to Ormond, who held that office during the period of Plunkett's trial and death, and he expressly challenged the judges and the law officers of the crown (a challenge which they did not chose to accept) to enquire of each of these persons as to his character and conduct whilst in Ireland. We have already seen with what contemptuous scorn the Duke of Ormond, who had been repeatedly, and for very long periods lord lieutenant, and who knew Ireland better than perhaps any of his contemporaries, treated the entire story of the plot, and the thieves and robbers whose evidence alone sustained it.‡ The Primate

* The lord chancellor was the Most Rev. Michael Boyle, the Protestant archbishop of Armagh, and primate of Ireland. He was one of the twelve bishops who were consecrated together in St. Patrick's church, Dublin, after the restoration, in 1660. He was first promoted to the sees of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, and at the same time he held as sinecures no less than six parishes in his own diocese. He was translated to Dublin in 1663, and to Armagh in 1678. He was in the same year appointed lord chancellor—an office which he held for twenty-two years. He sat in King James's parliament, in 1689; died in 1702, and was buried at midnight under the altar in St. Patrick's cathedral. He founded the town of Blessington, in Wicklow, from which his son, Morrough Boyle, obtained the title of Viscount Blessington (See Dotson's "Bishops of Dublin," for a more detailed account of the lord chancellor.)

* "Chronicle by Sir Richard Baker, continued to the death of King George I." London, 1730.

† Eachard, Hist. Eng., vol. iii. p. 631.

‡ Ormond might perhaps have exerted himself more strenuously to save the Primate, but that he was himself suspected by the Puritans. In a letter to Sir R. Southwell (Carte, ii. 490) he says, also stated that the lord chancellor of Ireland, Michael Boyle, who was also the Protestant primate, was ready to bear testimony to the loyalty and uprightness of his character. But all these appeals were listened to not only with indifference, but with the utmost impatience; nor would the testimony even of an angel from heaven have been sufficient to avert the blow from the doomed victim.

On the 15th of June, sentence of death was pronounced upon the Primate, and on the next day he wrote the following beautiful letter to Father Corker, in which he contrasts in the most touching language the partiality of the judges of the bench before which he had been condemned on earth, with the "supreme Judge of the high bench where no false witnesses can have audience:"

"DEAR SIR,

"I am obliged to you for the favour and charity of the 20th, and for all your former benevolences: and whereas I cannot in this country remunerate you, with God's grace, I hope to be grateful in that kingdom which is properly our country. And truly God gave me, though unworthy of it, that grace to have fortem animum mortis terrore carentem (a courage fearless of death). I have many sins to answer for before the supreme judge of the high bench, where no false witnesses can have audience. But as for the bench yesterday, I am not guilty of any crime there objected to me: I would I could be so clear at the bench of the All-powerful. Ut est sit, there is one comfort, that he cannot be deceived, because he is omniscious, and knows all secrets, even of hearts; and cannot deceive, because all goodness; so that I may be sure of a fair trial, and will get time sufficient to call witnesses, nay, the Judge will bring them in a moment, if there will be need of any. You and your comrade's prayers will be powerful advocates at that bench. Here none are admitted for "Your affectionate friend,

"OLIVER PLUNKETT."

In this way the holy martyr spent the time between his condemnation and his execution. He was more cheerful and happy than he had been since he returned to his native land, carrying with him the dignity and the cares of the primacy. He felt that he was about to be relieved from the afflictions of earth, and to be rewarded by the joys of heaven. Like another Paul, he cried out, "who will deliver me from the body of this death;" and like that great apostle, he "desired to be dissolved, and to be with Christ." His body indeed was still upon earth, but his soul was entirely absorbed in the contemplation of God, and those who saw the venerable man, with his long white hair and emaciated form, kneeling before the image of his Saviour, and calling upon Him for strength to follow Him in His sufferings, and to die for His name, seemed to see the light of heaven already shining upon his countenance. Fortunately Father Corker, who administered to him the last consolations of religion, has left us the following most interesting narrative of this portion of the Primate's life:

"I cannot as yet," says he, "pretend to give to you, as you

"I know well that I am born with some disadvantages in relation to the present conjuncture . . . my father and mother lived and died Papists . . . my brothers and sisters, though they were not very many, were very fruitful and very obstinate (they will call it constant) in their way; their fruitfulness hath spread into a large connexion, and their obstinacy hath made it altogether Popish." When he was dying, Peter Walsh (the most unfit person certainly in the whole world) strove to convert him to Catholicity. The duke asked him if he thought the change so necessary for his salvation, why he had not mentioned it to him sooner, and he, no doubt, remembered the mischief which Peter had himself done to that religion, and to those who professed it. The religious doubts which agitated his own mind were transmitted to his descendants, and I have been told that up to the present time his heirs have died, the one a Protestant and the other a Catholic, in regular alternation.

desire, a description of the virtues of the glorious archbishop and martyr, Dr. Oliver Plunkett; I am promised the particulars of his life and actions, both at Rome, where he studied and taught almost twenty years, and in Ireland, where he exercised his episcopal, or rather apostolical functions till he became a champion of faith: but these particulars are not as yet arrived at my hands. After his transportation hither, he was, as you know, close confined, and secluded from all conversation save that of his keepers, until his arraignment: so that here also I am much in the dark, and can only inform you of what I learned, as it were by chance, from the mouths of the said keepers, viz., that he spent his time in almost continual prayer; that he fasted usually three or four days a-week, with nothing but bread; that he appeared to them always modestly cheerful, without any anguish or concern at his danger, or strait confinement; that by his sweet and pious demeanour he attracted an esteem and reverence from those few that came near him. When he was arraigned, it is true, I could write to him, and he to me; but our letters were read, transcribed, and examined by the officers before they were delivered to either of us. For which cause we had little other communication than what was necessary in order to his trial. But the trial being ended, and he condemned, his man had leave to wait on him alone in his chamber, by whose means we had intercourse by letters to each other. And now it was I clearly perceived the spirit of God in him, and those lovely fruits of the Holy Ghost—charity, joy, peace, &c., transparent in his soul. And not only I, but many other Catholics, who came to receive his benediction, and were eye-witnesses (a favour not denied to us) there appeared in his words, in his actions, in his countenance, something so divinely elevated, such a composed mixture of cheerfulness, constancy, love, sweetness, and candour, as manifestly denoted the divine goodness had made him fit for a victim, and destined him for heaven. None saw or came near him but received new comfort, new fervour, new desires to please, serve, and suffer for Christ Jesus, by his very presence—concerning the manner and state of his prayer, he seemed most devoted to Catholic sentences, taken out of scripture, the divine office, and missal, which he made me procure for him three months before he died: upon these sentences he let his soul dilate itself in love, following herein the sweet impulse and dictates of the Holy Ghost, and reading his prayers, writ rather in his heart than in his book, according to that—"unctio ejus docet vos de omnesibus," St. John, ii. 27. For this reason, I suppose it was, that when with great humility he sent me his last speech to correct, he also writ me word he would not, at the place of execution, make use of any other set form or method of prayer than the Pater-Noster, Ave-Maria, Credo, Miserere, In Manus tuas Domine, &c., and for the rest, he would breathe forth his soul in such prayers and ejaculations as God Almighty should then inspire him withal. He continually endeavoured to improve and advance himself in the purity of divine love, and by consequence, also in contrition for his sins past, of his deficiency in both which this humble soul complained to me as the only thing that troubled him. This love had extinguished in him all fear of death; the very night before he died, being now as it were at heart's-ease, he went to bed at eleven o'clock, and slept quietly and soundly till four in the morning, at which time his man, who lay in the room with him, awaked him; so little concern had he upon his spirit, or rather, so much had the loveliness of the end beautified the horror of the passage to it. After he certainly knew God Almighty had chosen him to the crown and dignity of martyrdom, he continually studied how to divest himself of himself, and become more and more an entire, pleasing, and perfect holocaust; to which end, as he gave up his soul, with all its faculties, to the conduct of God, so, for God's sake, he resigned the care and disposal of his body to unworthy me, &c. But I neither can nor dare undertake to describe unto you the signal virtues of this blessed martyr. There appeared in him something beyond expression—something more than human; the most savage and hard-hearted people were mollified and attendered at his sight; many Protestants, in my hearing, wished their souls in the same state with his. All believed him innocent; and he made Catholics, even the most timorous, in love with death. When he was carried out of the press-yard to execution, he turned him about to our chamber windows, and with a pleasant aspect and elevated hands gave us his benediction. How he composed himself after he was taken from hence, you yourself can give a more exact account than I, &c.*

In another of his letters to Father Corker he expresses his joy at the prospect of being put to death for the faith, "since," he says, "Ireland, so fertile of saints, has but few martyrs."†

* See both these letters in Challoner's lives.

† For this brief extract, as well as some other interesting parti-

Nor is this conduct of the Primate testified by Catholics alone, but also by Protestants. It is thus Sir R. Butstrode mentions him :

"Captain Richardson, keeper of Newgate, being asked by the lieutenant of the tower, how his prisoner had behaved himself? he replied, 'very well, for when I came to him this morning, he was newly awake, having slept all night without any disturbance; and when I told him he was to prepare for his execution, he received the message with all quietness of mind, and went to the sledge as unconcerned as if he had been going to a wedding.'"

It was in such a heavenly disposition of mind he went from Newgate to Tyburn, on the 1st day of July, 1681. At the place of execution he read the following speech :

I have, some few days past, abided my trial at the King's-bench, and now very soon I must hold up my hand at the King of king's bench, and appear before a Judge that cannot be deceived by false witnesses or corrupt allegations—for he knoweth the secrets of hearts; neither can he deceive any, or give an unjust sentence, or be misled by respects of persons; he being all goodness, and a most just judge, will infallibly decree an eternal reward for all good works, and condign punishment for the smallest transgressions against his commandments. Which being a most certain and undoubted truth, it would be a wicked act, and contrary to my perpetual welfare, that I should now, by declaring any thing contrary to truth, commit a detestable sin, for which, within a very short time I must receive sentence of everlasting damnation; after which there is no reprieve or hope of pardon. I will, therefore, confess the truth, without any equivocation, and make use of the words according to their accustomed signification; assuring you, moreover, that I am of that certain persuasion, that no power not only upon earth, but also in heaven, can dispense with me, or give me leave to make a false protestation; and I protest, upon the word of a dying man, and as I hope for salvation at the hands of the supreme Judge, that I will declare the naked truth with all candour and sincerity; and that my affairs may be better known to all the world. It is to be observed that I have been accused in Ireland of treason and præmunire; and that there I was arraigned and brought to my trial; but the prosecutors (men of flagitious and infamous lives) perceiving that I had records and witnesses, who would evidently convince them, and clearly show my innocence and their wickedness, they voluntarily absented themselves, and came to this city to procure that I should be brought hither to my trial (where the crimes objected were not committed) where the jury did not know me, or the qualities of my accusers, and were not informed of several other circumstances conducing to a fair trial. Here, after six months' close imprisonment, or thereabouts, I was brought to the bar the 3rd of May, and arraigned for a crime, for which I was before arraigned in Ireland—a strange resolution, a rare fact, of which you will hardly find a precedent these five hundred years past; but whereas my witnesses and records were in Ireland, the lord chief justice gave me five weeks time to get them brought hither; but by reason of the uncertainty of the seas, of wind and weather, and of the difficulty of getting copies of records, and bringing many witnesses from several counties in Ireland, and for many other impediments (of which affidavit was made) I could not at the end of five weeks get the records and witnesses brought hither; I therefore begged for twelve days more, that I might be in a readiness for my trial, which my lord chief justice denied, and so I was brought to my trial, and exposed, as it were, with my hands tied, to those merciless perjurers, who did aim at my life by accusing me of these following points:

First—That I have sent letters by one Neil O'Neal (who was my page) to M. Baldeschi, the pope's secretary, to the bishop of Aix, and to the prince of Colonna, that they might solicit foreign powers to invade Ireland; and also to have sent letters to Cardinal Bouillon, to the same effect. Secondly—To have employed Captain Con O'Neal to the French king for succour. Thirdly—To have levied and exacted monies from the clergy of Ireland, to bring in the French, and to maintain 70,000 men. Fourthly—To have had in readiness 70,000 men, and lists made of them, and to have given directions to one friar Duffy to make a list of 250 men in the parish of Foghart, in the county of Louth. Fifthly—To have surveyed all the forts and harbours in Ireland; and to have fixed upon Carlingford as a fit harbour for the French's landing. Sixthly—To have had several councils and meetings, where there was money allotted for introducing the French. Finally—That I held a meeting in the county of Monaghan, some ten or twelve years past, where there were 300 gentlemen of three several counties, to wit, Monaghan, Cavan, and Armagh, whom I did exhort to take arms to recover their estates.

To the first I answer, that Neil O'Neal was never my servant or page, and that I never sent letter or letters by him to M. Baldeschi, or the bishop of Aix, or to the prince of Colonna; and I say that the English translation of that pretended letter produced by Friar Mac Moyer is a mere invention of his, and never penned by me, or its original, either in English, Latin, Italian, or any other language. I affirm, moreover, that I never wrote letter or letters to Cardinal Bouillon, or any of the French king's ministers; neither did any who was in that court either speak to me or write to me, directly or indirectly, of any plot or conspiracy against king or country. Farther, I vow that I never sent agent or agents to Rome, or to any other court, about any civil or temporal affairs; and it is well known (for it is a precept publicly printed) that clergymen (living in countries where the government is not of Roman Catholics) are commanded by Rome, not to write to Rome concerning any civil or temporal affairs. And I do aver that I never received letter or letters from the pope, or from any other of his ministers, making the least mention of any such matters; so that the friars Mac Moyer and Duffy swore most falsely as to such letter or letters, agent or agents.

To the second I say, that I never employed Captain Con O'Neal to the French king, or to any of his ministers; and that I never wrote to him or received letters from him; and that I never saw him but once, nor ever spoke to him, to the best of my remembrance, ten words; and as for his being in Charlemont or Dungannon, I never saw him in those towns, or knew of his being in those places; so that as to Con O'Neal, Friar Mac Moyer's descriptions are most false.

To the third I say, that I never levied any money for a plot or conspiracy for bringing in Spaniards or French, neither did I ever receive any upon that account from priests or friars, as priest Mac Clave* and friar Duffy most untruly asserted. I assure you that I never received from any clergyman in Ireland but what was due to me by ancient custom for my maintenance, and what my predecessors these hundred years were wont to receive, nay I received less than many of them. And if all what the Catholic clergy of Ireland get in the year were put in one purse, it would signify little or nothing to introduce the French, or to raise an army of 70,000 men, which I had enlisted and ready, as Friar Mac Moyer most falsely deposed; neither is it less untrue what Friar Duffy attested, viz., that I directed him to make a list of 250 men in the parish of Foghart (Fohart) in the county of Louth.

To the fifth I answer, that I never surveyed all the ports and harbours of Ireland, and that I was never at Cork, Kingsale, Bantry, Youghal, Dungarvon, or Knockfergus;† and these thirty-six years past I was not at Limerick, Dungannon, or Wexford. As for Carlingford, I never was in it but once, and staid not in it above half an hour; neither did I consider the port or haven; neither had I it in my thoughts or imagination to fix upon it or upon any other port or haven for landing of French or Spaniards, and whilst I was at Carlingford (by mere chance passing that way) Friar Duffy was not in my company, as he most falsely swore.

To the sixth I say, that I was never at any meeting or council where there was mention made of allotting or collecting of monies for a plot or conspiracy; and it is well known that the Catholic clergy of Ireland, who have neither lands nor revenues, and hardly are able to keep decent clothes upon their backs, and life and soul together, can raise no considerable sum, nay cannot spare as much as would maintain half a regiment.

To the seventh I answer, that I was never at any meeting of 300 gentlemen in the counties of Monaghan, Armagh, and Cavan, nor of one county, nor of one barony, and that I never exhorted a gentleman or gentlemen, either there or in any other part of Ireland, to take arms for the recovering of their estates; and it is well known that there are not, even in all the province of Ulster, 300 Irish Roman Catholics who had estates or lost estates by the late rebellion, and as it is well known, all my thoughts and endeavours were for the quiet of my country, and especially of that province.

Now, to be brief, as I hope to be saved, I never sent letter or letters, agent or agents, to pope, king, prince or prelate, concerning any plot or conspiracy against my king or country: I never raised sum or sums of money, great or small, to maintain soldier or soldiers, all the days of my life; I never knew or heard (neither did it come to my thoughts or imagination) that the French were to land at Carlingford; and I believe there is none who know Ireland even in a map, but will think it a mere romance; I never knew of any plotters and conspirators in Ireland, but such as were notorious and proclaimed (commonly called Tories) whom I did endeavour to suppress. And as I hope for salvation, I always have been, and am, entirely ignorant of the treasons laid to my charge, and of any other whatsoever.

And though I be not guilty of the crimes of which I am accused, yet I believe none came ever to this place who is in such a condition as I am, for if I should even acknowledge (which in conscience I cannot do, because I should belie myself) the chief crimes laid to my charge, no wise man that knows Ireland would believe me. If I should confess that I was able to raise 70,000 men in the districts of which I had care, to wit, in Ulster, nay, even in all Ireland, and to have levied and exacted monies from the Roman clergy, for their maintenance, and to have proposed Carlingford for the French's landing, all would but laugh at me, it being well known that all the revenues of Ireland, both spiritual and temporal, possessed by his majesty's subjects, are scarce able to raise and maintain an army of 70,000 men. If I will deny all those crimes (as I did and do) yet it may be that some who are not acquainted with the affairs of Ireland will not believe that my denial is grounded upon truth, though I assert it with my last breath. I dare mention further, and affirm, that if these points of 70,000 men, &c., had been sworn before any Protestant jury in Ireland, and had been even acknowledged by me at the bar, they would not believe me, no more than if it had been deposed and confessed by me, that I had flown in the air from Dublin to Holy-Head. You see, therefore, what condition I am in, and you have heard what protestations I have made of innocence, and I hope you will believe the words of a dying man. And that you may be the more inclined to give me credit, I assure you that a great peer* sent me notice, "that he would save my life, if I would accuse others;" but I answered, "that I never knew of any conspirators in Ireland, but such (as I said before) as were publicly known out-laws, and that to save my life, I would not falsely accuse any, nor prejudice my own soul. Quid prodest homini," &c. To take away any man's life or goods wrongfully ill becometh any Christian, especially a man of my calling, being a clergyman of the Catholic Church, and also an unworthy prelate, as long as there was any connivance or toleration; and I by preaching, and teaching, and statutes, have endeavoured to bring the clergy (of which I had a care) to a due comportment, according to their calling; and though thereby I did but my duty, yet some, who would not amend, had a prejudice for me, and especially my accusers, to whom I did endeavour to do good; I mean the clergymen, (as for the four laymen who appeared against me, viz. Florence Mac Moyer, the two O'Neals, and Hanlon, I was never acquainted with them;) but you see how I am requited, and how by false oaths they brought me to this untimely death; which wicked act being a defect of persons, ought not to reflect upon the order of St. Francis, or upon the Roman Catholic clergy; it being well known that there was a Judas among the twelve apostles, and a wicked man called Nicholas among the seven deacons; and even as one of the said deacons, to wit, holy Stephen, did pray for those who stoned him to death, so do I for those who with perjuries spill my innocent blood, saying as St. Stephen did, "O Lord, lay not this sin to them." I do heartily forgive them, and also the judges, who, by denying me sufficient time to bring my records and witnesses from Ireland, did expose my life to evident danger. I do also forgive all those who had a hand in bringing me from Ireland to be tried here, where it was morally impossible for me to have a fair trial. I do finally forgive all who did concur, directly or indirectly, to take away my life; and I ask forgiveness of all those whom I ever offended by thought, word, or deed. I beseech the All-powerful, that his Divine Majesty grant our king, queen, the duke of York, and all the royal family, health, long life, and all prosperity in this world, and in the next, everlasting felicity.

Now that I have showed sufficiently (as I think) how innocent I am of any plot or conspiracy, I would I were able, with the like truth, to clear myself of high crimes committed against the Divine Majesty's commandments (often transgressed by me) for which I am sorry with all my heart, and if I should or could live a thousand years, I have a firm resolution, and a strong purpose, by your grace, O my God, never to offend you; and I beseech your divine Majesty, by the merits of Christ, and by the intercession of his blessed mother, and all the holy angels and saints, to forgive me my sins, and to grant my soul eternal rest.

Having finished the reading of this speech, to which the audience listened with the most profound attention and the most lively emotion, he spoke as follows:

To the final satisfaction of all persons that have the charity to believe the words of a dying man, I again declare before God, as I hope for salvation, what is contained in this paper is the plain and naked truth, without any equivocation, mental reservation, or secret evasion whatever; taking the words in their usual sense and meaning, as Protestants do when they discourse with all candour and sincerity. To all which I have here subscribed my hand,

OLIVER PLUNKETT.*

After he had ended his speech, and recited the psalm Miserere mei Deus, Parce animæ, In manus tuas Domine, and other devout aspirations, he gave a signal, previously agreed upon, to a disguised priest who stood by the scaffold, and meekly bowing himself, obtained absolution from him; and his cap being drawn over his eyes, he continued recommending his happy soul into the hands of his Saviour, till the cart was drawn away. He was suffered to hang till he expired, or at all events till he was in a state of insensibility, and then was cut down, quartered, and bowelled: his heart and bowels were thrown into the fire; his body was begged of the king, and was interred (all but the head and arms to the elbows, which were disposed of elsewhere) in the church-yard of St. Giles in the Fields; with a copper-plate on his breast with the following inscription:

"In this tomb resteth the body of the Right Reverend Oliver Plunkett, archbishop of Armagh, and primate of Ireland, who, in hatred of religion, was accused of high treason by false witnesses, and for the same condemned, and executed at Tyburn, his heart and bowels being taken out, and cast into the fire. He suffered martyrdom with constancy, the 1st of July, 1681, in the reign of King Charles the Second."

The inscription was written by Abbot Corker, to whom the Primate had made a present of his body. This legacy is mentioned by Father Corker himself in his letter, and is thus related by Dodd (Church History, v. iii. p. 283-4): "'Tis observed in the account I have of him (Plunkett) that, on the morning before he suffered, he made Mr. Corker a present of his body, to dispose of it at his pleasure. Mr. Corker willingly accepted of the gift, and, when times permitted, disposed of it in a proper manner. His body was first deposited in St. Giles's churchyard, under the north wall, near the five jesuits. 'In the said place Plunkett's quarters continued till the crop-eared plot broke out in 1683, and then they were taken up and conveyed beyond the sea, to the monastery of the Benedictines at Lambspring, in Germany.'—Athen. Oxon. p. 221.

"Challoner," p. 450, says that the translation of the relics of Dr. Plunkett from St. Giles, to Lambspring, took place four years after his execution; but I prefer Dodd's authority, which places it two years earlier. The account in Harris' Ware's Writers also agrees with Dodd. It is as follows: "The (Plunkett's) head was separated from his body, which was divided into four quarters, and they were buried in the churchyard of St. Giles in the Fields, where they rested about two years, and then were taken up and conveyed beyond seas to a monastery of English Benedictines, at Lambspring, in the dominions of the duke of Brunswick, in Germany, where, with great ceremony, they were re-buried."

When the quarters of the martyr's body were taken up by order of Father Corker, in 1683, they were found to be entire. He had them transferred to Lambspring, as already stated, and in 1693 erected over them a handsome monument, with this Latin inscription :

"Reliquiæ sanctæ memoriæ Oliveri Plunkett, archiepiscopi Armachani, Hiberniæ primatis, qui in odium Catholici fidei laqueo suspensus, extractis visceribus et in ignem projectis, celeberrimo martyri occubuit Londini, primo die Julij (style veteri) anno salutis 1681."*

Since this sad but glorious tragedy was enacted at Tyburn, on the 1st of July, 1681, no Catholic has been put to death for his faith in these kingdoms.† The blood of the martyr, stronger than a wall of adamant, resisted and drove back the fierce and triumphant flood of persecution, and in its recoil it overwhelmed the persecutors themselves. On the very day after the execution of the Primate, Shaftesbury, the great promoter of the proceedings against all those who approved of the Popish plot, was dragged ignominiously to the tower, amid the hootings of the rabble. The Irish witnesses, whom he had patronised, fearing from the sudden change in public opinion that they might be prosecuted for their perjuries, offered as a set off against their delinquencies to appear against their former employer. Their services were accepted, and it was not the want of strong swearing, but the packing of a jury by his friends, the sheriffs, that saved him from quickly following his victims to the place of execution. But though he escaped on this occasion, some documents found amongst his papers were published, which turned the popular feelings so strongly in favour of the court, that he hid himself for fear of a second prosecution, and, after vainly endeavouring to excite a rebellion, fled to Amsterdam, where he died in January, 1683. Oates‡ was deprived of his pension, Rouse, the leader of the mob from Wapping, and College whose zeal had procured for him the appellation of the "Protestant joiner," were both hanged. The dissenters had been the active parti-

† Challoner's Memoirs, ii. p. 450.—"When we say that Oliver Plunkett was the last martyr who was put to death for the faith in these countries, we do not forget the atrocious persecutions which the Irish priests were obliged to undergo during the reign of William and Mary, of Ann, and even, for a short time after the Scotch rebellion of 1715, in the reign of George the First. We do not forget the violation of the treaty of Limerick; after which no less than twelve thousand men sought refuge in France. But although a reward was set upon the heads of the priests, and they were dragged out of the caves where they had concealed themselves, and sometimes whilst in the very act of celebrating the divine mysteries, yet none of them, as far at least as I know, was put to death by law. It was generally content with banishing them from the kingdom, or transporting them for life, although if they returned they were subject to the penalty of high treason. A few words concerning the laws against priests passed in the reign of William III. and Ann, will be found a little farther on. With regard to the time of George the First, the lords justices, on the breaking out of the Scotch rebellion in 1715, issued orders for the apprehension of many of the Catholic nobility. All the chapels throughout the kingdom were obliged to be closed, and the usual reward of fifty pounds was offered for the apprehension and conviction of a dignitary, and twenty pounds for that of any other regular or secular unregistered priest. The priest-catchers at this time were generally Jews who pretended to be converts to the Christian religion, and sometimes even to be priests, in order to gain the confidence of the people. The most notorious amongst these was a Portuguese named Gorgia, who got two Jesuits, a Dominican, a Franciscan, and three secular priests apprehended in Dublin, and banished the kingdom. We may as well observe that all "Popish schoolmasters, ushers, or private tutors, were subject to the same penalties as the proscribed ecclesiastics."

‡ In the reign of James II. Oates was convicted of perjury, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, together with being obliged to stand in the pillory four days in the year, on each of which he was flogged by the common hangman. When William III. ascended the throne, he got back his pension.

zans of the party which had procured the death of innocent men for having been concerned in the Popish plot. Merited retribution quickly overtook them, and the toleration and justice which they would not award to others, was taken from themselves before the end of the year in which the Primate suffered. At the request of the magistrates of Middlesex, the king ordered the laws against "conventicles and unlawful meetings under pretence of religious worship" to be immediately enforced, and the dissenters were quickly subjected to fines, imprisonment, and persecution.

The Irish witnesses soon squandered the money which they had received for proving the plot and swearing away the Primate's life. For a time they managed to support themselves by swearing against Shaftesbury and their old employers. But even this failed them, and they were quickly brought to a state of the most wretched destitution. Florence Mac Moyer was so far reduced that he was obliged to pawn for £5, the celebrated "Book of Armagh," which thus passed out of his family, where it had remained for many centuries. Nor was this the worst evil against which these miserable beings had to contend, for they were now universally abhorred and detested even by their former abettors, and lived in daily terror of being punished, perhaps hanged for their perjuries. They had now no friends, for they had been equally faithless and false to all parties. They were, moreover, tormented by the hell of a guilty conscience, for the crime of murder was upon their souls. "One of those miscreants, Duffy, old, emaciated, abhorred, exiled from his Church, and tortured with remorse, visited a successor of Dr. Plunkett (Dr. McMahon), and as he approached him, exclaimed in an agony of soul, 'Am I never to have peace! Is there no mercy for me!' The prelate heard him in silence, then opened a glass-case, and in a deep and solemn voice said, 'Look here, thou unfortunate wretch!' The head of his murdered Primate was before him, he saw, knew it, and swooned away."* This miserable man was reconciled to the Church, and died penitent.

It is a most singular fact, that the death of Plunkett is the barrier beyond which the tide of persecution against the Catholics could not advance, at that time, and by which it was immediately driven back upon their enemies. But God often takes good out of evil, and makes their own iniquity the instrument by which he strikes down the wicked. Thus the enemies of Catholicity, who got the Primate put to death as a traitor, exalted the ancient faith by the very act by which they hoped to work its fall. The people were so touched by his conduct, so full of innocence, and yet so forgiving to those who falsely swore away his life, so modest yet so fearless, so simple yet so sublime, that many of them, although Protestants, publicly prayed that their souls were in the same state as his, and declared that his death had given more glory to God, to his country, and to the Roman religion than he could have acquired for them during his life, even if it had been protracted for a hundred years.†

Father Corker, to whom the venerable martyr had bequeathed his body, caused a surgeon, named John Ridley, to cut off the arms by the elbow. He got a round tin case made for the head, and an oblong one for the arms, and enclosed them both in a chest. The head and arms were not buried with the rest of the body in St. Giles' churchyard. But when Father Corker had it exhumed, in 1683, they were taken along with it to Lambspring. The quarters of Oliver Plunkett's body repose under a monument in the wall of the crypt of the church. His right hand is preserved in a casket in the sacristy. Whether his left hand was buried with the body, or enshrined, I cannot discover; but I am enabled to give some account of the manner in which his head was preserved.

At the time of the translation of Dr. Plunkett's relics, Cardinal Howard,* better known as Cardinal Norfolk, resided at Rome, and was Cardinal protector of England. Father Corker sent Dr. Plunkett's head from Lambspring to Rome, where it came into the possession of Cardinal Howard, about the end of the year 1683. The way in which it was brought back to Ireland was as follows:

It may be remembered that we have had occasion, in the earlier portion of this biography, to make frequent mention of one of Dr. Plunkett's successors in the primacy, the celebrated Hugh M'Mahon, author of the "Jus Primatiae Armaranum." Dominick Maguire was appointed primate by Pope Innocent XI., immediately after the martyrdom of Oliver Plunkett. He was a Dominican, had studied at Andalusia, in Spain, and was residing in London as honorary chaplain to the Spanish ambassador, when he was placed at the head of the Irish Church in 1681. After the treaty of Limerick he was obliged to fly to Paris, where he died in 1708. Dr. Richard O'Heain was immediately nominated by the pope to the primacy, but declined the honor.† Dr. Hugh M'Mahon, who like his predecessors had acquired his education on the continent of Europe, was in the same year promoted to the vacant see. He was a most ardent admirer of his illustrious predecessor, Dr. Plunkett, and remembered to have heard, when a boy, of the celebrated contest for the precedency of his see, in which that prelate was then engaged with Peter Talbot, archbishop of Dublin. The martyrdom of Dr. Plunkett—the crowning glory of his life—could not fail to enhance the admiration of his pious successor, and when Hugh M'Mahon was appointed to the primacy, he returned to Ireland, carrying with him the head of Oliver Plunkett, which he had, many years before, obtained from Cardinal Howard. His predecessor had died in exile, the times were most perilous, and it is probable that he wished to fortify himself and others by this noble relic, in case they too should be obliged to suffer martyrdom. This was by no means improbable, for during the reign of William and Mary, as well as during that of Anne, most severe laws were passed against the Catholic clergy.

* Philip Howard, third son of Henry, Lord Mowbray, was born in Arundel-house, London, in 1629. At the age of fourteen, his grandfather, Thomas, earl of Arundel, took him to Italy, and placed him under the care of the Dominicans, or black friars, at Cremona, of which order he became a member. After the Restoration, he returned to England, and became one of Queen Catharine's chaplains. When the Popish plot persecutions commenced, he was obliged to retire to Bonheim, in Flanders, where he founded a small community of his order. He was raised to the dignity of cardinal in 1675, and in the same year received the hat, in the bishop's palace at Antwerp. He then went to Rome, where he lived beloved and respected to his death, which took place in 1690.

† Hib. Dom., p. 429.

In the year 1695, "All the Popish prelates vicars-general, deans, monks, Jesuits, and all other dignitaries of their religion, who exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction in Ireland," were ordered to depart from the kingdom before the 1st of May, 1698. In case they should return, they were liable to imprisonment and transportation; and if they escaped and revisited Ireland, their crime was high treason. This law was followed by the still more terrible acts passed both in this reign and in the beginning of that of Queen Anne. Some of the latter which regarded the registration of the clergy, I have already had occasion to notice. The rest of those atrocious laws it is not my province to detail, but if any one delights in studying the wicked ingenuity of parliament, he will find them in the Commons' journals, and an excellent epitome of them in the Hibernia Dominicana (p. 152, and following). During the exile of Primate Maguire, Dr. Donnelly, the vicar-general of Armagh—and afterwards bishop of Dromore—remained in Ireland,* and administered the spiritual affairs of the diocese in spite of the sanguinary laws by which all dignitaries were persecuted. On the appointment of Dr. M'Mahon to the primacy, in 1708, he immediately came to Ireland. In the following year (the eighth of Anne) the Earl of Wharton, the viceroy whom the Whigs sent to govern Ireland, made a most wicked speech to parliament, calling for new laws against the Catholics. The commons immediately resolved, "That several Popish bishops (one of whom was Primate M'Mahon) had lately come into the kingdom, and, by ordaining great numbers, had presumed to continue the succession of the Romish priesthood, and that their return was owing to a defect in the laws." A reward of fifty pounds was offered for the conviction of a bishop, vicar-general, or other dignitary, and twenty for every regular or secular priest not lawfully registered. To remove the infamy with which the profession of an informer is regarded, especially in such a cause, the commons resolved, "That the prosecuting and informing against Papists was an honourable service,† and that all magistrates who neglected to execute these laws were betrayers of the liberties of the kingdom."‡ The deadly object of the act for registering the second order of the secular clergy became evident. It was known that in former times, no matter how severe the laws might be, the priests remained to administer to the people all that remained to them—the consolations of religion. The laity, for the most part, repaid the devotion of the clergy by the most undeviating fidelity, and nothing could induce them to betray the hiding-place of a priest. But the registration supplied this knowledge—they knew where every priest dwelt, and then they ordered them to abjure their religion or leave the kingdom; for by the 8th of Anne, cap. iii. sec. 23, all the registered priests were ordered to take the oath of abjuration before the 25th of March, 1710, either in one of the four courts in Dublin or at the quarter sessions of the county where they had been registered. If after the day named any of them who had not taken the oath presumed to celebrate mass, or perform any other sacerdotal function, he became subject to transportation for life, from which, if he escaped and returned, his crime was high treason. It is scarcely necessary to say, that the oath of abjuration contains a distinct denial of transubstantiation, and a declaration that the invocation of saints and of the mother of God, as well as the sacrifice of the mass, are idolatrous. At such a time, Dr. M'Mahon could not look upon the head of his martyred predecessor without contemplating the possibility of his being obliged to share his sufferings as well as his dignity.

The persecution, however, slackened from the accession of the house of Brunswick, in 1714; the crowds of priest-hunters who infested the country were not bounded on so fiercely as formerly,* and in 1721, at the request of Stephen MacEgan, then provincial of the Dominicans, and afterwards Bishop of Meath, Primate Hugh M'Mahon applied to the general of the order, afterwards Cardinal Phipps, to have a convent of Dominican nuns founded in Drogheda. The general acquiesced in the petition,† and Cathrine Plunkett was ordered to leave Brussels and assume the duties of prioress. The convent was founded in 1722, and here Dr. M'Mahon deposited the head of Oliver Plunkett, enshrined in a silver case. De Burgo saw the head there, and touched its white hair.‡ He was, indeed, consecrated in this monastery, on the 22nd of April, 1759, on his elevation to the see of Ossory, along with Philip O'Reilly, bishop of Raphoe, by Anthony Blake, archbishop of Armagh, the assistant bishops being Anthony O'Garvey, bishop of Dromore, and Edmund O'Doran, bishop of Down.§ Cathrine Plunkett was living when De Burgo wrote his Hibernica Dominica,|| but he does not say whether she was of the same family as Primate Plunkett; it is, however, extremely probable that she was, and it is not unlikely that this circumstance may have influenced Dr. M'Mahon to place in the convent over which she presided the head of his martyred predecessor. The head was accompanied by an authentication of its genuineness written on parchment, of which the following is a copy:

|| Ibid. p. 361. When De Burgo published his Hibernica Dominicana in 1762, he was bishop of Ossory. A great outcry was raised against it by the bigots, and the Catholic bishops of Munster determined to assemble in his own diocese, in the city of Kilkenny, for the purpose of reviewing and expurgating the work. Dr. Burke vindicated the work, and insisted on his episcopal privileges so strenuously that no meeting took place then. The Munster prelates, however, soon after assembled at Thurles, and expunged from p. 136 to p. 147, which consisted of an extract from Porter, relative to the reign of James II. In the older copies of the work it is sometimes printed loosely on different paper, the original leaves having been torn out. No copy, however, would be purchased without it.

In witness whereof wee have hereunto sett our hands scales this 29th Day of May An: Dni: 1682.

JOHN (seal) RIDLEY, ELIZABETH (seal) SHELDON.

On the back of the parchment is written:

Signed and sealed in the presence of

EDWARD SHELDON,
RAPHE SHELDON.

The head of this illustrious martyr is still preserved in the convent of the Dominican nuns at Drogheda, better known by the name of the "Sienna Convent," a name which it has obtained from its patroness, St. Catherine of Sienna, under whose protection it was placed by its first prioress, Cathrine Plunkett. De Burgo says that it was enclosed when he saw it in a silver case, out of which it could be easily drawn.* At present it is enshrined in a little ebony temple at each of the four angles of which is a Corinthian pillar of silver. The sides are also inlaid with silver plates. There are two doors, one in the front and one in the rear, and inside of each there is a glass plate, through which the head can be seen. On the silver plate in the front door are the Primate's arms, surmounted by a silver mitre. On each angle of the roof is a silver flame, emblematical of martyrdom. The head itself is of a brown colour, and quite perfect, with the exception of the nose, which is slightly injured. It still retains some of the white hair of which De Burgo speaks.†

The skin and flesh of the neck are contracted, leaving the ends of the bones bare, thus attesting that the muscles were still capable of action when the head was separated from the body. On the crown, is the zucchetto or little cap worn to cover the tonsure: but this is evidently a modern ornament, and it could not possibly have been worn by the Primate, for it is purple—a colour which no person but a cardinal has a right to wear. It may, possibly, have belonged to Cardinal Howard.

There are two portraits of the Primate in the Sienna Convent, which were also the gifts of Primate Hugh M'Mahon. Both were taken after Dr. Plunkett became primate, for he is represented in them as wearing the pontificals and the archiepiscopal cross, but in one of them he appears to be much younger than in the other. The earlier of these portraits must have been taken shortly after he became primate, for it represents him as being little more than forty years old, with long curling chestnut hair. In the second he seems a great deal older. There is a third, now in the possession of the Rev. Dr. Campbell, of Clogher, which was taken in Newgate, after his condemnation. An excellent copper-plate impression of this last has been issued by Mr. Duffy: the plate was brought from the Low Countries within the last few years by Mr. Bindon. All these portraits exhibit the same general cast of features—the forehead ample, the eyes large, the nose, mouth, and chin well formed, and indicative of firmness and energy. Any one would know them all to be the portraits of the same man, and yet how much he is changed within the space of a few years! In the first he appears in all the vigour of the prime of life;

* Theca argentea inclusum ex qua facile extrahi potest—Hib. Dom., p. 361.

† Iludque quod crines utique canos nuper palpavi. De Burgo says that the Sienna convent was in his time most flourishing—that it immediately received novices, illustrious alike by descent and by virtue—tam parentela quam vita conspicuas—and that large numbers of girls were educated in it. It is gratifying to be able to say that in all these respects this convent is still equally flourishing.

in the other two, his hair, though still abundant, has become quite white—his ample forehead is slightly furrowed, and his whole countenance, though still retaining its mildness, its energy, and its beauty, wears a look of sorrow. It is, however, a countenance which we are never tired of beholding, and which, if it speaks to us of the miseries and of the uncertainties of earth, also reminds us of the joys and of the glory of heaven.

Paraguay and the Jesuits.

WORLDLY ambition, the desire of wealth, or distinction, or fame, powerfully as they influence the human mind, would never have sustained the missionaries in their arduous career: they had higher and more exalted motives for their exertions. The command "To go and teach all nations" impelled them onwards. Inspired with the desire of gaining souls to Christ, the Spirit which he sent to his apostles guiding, they raised the sacred symbol of our religion before the nations who were in darkness. They assailed with equal perseverance and success the heresies of Europe and the barbarous idolatry of southern America. China, Japan, India, Tartary, Siam, Persia, Abyssinia, Angola, Mozambique, witnessed their zeal. For them death had no terrors, the grave no sting. Their victory was gained when called from this earthly tabernacle to the eternal mansions. Visi sunt oculis insipientium mori, illi autem sunt in pace.

Undismayed by sufferings, not disheartened by the ruin brought on the rising church, in Guayra they recommenced their labours, and were hailed with much satisfaction by the entire of the Tapè people, a branch of the Guaranies, and speaking the same language. They invited the missionaries among them, gave them the kindest reception, and in very many instances formed themselves into communities, the better to ensure the residence of the fathers in their country.

Their chiefs claimed a right to keep as many wives as they could maintain; but, although they were willing enough to submit to have but one wife, yet considerable difficulties arose as to the question whether they were obliged to keep the first, or were at liberty to chose the one they liked most among those with whom they cohabited. This point of theology caused much discussion among the missionaries. It was ultimately referred to Rome, and a memorial sent forward to the effect that this people considered their wives more as servants than equals; that they were accustomed to put them away without any reason but caprice; that it was impossible to find out with whom they first cohabited; that the obligation of confining themselves to her with whom they first had intercourse was a great obstacle to the conversion of many of the chiefs; that they had no marriage ceremonies by which the wife might be distinguished from the concubine; that for many reasons the memorialist, Father de Lugo, and many others, believed that no marriage existed among those Indians. On the other hand, it was urged that marriage, according to the natural law, existed; that the woman first lived with ought to be the wife, except such was an obstacle to the practice of religion. A decision was prayed, in order that some uniform rule might be acted on.* The decision given at Rome was, that both opinions were probable, and that the missionaries were at liberty, in this instance, to act so as to secure the conversion of the Indians. Christianity made much progress among the Italines, a branch of the Tapè tribe, and Father Ranconnier established among them four "Reductions," which were shortly after attacked by the Paulistas, and almost ruined. After various vicissitudes, sometimes successfully defending themselves, the Jesuits collected the remains of the inhabitants, and abandoned the country as they had Guayra. They emigrated to the district where the rivers Parana and Uruguay approach nearest. Their new abode was protected by immense woods and large rivers. The numbers forming this second migration amounted to fifteen thousand.

For a considerable time the "Reductions" which had been formed on the Parana enjoyed tranquillity. They were growing in numbers, order, and comfort—the Indians of them were gradually losing their instability of purpose, and beginning to be conscious of their happiness. Their trials and annoyances commenced from those who ought to have been their protectors—the governor and the bishop of the district. There was nothing the converts so much detested as the personal service which the Spanish settlers sought to exact from them; to avoid it, they would not hesitate to return to the woods and mountains. The governor of the province demanded from them a supply of canoes for his own use; they complied, but on some frivolous ground he threw into prison a cacique and some Indians who came to deliver the boats. This caused a storm of indignation among the towns, which with difficulty was appeased, but not until Father Romero procured the freedom of the captives by representing to the governor the injustice of his conduct, and reminding him that by the king's decree the Indians of the "Reductions" were exempted from his authority. The bishop thought to deprive the "Reductions" of their pastors, the Jesuits, and to appoint others who would be more immediately under his own control, and that consequently the revenues of his diocese would be much improved. Father Romero used all his powers of reasoning—he reminded him that the "Reductions" were placed under the care of the Jesuits; that through their efforts those Christian communities had been formed. But he argued to no purpose: the only answer given to his argument was, that the "Reductions" were parishes, and that every parish priest should be the appointment of the bishop. At length the letters patent of the king, together with specials bulls of the sovereign pontiffs, and the decrees of the royal council were produced, all of which forbade any person or persons, no matter of what rank, to interfere with the Jesuits in their government and management of the converted Indians. The bishop yielded, he went to visit the "Reductions" in his jurisdiction, spoke and wrote of them in terms of the highest praise, and continued for the remainder of his life a firm friend to the order. But far greater dangers awaited the converts than the opposition of the bishop or the commands of the governor—the people of St. Paul were about to send an expedition against them for slaves and plunder. Wearied with forced emigrations, the Jesuits resolved to train the people to the use of arms, that they might be able to defend their homes and families. Hitherto the use of fire-arms had been positively forbidden to be taught the Indians, lest they might become too powerful; now, however, the fathers resolved to appeal to the court of Spain and obtain the required authority, as also redress for the grievances inflicted by the people of St. Paul and the carelessness of the governor. Accordingly they despatched the untiring Father Montoya to Madrid, and an emissary to the holy see. Montoya complained to the royal council of the outrages and miseries inflicted on the converts by the Paulistas; that they were utterly at their mercy, because they were prohibited from using fire-arms; that it was next to an impossibility to preserve the towns now so flourishing unless permission was given; he promised that the purchase of arms or the teaching the use of them should cost the government nothing; that the arms should only be delivered when required for defence. The request was granted; the conduct of the Paulistas condemned in the strongest terms; all the slaves they had taken were ordered to be set free. All those who were converted in the districts of Guayra, the Tapé, the Uruguay, and the Parana were declared vassals of the crown and exempted from all taxes or duties, save a tribute to commence in the year 1649. Most positive orders were sent to the Spanish governors to carry those instructions into execution, and to punish most severely any infringement of them. Tano, who had been sent to Rome, was presented by the general of the order, Vitellische, to Urban VIII., who, horrified at the evils inflicted on the converts, pronounced the strongest condemnation on their persecutors, and excommunicated all who should seek to enslave them on any pretext. Montoya and Tano having both succeeded in their missions, were obliged on their voyage back to touch at Rio Janeiro, where the slave party was so strong that they excited a great commotion and disturbance. The Jesuit church was attacked, their college pillaged, their lives endangered. At another neighbouring town the populace rose, and were guilty of frightful excesses—so generally implicated were all classes in the maintenance of those unjust depredations. Since the first attempt at civilizing and converting the Indians, the history of those countries presented a sad picture. On one side persevering efforts for reclaiming the Indians, on the other, no less constant efforts to enslave them. The Jesuits labouring incessantly to teach the Gospel, and the Spaniards, by their cruelty and licentiousness, frustrating their efforts. But those evils were henceforward at an end. A militia was raised: the Indians were trained to defend themselves, and on four or five occasions they so completely defeated the Paulistas as to deter them from approaching the "Reductions." They were enabled to live in peace and bid defiance to their enemies. Seeing how the Jesuits had laboured to obtain for them the means of self-defence, the suspicions which they entertained occasionally were now put an end to—each day they became more affectionately attached to their benefactors and more submissive to them. It was not alone the poor Indians who hailed the missionaries with delight, but all who were remarkable for probity, for devotion to Christianity, for love of their fellow-beings revered them and their labours. The following letter, written to the King of Spain, in 1637, by the Bishop of Tucuman, may not be uninteresting:

SIRE—Your majesty has often given orders to my predecessors to let you know how far the diocese may require the aid of religious, to preach the Gospel to the natives, that the royal council may supply its wants. As within three years I have had its spiritual government, I have carefully visited almost every part of it, I shall lay before your majesty an account of its present state.

This province, sire, is more than four hundred leagues in extent; contains eight Spanish and a great number of Indian towns, of which the most considerable contains from twelve to fourteen thousand inhabitants. All the inhabitants have been baptised, but most of them, through natural levity or want of instruction, have renounced or forgot the faith. Of these the Jesuits had converted upwards of fifty thousand, but were obliged to abandon them, on account of the bad behaviour of the Spaniards. . . . There are eight of these towns, but they have no pastor, and it is out of my power to give them any, since even in the Spanish towns there is scarce a priest capable of performing parochial duties. . . . In the Indian towns governed by secular priests there are many things that want to be reformed. These priests know nothing—they are incapable of fulfilling their own obligations, and know not how to instruct others. The regulars are very few. . . . There are, therefore, none but the fathers of the company that can exonerate your majesty's conscience. In all their houses there are labourers ready both night and day. . . . They instruct the children, visit the sick, assist the dying, and are particularly careful of the Indians. . . . I entreated the provincial to hold an assembly of his order at Corduba . . . to spare some preachers to the most unprovided portions of my diocese in order to reform the Spaniards and Portuguese, whose dissolute lives greatly scandalised the Indians. . . . To this he answered that his religious could not comply with my request without exposing themselves to the persecutions they have suffered for some years in Paraguay from the Spaniards, the inhabitants of St. Paul. . . . However, when he saw that I spoke to him in your majesty's name, and that what I required so nearly regarded the service of God, he sent orders, in conformity, to all the fathers of his province, and I am satisfied they will leave all their houses empty rather than not comply with them. . . . I therefore conjure your majesty, by the bowels of Jesus Christ, and by the inestimable value of so many souls whose salvation this divine Saviour has charged me to procure, and for whom he died on the cross, send me forty fathers of the company, with strict orders not to stop to exercise their zeal anywhere but in Tucuman, for I do not believe there is in all the world one more destitute of spiritual assistance. I do assure your majesty that if my whole revenue, which does not exceed four thousand crowns, was not irrevocably appropriated, I would send for those religious at my own expense. . . . God keep and preserve your royal person for the defence of religion.

October 18, 1637.

Such was the testimony borne to those holy servants of God by this excellent bishop. Like his predecessor who first invited them to Paraguay and the adjoining regions, the more he knew the more he prized them. He had the deepest anxiety in the welfare of the order, and truly they richly deserved the approbation of all who loved religion, or sympathised with the sorrows of suffering humanity. They had spread or were spreading themselves over almost every nation of South America, bearing with them the glad tidings of salvation. Genius, learning, and piety were united in the great work, and men who were fitted to adorn, or had adorned the courts and colleges of Europe, were seen to abandon all the comforts and the ease of civilized life, to go among benighted savages, to live in suffering, and to die far from home and friends in strange lands.

Not even the most prejudiced writers deny that among the missionaries who spent their lives in South America very many were men of extensive learning and highly cultivated minds. If any equalled, few surpassed in knowledge Cyprian Baraza. He was born in the year of our Lord 1641. Distinguished and remarked for his abilities, he spent the first years of his ministry in Lima.

This city is most beautifully situated in the midst of a rich valley, distant only six miles from the sea. The country around is thickly studded with villas, or covered with the richest crops of corn, vines, sugar, tobacco. The climate is most agreeable, equally freed from excessive heat or cold; the thermometer in summer never rises beyond 82 degrees Fahrenheit, or falls in winter below sixty. The seasons are divided into dry and moist, and all writers agree in describing the city and its environs as most enchanting. In this delightful spot Baraza lived for some time; his eloquence and learning gained the applause and admiration of the people: he zealously laboured in the pulpit and the confessional; but his heart was not at ease—he yearned to devote himself, body and soul, to the conversion of the benighted savages. The recent martyrdom of Fathers Nicolas Mascardi and Louis Sanvitores inflamed him still more, and he perseveringly supplicated permission from his superiors to go among the Moxos, a savage race, who for nearly one hundred years had frustrated all attempts made for their conversion. Having ultimately succeeded in his desires, he left Lima in the year 1674, in the prime of life, with a zealous heart, boundless courage, and stores of knowledge which would fit him for any of the colleges of Europe. Having arrived at Santa Cruz de la Sierra, he embarked on the river Guapay with a lay brother named Castillo. After a toilsome navigation of twelve days they arrived at their destination. At first the people scarcely permitted him to live amongst them, but his mildness, and some presents of beads, hooks, needles, &c., made them more tractable. He lived among them for four years learning their language, during which time he suffered so much from sickness that he was forced to return to Santa Cruz for the advantage of his health. As he became convalescent, his thoughts and wishes were turned to the Moxos, and he learned to weave cloth, in order that he might instruct them how to clothe themselves. By the commands of his superiors he was sent to a tribe named the Chiriguanas, where he spent five years; at the end of that time he was allowed to return again to the Moxos.

The country inhabited by the Moxos is very extensive. It is comprised within the 10th and 15th degrees of south latitude. It was not, at the time of which we write, seized on either by the Spanish or Portuguese adventurers. It was a vast plain, extremely humid. The rains were almost incessant. In summer, from the dissolving of snow and ice on the mountains, torrents poured into the country and rivers frequently overflowed their banks. The principal rivers are the Mamore, into which flows the Guapay; the Guapore and the Beni, which, uniting, form the Madura, a large body of water. Those rivers are available for canoes and small vessels. In summer great heat prevails, but occasionally the climate becomes cool and refreshing. In the winter a southerly wind blows along the snow mountains, and the cold becomes so piercing that the inhabitants, who are scarcely clothed, cannot bear its intensity, and much is endured from sickness and hunger. The country produced neither corn or wine; there were no sheep or horned cattle. The heat and the moisture produce enormous multitudes of mosquitos, and ants; vipers and serpents also are very abundant. In this large tract of land the tribes were very numerous; they spoke as many as thirteen different languages. The first that Baraza went among were the Moxos; they lived on fish and some roots and vegetables which the soil produced; the chase, also, contributed to their support. They had no laws or government, each person exacted justice as he best could. The sterility of the country caused them to disperse from time to time in order to find means of subsistence*—there was no greater obstacle to their conversion. They lived in small cabins, each family by itself. They slept on mats, or in hammocks suspended from stakes, or from the branches of trees, exposed to the air, the mosquitos, and the attacks of wild beasts. At night they kindled large fires, the smoke of which drove away the insects and the light terrified the wild beasts. Their meals were taken at no fixed time; they seldom exceeded in eating, but they had found out how to brew an intoxicating liquor, which they drank to maddening excess. They celebrated the feasts of their gods by the most revolting excesses. At the sound of certain instruments they assembled and danced, and drank day and night, till they were obliged to give over from exhaustion. These revels seldom finished without bloodshed, and the maiming or killing of numbers, together with the most revolting licentiousness. Although exposed to numerous maladies they were entirely ignorant of medical remedies. Their only remedy was to call in their jugglers, whom they believed to possess the power of healing. The treatment consisted of the recital of certain superstitious formulas, a promise to fast for the cure of the sick person, and sucking the part affected; for this liberal payment was exacted. They went almost entirely naked; the women wore a cloth round the waist. They were fond of ornament, and for that object they blackened one side of the face and painted with red the other. They pierced the nose and lips, and suspended from them various baubles. Others adorned themselves with feathers of birds—a much-prized decoration was the teeth of their enemies. Hunting, fishing, or repairing their bows and arrows was the occupation of the men; the women brewed their liquor and took care of the household. When the mother died in childbirth they buried the living child with her; when twins were born one was killed, they imagined that two children could not be reared at the same time. Their marriages were contracted without any ceremony, the consent of their mutual friends and some presents to the nearest relations of the bride sufficed. Polygamy, though allowed, was rarely practised. Adultery was punished by the husband with death. Their burials were conducted in silence. When the body of the deceased was covered with earth, they divided among them any property he possessed, and they thought of him no more.

All the tribes comprehended under the name of Moxos, or inhabiting the same territory, were in the deepest ignorance of religion. Some of them adored the sun, the moon; others, the stars, the rivers; others, an imaginary invisible tiger; others carried idols about them, as some of the negro tribes in Africa do at the present day. They had no future hope or fear, and among so many different tribes the missionaries were unable to discover any sort of sacrifice, one or two excepted.

Such were the people and the country among whom, and where the accomplished but humble and zealous Cyprian Baraza spent the greater portion of his life. It was a life of martyrdom and self-denial. The rains were incessant, the cold piercing, occasionally the heat most oppressive. This uncertain severe climate caused him to suffer much from ague and fever. He found it very difficult to learn the language, having no interpreter. Some times he was in danger of being murdered by the barbarians; at others, he was obliged to follow the tribes in their long migrations lest he should lose all the fruits of his sufferings. Among the few privileges of the Moxos women was, that the husband was obliged to follow the wife wherever she pleased to go.

"Varium et mutabile semper femina."

This privilege was frequently exercised, and was the cause of much trouble to Baraza.

Gradually, by the gentleness of his demeanour, his anxiety for their welfare, the few small presents he distributed among them, their prejudices were overcome, they permitted him to live among them unmolested. At length he induced about 600 of them to submit to live together under his guidance and management.

He instructed them carefully in the principles of Christianity, and with a joyful heart filled with thanksgivings to God, on the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin he administered to them the regenerating waters of baptism, and he placed this rising community under the protection of the Mother of God, naming it the mission of our Lady of Loretto.

For five years he ceased not to cultivate this portion of the vineyard of the Lord. It had increased to the number of 2,500 Christians when some missionaries arrived to his assistance. To those he consigned the care of the Christian community already formed, while he himself went forthwith in search of other tribes to announce to them the kingdom of God. He fixed his abode in a district far distant, the inhabitants of which were ignorant of religion and humanity. They were scattered over a vast tract, each family living apart in their solitary hut, and the deadliest animosity existed between them with another. This was a great obstacle to the designs of Baraza, but his charity overcame every difficulty. He lived now with one family, now with another; his gentleness insensibly stole upon them; they listened and were persuaded. He imitated their manners, he watched and quickly learned the signs by which they expressed the emotions of the heart; he dealt with them—he became "all to all man" with the barbarians—he became a "barbarian" to gain them to Christ. In their maladies he was their physician. Possessed of a considerable share of medical knowledge, he prepared their medicine; when they were sick he washed and bandaged their wounds; and those offices he performed with so much affection and kindness that he won their hearts. They yielded to his wishes, and in the course of twelve months he had assembled about 2,000 souls. He now sedulously instructed the new community in the Christian doctrines; he explained to them its mysteries, its hopes and fears, and he had the holy satisfaction of administering to them the sacraments of regeneration. In embracing Christianity they became different beings—their manners were changed—they submitted willingly to the commands of the Gospel; they became docile, mild, devout. They assisted daily at the holy sacrifice, and the heart of Baraza swelled with emotion—he could not restrain his tears of thanksgiving when the wild voices of the savages intoned the celestial anthem of "Glory to God in the highest;" when he saw the dreams of his youth, the yearnings of his enthusiastic devotion in course of being realised in this wild country, where, by his energy and self-devotion, and the inspiration of the Most High, he was emulating the toils and the successes of the apostles.

"Nor shall the spirit of those deeds expire
As fades the feeble spark of vital fire,
But beam abroad and cheer with lustre mild
Humanity's remotest prospect wild—"

Till this frail orb shall from its sphere be hurl'd,
Till final ruin hush the murmuring world,
And all its sorrows, at the awful blast
Of the archangel's trumpet, be but as sorrows past." *

Fearful lest they should relapse into their old habits, he instituted among them a form of government; the bravest he selected for their chiefs, the wisest and most prudent to decide upon their dissensions, to administer justice. He induced them to learn trades, and some he taught to be carpenters, weavers, labourers. His next chief care, after teaching them Christianity, was how to procure food for the numerous people that he had formed, and which were each day increasing. He feared that the barren nature of the country would cause them to disperse in search of food, and that, absent from his care, they would relapse into barbarous ignorance. This occupied his mind, and gave him much disquiet. At length he determined to make an effort to introduce cattle into the country. They could be found only at an immense distance, through difficult paths. As yet there were no roads in this wild district; but difficulties only excited the zeal of the missionary. He left for Santa Cruz, where he collected two hundred cows. He induced some Indians to accompany and help him in the journey. Their strength and courage soon failed, and he was left alone to manage the herd. Nothing could damp his ardour; he climbed the mountains, crossed rivers, driving before him the cattle, in danger of death from the barbarians, as well as from wild beasts that hung on his steps, occasionally devouring one or two of his charge. After a most toilsome journey of nearly three months, he arrived once more among his dear children in Christ. In a few years the cattle became sufficiently numerous to supply the entire country.

Again he went in search of new converts, discovered new tribes. By the same means he succeeded in softening, teaching, and baptising great numbers; but as the number of Christians multiplied, the difficulty of supplying them with missionaries, on account of the long and painful journey, requisite to be made from the Spanish settlements, disturbed and excited him. He had heard an obscure tradition of a direct path across the mountains, by which the journey from where he resided with his neophytes might be made to Peru in fifteen days, in place of fifty. But he could gain no information regarding it; it was unknown among his people, and he deemed the matter so important that he determined to explore the country in person. Once more he left his dear children; he took with him provisions, a few Indians, and some instruments which might be necessary to open a path through the mountains. For three years he wandered through the country; at times lost in tracks made by wild beasts, at times in thick impenetrable forests; sometimes benumbed with cold on the tops of mountains covered with snow and ice; often exhausted with hunger, and ready to expire with fatigue and exhaustion. But nothing that Baraza undertook did he abandon. The fourth year he recommenced his task, renewing his toils and sufferings, till one day passing through a thick forest, he lost all knowledge of the path, but, having gained the summit of a neighbouring mountain, he was amply repaid—the vast plains of Peru broke upon his delighted eyes. Transported with joy, he threw himself on the earth, giving thanks, from the abundance of his heart, to the God of mercy, whose servant he was. He was absent from Lima over twenty years—he had grown old in this wild land amid savage tribes, his heart swelled with the thought of revisiting the scenes of his youth, of grasping the hands of such of his former friends and associates as yet survived the lapse of time—of communing once more with kindred hearts; but the man of God, ever tender, ever gentle and considerate for others, stern to himself, sent notice of his discovery to the nearest mission, and returned to the flock that blessed his paternal solicitude.

"The Angel Minstrel's Nap."

A LYRIC,

[From "The Pleasures of Piety," a poem, preparing for publication, by the REV. JOSEPH FITZGERALD.]

I.

FROM the Choirs of Heav'n I've borrowed a tone;
'Twas music's—I mingled with men—
To the temples of earth its young spirit hath flown,
While the organs of melody made it their own,
And to Heav'n, I bear it again.

II.

Those blossoms of song in those bowers above,
Long, long have they bloomed in the light,
In the glory of THEM, the ALMIGHTY above,
Bearing always about them, wherever they hove,
An odour and pulse of delight.

III.

I'm an angel of melody scattering around,
From my lute, every sigh that is given,
From Piety's bosom in making my round,
I wave from the spheres every magical sound,
In the musical garland of Heav'n.

It has pleased God to mark this year by events of wider influence, and deeper portent, than any the present generation had hitherto witnessed. Before gray hairs shadow the brow of our young men it shall be numbered with the anni mirabili of history—with the eras of Rome's fall: of society's reconstruction: of the crusades: of the heresies: of the revolutions. Poets shall sing of it, and historians love to describe it; philosophers shall estimate its characters, and priests preach its moral. The voice of its teaching shall murmur down the stream of time while the current of its influence shall flow: and both will warn and move until eternity supersedes all instruction, and ends an earthly agency. This is not because kings have fled and thrones have flamed, and barricades have bristled with the bayonets of artisans; not because empire has received new modifications, and government taken new names; but because of the inner and central fact of which these are but the wild symbols or the stereotyped accompaniments—the change of popular influence from being remote and contingent, to being direct, immediate, and constant.

Of the certainty of this event, so momentous for evil or good, there can be little or no doubt. It is plain that a new epoch of the old cycle has come about. The elements of society have attained, or are attaining another stage in their ceaseless revolution. Social influences are changing their old rank, and their former manifestations. New dangers have arisen, new hopes are indulged, new passions are aroused, and new changes have become practicable. These, every friend of society must consider; for he, also, has new allies to cherish, new foes to combat, and new tactics to study. God's Church, above all, will apply her ancient remedies to those new necessities, that her certain triumph may be speedy, and her final attainment complete. As in the first century her immediate aim was to subdue the great Roman world to the yoke of Christ: as in the fourth, it was to save the moribund empire, and lay the foundations of her power in the hearts of the people, that no eruption might sweep them low, or root them up: as in the sixth, it was to conquer to salvation and civilization the rough conquerors of Europe; as in the eighth, it was to modify for the glory of God and the peace of man, the Teutonic-Romanic reconstruction of institutions, manners and laws: as in the eleventh, it was to protect Europe from the encroachment of the Mahometan superstition: as in the twelfth, to win over the kingly power, and guide the councils of monarchy: as in the fifteenth, to mould the new element of literature and direct the rising element of mercantile spirit: as in the sixteenth, to combat the encroachment of heresy: as in the eighteenth, it was to battle with infidelity on the one hand, and temporal tyranny on the other—so, now it is to direct all her energy to the people, not only with the partiality she has always manifested, but with the great additional view that she may instruct it in the exercise of its new and terrible sovereignty—that this year may not be the opening of an age of anarchy, but the date of a great and happy advancement. Most congenial to the Church's character is this old task of her's, for the people is the dearest object of her care, its salvation the great aim of her existence, and its ward the holiest of her trusts. Whatever influences shall rise, or fall, or originate, or disappear, God's Church and the earth's people will be found, side by side at the final day.

Akin, as in a thousand instances, is the aim of true patriotism and wise home-love. Oh! it is a fearful experiment—which each country must in time try—the endowing of that wild, fickle, passionate, unreasoning democracy with the sceptre of dominion and the reverence of authority. Who knows but it may be the resolution of society into its elements? Short is the step and narrow the bound between the liberty of the transcendentalist and the license of the savage. Who can say that this disenthralled giant will not prove more cruel to itself than rough-handed kings or hard-hearted ministers? Dull are the perceptions f the mob; brutal its instincts; and stronger is the granny of a majority than any other, more unavoidable and more unrelenting. Nay, what shall assure us that the whole is not merely the reaction of an ever artificial life, and but the prelude to the same race being run, and the same end attained? All lies where no human vision can penetrate. But the aim of duty is plain though the course of events is dark. To approach this wild DEMOS with gentle hand: to win it over to truth and virtue: to imbue it with the principles which are alike the salvation of states and of individuals: to give it striking motives for restraint and noble objects for exertion: to combat, in its regard, the weakness of nature and the wiles of the enemy; and so to train it to a greatness which shall be virtuous, and a rule which shall be happy: such, now as ever, but now more than ever, is the first aim of the patriot, and the highest service to the state.

Viewing popular education in this two-fold light, what more efficient instrument could be selected in our time and country than a great brotherhood of teachers of the people: sprung from the masses, and devoted to them: sharing the old monastic character, and bound by old monastic vows: pursuing its self-imposed task with the determination of duty, and the love of choice: guarded against cupidity by voluntary poverty, and secured from sloth by the necessity of labour: prepared by profound study, and trained by a watchful experience: understanding our national character, and stirred by our national hopes: estimating profane learning as "power" indeed, but not virtue and not happiness: whose notions of a teacher's duty spread beyond the mere schoolmaster's acquirements, to embrace every virtue, and ambition every acquirement: for whom no object can tempt but the people's good, and no guerdon glitter but God's promised blessing.

Such an institution, small in extent, it is true, compared with the work before it, and checked by inevitable human shortcomings, actually exists for Ireland this day, in the "Brethren of the Christian Schools."

Founded in 1802, by Edmund Rice, of Waterford, modified in 1820 by the rule of De la Salle's institute, and confirmed by the bull of the Pope, it now numbers under its gratuitous direction nearly a hundred schools, and eighteen thousand pupils. It has commanded the respect of all creeds and classes, and won the enthusiastic love of that to which its efforts are directed. It has received the approbation of educationists of every shade, from the inspectors of government to the philanthropists of America. It has had the joy of beholding its success in the character of its élèves, already the artisans and tradesmen of our chief cities. And it only needs increased numbers and increased practical sympathy, to spread from town to town, and from county to county, until the whole island is linked together with a chain of its holy citadels.

On seeing the new edition of these now celebrated "class-books," these and many other considerations crowd to our minds:

Of the intrinsic merits of these volumes it is now almost superfluous to speak. They rank already with the standards of educational literature. Intended at first only to meet the requirements of the brethren's schools, the circulation they attained was so rapid, wide, and early, that several large editions have been "consumed," and they are now to be found in almost all our Catholic colleges and seminaries. Emboldened by success, these good and able men extended their plan, and issued, in quick succession, several other works—of which it is sufficient to say that they equal their predecessors. New editions and extended application demanded close revision and some judicious addition. The volumes we have named are the result of both. Thus, by simple zeal directing educated taste a pressing want has been supplied in the literature of the day, and the teaching of Catholicity.

To the "literary class-books" we would in particular refer: judging that nothing having connexion with interests so great as those of popular religious education will be considered unworthy of attention.

Perhaps the first remark one would make about them is that of the contrast they afford to similar publications in all that regards Catholic feeling and Irish spirit. They are the first and almost the only books of their kind compiled for us. As to the stupid "Speakers" of our youth, they served scarce any purpose but to disgust the mind and vitiate the taste. Deep in sarcophagi of dust they lie, with the objurations of many a whipped boy upon them. They were very pious, orthodox, and Protestant; but Rugby boys hated them for their dullness, and Catholic teachers feared them for their falsehood. Other and better compilations have succeeded, and still hold the supremacy. Admirable, for the most part, in literary selection, in moral tendency, and in English Protestant spirit, they are as well fitted for the Quaker youth of Pennsylvania as for the Catholic youth of Ireland. Borne in his satchel, studied in his class, and pored over in his recreation-hour, they contain nothing to arouse his love of country, or direct his love of God. No stirring episode of his church's history makes his young blood rush: no broad view of his religion enlightens his judgment, and dazzles his imagination: no touching notice of his sacramental practices fixes his resolution and guides his prayer: no holy figure from among the saints he is to reverence, stands out before his young mind, to beacon his ambition, to kindle his zeal, destined, it may be, to fix itself on his recollection for ever, to steal back upon him in the hour of temptation, like Jerome's Gabriel, to win him in the hour of thought, like a mother's smile, or to cheer him in the hour of death, like an angel from God. There, it would be folly to expect that the future Irish citizen, statesman, or priest should learn anything of his own land's stirring history: of the races who won it: of the crises that marked it: of the agencies that shaped it: of the genius that enlightened it: of the virtue that made it holy; of the crime which polluted it: and of the present condition of the country, its wants or its resources, its aspirations or its defaults—nothing, in fact, to guide him in the momentous choice which a few years will almost inevitably force upon him, whether in action or in thought. The brethren have made their compilations the very reverse of all this. As Enfield, Moore, and Spalding are rightly English and Protestant, the "class-books" are rightly Irish and Catholic. They are shaped for our necessities, and directed to our advantage. Religious in tone and teaching, they are not, however, by any means "sermon-books," but "represent the opinions of the order on the subject of education, and embody the spirit of their system by representing religion, not in its isolated form, but in its natural connexion with science and literature."* National in tendency and in composition, they are as far from being political as could well be imagined, and tend only to promote that general knowledge which it is a citizen's first duty to acquire, and cherish that feeling which it is a state's truest security to maintain.

Apart from these merits, the series possesses the other and scarcely less important ones of adaptation to the school purposes for which it is designed. In its scale of lessons, graduating from the syllables of the infant class to the studies of the most advanced students, it is perhaps unrivalled. In the fine scholarly taste and sound critical judgment that guided its compilation, in a literary sense, we do not believe it has a competitor. Its merits in this way are proved by its adoption where its Irish character would be no utility, and even where its religious tendency is only a disadvantage. All the talent, all the experience, and all the zeal of the brotherhood have contributed to give it this rank.

The first two books are entirely elementary; but, to one who knows anything of a school-room, there is a good deal in them to interest. The substitution, for the old alphabetical plan, by which a month's labour did not suffice to imprint on the memory of a little victim the arbitrary names and puzzling properties of twenty-four conundrum symbols—of the new form, approved by experience as well as by reason, by which the alphabet and the first lessons of reading are taught together in a fourth of the time: the introduction of words of the required number of syllables instead of the unmeaning ba's and be's of other spelling exercises: the insertion of ingenious "elliptical lessons": the change of the silly and futile nursery rhymes and stories for well chosen extracts, which interest as well as amuse—are instances of the skill to which we allude. The "third book" is equally adapted for its purpose. The carefulness of the arrangement, and the appropriateness of the exercises, are at once apparent, and one is at a loss to know where so many extracts were found, combining the highest individual excellence with admirable adaptation to their aim here. The "fourth book" is perhaps the chef d'œuvre. It was of it our previous remarks were generally made. In it the taste and skill of the compilers are chiefly shown. As a mere literary production we do not know a pleasanter compilation; while as a school-book, for Irish Catholic seminaries at least, it is unequalled.

Writing of the Christian Brothers, who could forbear to pen the name of GERALD GRIFFIN? True novelist—touching poet—powerful dramatist—gentle teacher—zealous brother—holy and high-hearted man—he has left the sweetest and saddest memory in all Irish literature. We cannot wonder that, with the echo of his words ringing in their ears, and with his grave lying among them, so calm and lonely, these men should have caught some of the light of his talents, and all the glow of his zeal.

It is fitting that the IRISH CATHOLIC MAGAZINE should say, God be with this Irish Catholic Institute. God be with it, and all like it, who wisely labour in this momentous time for the glory of the Highest, and the peace of men. God be with them all, for while statesmen are refining, and politicians are speculating, these are working out the great problem of "Irish amelioration." With the mighty instruments of faith and knowledge they are at the fons et origo malorum, the moral and intellectual condition of the people, of which institutions are but the results, and laws only the expression. God be with them all, that so religion may not loose its old hold on the affections of this nation—that the present period may but mark the commencement of a new, happier, and holier destiny—that industry, well-directed, may build again cheer, cottage-homes—that love and joy may descend one more with faith and charity to our poor tradesmen's hearths—that honest toil may meet honest recompence—that lives well spent may close with death whose glory shall make humble homes prouder than palaces! God be with them! that by their agency the scaffold-dream of Moore may, perhaps, meet, even here, some faint fulfilment, and our children enjoy an approximation to that true rational freedom which shall be Christian liberty indeed, not pagan license which shall be the muse of genius, and the guardian of learning, which shall be the child of religion, and the mother of the poor, which shall make lowly hearth happy, and high ones innocent, which shall give genius new vigour, and zeal new objects—that freedom which saints shall bless, and holy prelates pray for which young mothers shall hail, and beautiful maidens sing of, which shall muster round the throne the genius, and the worth, and the valour of the land—clear heads, true hearts, and ready hands, and which approved by God, and loved by men, shall be the promise of national advancement, the gerden of national exertion, the proof of national strength, and the surety of national prosperity.

The Marquess Wellesley appointed lord lieutenant. Reasons for his being named successor to Earl Talbot. The Marquess disliked by the orange party. "Dressing the Statue" interfered with. Conspiracy to annoy the lord lieutenant in the theatre. The leader of the Conspirators—Badger-Row. Badger-Row reprimanded by the Speaker of the House of Commons. The "bottle-and-rattle" rioters. Conduct of Marquess Wellesley when assailed in the theatre. Public meeting in support of the lord lieutenant. The slanders and libels published by the orange newspapers. Prosecutions against the orangemen defeated. Badger-Row's triumph.—Government neglect of the supporters of Lord Wellesley—Alderman Fleming, Mr. George Farley, Mr. Milliken. Government rewards for the opponents of Lord Wellesley. The popularity of the Marchioness Wellesley. The Marquess Wellesley insulted by the Beef-Steak Club. Description of the Club, and its reception of the Irish pugilist, Donnelly. Speech of Sir Daniel Donnelly, upon his health being proposed by the Duke of Leinster.

The Marquess Wellesley was the successor of Earl Talbot in the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland. The ostensible cause for the removal of Lord Talbot was his drinking "the glorious memory," and the ministry in nominating Lord Wellesley as his successor, secured themselves, at least, from the embarrassment of having the king's representative in Ireland avowing himself the partizan of a faction, and the opponent of the great body of the nation, whose affairs he had been selected to administer. What was then most desired by the government was the prolongation of that state of quiescence, in which the Catholics had for some time remained.

For a moment the Catholics had been roused from their supineness by the vice-regal insult to their feelings, and had an individual of the same school of politics as Lord Talbot been appointed, the Catholics would have followed the example of the English radicals—public meetings would have been begun, and in a few months all Ireland would have been in a ferment of agitation. The government was sufficiently sagacious to appreciate the temper of the times, and to evade the trouble, which they hoped might be destined to devolve upon their successors. They therefore made the Marquess Wellesley, the professed friend of Catholic emancipation, lord lieutenant of Ireland; but tied him up so effectually that he never could give effect to what might be supposed his sincere wishes. He had not the power to do good, and he was not disposed to do evil. His glorious deeds in India, his talents, his reputation, his years, and even his Irishry, could not secure him from persecution and from calumny. He was not the friend of a faction, and would not make himself the instrument of a coterie, and hence all his steps were dogged by a malignant band of men willing to find fault with whatever he said, and to vent their vituperation on whatever he did.

The Catholics upon hearing of his appointment, relapsed into their accustomed apathy. They confided in the promises which they understood a king had made, and they left to the ministry an open field to labour upon. They determined that, as a party, they would be no impediment to “the good work” of conciliation and emancipation, and the other thousand and one blessings expected to follow from the visit of “his most gracious” majesty. A very trivial incident, however, served to arouse them from their political repose, by exposing the deep and elaborate scheme of delusion practised upon them.

The Marquess Wellesley, who from the moment he had arrived in Ireland, “was not very welcome to the Protestant faction,”* gave, in the year 1822, dire offence to that faction by the resolution he adopted for putting an end to the old practice of “dressing the statue” of King William in College-green. The orangemen who had long been accustomed to decorate it with gaudy orange trappings, had from the year 1798, placed at the horse’s hoofs on the statue, a quantity of green ribbons, as emblematic of the condition of the Irish Catholics, and of the degradation to which, in the estimation of the orangemen, they were properly subjected. The Catholics took offence at an exhibition which was intended to insult them. As Abraham Bradley King had, in the year 1821 and during the king’s visit, issued a proclamation against this exhibition, it was conceived by the Marquess Wellesley to be but a proper exercise of his power to prevent the renewal of that which an avowed orangeman had declared to be improper. His doing so, it was considered, must gratify the Catholics, and ought not to be regarded as an injury by the orangemen.

The proclamation of the lord mayor, Alderman Fleming, prohibiting the dressing of the statue, was issued, and care was taken by the lord lieutenant that it should be obeyed, for infantry and dragoons were, to the utter disgust, horror, and amazement of the orangemen, seen parading up and down Dame-street—the king’s soldiers were there, with swords drawn, and bayonets fixed, and quite prepared, ready, and willing to cut them down, and to run them through—them! the orangemen! It was the government rebelling against them! And this too was done by a lord lieutenant! He who had always been their patron was now their adversary—their friend was changed into their foe—their partizan into their mortal enemy. It was monstrous, and hence they determined, since they were treated as if they were no better than “the common people”—the mere population of the country—they would manifest their opinion of the lord lieutenant at the very first favourable opportunity.

On the 14th of December, 1822, it was announced that his Excellency, the Marquess Wellesley, would visit the Dublin theatre in state, as lord lieutenant. The promised visit occupied a prominent place in all the play-bills of the day, and every effort was made by the lessee of the theatre to attract attention to the fact. He succeeded but too well in this object, as subsequent events proved. A few days previous to the “state visit to the theatre,” there was a meeting of orangemen at a public-house in Werburgh-street. This meeting or league was composed of operatives, such as carpenters, printers, butchers, &c., and at this place it was suggested—after supper, and when each of the company had imbibed “three or four tumblers of punch,” as “his share” of the evening’s amusement, that “a row” should be excited in the theatre—that as Lord Wellesley did not let them dress their statue, they would not let him hear the play—that he therefore should get a good hissing, and Alderman Fleming, the lord mayor, a still better hooting. It was a new idea for orangemen to hiss a lord lieutenant, and the bon vivants promised themselves a great deal of fun from it, and “for the fun of the thing,” and nothing else, it was determined to carry the plan into effect. The project, I believe, originated with a juvenile printer, named Graham—“a lad” remarkable amongst his associates for being what they considered a wit, a humourist, and “a good-natured fellow;” but whose looks were wild, his manner eccentric, and his spirit so daring, that any mad or comical prank contemplated by him was certain, at all hazards, of being carried into effect. Amongst his fellow operatives and boon companions he was known by the soubriquet of BADGEY-ROW; and Badgey-Row it was who “frighted the isle from its propriety,” and who seemed to put the king’s representative in bodily fear—if it were possible to make a Wellesley fear—and who actually horrified by his conduct the entire House of Commons; for Badgey-Row did in the House of Commons draw a cane-sword upon one of the witnesses against Sheriff Thorpe—inculpatated in the Bottle Riot at the theatre. For this outrage Badgey-Row was reprimanded by the Speaker; but Badgey-Row cared as little for the reprimand as he did for the powder that whitened the wig of the Right Honourable Speaker. If the truth were known, Badgey-Row rather liked the reprimand, as it ensured him that which is fame to a vulgar-minded man—notoriety—and that too, in every low pot-house in Dublin, in which he might thereafter appear.

Humble in station, and individually insignificant, Badgey-Row was, however, able to collect a sufficient number of orangemen in the Theatre Royal to render the lord lieutenant extremely uncomfortable, by saluting his ears with every vulgar and opprobrious epithet their foul fancies might suggest, or their ribald tongues give utterance to. With the hissing, hooting, and shouting, the night might have passed off without further observation, but that a bottle was thrown from the upper gallery on the stage—a thing that I had seen done at least ten times before, when the curtain was down, and which, however reprehensible and dangerous it might be, was not therefore to be regarded as an extraordinary circumstance. It was most probably the mad freak of a drunken man, and would, possibly, not have excited the attention subsequently bestowed upon it, if at the same moment at which the bottle came crashing upon the stage, there had not been flung a piece of a watchman's rattle, which hit a box near to that in which the Marquess Wellesley was sitting. Upon being told of this, for he himself did not perceive it, his excellency came to the front of the box, and gazing steadily at the upper gallery, he exposed himself fully as a mark to its inmates: his attitude and his looks plainly indicating to his assailants that he despised and defied them. The attitude and bearing of the brave old man were alike noble and touching; and extorted from his countrymen that applause which a factious spirit had hitherto refused to bestow upon him. It evoked enthusiasm in his favour, and that enthusiasm fell into exaggeration when it denounced the thoughtless brutality of drunken orangemen as "an attempt at assassination," for such was the term applied to the theatrical row, not merely by Catholics and Protestants, but even by many orangemen at the time.

Dublin was immediately afterwards inundated with public meetings*—there were general meetings and parish meetings; and the provinces followed the example of the metropolis with town and country meetings; and how far the panic of enthusiasm in favour of Lord Wellesley would have extended, it is impossible now to conjecture, if it had not found a check in the pasquinades that issued from the press.

At this period, a new style of writing commenced in Ireland, of which the English reader had seen some specimens during "the queen's trial" in the John Bull, Age, and Courier newspapers. There was, however, a difference between the slanderers at the English and the Irish press. In England there had been shown some (not much) veneration for age; in England there had been a little (although but slight) respect evinced for the female sex, whilst in Ireland there was neither, once the work of slander had been begun, in 1822, by the ultra-orange journalists. The party were at first appalled by finding themselves involved in the charge of an attempt at assassination—then taking courage upon discovering it would be impossible to punish even those who were the real offenders, they became in turn the assailants, and struck terror into their opponents by their audacity. The men who had one week cowered in the crouching attitude of felon fear, were seen the next setting the law authorities at defiance, and even crushing beneath their feet the recognized courtesies of society.† Ferocious attacks were hourly promulgated in newspapers, pamphlets, and ballads, and to gratify party spleen, the religion of the Catholics, the character of all professors of their creed, the politics, the past life, and the morals of the lord lieutenant were cruelly and basely assailed. These publications, although of the character I have described, had their use, at least for the faction which they intended to serve; for they helped to reanimate the spirits of the desponding, to recall to the orange standard many who were about to desert it, and most assuredly to terrify most of those who were arrayed against it. The censorship of the press was by custom vested in an orange jury, and when their associates were the transgressors no one who was maligned could hope for redress.

The violence of the orangemen was for the moment met by the violence of the government, which under the advice of the then attorney-general (Mr. Plunkett) when defeated by the rejection of the bills of indictment by the grand jury, proceeded by ex-officio information against those who were called "conspirators." The officers of the law fought against the officers of the corporation. Those concocted indictments, and these arranged the juries; and as the indictments had been quashed, so had the prosecution to be abandoned, and Badgely-Row with his confederates retired the victors, from the field of legal controversy.

If it had been supposed by the Catholics that the Marquess Wellesley had been sent by the government who appointed him, either to bestow upon them any benefit, or that he had the power to do so, the result of the trial of "the bottle conspirators," and still more, the strange conclusion to the Inquiry in the House of Commons, when, to use Mr. Canning's celebrated phrase, "a triumph to neither party" was given, were alike sufficient to undeceive them. That the marquess was inclined to act up to his professions few could doubt, but that he was powerless there was the practical proof in the manner in which those who supported his government were treated. A few instances will suffice to corroborate this assertion, as well as to demonstrate the spirit in which Ireland was ruled by the predominant party in the English cabinet, wherever that party consented to nominate an individual of liberal tendencies to the Irish lord lieutenantcy or chief secretaryship.

Alderman Fleming, who was lord mayor when the statue was despoiled of its annual trappings, and who by putting in force the lord lieutenant's wishes, exposed himself to the hatred of the orangemen, was, when his year of office expired, permitted to return to private life without the slightest mark of favour. He had not conferred upon him even a poor knighthood, even though a baronetcy was bestowed upon Alderman James, whose sole claim to notoriety was, that he had proposed, as lord mayor, the toast of "the glorious memory," for responding to which the Earl Talbot had been removed from the lord lieutenantcy. Alderman Fleming, who sacrificed much that must have been dear to him, as a member of the corporation, to sustain the government, obtained neither honour, office, place, nor emolument, whilst in the very castle itself, a valuable office was conferred, during the lord lieutenantcy of the Marquess Wellesley, upon one of those who had been branded by the officers of the crown as "conspirators."

The same species of ingratitude was manifested towards Mr. George Farley, a gentleman who, during the trials of "the conspirators" rendered most efficient service to the government. He was permitted to die unnoticed, and had reason to lament before his death that he had allowed himself to be dragged into the arena of politics, wherein he received nought but injury, and had not even the barren meed of praise bestowed upon him by those whom he had served.

These instances of ingratitude were poor and trifling when compared with that which was exhibited towards

* The author must here admit that the only political question in which he ever personally took a part was on this occasion. It was "as a Catholic" giving his signature to a requisition for a meeting of the Catholics, to address the Marquess Wellesley on the outrage offered to him as an advocate for Catholic emancipation.

† "Apud populum nihil moderati, aut medii, consternatio primum, mox audacia: nunc timenti, nunc terrenti similis."—STRADA, Bell. Belg. dec. i. lib. 2, vol. i. p. 60.

Mr. Milliken, the university bookseller, who gave information to the government of an extraordinary declaration which fell from Mr. Sheriff Thorpe—an orangeman—on “the bottle-and-rattle night” at the theatre. Mr. Milliken had even apprehended some of the conspirators, and his zeal and activity extorted the praises—it might be even said, the admiration of the government. An office subsequently became vacant, for which the candidates were Mr. Milliken the supporter, and Sir A. B. King the opponent of the Marquess Wellesley. The claims of Mr. Milliken were rejected, and Sir A. B. King was appointed! This might be termed “impartiality”—perhaps it was so. The responsibility of the act was cast upon Lord Wellesley, and it entailed upon him, for the time, the contempt of his opponents, and the disgust of those disposed to be his supporters.

From the period of the riot at the theatre, to the close of his administration, the position of Lord Wellesley was painfully humiliating. It was brightened but by one single gleam of popularity, and that was occasioned by his marriage with a truly beautiful, excellent, charming, and pious lady—a Catholic. The enthusiasm of all parties in favour of this lady was elicited when she appeared with her husband at the theatre. The ferocity of faction was not merely tamed into silence in her presence, but appeared to bend in admiration, and to bow its head in submission in her presence, as it is fabled the fiercest lion will fall down and worship the maiden whose mind has never been tarnished by a thought of sin. The only pleasing incident in the latter days of the administration of the Marquess Wellesley, was his visit to the theatre with the marchioness, for he then seemed to be popular with all parties.*

Abandoned by the government in his conflict with the orange party, a vain attempt was made by the Marquess Wellesley to conciliate them. He had been outraged by the low orangemen, and he was insulted by their aristocracy, who, at the time that he was battling in the law courts with “the bottle-throwers,” had at their aristocratic gathering—“the Beef-Steak Club,” given as a toast, and in derision of the Marquess Wellesley, “the lord lieutenant, and—the exports of Ireland.” Notwithstanding this misconduct, Lord Wellesley was persuaded to accept an invitation to the Beef-Steak Club; but with so little propriety did the nobility and gentry conduct themselves in his presence, that he had to retire in disgust; and he shortly afterwards quitted Ireland.

The Beef-Steak Club was originally a most delightful musical society; but shortly after its institution degenerated into a mere factious junta, composed of men who belonged to one party, and carefully excluded all who were Roman Catholics. By the Beef-

Steak Club “ascendancy” was carried to the heights of Parnassus—the music-book was scored with “no popery”—Apollo was converted into an orangeman, and the muses were made to take the oath of supremacy. The strains of Handel were purified by “the Boyne Water;” and Mozart’s compositions were followed by “Croppies lie down.” Such was the state to which Lord Monk—a man possessed of some humour and little reflection—reduced this once harmonious club by giving, in a tipsy freak, one night, the orangemens’ toast of “the pope in the pillory, the pillory in hell, and the devil pelting him with priests.”

This club, although slightly tinged, at one time, with liberalism, was always decidedly Protestant, and the following curious scene, I have more than once heard, occurred at one of the festive meetings of its members. Daniel Donnelly, the celebrated boxer, then lived in Dublin, and having gained a victory over the distinguished English pugilist, Oliver, he took it into his head that he was identified with the honour of his country—that he was the champion of old Ireland, and as every champion was a knight, and as every knight had the privilege of putting “Sir” before his name, Daniel Donnelly convinced himself that he was fully authorized to the designation of “Sir Daniel Donnelly.” If Donnelly, as was his wont, had taken a cup too much, it would have been a dangerous experiment for either an acquaintance or a stranger to address him as Mister Donnelly. It occurred to the members of the Beef-Steak club, late one evening, that they might have some sport by inviting Sir Daniel Donnelly amongst them. He was accordingly sent for, and having been pretty well plied with wine, the Duke of Leinster, who was in the chair, rose and said: “That they that night had the high and unexpected honour of having amongst them, and dignifying them by his presence, a great man, who had determined upon vindicating the ancient reputation of their native land for its magnanimous and unconquerable ferocity. They had amongst them, and they might boast of the event, as the proudest to be recorded in their annals, a hero whose spirit had been aroused by hearing of the vain boasts of their pugilistic English neighbours, and who had in consequence, at his own personal risk, cost, and charges, travelled all the way to the sister country, had there met the bravest of the brave champions of England face to face—had demanded when he entered the lists against his adversary, nothing more than ‘a clear stage, and no favour’—and having obtained these, had, there and then demonstrated by convincing, nay, by striking proofs, that Irish potatoes, Irish buttermilk, and Irish bacon are far more nutritious than English corn, English beef, and English beer. This brave man, this great man, this illustrious patriot was in the midst of them. He whose omnipotent fist had made a mark upon the body of his opponent which every Irish anatomist must regard as an entire volume of living fame to them and to Erin—sat at their table. Words were not strong enough to depict the strength, and vigour, and valour of him whose health he was about to propose:—Sir Daniel Donnelly—the champion of Ireland—the bone-crashing, nose-smashing, black-eye-bestowing, chivalric hero who had plucked from its brambly bush the haughty rose of England, and planted upon the very topmost pinnacle of fame, the drooping shamrock of the green little island!”

Poor Donnelly, whilst such a speech as this was delivered—every sentence being followed by a “Hear, hear,” or “a cheer”—sat amazed and stupefied at the

* I remember sending to a London weekly literary journal, a description, at the time it occurred, of the reception of the Marchioness Wellesley at the Dublin theatre. For this and other contributions I forwarded a letter to the editor, requesting payment. The editor forgot to answer my letter. Some years afterwards, however, when my friend Mr. Martin Haverty published his “Wanderings in Spain,” and did me the honour of dedicating his work to me, the same editor, in reviewing Mr. Haverty’s book, declared that he was utterly ignorant who the person could be to whom the book was dedicated! The “honest editor” not only forgot what he owed, but the very name of his creditor. Some men are blessed with a good memory; but in this case we perceive what an ease to a man’s conscience it must be to have a defective memory—so defective that it may be said of this literary reviewer, that he is possessed of an ethical phenomenon—the petrification of a bad memory.

honours that were bestowed upon him. Towards its conclusion, the poor fellow's eyes were filled with tears, and when the company stood up to drink his health, he rose along with them, and cheered also. Lord Monk, who sat beside him, said, "I beg your pardon, Sir Daniel—you will be called on immediately; but you should not rise to drink your own health."

"Ah! hould your prate, man," answered Donnelly; "you know nothin' about it. Tare-and-agers! who has a better right to drink my own health than myself?"

Donnelly was then called on to return thanks, and he made the following oration, which, considering the time, the place, and the circumstances, was as mal-à-propos as it possibly could be:

"Raaly, now, gintlemin, I'm so much obliged to you, that, blow me tight! if I know what to say to you. You see I can't make a speech like the likes of you, because I wasn't college-larned; but I can box my corner I'll engage, as well as any one of you, and I know where to find the soft part of a man's noggin. But no matter now for that. May I never go home with my life, but I'm obliged to you, and sure! I oughtn't to wonder that the Duke of Leinster would be good to me, for wasn't he always good, breed, seed, and generation of him. Oh! my lord-duke, its yourself that knows that I was too young, or I'd have been out with your uncle, Lord Edward Fitzgerald—the Lord rest his sowl in glory! but if ever yourself should take it into your head to have the spirit to be out, just let me know, and maybe we won't give the Ancient Britons and the yeomen as good a thrashing as ever I gave Oliver. Well there's no use in braggin' with the tongue what a man 'ill do when he has a big fist quite handy to him. I'll say no more, gintlemin, than this, and I give it from the bottom of my heart—here's the worst of bad-luck, hard-fortune, and a broken nose to every thievin' orangeman in the country! Amen! a hierna!"

CHAPTER VIII.

An extract from my note-book—"The Catholic Association and O'Connell." Debate in the House of Commons in 1823. An annual farce. Situation of the Catholics in 1823. State of the country—the Insurrection Act—the Marquess Wellesley's humanity. Mr. Martin Langan. Tipperary justice—a magistrate and his tenant. Aggregate meeting of Catholics. Catholic Association founded. Mr. O'Connell. Imperfect portraits and description of him. Comerford's picture. O'Connell's attributes as a leader—his command over the people—his appearance—mode of defeating opponents—his intemperance—skilful management—long speeches—power of adapting himself to an auditory—various styles of speaking—his devotion to the Catholic question—characteristic anecdote of O'Connell—a lawyer's revenge. O'Connell's popularity.

[The following chapter, containing a description of the rise of the Catholic Association, and its founder, Mr. O'Connell, was written in the year 1829, and previous to the appearance of Mr. O'Connell as a member of the imperial parliament. It has lain unpublished amongst my papers from that time until the present, although it was then prepared for publication. My first intention was to have altered, and adapted it to the present moment; but, upon consideration, I have come to the conclusion that, if there be any value in such a sketch, it can alone be found in the fact that it was made at the moment when the great original was living, and when the full measure of his fame had not been completed. In perusing the succeeding lines the reader is requested to carry himself back in imagination to the close of the year 1829, and to remember that "the great men of Ireland" at that time were those who had been conspicuous orators in the Catholic Association.]

THERE was no declaration yet made by a public man that was more useful, or more necessary at the time, than that which was given utterance to by Sir Francis Burdett, in the debate upon the Catholic question, in the House of Commons, on the 17th April, 1823. The Catholic question was then introduced into the house by Mr. Plunkett (the attorney-general for Ireland), and Sir Francis Burdett denounced the discussion by describing it in its true light, "an annual farce," and one in which he declared he would take no part. Sir Francis and his friends accordingly withdrew from the house, and the question was lost—a majority of 202 deciding against it. This was a strong hint to the Catholics to adopt other measures than those which they had hitherto pursued. It was telling them, that if they desired to succeed they must rely upon themselves, and neither confide in the promises of a king, which might be forgotten, nor depend upon parliamentary friends whom a ministerial bribe could purchase. The hint was not lost on the Catholics; they resolved, or rather Mr. O'Connell resolved for them, to fight their own battles, and within six short years from that very time, they attained the object of their wishes.

If ever a party or a people were excusable in taking upon themselves the management of their own affairs, the Catholics were in 1823. The expectations held out to them were unfulfilled, the promises made to them broken—ribaldry had poured its poison upon their religion, and slander had endeavoured to blacken the character of their leaders; while, at the same time, they beheld the country under the operation of martial law. The powers of the law, not of the constitution, were confided to their opponents for their oppression, and "transporting sessions," as the people most appropriately termed the sessions under the Insurrection Act, were holding in many counties in Ireland; blood was shed in the open day, and the departure of the convict was often emblazoned by the midnight conflagration of the property of his prosecutor. Fresh convictions followed the recent outrage, and they were again followed by new murders and the repetition of outrages, and thus the flame of devastation was spreading from one part of the country to the other, and "the aristocracy" (as they called themselves) were as determined to punish as the peasantry were resolved to avenge that punishment; anarchy was beginning to embrace all the bonds of society when the Catholic Association was first formed.

But before I pass by the horrors which the insurrection act was entailing upon Ireland, I should mention this fact, which is highly creditable to the Marquis Wellesley, that whenever an unfair conviction took place, and that it was so proved to him, even though the convict had been in the hulks, the Marquis Wellesley had him restored to the country. I may mention one instance, which will serve as an illustration of the justice of this remark, and will also show the system pursued under the Insurrection Act.

At the time this act was in force in Tipperary there was a man named Hogan (as well as I recollect) tried at the sessions of Cashel. This man had a strong faction in the country; he was, I believe, a sturdy, stout, and quarrelsome fellow enough, and therefore obnoxious to the magistrates in that neighbourhood. Besides this, Hogan had a nice little piece of land on a long lease, which his magisterial landlord was anxious to have back again from him. In addition to this "crime," Hogan had the misfortune of having a dispute with a sergeant of police, who, in order to be revenged upon him, went one night and concealed in the thatch of Hogan's house four or five bullets. The sergeant came the next night and had Hogan arrested on the charge of having "arms concealed in or about his house." Hogan, of course, denied the accusation, but the sergeant verified the old proverb of "those who hide can find;" he went to the thatch and produced the bullets. This was a clear case; Hogan was marched off prisoner to Cashel, tried the next day, convicted, sentenced to transportation, and in pursuance of his sentence sent off instantly to the hulk at Cork. Fortunately for Hogan, his attorney was Mr. Martin Lanigan, a gentleman of independent fortune, the most sterling patriotism, and of unbending firmness. Mr. Lanigan had in vain represented the facts of the case at Cashel; he had in vain called upon the court for permission to have the facts tried by a jury. It was determined that Hogan should at all events be transported, and he was accordingly sent, at a few minutes' notice, out of the country. Mr. Lanigan immediately drew up a memorial, mentioning that which he had already stated to the magistrates at Cashel. This he had forwarded instantly to the lord lieutenant, and in a week afterwards, as the magisterial landlord and the police sergeant were viewing Hogan's farm, and settling upon the terms that one would give for it and the other was disposed to take, they were horrified to see Hogan put his head out of the window, and say, "God bless your work this fine morning, gentlemen, I was afraid the farm would be a heartbreak to the two of you, and so I came back just to take a look at it myself."

Few of the peasantry had so able and so honest an advocate to plead their case for them as poor Hogan found in Mr. Martin Lanigan, and those who could not procure justice were determined to have vengeance. That in many cases they procured—in others they were disappointed; but at the time that the association was contemplated no country could be in a more deplorable condition than Ireland.

On the 28th of April, 1823, a few days after the rejection of the Catholic petition, a meeting was held at Dempsey's tavern, in Sackville-street, when it was proposed by Mr. O'Connell that a Catholic board should be formed. It was recollected how very little good Catholic boards had ever accomplished, and the idea was not very cordially approved of; all, however, agreed that "something should be done," and an aggregate meeting for the 10th of May was determined upon.

At that aggregate meeting, Mr. O'Connell proposed the formation of an association by the Catholics to forward their interests, as it was notorious at the time that there was in full operation an orange association to oppose them. Mr. O'Connell took advantage of some of their documents which he had got into his possession, and he portrayed the plans of the orange-men in such appalling colours that the Catholics started back with affright and horror from the picture he presented to them. The minds of the Catholics were roused, and the energies of despair were almost lent to their exertions. They discovered that they had been deceived, and they found that those whom they had tried to conciliate were their bitter opponents, and that their own apathy had been the means of increasing the strength, and adding to the resources of their enemies. In two days after the aggregate meeting there was another held for the purpose of organising the association, and there Mr. O'Connell detailed his plan, which has been attended with such eminent success.

Mr. O'Connell, the proposer of the Catholic Association, and the inventor of the Catholic rent, was at this time in full possession of that popularity which he has ever since retained. The description, both personal and mental, of this great and extraordinary man has been so often given, that any attempt at it now may be considered dull and uninteresting.

I have often observed that those who have endeavoured to paint, like those who have sought to describe O'Connell, have not given general satisfaction, because the original presents, in both respects, so many different faces that it is almost impossible to catch a likeness. To the painter, the profile will be found unlike the front face, and the half-quarter view differing from both. Upon reading a description, or looking at a picture of O'Connell, I have often thought of the pun which a brother artist once made when looking at Mr. Comerford's picture. In this picture of O'Connell, the right arm, in which a scroll is placed with the words "Catholic Rent" inscribed upon it, is miserably shortened, and the painter (Lover) looking at it, exclaimed, "See what a rent the envious Casca made."

In almost every description of Mr. O'Connell there is "a rent" which mars its entire effect. Perhaps I am too fastidious upon this subject, and in order that the reader may not find the same fault with me, which I do with others, I shall be more sketchy than distinct in my portrait.

There was a time, when a few envious spirits, unable to gain the elevation in popular esteem, which Mr. O'Connell had attained, endeavoured to bring him down to their own level, by disseminating their slanders against the purity of his motives. Of the purity of those motives, I believe there cannot now be any question, for few Catholics will be bold enough to deny, that without O'Connell they never could have achieved emancipation. In eloquence Mr. O'Connell is inferior to Mr. Sheil, and he is not possessed of the classical knowledge and deep research of Mr. Wyse, but he knew the people better than either of them—he could adapt himself to his auditors, and pour forth in a few minutes a mass of general, and what was still better, of local information, which it was necessary for the people to know, and useful for them to recollect. Mr. Shiel could rouse the passions—so could Mr. O'Connell, but he also possessed the power, which no other man in Ireland did, to influence, to direct, to controul, and, if he pleased, to suppress those very passions. Mr. Wyse might talk to them of "Greek and Roman virtue," but the people could not understand, or they would not attend to him, while their eyes would lighten with fire, and their hearts throb responsive to the accents of O'Connell, when he told them anecdotes of Irish patriotism, or wept with them over the sufferings of those heroes who had endured the horrors of banishment, or suffered the pangs of death "for their religion and old Ireland."

As if nature had created O'Connell for the very part which it has been his lot to fill in life, she has conferred upon him that importance of stature and dignity of person, which, with the lower classes in society, are found in themselves, sufficient to attract attention and admiration. It is an impossibility to describe Mr. O'Connell's features, because they are flexible as the tones of his voice, which is sufficiently musical to give full effect to the most beautiful passages in poetry, and convey by its very sound the very sentiment he is desirous to express, whether it be one of admiration, or contempt of praise, or of censure, of indignation, anger, pity, or sarcasm. At any moment it would be difficult to catch Mr. O'Connell's features at rest, for the very rising of a passion, and the birth of an idea, would be stamped in the involuntary curl of his lip, or be seen passing in a slight shade across his brow: if he were strongly excited, it could be observed by his change of position, or in the sudden exclamation that burst from him. In the many by-battles in which Mr. O'Connell was engaged in the association, this defect of nature, this mastery of passion over mind, whether assumed or natural, was always found most annoying to his opponents. Any innuendo against himself was repelled with the smile of contempt—the open charge was met with the frown of indignation, and the longer O'Connell's assailant occupied the time of the association, the more conscious must he every moment become that he was losing the attention of his hearers, while his self-possession was shaken, and his reasoning disturbed by the seemingly unpremeditated interruptions of Mr. O'Connell, who, when he rose to reply, had an easy task to perform, for his acting of an ill-used and wantonly insulted man had already won for him the hearts and the attention of his auditory.

Mr. O'Connell has frequently been described as an intemperate man, and one whose violence was most likely to injure the cause to which he was sincerely attached. If by intemperance those who made this objection to Mr. O'Connell meant that he either said or did anything that was rash, or which he himself had not previously considered, they were greatly mistaken in his character. That he used violent language is most true, and that some of his speeches might be stamped with the character of intemperance I shall not deny; but then violent language was never used by him without an object, and his "intemperance" was adopted for some special purpose. I have been watching the progress of Mr. O'Connell for some years, and the hand that gives this description of him has been often wearied in writing out his speeches. At first I used to think that many of those speeches were rambling, and contained matter which was not at all germane to the subject, but an acquaintance with the exact circumstances with which Mr. O'Connell was at the moment of delivering a speech surrounded, soon showed me that what was apparently an irrelevant observation, and seemingly unconnected with the debate, was uttered for some certain purpose—it was intended to conciliate, to win over, or to compliment some individual present. The reader might on this account criticise the speech—the hearers never could, for Mr. O'Connell possesses the happy art of never tiring them. There was so much of truth and nature, and so little of art apparent (although every sentence was intended to serve its office), that it was impossible to listen to Mr. O'Connell without being engrossed by him; and if you were a person of the slightest consequence (from a Catholic churchwarden to a peer of France), and heard him for the first time, and that he was aware of your presence, you were secured to him by some observation that irresistibly attached, and made you his friend and firm supporter for ever. Should this testimony to Mr. O'Connell's powers as an orator be at all considered exaggerated, I trust it will be recollected that it comes from one who had less reason than any other to be an admirer of that eloquence, for it entailed upon him many a laborious hour and many a sleepless night. It was delightful to listen to O'Connell—it was a sad punishment to have to report him. In the association O'Connell was seldom a minute at rest; he was never satisfied with one charge on our pencils, but column after column debouched before our aching sight, and the unfortunate reporter could not quit his field of operations, the writing-desk and the printing office, until he had despatched them all. My testimony in favour of O'Connell as an orator may well be believed when I state that no man has reported a greater number of his speeches than I have. I will not even except my friend Sheridan, of the Times, nor Quinlan, of the Register.*

No matter what may be the auditory to which Mr. O'Connell addresses himself, he will in a few minutes be found to possess a complete mastery over them—for he is possessed of the almost miraculous gift of completely suiting himself to them. His manner, his tone, his very style he can change with his audience, and be "the grave, the gay, the lively and severe" in the course of one day, aye of one hour, if necessary. When he appeared in the House of Commons to plead his own case he delighted his friends and astonished his enemies, because they found him to be a different man from what they expected. They had just reason to be astonished, for they really did not see the O'Connell they would have seen in the association, much less the O'Connell they would have beheld if addressing thousands of his countrymen from his carriage in the open air. Even if he touched upon the same subject in a popular meeting and in the House of Commons, his manner of handling it would be as different as the portraiture of the same landscape would be on a play-house scene and in a cabinet picture; in one the colours would be strong, glaring, and brought in marked contrast with each other, while in the latter the tints would be softened down, the details accurately preserved, and the entire neat, compact, and most probably faultless in the judgment of the critic and to the eye of the connoisseur. Mr. O'Connell possesses that power which I have not known any other man to have—an identification with his hearers; he is actuated by their feelings, he invests himself with their passions, he clothes himself with their caprices—and, when he has obtained the mastery of all, he then moulds them to his own purpose, and renders the caprice, passion and feelings of others subservient to his own objects. Even Mr. O'Connell's manner of addressing popular assemblies differs most materially; he has one style for the populace, a second for the association, and a third for public dinners. In the last I used to admire him particularly, not because his speeches there were shorter (although that is not a bad reason for a reporter's admiration), but because there his sentences were rounded with the greatest care and flowed in a full, free, and majestic stream, while they were frequently enlivened with bursts of poetic eloquence so pure and brilliant, that, when I now recollect some of them, I am almost disposed to retract the observation that Mr. O'Connell was inferior to Mr. Sheil in eloquence. With the powers Mr. O'Connell possesses that he will have great weight in the House of Commons I cannot have the slightest doubt; but that he will be ever able to have the influence there that he possessed in the association it would be folly to expect, for there he will not address himself to disinterested listeners—he will have opposed to him the weighty arguments of the purse, and the powerful reasoning of personal interest, and these he could not expect to overcome, unless, like the girl in the fairy-tale, his words could be changed into rubies and his sentences transmuted into diamonds.

* James Sheridan here referred to was the son of Dr. Sheridan, one of the Catholics prosecuted by attorney-general Saurin. My friend Sheridan died in the year 1837, in the service of the Times. The proprietors of that paper acted most nobly and generously towards him in his last sickness, and erected a tomb to his honour at Dawlish, in Devonshire, where he died. Mr. Quinlan is now connected with the Evening Post.

Great as were Mr. O'Connell's powers as a speaker, they never could have made the association so powerful a body, nor could they have advanced the Catholic question beyond the state in which it was when he commenced his public career, if he had not given up so much of his time and devoted so much of his personal exertions to the one great object of his life—the tainment of Emancipation. He was not only the most forward in the debate, but he was the most active in the committee—he originated the most bold measures, and he carried them into effect by managing the most petty details; he was at one and the same time the commander-in-chief and the drill-sergeant; he not only watched the manœuvres of the enemy, and concerted measures for their defeat, but he had an eye to every company, and saw that they were properly dressed and fit for parade. When it is remembered that all this was done by a gentleman who had the management of his own estate to look to, also engaged in an arduous profession, in which he held a high station and was in possession of the first practice, it may be asked how he was able to accomplish all these things? Simply by attending to his own business, that of his clients and the public, and to nothing else. That which the generality of mankind call pleasure, he did not partake of. He has always kept a hospitable and a luxurious table—his friends were welcome to it, but he did not enjoy its luxuries; business called him away from it, and business also roused him from his bed at the hour of five every morning. If a reporter were, in term time, and during the continuance of the association, to give a full report of what he said in each particular court, and in the association besides, his speeches would fill an entire newspaper! And yet, perhaps, in addition to the battling in the association, before the public, he would have employed a spare hour the same day arguing in the committee. This was the man who roused the Catholics from their apathy in 1823, and such a man only could have accomplished the important change which has taken place in Ireland in the course of a few years.

What would Ireland be without O'Connell? This is a question upon which I am not now disposed to speculate, and yet a slight accident might have rendered the country ignorant that such an individual had ever been in existence. When Mr. O'Connell was a very young man, he was one night supping with a number of friends in College, and as he was returning to his lodgings, better filled with wine than sense, he heard a cry of fire, and immediately ran to see where it was. It was in High-street the conflagration had taken place; volumes of flames were pouring out from one of the windows, the inhabitants had been alarmed and fled. When Mr. O'Connell was apprised that there were no lives in danger, he asked why some means were not employed for suppressing the progress of the flames. He was told that water could not be procured; there were a number of men engaged in the middle of the street endeavouring to get at the water-pipe, but in vain. Mr. O'Connell immediately ran amongst them, and snatching a pickaxe from one of them he had in an instant a large stone flying about the street. There was immediately a loud cheer for him. This encouraged the young wine-inspired student, and in an instant another stone was sent flying after the first. A third was dislodged; a fourth went whirling along the flags; a fifth was dashed into splinters; a sixth was scattered to pieces. Mr. O'Connell became enthusiastic in his occupation. The sheriff, who was by this time in attendance, thought he had done enough of good, and cried out to him to stop. Mr. O'Connell did not attend to this command, for he imagined the more stones he knocked up the sooner the fire would be out. The sheriff, becoming exasperated, and regardless of Mr. O'Connell's youth, and forgetful of the good he had effected, called out to the soldiery, by whom he was surrounded, to "run him through," an order which one of the obedient soldiers endeavoured to accomplish; for, meeting Mr. O'Connell at full charge, the point of the bayonet hit right against one of the breast buttons of his coat, the point turned, and passed along the ribs, inflicting a severe but not a dangerous wound. But for the mere chance of the bayonet point coming in contact with the button, Mr. O'Connell would have been stabbed through the heart, and thus "in a foolish frolic," as I heard Mr. O'Connell say, when telling this anecdote of himself in a private company, "Ireland was near losing a determined agitator." Upon the sheriff, whose name I now forget, Mr. O'Connell had ample revenge afterwards. In about twenty years from that time, he was engaged as counsel against this sheriff in the Court of Chancery, and was the principal means of depriving this humane man of no less a sum than fifteen thousand pounds. I hope all future sheriffs will take warning from this story, and be cautious in attempting to kill young lawyers for trying to pick up paving stones!

It can give but a very insufficient idea of the estimation in which Mr. O'Connell is held in Ireland to say that he is the most popular man in the country. George Ensor is popular in Armagh, John Lawless in Belfast, Tom Wyse in Waterford, and Eneas MacDonnell in Connaught; but let Mr. O'Connell go to any one of these places and the day-star of their popularity immediately sinks into insignificance—it would be completely absorbed and lost in the halo of enthusiasm that would invest O'Connell. Take O'Connell to Armagh, and Ensor would be as much forgotten there as if he passed all his life in the wilds of Connaught. Place O'Connell in Waterford, and the philosophic Wyse will be as little regarded as if he had spent his entire life in "walks at Rome," or composing a "Traveller's Oracle." The truth is, the regard, the esteem, the love of the people for O'Connell, approaches closer to idolatry than to any other feeling or sentiment. Whatever he asserts is with them "confirmation strong as proofs of holy writ," and whatever he commands is to them a law. Ireland and O'Connell are to them synonymous, and his name is identified with that of their religion. No man, I believe, ever yet was so firmly enthroned in the affections of an entire people, and no man ever yet had such command over the feelings of a nation.*

When I have looked upon O'Connell in the midst of a popular assembly, turning them in the direction he pleased, moulding them to his wishes, and filling them with his own ardent and enterprising spirit, while, at the same time, the willing smile was playing round his mouth, and his eye seemed to seek for no object but that which his imagination could turn into ridicule or expose to laughter, I have often thought of the following passage, which I have met with in some author; it is, or perhaps I should say it was, an accurate picture of Mr. O'Connell: "When I seemed only intent upon pleasure, I looked in my heart the consciousness and vanity of power; in the levity of the lip I disguised the knowledge and working of the brain; and I looked, as if with a gifted eye, upon the mysteries of the hidden depths, while I seemed to float an idler with the herd only upon the surface of the stream."

* Of the four persons here alluded to, two are since dead, Ensor and Lawless. Mr. Wyse is the holder of an office under the Russell ministry, and Mr. MacDonnell, a resident in London.

No. V.—THE SOUL THAT SIGHS FOR HEAVEN.

I.

My strong desire, O God! to view thee
Consumes my soul away;
Here on earth 'tis anguish to me
Another hour to stay.
To live so long from thee apart
Fills with such grief my restless heart,
It breaks, or else it dies:
But full of confidence in thee
It sighs and cries incessantly
O Paradise! O Paradise!

II.

What but pain can earth bestow
To ev'n its happiest?
All is misery—all is show—
And lasts but short at best.
Judge, then, ye souls that love your Lord,
With what deep rents my bosom's gored,
While death release denies.
But buoyant still with hope and love
I cry, the while I gaze above,
O Paradise! O Paradise!

III.

Thou can'st ravish soul and sense—
Thee, earth, I then defy;
Go, thy worthless boons dispense
To those that for them sigh.
Ye guilty pleasures—pegeants hollow—
Ne'er more in your train I'll follow,
I hate you and despise;
For yet my God I hope to see,
And hence I long and sigh for thee
O Paradise! O Paradise!

IV.

Clime of bliss, where love's the meed
For love that is return'd;
Where our sweet Saviour's face we read,
Without a veil discern'd!
Oh! when shall I behold the day
That shall dissolve this mortal clay,
And waft me to the skies;
When with a burst of joy I'll cry,
As thro' thy op'ning gates I fly,
O Paradise! O Paradise!

No. VI.—THE DEATH OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

I.

MARY, the glowing flame
That form'd thy only life thro' all the past,
Victorious now at last,
Expels thy spirit from its feeble frame.

II.

O death how calm and blest—
If death it can be call'd—when thy pure soul,
Spurning its weak control,
Wings its glad flight to realms of light and rest.

III.

Sunk in a pleasing sleep—
A heav'nly trance—a life-like deep repose,
From earth and all earth's woes,
Thou seek'st the clime where mourners cease to weep.

IV.

Yes, go! see heaven's high King—
Thy Son now beckons to thee from the skies—
The harps of Paradise
All wait thy joyous welcome-song to sing.

V.

Humbling myself like Thee,
And treading the rough way thy footsteps trod,
O Mother of my God!
Like thine I hope my death one day shall be.

VI.

How blest, my soul, wert thou,
Her bliss could'st thou be worthy yet to share—
To see her and to bear
Undazzled all the radiance of her brow?

VII.

And over all the blest,
Bright, peerless, unapproachable, alone.
To see her and her Son

ST. ADAMNAN'S

Description of the Holy Land.

"Adamnan wrote a book about the 'holy places' most useful to many readers."—Bede. His. Ecc. lib. v. c. 15. Whoever desires to see more of that book may see it either in the same or in that which we have lately epitomized from it.—Ibid. c. 17.

IN the ancient days, when no foreigner had yet profaned the shores of Ireland, and while her schools were frequented by the learned and pious of Europe, a shipwrecked stranger knocked at the gate of the monastery of Iona. He was a man of great rank in his own country, having for many years laboured as bishop in one of the episcopal sees of France. In accordance with the pious custom of the eighth century in which he lived, he had visited the Holy Land, and from the accounts which he had left of his pilgrimage, he was eminently gifted with all the qualifications required in an intelligent tourist of his age. The stories which he told to the good monks of Iona, where he was cast away on his return, are not, it is true, of that character which would suit the taste of the present time. He had little to say of the political institutions or customs of strange climes, and still less of himself. His business was not to collect materials for a popular volume, nor to put money into his pocket; the Holy Land—the land consecrated by the life and death of our Redeemer—he wished to see, to study all its features, to treasure them up in his memory for the good of his own soul, and the spiritual benefit of those among whom he had exhausted the enthusiasm of his youth and the steady zeal of his riper years.

What a welcome guest was this holy stranger on that wild island of Iona! There the spirit of St. Columba was still fresh among the disciples; a century had not yet passed since they had received his dying admonitions. How they must have hung on the words of the bishop-pilgrim, while he cheered the rocky solitudes of the northern island with descriptions of the Mount of Olives and the brook of Cedron, and the way of sorrows which led to the spot where man's redemption was consummated. Royal tombs, tombs of kings of Ireland, and of Albany, lay around the monastery of Iona, and within sound of the midnight chant, but vain were those frail memorials, powerless to excite an emotion in the heart of the youngest monk, when he thought on that sepulchre where the world's King, the Saint of saints, had been entombed.

Fortunately, the pilgrim's account of his travels is preserved. One of his hearers, influenced no doubt by the pious wish that future generations should profit by his profit, diligently collected the details of the pilgrimage, and with all the scrupulous accuracy of an Irish topographer, noted down the various sacred localities, and even illustrated his work by ground-plan sketches of the principal churches. The compiler of this work, St. Adamnan, has been revered for more than a thousand years as patron of several dioceses in Ireland; his cross may yet be seen in the churchyard wall on the top of Tarah hill; he was the biographer of his predecessor, St. Columba, and a great legislator in the Irish Church. Venerable Bede and Saxon kings and prelates respected him while living, and venerated him after his death, and grateful should we all feel to that Providence which had placed so competent a superior over the monastery of Iona, when the learned pilgrim was cast away, to light up in the ends of the earth, by his account of the Holy Land, the flame which for centuries after warmed the hearts of thousands of Irishmen, and gave them a signal preeminence in at least one of the old Catholic customs. "Pilgrimage," says Eric of Auxerre, "has become a second nature to the Irish."

The work, compiled by St. Adamnan from the accounts of the French pilgrim, is entitled "De Locis Sanctis," or the "Holy Places." It is divided into three books, the first containing nineteen, the second twenty-seven, and the third six chapters, occupying altogether about thirty folio pages. The author, being sent as ambassador by his countrymen to Alfred, king of Northumbria, presented a copy of his work to that monarch, who received the present with gratitude, and circulated it among his subjects. "A most useful book it is," exclaims Venerable Bede, "especially to those who cannot have the happiness of seeing with their own eyes the places where the patriarchs and apostles lived." So highly did that great man prize it, that he devoted to it two chapters of his ecclesiastical history, and even epitomized the whole work. That epitome has been long since published, and was very generally known, but the work itself, less fortunate,⁽¹⁾ lay in manuscript until the year 1734, when James Gretser Theologian, of the Society of Jesus, published it in the fourth volume of his Defence of Ecclesiastical Rites,⁽²⁾ from a copy which had been sent by Heribert Rosweyde from Holland to Ratisbon. Singular, indeed, is the fate of many ancient ecclesiastical works written by Irishmen; like their authors, they are often prized and extolled by foreigners, but are neglected or unknown at home.

The pilgrim had lived nine months in the Holy Land. The city of Jerusalem, though lately reduced under the Saracen yoke, still retained almost all its Christian glory. Eighty-four towers guarded its walls; six gates, namely, David's Gate, at the west of Mount Sion; the Fuller's Gate, next in order to the north; St. Stephen's Gate; Benjamin's; the Little Gate, leading down by steps to the valley of Josaphat; and lastly the Gate of the Thecuite received on the 15th day of September crowds of pilgrims in the varied costumes of every nation, to celebrate the Exaltation of the Holy Cross; but on the spot where the great Basilica had lately stood the Saracens had thrown up "a square house of prayer,"(3) an unsightly mass,(4) constructed of long planks and immense beams. Thus was the crescent of the Arabian impostor raised over the symbol of redemption, as in later ages, alas! Adamnan's own church of Iona was to become the victim of sacrileges such as the Mahometan sword or axe never committed in the holy city. The shapeless and crossless conventicle of Knox now deforms the scene of Columba's and Adamnan's labours.

Arculf the pilgrim was well acquainted with all the public buildings in the city, but the "holy places" were the objects of his predilection. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre, otherwise called the Anastasis, he found was a circular building, divided into three compartments by concentric walls, and supported on twelve gigantic columns. Between the walls there was a large space to accommodate the crowds, and indented in the centre wall were three beautiful altars. The sepulchre itself, or rather the inner round church built over the sepulchre, was covered on the top with polished marble, surmounted by a gold cross. The entrance to this little church looked to the east; the sepulchre lay in the northern side, not level with the pavement, but exactly three palms higher (Arculf had often measured it);(5) it was seven feet long, and around it were suspended, night and day, twelve burning lamps. "To aid this description," observes Adamnan, "I took a ground-plan of the church, a very poor one,(6) indeed, on a tablet of wax: which plan has been published by Gretzer, from a copy found in a Belgian library. To the west of the sepulchre lies the Church of Golgotha, where the rock was preserved in which the cross of our Lord was raised when he was crucified. A large silver cross, surmounted by a brazen wheel studded with lamps, now stood on the rock, and beneath it was hewn out a cave where Mass was offered up for the repose of honourable persons, whose bodies, meantime, remained out in the street."—Chap. ii. lib. 1.

The rock which had been rolled by the angel from the mouth of the sepulchre was now divided into two parts, both formed into altars, one placed before the sepulchre, another in the east end of the same church (c. iii. lib. 1). Could Adamnan omit the monuments specially dedicated to the Mother of God? No, if there be one feature more prominent than another in the devotional forms of the Irish Church it is veneration for the Mother of God. In every age, in every change of fortune—in the time of our elder glory, as well as in the latter days of martyr sorrow, Mary has been the theme of her bards and the comforter of the afflicted hearth. During the terrible struggle in the sixteenth century, Mary, St. Peter, the Passion of our Lord, and the Blessed Sacrament are blended in the popular poetry, which then, by a special providence of God, reflected more deeply than ever the intense religious feeling of the nation. But the devotion was never new; it was coeval with the Irish Church. No monument that recalls the sweet name of the Virgin Mother is omitted by Adamnan. He describes the great square church "of the Blessed Mary, Mother our Lord," to the east of the sepulchre, and the long silver cross that lay within it. There was kept a linen cloth of red and green, with the image of our Lord and of the apostles worked on it, which was an object of special reverence to the whole people,(7) because it was believed to have been woven by the Blessed Virgin. Adamnan describes it minutely (c. vii. lib. 1), as well as the chalice,(8) the sponge, the lance and the sudarium, which it was believed had been rolled around the head of our Lord after his crucifixion. These relics were preserved in the Basilica of Constantine (c. iv. v. vi., lib. 1). Thus we have all the practices recommended in the monastery of Iona, which modern heresy condemns as idolatrous. On the word of poor debauchees or robbers of the sixteenth century we are asked to believe that the idolatry which Christ came to destroy reigned triumphant, not only in Jerusalem but over the whole earth, 700 years after his death.

In the valley of Josaphat stood one little church which Arculph very frequently visited. It was round and exquisitely beautiful, and divided into two churches, the upper and lower, the former containing four altars, the latter only one, placed in the eastern end. To the right of this altar was a tomb hewn out of the solid rock, in which it was believed the body of the Blessed Virgin rested for a short time after her death,(9) but how or by whom it was thence removed no one could tell. In the lower church was pointed out the very stone on which our Lord was kneeling in the garden of Gethsemani. Adamnan must have been particularly affected by this little church of the Blessed Virgin, the mother of mercy. "Arculph," he says, departing from his usual calm strain, "assured me that he saw with his eyes what I am describing." The church stood there in the awful valley, a type of mercy, shedding its light of hope on the judgment-seat of the human race, and exciting, by that monument from Gethsemani, a remembrance of the agony which pierced the mother's heart with a sword of grief, and commenced the awful purchase of the redemption of man. Near this church lay the graves of Simeon, the just man, who "held the little infant, the Lord Jesus, in both his hands,"(10) while he prophesied the Mother's grief and the world's redemption; and there also lay the tomb of Joseph, the spouse of Mary (lib. i. c. 9).

The place where the traitor Judas hanged himself, the very tree outside the gate of David, were pointed out to the pilgrims (c. 13).

On Mount Sion, a church of simple form perpetuated the memory of the Last Supper. In this church was shown the place of the Last Supper; the place where the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles; the marble column to which our Lord was bound when he was scourged; the place where the Blessed Virgin died, and the rock on which St. Stephen was stoned. Below Mount Sion lay the Haceldama, a dismal sight; rocks protruding at every point through a hard and barren soil, the last earthly home of myriad pilgrims, many of whose skeletons lay on the surface of the earth, covered with skins of wild beasts or mouldering rags.

Arculph visited frequently Mount Olivet, clothed with its deep woods of olive and vine, and girt around its base with rich fields of barley and wheat. At the first glance it appeared as large as Mount Sion, but on closer inspection it was found that in two of "the geometrical dimensions," (11) namely, length and breadth, it is smaller. After winding through paths of intermingled vine and olive, he arrived at the church, a large and beautiful building, divided like that over the sepulchre, into three concentric parts, the interior of which was never roofed, but the altar in the east side of it was merely covered with a thin kind of shed. In the centre were seen the foot-prints of our Lord's last stay on earth. On the western side of the church, and looking towards Jerusalem, were eight windows, opposite which, eight blazing lamps, suspended by ropes, flung "the light of day" itself across the valley even on the darkest nights and cheered the pilgrim's path with joy and sweet humility. On the great festival of the Ascension "the glass valves of the windows" (12) were furnished with an increased number of lamps (c. xvii.) Adamnan has given a plan of this church, such as it was described by Arculph, and certainly there is a neatness and precision about that work which proves that those monks of Iona were not ignorant of "geometrical dimensions."

In the eighteenth and nineteenth chapter of the first book there is a brief description of the great olive wood near Bethania, encircling an extensive monastery, within which a church rose over the tomb from which Lazarus had been called to life. Another church frequented by pilgrims marked the spot where the sermon of the beatitudes, delivered on the mount, promulgated the law of the Gospel, which in after ages was to lead myriads from all quarters of the globe, through dangers of sea and land, of war and robbers, of plague and famine, to worship at those places, consecrated by the presence of the Desired of all nations.

The second book is chiefly devoted to the "holy places" which are distant from the holy city. Bethlehem and Nazareth, Jericho, and the Jordan, and other celebrated places receive each their due share of attention; but in Nazareth, Arculph happened to meet a monk from Europe, who was in a great hurry to return home, and did not allow him to study as minutely as he would wish the scenes which they viewed in company. Though Adamnan does not complain of this hapless meeting, probably he would much prefer that his guest had fallen in with some other companion or been left to himself. But he is careful to inform us, that even in those points which Arculph describes as subsequent to the meeting, there is not the slightest discrepancy between his accounts and those of St. Jerome and other writers, with which he had collated them (lib. iii. c. 26).

Bethlehem was then a long line of houses, stretching along a narrow ridge. A low wall, not defended by towers, surmounted it. In the extreme eastern point of the town a cave, apparently formed by the hand of nature, had the first claim on the pilgrim's piety. It was divided into two compartments, the inner, in which the Blessed Virgin laid our Lord after his birth, (13) the exterior was that in which he was born. The sides and roof of the cave were now covered with marble, and over the whole towered the great church of the Blessed Virgin. Near the church there was a little spring, which, in the traditions of the age, was believed to be coeval with the birth of our Lord (lib. ii. c. i. 111). Here the pilgrims inquired for the tombs of St. Jerome, and of the shepherds who had heard the angelic hymn on the night of the Nativity, and also for Rachel's—saints of the old and of the new law, awaiting together the resurrection of the dead (c. iv. v. 6).

Hebron, once the stronghold of the Philistines, and afterwards the metropolis of David's kingdom, presented now a spectacle of ghastly ruin. Its walls had disappeared, and over the ruins of stately mansions and royal palaces arose a few scattered huts, impressing by the contrast a deeper feeling of departed glory; but about one furlong to the east of it, slept (as some persons believed) the great parent of the human race; and who could feel for the fall of Hebron when the countless generations of men succeeding each other in all parts of the earth arose to the imagination of the pilgrim at the sight of Adam's grave? It lay with those of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, within a double cave, each covered with a chiselled block of stone, the same in general form, except that Adam's appeared to be of meaner workmanship. The feet of the tombs were turned not to the east, as is usual with all other tombs, observes Adamnan, but to the south. A sketch of these monuments was taken from Arculph's description, but unfortunately it is not preserved. It might have given us some knowledge of the ideas of our ancestors regarding sepulchral monuments.

About a thousand paces from the monuments arose the hill of Mambre, clothed with verdure and flowers. On the summit a church enclosed the remains of Abraham's oak, portions of which were carried by the pilgrims on their return to their homes (c. ix.) Adamnan's remark on this subject reminds us of the trees preserved with religious veneration for many a long and sorrowful century in Ireland, because they were believed to have been planted by or to have sheltered some of the primitive fathers of our church. Such were the yew tree of St. Patrick, which gave its name to the town of Newry, the tree of St. Bridget, at Kildare, or of St. Kevin, at Glendalough.

A group of plane trees waved over the ruins of Jericho. The church of Galgal marked the spot where the Israelites encamped after passing the Jordan. Within it were preserved the twelve monumental stones, each so large that two men of the present day could not stir them.

The baptism of our Lord was commemorated by a large cross standing in the Jordan. A small square church on the bank was believed to cover the spot where his clothes were laid during the baptism, but the great church of St. John the Baptist crowned a neighbouring eminence.

The pilgrim explored the fountains of the Jordan, the Dead Sea, and the sea of Galilee; took a distant view of Capharnaum from a mountain, and visited the spot where our Lord multiplied the bread and fishes. Over the well of Sichem a cruciform church, "stretching its arms to the four cardinal points," (14) was erected, of which, unfortunately, the ground-plan, taken by Adamnan, is not preserved; the little fountain from which the Baptist used to drink was "covered with a stone roof," (15) no novelty to Adamnan, as there are few saints on the Irish calendar who have not several similar monuments to their memory in every part of Ireland.

Nazareth, though full of large stone houses, and provided with two great churches, was not defended by walls. The house in which our Lord lived stood in the centre, enclosed in a church, which was supported on vaults; a "most limpid spring," which was held in great veneration, flowed under the church. The other church marked the place where it was believed the angel announced to the Blessed Virgin the mystery of the Incarnation.

Arculph was allowed but one night by his companion to study the great monuments that crowned the summit of Mount Thabor, commemorating the glories of the transfiguration. Having ascended the verdant and flowery sides (16) of the mount, and passed through a deep wood that encircled its top, he found himself on a spacious and level plain, in the centre of which a great church towered over a circular enclosure of stone. Within the enclosure an extensive monastery met his view, with its innumerable little cells scattered around, and three small churches erected, in allusion to the words of St. Peter, "Let us make here three tabernacles."

From this brief notice, the reader may form an imperfect notion of Adamnan's description of the Holy Land; and when we peruse it and the epitome made by venerable Bede, and reflect that it was deposited in the great monastery of Iona, and copied and circulated through the monasteries of Saxon and Scot and Pict, to whom that monastery was equally dear, it is not difficult to conceive the influence which that little book must have produced upon the simple and earnest hearts of our pious fathers. Who could repine at the poverty and seclusion of the monastic life, when he had before him in the holy well, and the crosses that studded every part of the island, and the very barrenness of the soil, something to remind him of those scenes which the pious Adamnan had described—scenes consecrated by the sufferings of our Lord from his crib in Bethlehem to his agony on Calvary? It were well, if we too, when we examine the relics of ancient piety scattered over our country, would touch them with a reverent hand, and correct the pride of knowledge and the vain curiosity of mere antiquarianism by that religious feeling which induced Adamnan to snatch from his multiplied cares, in church and state, time to compose his Guide to the Holy Land. "Reader," he exclaims at the close, "may I beg your prayers for the holy Arculph, who has most kindly dictated this description of the holy places; pray also for me; in my own poor style I have taken down his words, overwhelmed, though I am, with the laborious and almost insupportable cares of the church, which are occupying almost every hour of the day." (17)

The close of the second book brings Arculph to Alexandria. Having visited Damascus, then the great seat of Saracen dominion, and examined the remains of Tyre, with whose history Adamnan was perfectly acquainted, he took shipping at Joppa and sailed for Alexandria. Adamnan's remarks on that celebrated emporium are worthy the serious consideration of those flippant moderns who see in the monk of the ancient times nothing but an impersonation of profound ignorance and loathsome idleness. Not content with the narrative of Arculph, he supplies from several historical sources a description of the city, and the nature of the great country of which it was the capital. Tracing its history from its foundation by Alexander, and surveying its admirable geographical position, seated in strength, "with the sea for its wealth" and "the water for its walls," he descends to a minute description of its port. The city was nearly surrounded by water, the mouths of the Nile on one side and Lake Mareotis on the other. Its port was difficult of access from the sea side, because it resembled the human body, the head or basin being large and sheltered from every breeze; the neck, or passage through which the vessels entered, narrow and winding; but this passage once cleared, the sea opened "long and wide," studded with merchant vessels from all quarters of the globe. On the right of the entrance to the port, the great pharos flung its warning light along the waters; it was attended the whole night long by coast guards, who fed its flame by piles of wood and other combustible materials. (18) Within the port, the enormous moles heaved their giant forms over the water, protecting the city from the encroachments of the sea. The extent of the city from east to west was so great that Arculph, who entered at the third hour of the day, did not arrive at the opposite suburbs until evening; and along that vast range, towers and bastions innumerable protected the massive walls. "But can we be surprised," exclaims Adamnan, "at the wealth and grandeur of this city, when we reflect that it is the mart of the world, sending out its corn and the most necessary articles of merchandize to every nation in Europe. The fertilizing inundations of the Nile, the canals which intersected the whole country, the great embankments directing and controlling the flow of that inland sea, the corn sown without a plough and reaped in a profusion unknown to other regions, the high road of waters along the river up to the city of Elephantia, furrowed by a thousand keels; all these are described by Adamnan as the great titles, impressed by the hand of God on that ancient land, to her pre-eminence among the nations of the earth. The cataracts, which he designates as "river hills of water," (19) arrested the navigation of the Nile; not, he says, because there was not a sufficient depth of stream, but because the fall was too precipitous. Such are some of the particulars which this poor monk of Iona thought worthy of preserving from the lips of the pilgrim regarding the city of the Ptolemies. Yet, if we are to believe the flippant pamphleteers of modern days, the monk was a man who never looked ten yards beyond his cell, unless it were to find some spot where he might bask his animal length in swinish indolence under the sun.

Having sailed from Alexandria, and spent a few days in Crete, our pilgrim arrived at Constantinople, the metropolis of the Roman empire. Surrounded on all sides, except one by the sea, embracing a circuit of twelve miles, communicating with the heart of Europe, by the Danube to the north, and with the shores of the Mediterranean by the south, it strikes Adamnan as a place destined by heaven for the seat of empire. Its site and embattled walls remind him of the ancient glory of Tyre, and of the then existing strength of Alexandria, while the gorgeous stone palaces surpass everything of the kind in the world except the edifices of old Rome.(20) But the principal object that arrests his attention here is the great church of St. Sophia. He had given but a passing notice of the Church of St. Mark, in Alexandria, where the saint's body rested before the high altar in a beautiful tomb. To compensate, perhaps, for that omission, he invites the special attention of his readers to this church in Constantinople. "I cannot pass over in silence that famous round church of stone: It is of enormous size." The triple walls, and the exquisite dome supported on arches and towering high in the air,(21) exhaust all the eulogistic terms in his architectural vocabulary. In the north side of the church a large and beautiful armarium preserved the true cross, enclosed in a reliquary of wood, over which another case of the same material was generally kept. But on the three last days of the year (22) the reliquary, with its sacred treasure was brought out and raised on the golden altar to be exposed to the veneration of the faithful. On the first day, or Holy Thursday, the emperor, advancing to the altar, bowed his head and kissed the sacred relic, the officers of the army and all the great functionaries of the court following in the order of their rank and repeating the same act of veneration. On Good Friday the empress, with the ladies of her court, and on Holy Saturday the bishop and all the clergy "with fear and trembling," and with every mark of respect, also kissed the cross, which was then carried back in procession to the armarium. How different the fate of this church of Constantinople which once witnessed this religion of the great ones of the earth from that poor and despised church which claims Adamnan as her son! A few months ago, in cleaning the dome of St. Sophia, the artists discovered, beneath several coats of painting, a beautiful image of the Blessed Virgin, sweet but sad, as if in accordance with the profanation of the holy place, and the exile of faith from one of her once most favoured abodes. Heresy, it is true, has also been installed in the old churches of Ireland, and makes blasphemy against the mother of God an indispensable qualification for worldly promotion; but her love is enshrined in the hearts of millions who have not renounced the faith of Adamnan and the world for the German inventions of the sixteenth century.

From our brief and imperfect notice of St. Adamnan's "holy places" the reader can easily determine where those good monks of Iona would go now and say their prayers were they to return to earth. Yet learned men, men of high station, have ventured to maintain, in the face of facts, that the religion of the ancient Irish was quite different from the religion of

Rome. There is a story told by an ancient author which would settle this matter, and it may be the more acceptable as it regards the national saint of England. It happened that on a great muster of the imperial forces—a sort of levy en masse—troops of stalwart men were pouring into the gates of Diospolis. One of the recruits, mounted on a beautiful charger, whose glossy skin and proud gait showed that he had no reason to complain of his keeping, drove straight ahead, paying little attention to the groups in the streets, though they were to be his companions in the field. The cavalier dismounts at the door of a house where the pillar was preserved, to which it was believed the martyr St. George had been bound. An image of the saint was painted on the pillar; and, addressing this image as if St. George himself were present,(23) the soldier prayed: "O, martyr George, I commend myself and this steed to thy protection, that, by the virtue of your prayers, we may return safe from the dangers of flood and field, of plague and famine; and, should we return safe, I vow that I will present this horse to you." Months rolled by—thousands who had departed to the field in the full vigour of youth fell beneath the swords of the enemy, the ravages of famine, or fatigue; but the suppliant to St. George was more fortunate—he appears one fine morning opposite St. George's pillar, but ah! his good steed; there he was, the companion of his dangers—how could he part with him, would not St. George take money? "Holy martyr," he prays, "I give thanks to the eternal God, who has preserved me through the great efficacy of your prayers."(24) Twenty pieces of gold are paid down at the shrine, and the soldier, with a light heart, bounds on his steed. But the steed will not stir—no power on earth can move him from the spot. Again the soldier returns, lays down twenty other pieces of gold, but the steed is still obstinate. With a misgiving heart the same sum is again paid out—sixty gold pieces in all! Surely the steed has been amply ransomed and will not part now with his generous master; no, the shrine of St. George is more attractive than the pastures of the master. The steed would stay. "Ah," exclaims the returned soldier, "I see now what is the matter, I promised the steed himself; him and the sixty pieces of gold together I now give to St. George—he must have them both." This narrative is the fourth chapter third book of St. Adamnan's "holy places;" but it does not appear to have scandalized him or any of his monks from England, Ireland, or Scotland.(25)

23. Ad quam, quasi ad presentem Georgium loqui capit dicens, "me tibi Georgi martyr et meum commendo equum ut orationum virtute tuarum," &c.

24. "Sancte martyr: Deo eterno grates refero, quime per tuæ celsitudinem firmitudinis et orationis sospitem reduxit."

25. Adamnan's work supplies no direct evidence of the state of ecclesiastical art in Ireland; but we may infer from his minute details on foreign painting, sculpture, and architecture, that he had respectable domestic specimens of all in his own church; otherwise he could hardly have been able to conceive, much less describe them. If he wrote a history of Ireland (as some believe) its loss is much to be deplored.

Judge Fletcher's opinion of orange jurors. Feelings of the Catholics—their opinion of orangemen, as expressed by Mr. Sheil. Difference between Sheil and O'Connell. The former a moderate politician. Mr. Sheil in private life—violent in his public speeches. Description of him as an orator—an extempore speaker—liked by the reporters—a firm supporter of O'Connell in the Association—universally esteemed and admired by the Catholics—proposes simultaneous meetings—effect of that proposition.

[The reader will bear in mind that what he is about to peruse in the following chapter was written in the year 1829. It describes, in one respect, a state of things in which no improvement has been made; and, in another, it portrays the character of one of the great orators of Ireland, a line of which, the author, as a Catholic, is not disposed to change.]

ONE of the first and most important steps of the new association of the Catholics was to prepare an address to the people, in the form of a petition to the House of Commons, on the administration of justice in Ireland. The Catholics had long complained of the partial mode in which the laws were administered in this country. In all political trials it was a common, and is to this day the invariable practice, to exclude Catholics from the jury box. I can but recollect one instance that this rule has been departed from, and that was in the Commission Court in Green-street, in the year 1822, when the clerk of the crown was, as usual, bidding the Catholics "stand by," but was ordered by Mr. Plunkett, the attorney-general to desist, and by Catholics "ribbonmen" (who are, in truth, "Catholic fanatics") were convicted. This insult to the Catholics had been long a subject of complaint, and many amongst them said that even in their private property they were injured, when an orange sheriff, as in the city of Dublin, had the power of selecting a jury. I know not whether this complaint was well founded or not, but I must, in justice to the orange sheriffs, say, that I never knew a Catholic who could with any truth put forward such an allegation.

The only place that I can recollect being utterly disgusted at the bigoted opposition to Catholics as jurors was at the assizes for Tipperary, held at Clonmel. In every case of murder, when a Catholic usually stands at the bar as the accused, it has been the constant practice to object on the part of the crown to any juror of that persuasion. I remember upon one occasion—it was the trial of Patrick Grace for the murder of Mr. Richard Chadwick—a most respectable Catholic gentleman, Mr. Benjamin Craven, of Clonmel, being ordered to "stand by" upon the part of the crown. The oath had been half gone through at this time, when the crown solicitor endeavoured to have him put aside. There was an argument before Judge Moore upon the point, who ruled that according to the practice of the court Mr. Craven should be a juror, he having been partly sworn. Mr. Craven accordingly acted as juror, and brought in, along with the others, a verdict of "guilty" against Grace. The case was one of cruel and cold-blooded assassination, and, yet, it was in such a case that Catholics were sought to be put out of the jury-box! I could not give, I should think, a stronger instance of the extent to which this atrocious system is carried.

In 1823 the Catholics complained of this vile system, and they still complain of it, and their dislike to it was not a little increased by the triumph which had been gained over them in the acquittal of the theatrical rioters by those whom they termed an orange grand jury, and a no less orange petit jury. The Catholics did not in 1823 forget the memorable language which had been uttered by Judge Fletcher in the year 1814: "Murders have been repeatedly perpetrated, and though legal prosecutions have ensued, yet such has been the baneful consequences of those factious (the orange) associations that, under their influence, petit juries have declined to do their duty. It was sufficient to say that such a man displayed such a colour to produce an utter disbelief of his testimony, and when another has stood with his hand at the bar, the display of his party colour has mitigated the murder into manslaughter."

I have already mentioned that dreadful excitement prevailed in the country immediately previous to the formation of the association, and when the petition upon the administration of justice was brought forward the association had not been a sufficient length of time in existence to have had any pacificatory effect upon the people. The feelings of bitterness between the opposing parties was at its height, and the passions which raged in the hearts of the deluded ribbonmen were beginning at this moment to fester the minds even of enlightened Catholics. Prejudice blinded their vision, and they looked upon their opponents as either cold-hearted perjurers, who would swear away their lives, or as reckless assassins, anxious to imbrue their weapons in their blood. Such were the feelings of many Catholics at the time, and I cannot give a stronger evidence than is to be found in one passage of the petition on the administration of justice, which thus spoke of the conduct of the orangemen:

"The sacred writings are tortured into a profane instrumentality—the Bible is resorted to for the suggestions of massacre, and the injunctions of murder are drawn out of the very word of God."

Such was the horrible description given of the initiatory ceremonies in the swearing in of orangemen, who (in imitation of the tomfoolery of the masons) had adopted some passages of the Bible at their inauguration of a new member.

The passage I have quoted attracted a good deal of attention at the moment, and was, no doubt, the means of widening even to a still greater extent the breach between Catholics and orangemen. Mr. Sheil was the author of this petition.

The name of Richard Sheil is nearly as intimately interwoven with the formation, progress, and success of the Catholic Association as that of Daniel O'Connell himself. Between the two men there at first could appear but little sympathy. O'Connell was always an enthusiast, and it was his only amusement and his greatest relaxation to think, speak, and act for Ireland. On the contrary, it was evidently a great pain and trouble to Mr. Sheil to take the prominent part he did in politics, and when he came before the public he always did so thoroughly well prepared.

Never yet did a human being more magnificently perform the part of a leading demagogue than Richard Sheil. Even the bitterest of his opponents could not refuse him the meed of their applause. The orange-man who went into the association and listened to Richard Sheil delivering one of his splendid orations, must been actuated, I should imagine, by somewhat the same feelings as a lover of the drama should experience on beholding the character of Zanga, of Iago, or Sir Giles Overreach, supported by Kemble, by Young, or by Kean. His admiration of the man must have absorbed all his disgust for the sentiments he was delivering.

No man has, I believe naturally less of the feelings of a partizan—no man cares less for politics than Mr. Sheil, and yet the circumstances of his country and the condition of parties made him the most inflammatory of speakers, and even once subjected him to a prosecution for sedition. In private life there cannot be a more playful, lively, light and pleasant companion than Mr. Sheil; he possesses an inexhaustible fund of wit, spirit, and humour; his great enjoyment is to bring forth the bright and agreeable parts of each man's character he mixes with; and, anxious for amusement, he does not sneer at drollery because he knows it is not wit. There is a tinge of the epicurean about Mr. Sheil, which to the bon vivant renders every remark that comes from him delightful and piquant. Even in his pleasures and the greatest moments of sociability, you can at once see that Mr. Sheil is a complete man of the world; he pretends not to sudden friendship; he assumes no exaggerated kindness of manner; he meets you on your own terms. You can be as happy, as jocose, and as lively as you wish with him, but even in the very height of his humour you must feel that beyond the line of intimacy or familiarity he has marked down for you it would not be safe to trespass. He is in real life a delightful stage-coach companion, who, however pleasant upon the road, it would not be good taste to address in the drawing-room without a formal introduction. At no time, however, can the pride of the author or the self sufficiency of the orator be discerned in him. He is too conscious of his own great powers to have any vanity about him, and in speaking to him he never makes you feel that he had hundreds applauding his productions on the stage and in the closet, or thousands regarding with wonder and admiration what he had delivered in the arena of politics.

Mr. Sheil is as quiet and temperate in private life in his political opinions as he was desperate and violent when he addressed a public assembly. He was as playful and lively in his manners in the one as he was fierce and furious in the other—and to speak to him ten minutes before he commenced a speech, and look and listen to him five minutes afterwards, it was almost impossible to think that it was the same individual. The mild, the easy mannered, dark eyed little gentleman had cast off all appearance of self, the muscles of his countenance had become convulsed, the forehead was corrugated with wrinkles, the full dark eye flashed with electric sparks of genius, the mouth was cast into a sardonic grin, as if the orator was gloating over the agonies of the victim which his sarcasm had impaled; the hair was flung in wild masses round his temples, and the arms and body denoted by their violent movements how the spirit that stirred them was agitated by passion. It was impossible to think of Mr. Sheil a few minutes before, and look upon him thus, without being reminded of the following passage of an author that seems to be a great favourite with him:

“—— Subito non vultus, non color unus
Non comæ mansere comæ; sed pectus anhelum
Et rabie fera corda tument; majorque videre
Nec mortale sonans——”

In a country of orators Mr. Sheil is remarkable for an exuberance of diction and a floridness of phraseology. While listening to him, one would be astonished to perceive how the most common idea and threadbare sentiment assumes a new appearance from the magnificent clothing of words with which he invests it. In his speeches he cannot deliver himself as any other man would—every sentence is dressed in a holiday suit, and every portion of his subject introduces some new word which could never be expected to be met with in the common affairs of life. And yet in this exuberance there is not the slightest affectation—it is Mr. Sheil's manner as a public speaker, although no man is more unpretending as a talker. Mr. Sheil is particularly attractive as an orator from the splendid, gorgeous, and in most instances faultless imagery to be found in every speech of his. His imagination is like his diction, inexhaustible. Upon every subject, no matter how common, he, with the profusion of a spendthrift, throws away pearls of poetry which are above price, and which a man of more prudence and less fancy would reserve for great occasions. His luxuriance of imagery, his peculiarity of phraseology, and his powers of ridicule render him as formidable an advocate at the bar as they made him a dreaded opponent in politics. I have often seen Mr. Sheil engaged as an advocate to speak to evidence, and not more than once out of every five times have I seen the opportunity given him, the defendant preferring to rest upon the case against him, the speech of his own counsel, and exposed to all the expenses of the suit, rather than endure the castigation which Mr. Sheil would invariably inflict upon him—a castigation which would not pass away with the occasion, but which the unfortunate defendant would hear of for years afterwards; the beauty of the imagery and the particularity of the language in which the ridicule was conveyed rendering it an object of interest and curiosity to every one but the unfortunate sufferer. I could not better illustrate Mr. Sheil's powers as an orator than by this instance of their apprehended effect. I mention it with another view, that of disproving the erroneous idea which I have known to prevail very generally, that all Mr. Sheil's speeches are prepared before they are delivered. A more unfounded error than this there cannot exist, for the barrister who speaks to evidence cannot prepare himself, because it is impossible he can know what it is he will have to comment upon. In the Association too, I have seen Mr. Sheil speak in reply very frequently, and some of his best speeches were those which were thus delivered. That Mr. Sheil prepares himself, by reflecting and considering upon any subject, before he gives his opinion upon it, there can be no doubt, and what man was ever a great orator that did not do so? But the accusation that was generally preferred against him, that he writes down his speeches before he delivers them is quite untrue, and I have reason to know it.

There was no member of the Association a greater favourite with the reporters than Mr. Sheil, for this reason, that he never troubled them to take a note of his speeches. While he was speaking we could sit and listen, and be delighted with him, and “many is the time and oft" that I have caught myself (most unreporter-like) carried away by the enthusiasm he excited, and joining in the general cheer that followed one of the many splendid passages in his speeches. I have afterwards seen Mr. Sheil write out these speeches, generally but one-fourth of the length they ought to have extended to in print, and have never yet seen any one of them equal to what he had delivered. That which he had spoken seemed the inspiration of a deity, the other was but the fine production of an accomplished, but still mortal man.

The manner of Mr. Sheil might have produced some of that difference which is so observable between the speech reported and that spoken, and yet his gesticulation is by no means perfect. He is generally too violent in his action, often attitudinizes too much, and having a fine and powerful eye he frequently makes too much use of it. But it is in the management of his voice that Mr. Sheil displays his greatest power; at first, it has a squeaking, harsh, and unpleasant effect upon the ear, but, as he proceeds, the auditor is soon accustomed to it, and, as the orator becomes impassioned, his tones vary with every emotion he is desirous of expressing. I remember once having heard him describe the calamities that were likely to ensue from an insurrection in Ireland, and his manner and his voice thrilled his hearers with horror. The tones came from him in low, distinct, and whispering sounds that penetrated to the very extremity of the dense multitude by which he was surrounded; not a breath nor a murmur could be heard during his delivery, and when he had concluded, the terrors of the scene were too strong upon their minds to permit them to express their admiration of him who had thus excited their feelings. But, when they did recover from the enchantment, which his eloquence had cast around them, their admiration and delight burst forth with uncontrollable force and energy.

And yet to look at Mr. Sheil when the assemblage had dispersed you could not but be conscious that he had, all the time, been acting, and that his feelings, however strong, had evaporated with the occasion that had excited them. Mr. Sheil during the entire progress of agitation seemed to regard his country as his client, and was as anxious and as passionate every time he spoke in the Association or at a public meeting as if he had received a refresher for the occasion—but with the occasion his anxiety and his passion passed away and were no more thought of than John Doe or Richard Roe out of court. In the Association Mr. Sheil mixed himself up with no party, and was never found caballing in the committee. As far as his transcendent abilities and splendid genius could be useful to the cause of the Catholics they were devoted to their service, but in the proceedings of the Association he could be scarcely said to take any part except that of supporting Mr. O'Connell, when there was an attack made upon him. Differences had, previous to the formation of the Association, existed between Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Sheil, but a generous reconciliation had taken place—all was forgiven, all forgotten, and their former quarrel had but this effect upon Mr. Sheil, to render him upon all occasions the sincere, warm, able, and disinterested advocate of Mr. O'Connell. He seemed to feel that without O'Connell the cause of the Catholics must fail, and, feeling thus, he determined that while he had the command of the English language it should be levelled against Mr. O'Connell's opponents. As to Mr. Sheil himself he had no opponent, and I believe not one personal enemy. He aimed at no superiority, he took upon himself no command, and the station he assumed in Catholic politics no one attempted to dispute with him, for the personal vanity of each must have whispered that it would be far wiser not to seek to occupy that station—if the race of eloquence were to be run he should yield the palm to Mr. Sheil, or he himself would come in — "ad extremum ridendus, et ilia ducat."

Mr. Sheil conceded the first place in Catholic politics to Mr. O'Connell—he was content to fill the second, and however desirous some might feel to displace the one none were ambitious to contend with the other. The Radical, the moderate, and the aristocrat in Catholic politics was each the admirer and supporter of Mr. Sheil, because he was not mingled up with their measures, and was superior to their intrigues.

I believe that during the entire course of the Association, and amidst the many measures that were discussed in it, Mr. Sheil originated but one, and that was the resolution for having a meeting of all the Catholics in Ireland upon one and the same day. This was a very bold, a very dangerous, but in its results proved a very successful experiment, and one which produced an impression upon the government, that was felt in its very heart's core, and electrified it to its very extremities. I remember a few days after the first simultaneous meeting had taken place, a gentleman high in the police in Dublin, and who had that day a communication with no less a personage than the under secretary of state, Mr. Gregory, speaking to me; the expression that burst from him was an involuntary one, for he seemed to be confounded with some new light that had broken in upon his understanding. "Good God," said he, "is not this a dreadful state to which the country is reduced? We are completely in the power of the Association; O'Connell and Sheil have but to write a circular to all the parish priests in Ireland, the people would obey their voice, the population would rise at a certain hour or a certain day in every part of the country, soldiery and police might be overwhelmed in a few minutes, and in the course of forty-eight hours Ireland would not belong to the English government. It is a frightful state of things, and something must be done." There can be no doubt, that no measure of the Catholics tended more to a settlement of their question, than the simultaneous meetings, and however one party might abhor Mr. Sheil for the proposition, the other should feel towards him nothing but the most sincere gratitude.

Foreign Missionary Correspondence.

THE following letter has been communicated to us by the Reverend Directors of the College for the Foreign Missions, Drumcondra.

"Nomelah, Agra, July 3rd, 1848."

"DEAR AND REVEREND SIR,

"I received at the close of the month of May your kind letter from All Hallows. It afforded me much pleasure to hear that all the superiors and students of the college were well, and that the institution continued in a prosperous state. I need not say how interested we and the other foreign missionaries should be for its welfare, since on its success will depend the question whether we are to have assistants or not from Ireland.

"When I last wrote to All Hallows, I was safely settled in St. Peter's College, Agra, as retired from the world and as happy as when I was at Drumcondra. Every exercise had its particular time. We rose at five; had mass at about a quarter past five; study and recreation alternately, till the evening came, when the students retired for the night about nine o'clock. Early in April last I was removed from the college to a station four miles from Agra, and I am still employed here. His lordship, Dr. Borghi, was obliged to take this step, partly through necessity, and partly from a wish to comply with the entreaty of this congregation, who, I may say, are entirely Irish. I am again about to leave them, and to return to my college, which I left with regret. As a short account of my first missionary duties may be of interest to you, I shall feel happy in giving you an idea of them.

"The congregation is composed chiefly of Irish soldiers and their families; there are some civilians, and about ten Catholic families of native Christians attend also, the entire amounting to 500 or thereabouts. The soldiers have the same warm feelings, the same respect and veneration for their clergy as at home, the same generosity in contributing to works of charity. We are building a new chapel at this station. It is now roofed and floored, and I am at present collecting for the plastering. These good fellows hand me in at the close of the month sometimes 100 rupees, never less; and during the last month the respectable sum of 300 rupees, or thirty pounds sterling was given for that purpose. I have known several to give more than half their monthly pay. The soldiers are, indeed, the hope of Catholicity in India. As I am speaking of my chapel I must not forget the choir. Many of its members belong to her Majesty's band, and understand music well. These teach the others, so that we have several masses for three voices. On Sundays we have high mass (without deacon or subdeacon), and on Sunday evenings vespers and benediction. We celebrated the devotions of the month of May, as in Ireland, and in addition to the English hymns in honour of the Holy Virgin, we had the "Omni die," and others which came from All Hallows. If during the last week of Lent you were thinking of the old singing-class, I was not without having my thoughts also upon them; for my choir practised the "Popule meus," and sang it on Good Friday at the adoration of the cross, as it is sung at Drumcondra. They have plenty of time to practice, and it is seldom we had such leisure.

"I need not tell you that I have plenty of business to occupy my time. I say mass every morning at six; a considerable number of persons assist at it. After mass I have to visit two hospitals. They contain at present about fifty persons, and as this year is considered very healthy, not more than one death occurs in the week. Thank God we have no cholera in Agra this year, and the fever here is not dangerous. Some cases of apoplexy occurred lately, and carried off its victims after a few hours. After I return from the hospitals (which are very convenient to the chapel), I have always some persons to instruct. There are very many coming to this chapel who do not know the first principles of faith. They are persons born, perhaps, in the country districts of England, but of Irish parents. Their parents were Catholics, they say, and that is all they know. Sometimes the poor Protestant comes with the rest on such occasions. I have had the happiness of instructing and receiving into the church six such persons, since I came to this station; this very morning I baptised one. It is the poor soldiers here, who have nothing to lose, who embrace the truth when they see it. The civil officers would not think of changing; and if individuals among them would, they should prepare to lose their situations and all the society they might formerly have enjoyed.

"* * * * I could mention several instances which prove that Protestantism is not so civilized here as at home; but as long as their dominion in the north of India is stayed by an army, the two-thirds of which are Irish Catholic soldiers, a Catholic priest need not care much for their misguided zeal or their bigotry. But I have strayed away from my subject.

"I was speaking of my own duties. From ten o'clock, A.M. to six in the evening we cannot, without the greatest danger, appear under the sun at this time of year; so we close all our doors and windows to exclude the heat and light; servants are employed throwing water on large mats placed in the doorways, and by these artificial means we are kept moderately cool. This summer is longer than usual, and hence more is endured from the heat. During the warm part of the day our time is spent in writing or study, and very often it is impossible to do either. Every evening it is edifying to see the soldiers coming to say their night prayers in the chapel. They assemble in the yard, and will talk outside the chapel doors, as the people do in the country parishes in Ireland, until the bell rings for prayer. After prayer a short instruction is given on every evening, unless on Fridays and Saturdays, which are reserved for confessions. About a fortnight since I had thirty-two prepared for confirmation. They were persons mostly from the west of Ireland, whose education had been neglected. They often puzzled me, as they spoke nothing but Irish, so I had to get a catechist who understood the language. On the day of the confirmation I enrolled fifty-one members in the arch-confraternity of the Immaculate Heart of Mary for the Conversion of Sinners. This number consisted principally of the recruits, who came this year to the country. They have still about them all the simplicity of the country people at home. They sometimes express their surprise at seeing a priest of their own so far away from their home. One poor fellow said to me—"I thought we were going where we would never see a priest again; but we are here just as at home with our priests." I see Father Rooney nearly every Sunday; sometimes he comes to me, spends the day here, and preaches for me at night, and I have often the happiness of seeing him at the college, which is but four miles from me. Thank God, I have not had one hour's illness since I came to Agra.

"The expense attending such a long journey will, I fear, prevent his lordship, Dr. Borghi, from sending you any student from his college. There is one of the logicians very anxious to go; however, the bishop has no spare money; the extensive orphanage swallows up all.

"I hope that in September you will be able to procure some students for this mission. I am frequently asked by some of the Irish when they are to expect more priests from Ireland. There is a great want of priests here, and some stations are without any clergyman. Nearly all are supported by government, since in most cases they are chaplains. Their salary is about 10*l.* a-month, so the fear of an incompetent support need not discourage any one. * * * Father Rooney and I read with much delight the account of the safe arrival of our class-fellows in their several missions. * * * I frequently receive letters from my former companions at All Hallows, Messrs. O'Doherty and Riordan of Madras, and Prendergast, of Calcutta. Desiring to be remembered to all the superiors of the college, and hoping that you will not fail to remember Mr. Rooney and me in your pious prayers, and to solicit for us the prayers of the community,

"I remain,

"Yours most affectionately in Christ,

"NICHOLAS BARRY.

Reminiscences of the Irish Mission.

THE FAVOURITE CHILD.

On one of those glorious days in autumn, when summer seems to pay a brief visit to the waning year, I was summoned to attend a sick call far away in the mountains. The road to the place was so bad and circuitous, that I thought it safer and more expeditious to walk than to attempt to ride to it. It was evening when I turned my steps homewards, and the few light clouds which floated in the blue sky, pursued the sun as he disappeared in glory, like—to compare small things with great—a troop of mendicants following the superb equipage of their king, and the bountiful riches which he flung back to them gilded a quarter of the heavens. At first the whole western sky was of so deep a scarlet, that it seemed on fire. After a little, as if the creative power were at work disentangling the universe from this mass of flame, blue lakes, with emerald isles and beautiful yellow strands, and lovely white mountains began to appear. These by degrees grew less and less, until there was nothing left but a few long lines of red and green, and finally even these disappeared. Thy career, thought I, is like that of a gifted spirit upon earth, its glories are never fully appreciated until it has been snatched from us, and then after dazzling the world for a brief space with its too lately discovered splendour, even this gradually fades away, and its last traces are lost in the light of some newer though less brilliant luminary. For a moment I looked almost spitefully upon the moon, which was covered with a thin cloud as with a veil, but when she flung it aside and showed her fair face in the clear blue sky, and called around her the bright stars which had been chased away by the jealous rival, from whom meddling philosophers say that she steals her charms, I was strongly tempted to revile him, and thus exemplify in my own person my late meditations. Nothing, indeed, could be more beautiful than the scene which I now looked upon. I was standing on the top of a ridge of mountains that swept along a beautiful glen, through which a river of bright water now murmured quickly, and anon roared and foamed over rock and precipice. The shores were thickly studded with large trees, whose green foliage was gilded with the rich tinge of autumn, and the white walls and blue smoke of a populous village gave life and animation to the scene. Far away beyond the headlands slept the mighty ocean, mimicking the heavens in its calm and unruffled bosom. A small fleet of fishing boats, amounting to twenty or thirty, appeared like spectres in their shrouds, moving silently and mysteriously over the water. My road did not lead me to the village, but over lofty headlands, from four to six hundred feet high, sometimes descending to the sea by a precipitous inclination, and at others rising perpendicularly from the water. The coast was frequently indented with small creeks, into which the moonlight only penetrated for a short distance at the top, so that the bottom appeared black and frightful as the habitation of demons, who hid their malice here from that sweet spirit of love and holiness which seemed silently to pervade all nature. In every other place it was almost bright as day; and never had the rough headlands on which I stood, nor the blue mountains that stretched far away before me, looked so fantastically beautiful as they did now, when bathed in the yellow moonlight, which appeared to me to be the true charity of external nature for it concealed all that was harsh and barren, lighted up all that was beautiful, and mellowed the whole landscape into a glorious scene of perfect harmony and indescribable loveliness.

I sat down upon a stone and began to think of the ingratitude of man, when he rebels against that Almighty God who has given him such a beautiful world, even for his earthly habitation. I reflected on the innumerable physical as well as moral sufferings which sin caused in the universe, how it perverted into instruments of vice even the most bountiful gifts of heaven, and ruined alike the happiness of individuals, of families, and of nations. So absorbed was I in my meditations, that I did not perceive a venerable man who approached me, until he laid his hand upon my shoulder. He appeared to be about sixty years of age, and in the enjoyment of robust health, although it was plain that he was labouring under some heavy affliction.

"You do not know me, father Ned," said the stranger, "although I have often seen you and heard you both celebrating mass and preaching. Perhaps you may have heard father John mention the name of James O'Halloran of Myrtle Grove." I replied that I had heard him frequently praise that good man for his charity and benevolence, and that I was exceedingly happy to know him, as I doubted not but that he was the person to whom I was speaking. He said that my conjecture was quite correct, and that he feared he was about to give me a great deal of trouble, but that he would explain the matter as we walked to father John's house. I felt already chilled by the night air, and was therefore glad to resume my walk. For a little time he remained silent, as if struggling with some deep emotion, and then having mastered it he said:

"The only priest in the parish in which I live has been, as perhaps you are aware, confined to his bed for the last three weeks, since which time we have had no pastor to attend to us, but one who comes from a considerable distance to say mass on Sundays. My second daughter, Mary Ann, has got a very severe attack of fever, and although this is Friday evening, I was afraid she might become delirious before Sunday, I therefore thought it necessary to get a priest to administer to her the consolations of religion. She was very desirous to see father John, who is an old friend of ours, and as his residence is not much farther off than that of the priest who officiates in our chapel on Sundays, I thought I would gratify her. But when I came to his house this evening, I was informed that he had gone to spend a few days in his native place, and that you were discharging the whole duty of the parish. I was told that if I took this path I would most probably meet you returning from a sick call, and so it has fortunately happened. I feel that it is very hard to ask you to undertake a journey of near twenty miles at so late an hour; but I know well that an Irish priest never repines at the labour which is undertaken to console a dying sinner and save an immortal soul."

We soon started on our journey, and proceeded so rapidly, that before we had advanced many miles, our horses were reeking. My companion was too much occupied with his own meditations to be inclined for conversation, and after several ineffectual efforts to interest him, I abandoned the attempt altogether. Indeed I was not sorry to be left to my own meditations, for I felt it a kind of profanation to break the spell of the deep silence in which all nature was hushed. A light frost which had set in rendered the night still more brilliant, every cloud had disappeared, and the full moon shone in the centre of the blue dome of heaven. The stars beamed brightly as "the eyes of heaven," and seemed like sentinels to guard the earth whilst its inhabitants slept. Sometimes we travelled through tall trees which cast their shadows across the road, on which, however, lay many bright patches of moonlight, which crept stealthily through the branches. At length, we were obliged to allow our horses breathing time, and then my companion broke silence, but he seemed to be expressing his thoughts aloud rather than addressing me. "She has ever been," said he, "our favourite child, the flower of our little flock, the very pulse of our hearts, and the light of our eyes; and if it was the will of God, I would rather He would take any of the others and spare her."

"You must submit," said I, "to God's holy will, which none can oppose. He knows what is best for you and for her, and perhaps He may take her now when she is young, in order to save her innocent heart from sin, and your grey hairs from sorrow."

At first he seemed offended by these observations, but after a brief pause he replied in his usual manner, "You do not know Mary Ann or you would not fear that she could ever stray from the path of duty and virtue."

Although I did not at all acquiesce in this observation, I felt too deeply for the affliction of a father's heart, when the life of a child in the early bloom of youth and beauty was at stake, to make any reply which might wound it, and as I could not agree with what he said, we rode on once more in silence. It was about three o'clock in the morning when we reached our destination, and I was shown into the drawing-room for a short time, in order that the patient might be prepared for my visit. Mr. O'Halloran went up to the sick girl's room to announce my arrival to his wife and daughter, who were watching there; and as all the rest of the family had gone to bed long ago, I was left for some time quite alone. I had thus leisure to look through the room, which was very handsomely furnished, and I soon perceived that everything of superior elegance and value bore the name of the sick girl. I first perceived it on a rose-wood writing-desk, inlaid with mother of pearl, then on several beautiful work tables of the same material. I looked at the pictures on the walls, and found that those in the richest frames were maps or large trees, with a bird upon the branches, and a little girl looking up at it, which had been worked upon canvass "by Mary Ann O'Halloran." On a round rose-wood table there were several splendidly bound books, on opening which I invariably discovered that they were presents from Mr. or Mrs. O'Halloran, to their beloved child, Mary Ann, on her birth day. I now perceived the full force of Mr. O'Halloran's observation, and that the stricken one was indeed "the favourite child."

I received no summons to the sick chamber for half an hour, and when at length Mr. O'Halloran came for me, his eyes were red as if he had been weeping.

"Poor Mary Ann," said he, "has been very ill all night; and she is terribly afraid of seeing a stranger. Indeed, she was at first quite unwilling to speak to you, but, thank God, she has at length consented. I hope you will be kind and gentle with her, for she has been reared as tenderly as a delicate flower."

I took the old man's hand, for I pitied him, and said, "do you not know that I am His minister, who has said, 'come to me all ye that labour and are heavy laden and I will refresh you;' and who has told us above all others, to learn of him 'that he is meek and humble of heart.' I would, indeed, be totally unworthy to be His minister 'who seeketh the lost sheep in the wilderness, and carries it back on his shoulders,' if I could exhibit anything but the greatest tenderness to a sick girl."

He made no answer; but pressing my hand led me to the sick chamber.

During the long course of my ministry I have not met with five cases in which I experienced the least difficulty in making a young person resigned to die. Hoary old sinners I have seen whose life had been protracted long beyond the ordinary term of human existence, whose every friend had been long since laid in the tomb, who were oppressed with multiplied infirmities, and who could not bear to be told of the approach of death. But the young, with bright hopes of long years of happiness before them, and surrounded by loving relations and friends, and all the sweet sympathies which can render life worth possessing, I have ever found willing to abandon the vanities of earth, and to turn their whole hearts to God and heaven. The present case, however, was one of the few exceptions. Mary Ann O'Halloran could not contemplate the approach of death but with the wildest horror. Her parents had prepared her to expect a friendly visit from Father John; and they hoped that he would be able to reconcile her to the will of God, and to induce her to prepare herself for death. But when she understood that it was not Father John, but his curate who had arrived, she instantly became alarmed, declared that they wanted to get rid of her, and peremptorily refused to see me at all. This unkind language made both her father and mother burst into tears, which, being an affectionate girl, with all her waywardness, she no sooner saw than she begged them to kiss and forgive her, and that she would see me and do all they desired.

I found her in this state of mind, and had at first considerable difficulty in inducing her to consent to receive the last sacraments. There is, however, a sublimity and an unction in the ceremonial of the Catholic Church which none can resist who come properly within its influence. Mary Anne O'Halloran's heart was melted by the genial and holy influence of religion, and before I pronounced over her the sacred words of absolution, sweet tears of sorrow and of love flowed from her eyes. She received the holy Eucharist and Extreme Unction with the most lively devotion; whilst her father and mother knelt by her bed-side, and thanked God by their prayers and grateful tears for the change which He had mercifully worked in her disposition. She was now so far from being afraid to see me, that she earnestly besought me not to go away for some time; and although I was anxious to return, as there was no other priest in the parish, I yielded so far to her earnest entreaties as to consent to remain and say mass for her in the morning.

I prayed and conversed with her a-while before my departure. The doctors had been with her, and had given her strong hopes of recovery which they did not themselves entertain. They thought, however, that she had a better chance, as in consequence of my visit she allowed her beautiful and luxurious hair to be shaved off, and her head to be blistered. This was, indeed, a great sacrifice for a lovely girl of eighteen, and I was grateful to her for it. But, at the same time, I thought it my duty to remove gently the false and cruel delusion that she was out of all danger. I had once seen a young mother dying of consumption—from whom, out of mistaken kindness, her relations and medical attendants concealed the knowledge of her situation, until a few hours before her death. I shall never forget her terrible exclamation when informed that she was dying: "Oh! God, why was I not told this sooner.—Bring hither my infant orphans." The children had been just sent away to a relation's house, to remain there until after the funeral. A messenger was despatched for them in haste, but death was swifter than the messenger, and almost the last words the poor mother uttered were, "Have I no friend left on earth who will bring my children to me, that they may kiss their poor mother before she is laid in the cold grave?" This terrible scene convinced me that it was not only irreligious, but cruel and unkind, to deprive the sick person of that knowledge which is necessary, in order to make him arrange his temporal and his eternal concerns, and which by preparing him for death deprives it of much of its bitterness.

When Mary Ann O'Halloran became aware of her true situation, she was still prepared to submit to the will of God, but she by no means enjoyed the same sweet peace and perfect resignation which rendered her happy even in her sufferings, before false and delusive hopes were raised within her. She did not refuse to die, but she clung to the most slender hopes of life. I was, however, satisfied with the Christian disposition of her mind. Just after I had given her my blessing and was about to leave her, she said,

"Have you ever seen any one recover who had been so ill as I am?" "I have, indeed, my dear child," I replied, "seen many recover who were much worse than you are."

"Thank God," she exclaimed, "and may Jesus and Mary, whose names are now music to my ears, honey to my lips, and joy to my heart, bless and protect you for telling me my true situation, and teaching me to be resigned to the will of our Father who is in Heaven. But, remember your promise," she added, "of coming again to see me, if I should be still alive."

"I will, undoubtedly," said I, "return on Tuesday next; or, if you should desire to see me sooner, I shall come at any hour of the day or night at which I may be sent for."

Before I left the house, I was taken into a private room by Mr. and Mrs. O'Halloran, in order that I might give them my opinion regarding the probability of their daughter's recovery. Although the doctors had not spoken so candidly to them as they had done to me, they told them that some very bad symptoms had shown themselves, and that the girl was very far from being out of danger. They hoped that I would speak more hopefully, but in this they were disappointed. I told them, candidly, that it would be most presumptuous of me to set my opinion above that of professional men, and that of whatever value my own little experience was, it led me to the very same conclusion at which they had arrived. I had strong hopes that their daughter would recover; but at the same time I would be only deceiving them if I did not add, that I considered her life in imminent danger.

"Oh! Lord," cried the father, frantically, "take all my other children, take all I have from me, but spare me my favourite daughter. Do not permit me to see the child of my heart laid in the cold grave."

I was greatly shocked by this outburst of feeling, which I told him, plainly, I considered neither religious nor Christian; and I appealed to Mrs. O'Halloran, who had burst into tears, to tell her husband that it was God who had given them this child, and that they should be ready to give her back to Him whenever He demanded her; that He knew, and always did that which was most conducive to the true happiness of those who loved Him.

"You may think me," she answered, "very wicked, but although I have two sons and two other daughters, I would rather lose them all than her. But James, dear," she continued, tenderly embracing her husband, "you know we must be resigned to the will of God; and although I would willingly give my own life for her's, still if the Almighty desires to take her to himself we must not refuse. His will be done on earth as it is in Heaven." After a little more conversation, I succeeded in calming the old man's excited sorrow, and then I took my departure. The numerous inquiries which I was obliged to answer as I rode along, convinced me that the sick girl was a general favourite, and that the father's excessive attachment to her was well known, for when I told those who asked for her, that she was still very ill, they almost uniformly observed, that "her death would break the old man's heart."

Mary Ann O'Halloran became delirious only a few hours after my departure; and to increase the affliction of the family, her youngest sister, Ellen, who had watched over her with the most constant and unremitting attention, was cast down by the fever against which she had struggled for the last few days. But the father's prayer seemed, at least, to have been partially heard, for the younger girl was taken and the favourite spared. The fever took a favourable turn at the very moment when death seemed certain, even to her medical attendants. She recovered so rapidly that, after the lapse of a few weeks, she was able to drive to the chapel where I officiated. She determined to give me a surprise, and she succeeded, for I was quite astonished when a young lady of great beauty and elegance addressed me with the familiarity of an old friend. I had some vague recollection of having seen her; but I thought it must have been a long time ago, and in some foreign country. She perceived my confusion, and enjoyed it greatly. At length, after searching every musty old corner of my memory, and not finding her in any of them, I observed, in a fit of desperation, "I remember perfectly that I met you somewhere, but, really, your name has quite escaped my memory."

"And where," said she, "may I ask, did we meet last?"

"Why, I—I know it was on the continent; but—" a fit of suppressed laughter, which brought the tears to her eyes, prevented me from finishing the sentence. Taking, therefore, new ground on which I considered myself safe, I observed, "it was so long since we met, and that she was such a mere child then, that I could not tell where it was." This seemed to complete her merriment, for she fairly burst into a fit of the most provoking laughter. When she recovered, she beckoned to some one who had been evidently concealed from me during the interview. She ran gaily to this person, who was no other than old Mr. O'Halloran, to whom she gave her hand, and requested that he would introduce her to Father Ned, who had very naturally forgotten her, as he had not seen her since they met many years ago on the continent of Europe. The old man was greatly amused by this sally of his daughter; who had become, since her recovery, a greater favourite than ever. They accompanied me home; and Father John was exceedingly glad to see Mary Ann after her recovery.

It was past two o'clock in the afternoon, a not unusual hour for an Irish priest to breakfast on Sundays and holidays, after he has laboured hard from six o'clock in the morning—we did not, of course, wait on each other at such an hour; but, on the present occasion, Father John had arrived only a few minutes before me, and we breakfasted together. Our fare, at this meal, was generally the same as that of the people amongst whom we ministered, consisting of stirabout, bread, and milk, or something equally simple; but on Sundays we managed to have coffee, for which we had both acquired a relish whilst on the continent. We were enjoying this delightful beverage when, a gentleman, whose profuse beard and sallow complexion proclaimed him to be a foreigner, bowed himself into the room. In a kind of polyglot language, which was neither French nor English but a mixture of both, he made a thousand apologies for having intruded during breakfast, but he had a considerable journey to make, he said, before night, and as the days were short he was afraid to delay. Father John assured him that no excuses were required, and that if he had any business with him, he would be most happy that he would transact it at once. The Frenchman started to his feet with the greatest agility, drew a paper from his pocket, and putting his hand to his heart, reached it to Father John. The gentleman was a dentist, and the paper consisted of testimonials from various persons, one of whom was the bishop of the diocese. Having politely read them all over, Father John observed, as he resumed his breakfast,

"These are very complimentary indeed; but I fear there is not the slightest chance of your getting any employment in this part of the country."

The Frenchman rushing forward, put his finger on the bishop's testimonial.

"I have read that already," said Father John, "and I am sure nothing could give me greater pleasure than to serve any one who brings his lordship's recommendation, but I really cannot force people to employ a dentist contrary to their own inclinations."

The dentiste was not, however, to be got rid of in such a summary way; so, every time Father John opened his mouth to eat, he looked steadily into it, until, being satisfied with the inspection, he exclaimed, "you teeth in very bad state, you want me yourself."

Miss Mary Ann tittered, and it was with great difficulty that I avoided joining her, for Father John never had a tooth ache in his life, and he would just as soon have thought of putting his head into the fire as of letting a dentist's hand into his mouth. He was, indeed indebted to his well-known horror of all such "unclerical fopperies," as he called them, for the present visit; for some of his younger brethren, learning that the dentist would be passing this way, advised him to call on Father John, who would be very likely to give him a job. The worthy priest suspected that a trick was being practised on him, but being blessed with an excellent temper, he replied—

"M. Le Dentiste, I am growing old, and, I think, the teeth which I have will serve my turn without any mending."

"I tell you, you wrong, M. L'Abbe, you teeth mosh dirt; you teeth rot if you do not get them cleaned. Look at them in one miroir, and you see them yourself."

The Frenchman delivered this with great volubility, and vehement gesticulations; and then walking close up to Father John, for the purpose of seeing better into his mouth, he added, "will you let me put my finger into you mouth to feel you teeth, and I prove to you they rotten."

"By all means," said Father John, who was not well pleased at being thus made a butt for us all to laugh at. The dentist was, however, thoroughly in earnest; and when the mouth opened again, in went his finger, and the teeth closed tightly upon it.

"Sacré," roared the Frenchman, "mon Dieu, let go my finger, you bite my finger."

Father John could make no answer, but he kept his hold, although the unfortunate dentist bellowed hideously. The old housekeeper and the little boy who took care of our horses, rushed in, and although they did not find any one murdered, as they expected, they were almost as much astonished by the spectacle before them. Father John was sitting, quite calmly, holding the fore-finger of the Frenchman's hand between his teeth. The latter was yelling with all his might, whilst Mr. O'Halloran, his daughter, and myself were in such an uncontrollable fit of laughter that we were totally incapable of interfering, even if we had been so inclined, which, undoubtedly, we were not. At length, Father John let go his hold, and the dentist immediately rushed out of the house. The little boy brought out his hat and cane to him, where he stood outside, caressing his injured member; which, however, to tell the truth, received no serious hurt, and about which he had made far more noise than the occasion required. Considering himself safe, after he had received his property, he ventured to come back to the door and shake his stick at Father John.

"Vous êtes un coquin, you one scoundrel," he vociferated.

"I hope," said Father John, "I have convinced you that my teeth are not rotten."

"Sacré," cried the Frenchman, rubbing his finger, "you are anthropophage (cannibal)—I tell you bishop—I know you bishop—I have you suspended."

"When you go to the bishop," said Father John, "will you be kind enough to deliver him this message: That if his lordship were to come to my house whilst I am at my breakfast, if he should employ himself in looking into my mouth and commenting on my teeth during the entire time, and if he should, at length, imprudently put his finger into my mouth, I would bite it off even if it were the one that the ring is on.—Boy, shut that door.”

Mr. O'Halloran and his daughter remained with us about an hour after the departure of the discomfited dentist; and I observed, with great pain, that the excellent natural dispositions of the girl were likely to be spoiled by the excessive fondness of her parents. I took the liberty, indeed, of hinting this to her father, and recommending him to send her to a convent school for some time. He said that her mother could not bear to part with Mary Ann; and when I attempted to urge the matter farther, he gave me pretty plainly to understand that my advice was not relished; and that the poor girl herself was the only one of the family who had any great regard for me. I, of course, therefore desisted; and what astonished me very much, and made me almost accuse myself of uncharitableness was, that when I mentioned the matter to Father John, after they had left us, he did not seem to fear any of the dangers which I apprehended. He could not, however, deny but that it was wrong to teach a young girl that whatever she desired she must obtain; to accustom her to eschew all contradiction, and to have her every wish gratified. But he trusted that the gentle nature and kind and affectionate heart of Mary Ann O'Halloran would save her from every danger.

For three years after this time I very seldom saw Mr. O'Halloran or his family. This was occasioned not merely by the distance at which they lived, but also because Mr. and Mrs. O'Halloran were afraid that I would endeavour to dissuade them from spoiling their favourite daughter. The elder sister and her brothers had been taught, by their parents, that she was a kind of divinity whom they must serve and almost worship—and they did not resent this partiality in the least, for they were all proud of her beauty and accomplishments. She insensibly came to look upon herself as she was looked upon by the rest of the family; she became peevish, selfish, and huffish at home, although she continued gay, cheerful, and goodnatured when she went abroad; and the whole family, but especially her sister, became her slaves, and served her with the most devoted and self-denying affection.

Thus much I had heard from Father John, for I had not seen any of the family for more than a year. He did not tell me what I soon after learned, that other and more discreditable things were whispered about Mary Ann O'Halloran. I paid little heed to those idle rumours, for I was determined to have nothing to say to the affairs of a family in which my advice appeared to be at once useless and disagreeable. This resolution, however, was soon broken; for Mr. O'Halloran came to Father John's house one night after I had gone to bed, and desired to see me instantly. I never saw any one so changed within so short a time. It was but little more than a year since I had last seen him, and he seemed to have grown twenty years older. He was tottering, emaciated, heart-broken. I saw at a glance that something dreadful must have happened. He caught me by both the hands, and the tears streamed down his cheeks. I was so deeply affected that I could not speak; and the old man wept on for some time in silence.”

“Oh! Father Ned,” he at length said, “if I had hearkened to your kind advice, you would not have witnessed these bitter tears. I know it is a just judgment, because I sinfully refused to give her to Him. Oh! how happy would I be if she had died then when she was so innocent, and before she had ever caused us a single pang. How sadly sweet it would be to think of her, and to pray to be united with her in heaven.”

He continued in this strain for some time, and I did not interrupt him. At length he became more calm; and I then learned from him the following particulars:

There lived within a few miles of Mr. O'Halloran's residence, a Protestant gentleman of great respectability, whose name was Brown; he was kind and considerate towards his tenantry, and all his children were good and amiable, with the exception of one young man, who was an immoral spendthrift. The two families were on very intimate terms, with the exception of William Brown, who was too great a puppy, and too much addicted to fashionable dissipation to enjoy the innocent domestic amusements which, alone, he could find in his own or Mr. O'Halloran's family. He was of course by profession a Protestant, by practise, of no religion whatever. He was one of those semi-demi-philosophers, who, like putrid carcasses, pollute the air of society at all times—who mistake infamy for glory, and irreligion for strong-mindedness. Master William was famous; for he had been frequently in the newspapers—the paragraphs regarding him were all of this character, “We understand from undoubted authority, that Mr. W—B—, of D—, beat two bailiffs, who went to arrest him for debt, in the town of L—, but that the limbs of the law being subsequently reinforced, he was at length overpowered by numbers, and put into C— gaol, where he is at present.” Or, “We understand that the far-famed pugilist, Mr. W—B—, is the person who beat the bailiff that came to arrest his friend Harry Strange, and that a warrant has been issued for his apprehension in consequence of this offence.” Not to speak of the fame which he had acquired by cock-fighting, he on two or three occasions appeared in such paragraphs as the following, which he declared to be the brightest feathers in his cap, and the crowning glory of his successful career. “Affair of honour.—We have just learned that the famous lady-killer, W—B—, having met the beautiful Miss H— at the ball on last Thursday, danced three sets with her, and that when Mr. L—, to whom she is engaged, came to ask her to become his partner, Mr. B— intimated to him his fixed determination to wring off his nose for daring to speak to a lady who was under his protection. The result was a challenge, but just as the parties had reached the ground they were arrested, and bound over to keep the peace.” He had moreover actually fought one duel, which made him be regarded as a hero by the more frivolous of the fair sex.

This young man had, at one period, paid an occasional visit to Mr. O'Halloran's family, but his character had latterly become so infamous that he was peremptorily forbidden to enter that house. Indeed his own father had refused to see him, and he was barely tolerated at home by the partiality of a fond mother. Mr. O'Halloran was told by a confidential servant, about two months before his visit to me, that he had seen Master William near the house on several occasions, at a late hour, speaking to one of the maid-servants. The delinquent was ordered to account for her conduct, but Miss Mary Ann interposed, declaring that she had sent the girl on a message on these occasions, and that she was engaged upon her business. Mr. O'Halloran suspected that this was only a pretext to save the girl, but he was afraid to grieve his "favourite child," so he told the girl that he would forgive her for that time, but that if he ever found out anything of the kind again she should at once leave his house: she was caught once more, but reprieved by his favourite daughter's tears. There appeared to him, however, to be something mysterious in the matter, so he determined to judge for himself, and he therefore charged the servant who had given him the information, to watch the place narrowly and to inform him secretly if he ever again saw Master William about the house. For more than six weeks Mr. O'Halloran heard nothing of the matter, and indeed had ceased to think of it. But at length the attention of the servant was attracted, as it had been on the former occasions when he had discovered Brown, by hearing a window lifted stealthily. He slept on the top of the house, and the window itself was completely concealed from him by trees which hung over it, but he saw the maid pass out, and return under the trees with the same man. He immediately awoke his master, who having dressed himself hastily, enquired through which window the girl had passed out; the servant hesitated, but Mr. O'Halloran commanded him to tell him at once.

"That is the reason, Sir," said the man, "why I did not mention before how the girl got out of the house, and also why I did not strive to follow her and see what she was about. There is the window," he continued, taking his master into his own garret and pointing out the place.

"Gracious heavens," cried Mr. O'Halloran, "that is the window of my favourite daughter's dressing-room."

There were two entrances into this room, one from Miss Mary Ann's bedchamber, and the other from the drawing-room. It had been a kind of boudoir until Miss Mary Ann began to recover from fever; being weak she found it inconvenient to go up stairs to her own bed-chamber, and she therefore exchanged with one of her brothers who slept on the ground floor. From some whim she preferred remaining below stairs, even after she had recovered her strength, and her mother's boudoir, with its books and elegant trifles—with its bay-window which looked out through an arch of evergreens upon a sweet lawn and a beautiful lake, was converted into her dressing-room. A door was broken into it from her bedchamber, and she kept the key of that which communicated with the drawing-room, so that no one could get into it without her permission. Mr. O'Halloran was doubly enraged at the maid servant for having gone out through this window, and thus run the risk of compromising the character of his darling daughter. He was convinced, moreover, that she must have procured master-keys for the drawing-room and dressing-room, for the latter was kept almost constantly locked by Miss Mary Ann, and Mrs. O'Halloran, herself, locked the former every night and put the key under her pillow, because part of her plate and a great many valuable articles were kept in it. All this flashed upon Mr. O'Halloran's mind in an instant, and so enraged him that he ran for his pistols, intending to shoot Brown as soon as he saw him. The servant however soon persuaded him to put the pistols in his pocket, and arming themselves with bludgeons, they crept stealthily down stairs, determined to give the intruder such a basting as should prevent him from ever daring to return. On trying the drawing-room door, however, it was found to be locked, and Mr. O'Halloran was obliged to go up stairs once more for the key, which he did as noiselessly as possible, leaving the servant to watch until his return; he was so agitated, that he made a slight noise in putting the key into the lock, a suppressed scream was uttered, evidently as a warning to some one, and as Mr. O'Halloran and his servant burst into the drawing room, a faint light, such as would issue from a partially-averted dark lantern, shone through the door of Miss Mary Ann's bed-room, which was in the very act of being closed at that moment. It was locked and bolted before they could reach it, and their united efforts were unable to burst it open. However unwilling Mr. O'Halloran was to alarm his "favourite daughter," who for some months past was in very delicate health, he was quite too much excited at present to be deterred from rushing to her door and demanding of her to open it instantly. But she did not answer for nearly a minute, although he called to her so frantically and beat the door so fiercely with the club in his hand that he almost broke it in, and alarmed the entire house. He still, however, had no suspicion of her, and when she opened the door, he told her not to be alarmed as he rushed past her. The door which led into the dressing-room being locked, obstructed his progress.

"Where is the key of this door?" he shouted in a peremptory manner.

"Oh! Pa," said she, "will you not tell me, your own Mary Ann, what has happened, for I'm sure you have frightened me to death; is it robbers, or fire, or what has happened?"

The old man was groping about the door for the key, but not finding it he rushed to the bed, and shaking her, for the first time in his life, cried out—

"Get me the key of this door, instantly."

Mary Ann began to sob bitterly, but her father was not to be deterred from his purpose, and, when lights were brought and the key could not be found, he, for the first time, suspected that his favourite child was concerned in the intrigue. As this knowledge flashed upon his mind, he staggered like a drunken man, and would have fallen if he had not leaned against the wall for support. His wife, whose tears flowed copiously, besought him to return to bed, and that he could calmly investigate the whole matter in the morning. He heeded her not, perhaps did not even hear her, but as soon as he recovered a little from the violence of the shock which he had received, he walked over to the bed where his daughter was sobbing, and said to her—

"You have this key; give it to me or I will wrest it from you."

"Oh! Pa," she cried, as bitter tears of real sorrow flowed down her cheeks, "how can you be so cruel to your own darling child? you will be sorry yet for this unkindness."

He made no answer, but seized her by the arms to see if she had the key in her hands; to his unspeakable astonishment, she was dressed precisely as she had been on the previous day, and he at once knew that she had not been in bed until after he had demanded admittance at her bedchamber. This was proof positive of her complicity in the intrigue, and she, finding that she could no longer conceal the matter, took the key out of her breast and gave it to her father.

The scene which we have just described, occupied no more than four or five minutes, but it afforded young Brown abundant time to make his escape. The maid servant, who had heard every word that passed, surrendered at discretion, for she was found in the dressing room, with the bay-window still open. She declared that whatever blame there might be in this matter it was entirely hers, and she hoped and prayed that none would be attached to her dear young lady, who had merely allowed her to pass through her room to see a young man, who was about to make her his wife, and that Miss Mary Ann sat up to let her through her room again, and to see that no harm befel her.

"What is the young man's name?" enquired Mr. O'Halloran, sarcastically.

"I wont tell," she replied, "you might prosecute him for breaking into your house at night."

"Oh! I know it myself—his name is Brown."

"Whoever says so," she answered boldly, "tells a falsehood."

Mr. O'Halloran called the man forward who had given him the information.

"Donnelly," said he, "did you not tell me you saw William Brown in company with this girl, at night, outside the window of this room?"

"Yes."

"You are sure it was he?"

"Perfectly."

"Now, hussy," said Mr. O'Halloran, "what have you to say for yourself?"

"That what he says is false."

"I will swear it is true," said the man.

"Donnelly," said the girl, "I know you hate me since I refused to marry you, but I assure you that you are quite wrong, if you suppose that my dear young mistress advised me against you. I don't care what you say about myself, but I beseech you not to revenge it on the sweet innocent for whom my heart is bleeding. And oh! Sir," she continued, turning to Mr. O'Halloran, "it will break her heart to be treated cruelly by you, whom she loved above all the world; do not believe this man, who is mad with jealousy. Does he not say that it was at night he saw the man, and from the top of the house, and how on earth could he be sure of who he was?"

"Donnelly," said Mr. O'Halloran, "did you propose to marry this girl?"

"Yes," said the man, "and I would marry her to-morrow."

"And yet you say she is a liar!"

"I know," said Donnelly, "that she loves Miss Mary Ann, and that if she has entrusted Susan with any secret, she would die rather than betray it. I admire her the more for this," the man added, "and God knows, if I did not think it was for the young lady's good, I would not have breathed this matter to you."

"But you have no doubt but that it was Brown you saw with her?"

"None whatever."

"Do you believe that this girl would do anything disgraceful, or be an accomplice in it?"

"As God is my judge," said the man, "I believe she would do neither the one nor the other."

"Now," said Mr. O'Halloran, "I desire you all to retire to your beds, and I will, myself, enquire into this matter in the morning."

So saying he returned into the disgraced favourite's bedchamber, where her mother and sisters were endeavouring to console her. The two brothers had gone out in search of the fugitive intruder, and had not yet come back: they came in after a little, and then he told the whole family to go to bed. Mrs. O'Halloran insisted that he too should retire to rest, which he promised to do, after he had spoken a few words alone to his daughter. When they were all gone, he knelt down by her bedside, and, covering his face with his hands and giving way to his feelings, wept passionately. This affected the girl more than all that had previously occurred—for with all her faults, she loved her father sincerely; she rose up in the bed, and clasping her arms round the old man's neck, and kissing his cheek, said to him—

"Speak one kind word to me, father, dear; say that you will forgive your poor unfortunate daughter, and, as God is my judge, I will conceal nothing from you."

"Oh! Mary Ann," said he, kissing her hand and washing it with his tears, "God alone knows how passionately, and I fear how sinfully, I loved you, and do love you still; and now, if you have one particle of gratitude or of affection in your heart, you will tell me the whole truth about this mysterious affair, and conceal nothing from me."

"I will do it," said she, "if it should cost me my life; first, to comply with your commands, and secondly, to exculpate that most true-hearted and faithful girl, Susan Gorman. Read this paper," she continued, drawing one from her breast, "and it will explain a great deal of the matter."

She buried her head under the bed-clothes whilst her father read it—it was a certificate of the marriage of William Brown and Mary Ann O'Halloran! the ceremony had been performed by the old parish priest, whom we have already mentioned as being in very delicate health. The paper fell from the old man's hand, and he remained rigid and motionless as if he had been changed into a stone. He felt a pang as if a sword had passed through his heart—his temples throbbed violently—a thousand bells rang in his ears, and if the blood had not burst from his nose, he would undoubtedly have got a fit of apoplexy. His daughter would have cried out for help, but he put his hand upon her lips; she, however, started out of bed, being still dressed in her ordinary wearing apparel, and sponged the old man's head and face with cold water, which very soon caused the blood to flow less copiously; and, after about a quarter of an hour, it ceased entirely. Not a word had been spoken until this time, but now when the girl had leisure to look around her, and saw the floor stained and a basin almost filled with her father's blood, she clasped her hands, and falling on her knees, exclaimed—

"Oh God! I have murdered my father. Oh! that I had died of the fever, and not lived to become the wretched outcast that I am. But father," she said, turning to the old man, "hear me only for a few minutes, and then I care not how soon I may die. I take the Almighty to witness, and I pray that he may strike me dead if it be not true, that I have never lived with this man as his wife, and that in that respect I am still pure in body and mind, as when I was born. We separated the very moment the ceremony was performed, as Susan and Mary, the porter's daughter, can prove; and since that time (it is now three months ago) I have never seen him but five times. These interviews were always solicited by Mr. Brown—in order that he might submit to me some plan by which you might be induced to give your consent to our marriage—and obtained by a threat, that if I did not consent he would at once divulge the whole matter; they never lasted above ten minutes—the same two maids were present—he never did more than put his head in through the window, and I always remained at a considerable distance from him in the room.”

The old man, who had listened to her with the most breathless attention, interrupted her here by observing—

“There was but one maid with you to night, and Donnelly never mentioned having seen any girl but Susan.”

“There were two maids with me,” she replied, “on this occasion as well as on every other. The second was Mary, the porter’s daughter, from the lodge. It was by her contrivance, assisted by her father, that the marriage and subsequent interviews were arranged. She always carried the letters which solicited these meetings, and if the reason alleged seemed to me sufficient to justify it (which was very seldom the case), Mary, leaving Brown at a distance, came to the window of my dressing-room, in which Susan and I remained reading or sewing. She was instantly admitted, and, after listening for a few moments to ascertain that no one had seen her or heard the window opening, Susan went out for Brown. The porter always accompanied his daughter on those occasions, and kept guard during the few minutes Brown was permitted to remain at the window. Mary never went back, but remained with Susan during the night.”

“But I cannot tell what tempted you, whose hand was sought by so many, to throw yourself away to a man who had nothing to recommend him but his infamy; or how the parish priest dared to perform the ceremony without the knowledge of any member of your family.”

“The first point I cannot explain—but the second I can and will. Whenever my marriage occurs to my mind, I at first start as if I were beset by some horrid delusion, but when I find that it is a sad reality, it seems to me that I must have been under the influence of witchcraft. But of this I am now certain, that I have been basely betrayed and practised upon by the porter and his daughter, who, as Mary herself has since acknowledged, were bribed by Brown to entrap me. They were continually praising him, whenever they got an opportunity, as the most gallant, brave, generous, noble young man, and withal as being passionately fond of me. They told me stories of the most beautiful and accomplished young ladies in the county, who they said were dying of their love for him. All this made no impression upon me, until you ordered him not to come to your house, and commanded your family to hold no intercourse with him. The porter’s daughter brought me letters after that time, breathing the most ardent affection, and representing that you treated him so harshly solely because you perceived his passion, and feared that in time it might be returned. Wearied by his importunities I consented to walk with the two girls to a part of the demesne where he could meet me without being observed. I told the girls that my only reason for granting him this interview was, to tell him to desist from his hopeless pursuit; and such was my real determination. I did tell him that my father would never consent to our union; and that, therefore, I never could become his wife. This excuse proved my ruin, for he represented to me that I was such a favourite that you could refuse me nothing; that it was a tyrannical thing for parents to controul the affections of their children, as if they had no heart to give away; and that although you might not consent to the match beforehand, yet if the ceremony were once performed you would be quite satisfied. I cannot tell what demon took possession of me, but, I think, I was mainly influenced by a determination to show my power over my parents, and to contradict their most reasonable wishes. At all events, I consented to become his wife on the next Tuesday. There was an express stipulation that this ceremony was to be regarded, for the present, merely as a betrothal, which, however, would render it impossible for either of us to retract, or to marry any other. Indeed, it was solely on this pretext that Brown urged me to become his wife so suddenly. He even pledged his word never to ask to see or speak to me except when it was absolutely necessary, until we should be able to make our marriage public.

“When Brown and Mary, and her father, the porter who had accompanied them to the place of meeting and had kept watch during the interview, left Susan and me alone, she instantly reproached me with my fickleness, and declared that she would not only not assist in the execution of the foolish and sinful design to which I had consented, but that if she could prevent it in no other way, she would reveal it to my father. I was, myself, tortured by misgivings and anxieties; I felt my heart oppressed with such a load of sorrow that I was unable to take my food, or even to leave my apartments, and you were all alarmed for my health. Mary, the porter’s daughter, brought me a long letter every day, during this interval, from young Brown, breathing the deepest and purest affection, and swearing in the most solemn manner that he would only look upon our marriage as a betrothal, and that he would leave it entirely to my own discretion to determine when he might claim me as his bride. Mary, herself, took care to follow up the impression made by these letters, by representing to me how romantic the whole affair would be—how like what was recommended to young ladies in the dear novels which I had sometimes given her to read—and how base and dishonourable it would be, to break at once my own plighted word, and the poor young man’s heart. I changed my own resolutions twenty times every day, and oftener every night—for, I may say, I never slept; but at length I came to the determination of breaking off my engagement. Still, with strange inconsistency, I was preparing for the interview and the marriage, of which I said to myself a hundred times that I had abandoned all idea. Thus, I had spent several hours in forging a letter to the parish-priest, in my mother’s name (for I can imitate her hand perfectly), and at that very time I persuaded myself that I had not the slightest intention of ever giving it to him. In the same way, as the time appointed for the interview drew near, I persuaded Susan to come with me to walk a short distance with Mary, and that we would return, and send her to young Brown, to tell him that I would never see him again, yet I took care to bring the forged letter with me (lest it might fall into any person’s hands whilst I was out), the purport of which was, that my mother entreated of the parish priest to marry me as privately as possible to William Brown, as it was absolutely necessary that the ceremony should be performed without any delay; but that Mr. O’Hal-loran must not know any thing of it at present. It was the very thing we had concocted at our former interview. Yet I deceived myself as much as I deceived Susan, even whilst, in spite of her remonstrances, I approached nearer and nearer the place appointed for the meeting. At length, she stopped, and declared that if I did not return she would go back without me. I yielded to her entreaties in spite of Mary's remonstrances, and had just turned my steps homewards, when young Brown, who had been watching us, sprang forward, and cast himself on his knees before me.

"The villain," cried the old man.

Without minding the interruption, she continued—"I therefore told him, myself, that I had changed my mind, and that this was the last time he should ever see me. Had I been permitted, I would, undoubtedly have returned; but their plans were too skilfully laid to be so easily defeated. The porter came running forward in great alarm, crying out, 'fly, for God's sake—here is Mr. O'Halloran.' I was hurried away between the two men, I knew not whither, and the two maids followed me. We soon came to a coach, which they persuaded me to enter with the two girls, saying, that if I did not do so, I must infallibly be discovered; and that they would simply drive us for a short distance, and then allow us to go home. I had been so flattered and obeyed during my whole life, that I could not imagine it possible that I should be taken away contrary to my own inclinations; but when I found that we were kept a long time in the carriage and that we were travelling as fast as four horses could gallop, I became greatly alarmed, and asked Susan if it was not time to stop.

"To stop!" cried the affectionate girl, bursting into tears, 'don't you know you are going to be married.'

"I ordered the girls to pull down the blinds, and to command the driver to stop the carriage instantly. They were fastened so as to defy our utmost efforts. I screamed, got into fits, and betrayed such genuine sorrow, that Mary thoroughly repented of her share in the transaction, and joined Susan in her tears, and endeavours to extricate me. But all was in vain, for the carriage rolled on at a tremendous pace; and our cries were unheard or unheeded. At last, after about an hour's hard travelling, it stopped in a lonely place, and Brown, descending from the top, let down one of the blinds.

"Sir," said I, "this is most infamous conduct; and I insist that you will let me out instantly."

"Pray, Madam," he replied, 'do you think William Brown could allow himself to be jilted by a little girl. As you declared that you would not allow yourself to be married except by a Roman Catholic priest, I have gone to the parish priest, promised to do all he required, and got myself received into your Church. This I did, I tell you, to prevent the good man from having any scruples about marrying me; for although I should profess the faith a year to be a legal Catholic, I am an actual one now, and he has promised to perform the ceremony on the strength of my conversion and your mother's letter, which he knows you are to bring with you. I have further promised you, that the moment the ceremony is over, I will allow you to return home again. I shall faithfully keep my promise, and, by G—, you shall keep yours; or, if you do not, declare now that you will marry me, I will this moment turn these girls out of the carriage, get in myself, and take you away without any ceremony at all being performed. And, I may as well warn you, not to manifest any reluctance in the priest's house, for there is no one there but a decrepid old man, and a doting housekeeper; and, by —, if we are not married, I shall take you away with me alone in spite of the devil. Give me that pretty note from your mother to the priest, because you might be tempted to tear it in a fit of passion (which would only injure yourself), and I will keep it safely and save you all scruples, by delivering it to him without your knowledge. Come, Madam, choose quickly, for you will be missed at home if you do not return soon.'

"I never hated anything in my life so much as I hated that man then, for I thought him an incarnate demon; but I feared him as much as I hated him, for I saw that he was determined to carry his threats into execution. Even Susan urged me to marry him. I had, in fact, no other alternative to escape being carried off and dishonoured. The good old priest recognized my mother's handwriting, and performed the ceremony without any suspicion of the imposition that was practised upon him. Brown simply shook hands with me, and saying, 'you are mine now,' ordered the coachman to drive back, at his utmost speed, the young lady and her maids to the place where he had taken them up. He did not accompany us himself, which was a great relief to me, as I was afraid he might take me to some strange place.

The Irish Catholics

AFTER THE DEATH OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

BY JAMES WHITE, VICAR APOSTOLIC OF WATERFORD AND LISMORE.

THE document which we present to our readers, describes an interesting episode in the history of the Catholics of Ireland. Elizabeth, in the commencement of her reign had abolished the mass and enforced by fines attendance at Protestant worship. But the Irish of all races refused to obey. Many of the native Irish took the field against her majesty; the Anglo-Irish of the towns and of the pale fought in her armies but would not worship at her altars; the churches in all the towns, and wherever the royal power extended, were by degrees handed over to the refuse of the English established church, who left many of them closed for want of worshippers, and converted others to mercantile or domestic uses. During the sixty years of Elizabeth's reign, those loyal Anglo-Irish Catholics heard mass as best they could, in garrets and other secret places, but would never listen to the invitations of the native Irish to strike for their liberty, and turn the old churches to their proper use. When too late—when the O'Neil and O'Donnell had sheathed the sword, the palesmen rose in the towns, and had mass said in the churches, but their insolence was speedily crushed, and "by a just judgment of God," exclaims the mere Irish O'Sullivan; for had they assisted the northern earls, the world would never have seen such an institution as that semi-military sinecure, Elizabeth's Irish established church.

Of James White, the author of the following narrative, little is known except what he tells us himself. Though he was Vicar-Apostolic of the important diocese of Waterford and Lismore, his name escaped the research of the learned author of the "Hibernia Dominicana," and of other diligent compilers of Irish Catholic history. His father's castle, it appears, was to the west of Clonmel; hence he was probably a relative of the Jesuit Stephen White (author of the "Apologia" against Giralduus Cambrensis), and of several other eminent ecclesiastics of the same name. No family gave so many able champions of Catholicity in those days as the Whites; and Peter White, last master of the endowed school, near St. Canice's Cathedral in the city of Kilkenny, had the happiness of sending out from that nursery, the Rothes, and Wadings, and Stanhursts, and other eminent Catholic scholars.

The manuscript from which we translate has been carefully copied, and the translation is literal.

"TO HIS HOLINESS POPE CLEMENT VIII.

"JAMES WHITE, AN IRISH PRIEST.

"MOST HOLY FATHER,

"Truly pestilent and infectious is that fever which now during many years has laid waste the northern kingdoms; 'flesh and blood' has given it birth, and accursed heresy has nursed and sustained it in its fury and ravages in those regions. Knowing that the mere thought of this subject is deeply interesting to your piety and paternal care, I have thought it my duty to communicate to your holiness officially the mercies which the Lord has lately vouchsafed to us in Ireland. The principal object of my very rapid journey thither is to lay before your holiness the most certain information on the state of the Irish Catholics. For who rejoices more or grieves more at the well-being or sufferings of the flock than its own true shepherd? Is not he who rejoices at the finding of the drachm and the sheep the same who mourned over the stray one that had departed from the flock?

"For the spiritual consolation of your holiness, I present to you this compendious and truthful narrative of the affairs of the Catholics from the death of Queen Elizabeth, late Queen of England. You, as the shepherd of the fold, will easily recognize the voice of your flock; cordially do the Irish Catholics acknowledge you as their father and shepherd; acknowledge your sons, acknowledge your sheep, O kind father, our shepherd. As the young fly to the parent hen when the vulture appears, so they place themselves now under the shadow of thy wings; they cast themselves at thy feet for protection, as the sheep rush to the shepherd from the rapacious wolf. Newfangled and strange terms in matters of faith they openly renounce, and, with the blessing of God, they are resolved to receive nothing which is not approved by the Holy Scriptures, the bishop of Rome, and the tradition of the church.

"In truth, nothing has happened in the north of Europe so disagreeable to the heretics or so acceptable to the Catholics as the conduct of the Catholics of Ireland: they have raised their heads, and have solemnly made a public profession in the saving and immaculate faith of the holy Roman Church, as your holiness will learn with certainty from this little narrative. Should your holiness convey to me any intimation of your pleasure and approbation of their conduct, we shall gain additional spirit and strength to do the same or greater things. I shall, with God's blessing, ever labour to teach the unjust thy ways, and the tracks of thy footsteps, that the impious may be converted to God. And now (to return to what I have strayed from—the glory of God) that strength may descend on me, I humbly bow to kiss your feet and beg your benediction, that by its might the word of Christ may spread without opposition, that, armed with the efficacy of Christ's power, I may expose myself to the vulture's swoop and the rush of the wolf, for the salvation of the flock entrusted to me by your holiness; that henceforward, as hitherto, I may fight courageously at their head, hungering and thirsting for the eternal salvation of that people as much as for my own salvation. May the Almighty and most bountiful God preserve your holiness in health for us and for the church, until Christ has once more been fully restored in the North.

"Your holiness's most obedient son and humble servant,

"JAMES WHITE, Vicar Apostolic.

CHAPTER I.

A BRIEF SUMMARY AND TRUE NARRATIVE OF THE AFFAIRS OF THE CATHOLICS, LAY AND CLERICAL, IN THE KINGDOM OF IRELAND, IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE DEATH OF ELIZABETH, LATE QUEEN OF ENGLAND. BY JAMES WHITE, AN IRISHMAN, DOCTOR OF THEOLOGY, AND VICAR-APOSTOLIC OF WATERFORD AND LISMORE, IN SAID KINGDOM.

THE great and intolerable sufferings of the kingdom of Ireland from the moment in which daring and bloodthirsty heresy lifted her brazen front in the North are so notorious both in the city and the world that it is needless to dwell on them. But as their profession of the Catholic faith was the sole cause of the sufferings of that people, I have thought it due to them to give a brief narration of their noble conduct after the death of Queen Elizabeth. Her death, though it took place in England on the 24th of March of the preceding year (1603), was not known in Ireland until the 9th day of April immediately following. The first announcement of this intelligence came like a thunderbolt on all men, and for a time left them mute and dumb with apprehension. But as silence could be of very little use in so critical a state of affairs, by degrees their feelings began to find vent and expression. The death of the queen compelled them to confess their own mortality and to think of their fate, and consequently to make diligent provision of all things necessary to obtain salvation in the other life, lest, if cut short by death, they should unhappily rush from the miseries of this world into the irreparable woes of a world that can never end.

Accordingly the Catholics, both lay and ecclesiastical, inspired by a common feeling of piety, came to the resolution that they should no longer dissemble the faith of their fathers and of their ancestors, nor shut it up in their hearts, but profess it openly and boldly in the face of man and make it known to the world. The resolve was quickly carried into effect; they came in a body to the house where I lived, and addressed me to the following effect:

"The unjust and flagitious title by which the churches of God and of our fathers have been so long held by Calvinist, Lutheran, and atheistical ministers, has been to us the subject of frequent and most painful reflections. Now as these churches and all places of prayer (oratories) are the property of Catholics by hereditary right, we hereby request that you will reconcile them all by the solemn rites of the Catholic Church, and deliver them over to us, that in them we may profess the faith of God and of our fathers, and discharge the other duties of piety and charity, whereby we may now at length move the mercy of God in our behalf, for long has his hand been heavy upon us. This duty of charity, a duty so agreeable to God, you cannot refuse to perform, for you need not be informed that it is your duty, and that you are in this place the vicar of the pope and of the apostolical see. We pray you, therefore, to accede without delay to this our most reasonable request: otherwise, we protest before God and his angels that we will send ambassadors to Rome to accuse you of being the sole cause why the exercise of the Catholic faith is not revived and established in this kingdom."

This remonstrance was supported both by the laity and clergy.

After the presentation of this address I held a council with my brother priests, and acceded most willingly to the pious prayer of the petitioners, cautioning them at the same time against tumult and disorder, strictly prohibiting any person to carry arms, or injure, or insult, or assail in any manner any of those who professed a different faith.

On the evening of the 11th of April (the feast of St. Leo, pope and confessor), I took peaceful possession of the church of St. Patrick, our apostle, and purified it by public and solemn rite. On the next day, to the inexpressible joy of the people, I celebrated high mass there, and endeavoured to do other things, which, by the grace of Christ, might imprint more deeply in their souls the principles of the Catholic faith: a public protestation was made in the pulpit that neither I nor any of my brother priests had any other object in our proceeding, save the glory of the eternal God and the everlasting salvation of the faithful.

After the close of divine service, this poor people, hungering and thirsting after justice, declared that what they had gotten was nothing, unless I purified in the same way the cathedral church of the Holy Trinity. I consented, and at two o'clock in the afternoon of the same day the cathedral was purified in presence, among others, of the noble Sir Nicholas Walsh, chief justice of the king's bench (banchi Regii judicis primarii) and privy councillor to the late queen.

Having performed the rite of lustration, we all entered the church of the Holy Trinity, and then discovered, alas, that the temple of God and of our fathers had been kept by the heretics not like a church, but like a pigstye, a receptacle of filth and impurities. But by the pious labours of the Catholics during the entire of that day the church was cleansed, and during the following night, new altars were erected in all the side chapels. So zealously did they ply their work of reparation that next morning every part of the temple was in the most beautiful order. The bells were rung; the mayor and magistrates, all the respectable families, men and women, and the whole population of the city, immediately answered the summons and walked in procession. So great was their joy that floods of tears streamed down their cheeks. Everything that could lend magnificence and external pomp to the most solemn ceremony of religion was lavished in profusion on this joyous occasion.

High mass was sung at the usual hour, accompanied by a sermon, and many other acts of religion calculated to excite the people to piety and penance, for it was the Wednesday in Passion Week. As the heretical ministers, and schismatics, and Atheists, and temporizers (politici) were present, we protested that in this public declaration of our faith, our principal object was to intimate to him, who was about to be proclaimed our king, that all of us never were, and never wished to be anything but sincere and assured children of the holy Roman Catholic Church. The lay Catholics resolved that there should be no secret as to their resolve in this respect. A document, declaring their sentiments, was drawn out and posted on the doors of the church; another sealed copy was transmitted to the lord deputy. That document contained nothing that could give just grounds of offence to the opposite party, as I will prove to demonstration in a larger treatise, which I am now composing on the subject.

On that same day, after dinner, James, son of the martyr Queen Mary, was proclaimed in the market place with the greatest solemnity. His accession was hailed with rapturous joy by all orders—a long life and happy reign was the general acclamation. Cannons were fired, bonfires lighted, money liberally distributed among the people, and the prisons in the palatinate liberties of the most illustrious the Earl of Ormond were thrown open, as a sign of exultation and joy. The mayor, magistrates and nobles, and the whole body of the citizens proceeded to the cathedral of the Blessed Trinity, and having taken their places according to their rank, the hymn of St. Ambrose, Te Deum Laudamus, was intoned and chanted by a choir as a thanksgiving. Complin followed, and the ceremony was closed by the Litany of Loretto of the Blessed Virgin Mary. These religious services performed, the people retired from the church to celebrate the festivities of so great a day. And no wonder, for of all festivals, this was the most anxiously desired: it was one of the greatest, and of the first class, on which all without exception, from the highest to the lowest, discharged a double office by professing the Catholic faith and receiving the most Holy Eucharist, that is, God and man, in the morning, in his holy temple, and by pledging in the evening their allegiance to their lawful king, his serene majesty King James.

O, truly memorable festival!—festival whose memory, I hope, will never be forgotten, but transmitted from age to age by an annual commemoration; festival on which the Author of all good, God himself, was seen by mortal eyes in the morning, and in the evening, that king for whom we had so long sighed was proclaimed; he, who as we hope will, with the blessing of Christ, grant to us what we have so long wanted, the reparation of our distracted and convulsed kingdom, and the full and complete re-establishment of the Catholic faith.

On the following day the intelligence of these extraordinary events had spread through the whole province; the people flocked in from all quarters to see this great sight; so great was the multitude that the city could scarcely contain them. But their exultation! O, none but he who gave it can conceive. Messengers and deputations speedily arrived from various cities and towns, begging me to go and reconcile their desecrated churches, for there were very few in the kingdom at that time invested with faculties to purify a church. I consented with all my heart by purifying personally with my own hands as many churches as I could visit, and by granting faculties to several of my clerical brethren to perform the same duty, wherever it was necessary, in several parts of the kingdom.

I myself reconciled the following churches: The beautiful church of St. Patrick, and the cathedral of the Holy Trinity, in the city of Waterford; the churches of Clonmel, in the diocese of Lismore; St. Mary's Church, in the city of Kilkenny, and by the ministry of another, St. Patrick's, in the same place; the monastery of St. Dominic, in the diocese of Ossory; St. Mary's Church, Ross, in the diocese of Ferns. All the churches of Wexford, in the diocese of Ferns, were reconciled by the Rev. John Coppinger; the Church of Thomastown, in the diocese of Ossory, and the churches of Carrick-on-Suir by the Rev. Thomas Woodlock; St. Mary's, of Dunkit, in the diocese of Ossory, by the Rev. William Nangle and Peter Strange. The Rev. Thomas Rachtur (sic) reconciled the metropolitan church of St. Patrick, in Cashel, and the grand church of the Holy Trinity, at Fethard, in the same diocese. The Rev. Robt. Miagh reconciled the cathedrals of Cork and Cloyne; and the Rev. Richard Arthur the cathedral and all the churches of the city of Limerick. Throughout the entire kingdom many parochial churches and Franciscan convents were also reconciled at the same time, but for brevity sake I omit to mention them here.

All these churches both in the country and cities, and most remarkable towns, were reconciled with the approbation, and at the request, of all the inhabitants of the respective localities. The service of the church was solemnly and publicly performed in them every day, to the inexpressible consolation and joy of the people. The spiritual fruit of these exercises was abundant, many men and women of dissolute morals were brought back to a better life; some schismatics and Catholics of scandalous morals were restored to the Church and to a life of penance; tepid and careless Catholics were inflamed with fire from above, and a love of virtue; dissolute priests separated from their sinful accomplices and renounced their disorders; even the heretical ministers began to observe more propriety of conduct; robbery and theft were stopped, and nothing was heard on the lips of all but thanksgiving both in word and work, charity unfeigned, and a showing of good works.

But in the midst of those proceedings, so conducive to the glory of the eternal God, the consolation of the Catholics and the conversion of the heretics, some false brethren, and especially Sir Richard Ailleward, baronet, who was only a Catholic in name (equivocé), invented certain stories which no sincere Catholic had ever dreamed of, and communicated them by letter to some members of the privy council. When his excellency, our lord deputy, lord Charles Mountjoy, now earl of Devon, heard this report, he instantly despatched couriers to all the above-mentioned places, cities and towns, with letters, all breathing the same spirit of stern remonstrance and terrible threat, ordering all the churches to be closed, the rites of religion to be suspended, priests to be not only prohibited from performing their religious functions, but arrested and detained in custody on a charge of high treason.

On receipt of those letters, the magistrates and governors (præfecti) of the different localities answered that the Catholic clergy had done nothing contrary to their duty; that, on the contrary, both in their sermons and religious instructions their constant theme was to retain the old faith of their fathers to God, and sincere, unalterable allegiance to their natural sovereign, his majesty King James; that not one act had been committed by any of them which could justify a suspicion of their allegiance, that it was their duty not to do otherwise, and that should any person be guilty he should be speedily punished. But as to suppression of Catholic worship, the arrest and imprisonment of the priests, they, the magistrates, could not attempt it consistently with their own conscience and faith, because they professed the same faith as the priests; and they urged their petition with greater confidence, because they had undoubted evidence that the priests were most loyal to the king and offered up daily prayer and supplications to heaven for his majesty.

But, notwithstanding these legitimate and well-grounded representations and petitions, the lord deputy having called a council in Dublin, placed himself at the head of a great army and resolved to raze the city of Waterford to the ground, and to put all its inhabitants to the sword.

At the head of this immense army, which was composed of troops draughted from the different garrisons, he set out on his march from Dublin to Waterford during the Easter days, and arrived in sight of that city about three o'clock in the afternoon of the 1st of May, which fell that year on Low Sunday. When the citizens beheld his army, they humbly recommended their case to the great and merciful God, the comforter and help of the afflicted. Accordingly at eight o'clock that evening, solemn supplications were offered up, the blessed sacrament was carried in procession through the streets, the market-place, and all the public parts of the city; the poor people inflamed with devotion declared, with stern intrepidity, that now they were satisfied, as they had seen once at least before their death, their heavenly king, Christ our Lord, borne in procession. The sacrament, which the whole people thus acknowledged as the author of their faith and their life, was followed with singular devotion and veneration, nor in that immense throng could anything be seen in the eyes, the countenance, or the heart, but a spirit of recollection, ardent sighs, and profuse and copious tears.

But when the round (circulus) had been completed, and we entered the cathedral of the Blessed Trinity from which we had set out, and had replaced the blessed sacrament on the high altar, there was a general cry from the people, all protested that they were resolved to live and die in the faith of the holy eucharist. Hearing this solemn declaration, I promised them, on the part of God and of the apostolic see, that if they persevered in that faith and died in it, they certainly would (if there was no other obstacle) obtain eternal salvation. The confidence which this promise inspired them with, could hardly be credited except by those who witnessed it.

A solemn high mass was then celebrated, the enemies of our faith and creed in the mean time crossing over the Suir from the manor, commonly called Grenagh, to the castle on the opposite bank, called Grace Dieu. Immediately after the offertory a sermon was delivered, in which the Catholics were exhorted not to lose courage; and that if they wished to have the protection of the Pastor of princes in heaven, they were bound now if ever to acknowledge their true pastor on earth, whom the wicked arts of heresy had during so many years endeavoured to render odious or suspected to the inhabitants of Ireland.

CHAPTER II.

A PROFESSION OF FAITH—THE PRIMACY OF SAINT PETER--THE BLOCKADE OF THE CITY--TWO PRIESTS, BEARING THE CRUCIFIX, GO OUT TO THE CAMP OF THE HERETICS—VICTORY AND TRIUMPH OF THE CRUCIFIED.

IN compliance with my exhortation, all the magistrates without exception, all men of family, and all who had come to man's estate, made a solemn and public profession that the holy Roman pontiff, the successor of St. Peter, prince of the apostles, was the one, only, true, visible, and undisputable head of the whole church of Christ on earth; they added moreover, that to no other mortal man, either lay or even clerical, however he might be called apostolical, could this dignity and authority of headship belong, unless he succeeded directly to St. Peter, prince and president of the apostolic senate, and derived from him all jurisdiction and spiritual authority. Not content with this confession of the primacy of the Roman pontiff, they protested that they resolved to live and die in the saving faith of the holy Roman Church. To the head of that church, the true vicar of Christ our Lord on earth, they promised full obedience and entire submission in all spiritual things; but to his majesty, King James, they promised due and perfect submission in temporal things, and in all other points in which Catholic subjects are bound to obey their temporal and natural sovereign. This solemn oath they confirmed by kissing the crucifix which I presented to each of them before the high altar, and during the celebration of mass. The women and boys earnestly begged to be allowed to take the oath, but I was obliged to refuse their request, so great was the multitude of grown men who pressed forward to take it.

Having made this solemn and striking declaration of their Christian and Catholic faith, the faithful people of Waterford, strong in their own honesty, resolved to admit the lord deputy into the city, but they deputed three ambassadors, Paul Sherlock, Paul Strange, and Nicholas Wyse, to request the lord deputy not to bring in more troops than the citizens could feed and lodge with convenience. Their petition was instantly rejected, the lord deputy declaring that he would make no conditions, but at once take possession of the city.

On the following morning, the second of May, the camp was pitched near the city; the soldiers received a promise that they should be allowed to plunder all the inhabitants and put them to the sword without distinction of age or sex. Accordingly the citizens, who had great apprehensions of the treachery and evil dispositions of the heretical soldiers, kept watch all the night, lest some part of the city might be carried by a surprise. In the evening they had sent out their ambassadors a second time, begging the lord deputy to have their case submitted to a legal investigation, and, in the mean time, not to suppose that they were other than loyal subjects of his majesty the king of England.

While these negotiations were passing between the camp and the city, a wish was expressed both by the soldiers and citizens, and (as I hear) by members of the privy council also, that I should go out in person from the city to the camp, and plead the common cause before the lord deputy. Having received his assurance of protection from personal injury, and being encouraged by the unanimous approbation both of clergy and people, I went forth to the camp, accompanied by my kinsman, Father Thomas Lombard, of the order of St. Bernard, and nephew of our Most Rev. Primate, the archbishop of Armagh.

Though I had intended originally to suppress the following particulars—the truth requiring that my own name should be frequently introduced (from which some critics may take occasion to censure and revile me)—yet it appears more useful to proceed, in order to complete the history and not to have my narrative mutilated, especially as what I have to say concerns the glory of God and the good of his church, I cannot, I ought not be silent.

Having received the lord deputy's word for my own and my companion's security, through Richard Power, baron of Curraghmore, sheriff of the county and city of Waterford, George Sherlock, and Nicholas Modan, I proceeded from the mansion house (domus civica) to the cathedral of the Holy Trinity, and taking down the crucifix from the high altar, carried it in my hands through the city, and thence proceeded to the camp, accompanied by Father Lombard and the above-mentioned distinguished individuals. My companion wore the religious dress of his order, his tonsure was also such as they wear; I was dressed in a long soutan, my square cap on my head, and a stole hanging over my shoulders.

As soon as we arrived in the camp, the heretical and ill-mannered soldiers burst into fits of immoderate laughter when they beheld our unusual and unpretending dress, and our shaven crowns, as if no man could be a Christian who had not his hair frizzled and oiled like a woman's.

Some of the highest rank in the army, especially Richard Wingfield, an English heretic, flew into a rage and were scandalized, they said, because I had dared to carry an idol (so they called the crucifix) into a Christian camp, as if they were not Christians (and truly they were so in name only.) So ungovernable was the said Wingfield's choler, that he certainly would have driven his sword up to the hilt in my body, had he not been prevented by some kindhearted and noble men, who seized his hand and restrained his rage. But when he could not despatch me as he intended, he poured out a volley of abuse, calumny, and curses, denouncing me as a turbulent and seditious disturber of the public peace, a seducer of loyal subjects, and a capital enemy of the Gospel. There was no remedy at the moment but to listen in peace and subdue by patience a man who had lost all controul of his temper.

But when this storm had blown over, I and my companion were placed in the middle of the whole heretical army, where we were exposed to all sorts of ribaldry and insult. The lord deputy and his privy council, in the mean time, had decided that I was guilty of high treason; that a proclamation to that effect should be published in my own hearing and before the whole army, and that after being thus placed under ban, I should be reconducted safe and sound to the city; this proclamation was actually drawn up in that council held in the camp, and was signed by the lord deputy and all the members of the privy council then present.

The deliberations of the lord deputy and of his council being over, the groom of his excellency's bed-chamber summoned us to an audience. We went forward with joy, for the Lord who giveth help to the weak had imparted to us confidence and strength.

Colonels, lieutenants, and a large throng of minor officers, and common soldiers followed us to the lord deputy's tent.

Having presented ourselves before his excellency, and paid to him all the customary honours in due form, he instantly asked me, "what are you?" I answered that I was a Christian, a firm Catholic, a servant and most loyal subject of his majesty King James. He interrogated me closely, not only on the meaning but even the etymology of that answer; but after having explained myself to the best of my power, I perceived that his passion was rising, and he called me "traitor." This calumnious epithet was so offensive to me, that I could not refrain from addressing him in the following words.

[To be concluded in our next.]

THE CROSS

Of the Legion of Honour.

THE Count de Cerney, accompanied by his wife, left France for England in the year 1793. Although they were both very young yet they had more prudence than many of the nobility who, like themselves, had quitted their native country at that epoch. At the first appearance of the troubled state of affairs in '89 they had invested the greater portion of their fortune in England, that they might be enabled to live in comfort equal to what they enjoyed in Paris. The Count lived in London, and formed an intimacy with Sir John Melville, a young gentleman a few years older than himself, and who was a lieutenant in the British service. The acquaintance of the Englishman with the Frenchman was not slow in ripening into friendship, and in the year 1814, when the Count quitted London, in order to return to France and demand from Louis the Eighteenth the reward due to his exile and his fidelity, the greatest trial he felt was in parting with his true and faithful friend.

The Count returned to France with a daughter fourteen years of age; he presented himself at court, and his fortune, already considerable, was increased by the appointment he received from the king.

It was at this period that Sir John Melville, a major in the British service, sent his son Edward to France, and wrote a letter by him to his friend the Count de Cerney, telling him that his son was going to France to look out for a wife.

Edward Melville had counted twenty summers and was a most interesting youth. The rose and the lily appeared to struggle for supremacy in his fair and fresh countenance, which had all the grace and delicacy of female beauty joined to a noble and manly bearing. His father, who was rich and respected, considered that he would be an excellent match for the count's daughter. The count and countess were most agreeably disposed in this particular. It was a most admirable thought, which would bind closer the friendship of the two families, and the young lady still preserved a most favourable recollection of her young playfellow and companion Edward. They directly called their daughter to announce to her the agreeable tidings.

"Ada," said the countess, "I have good news to tell you, your old companion, Edward, is about paying us a visit."

"Indeed! mamma," replied Ada, who having been brought up in England, retained a little of the habitual reserve of the English ladies.

The young lady made not a movement, nor raised up her eyes, and the mother herself could not guess whether the new arrival produced sensations of joy or sorrow.

"And the little Edward," continued the mother, "is now a fine young man, with whom you can no longer play as you did with the little boy, and he is coming to Paris to look for a wife."

"Indeed!" again replied Ada, and a slight colour suffused her cheeks.

The countess did not exactly say that she was to prepare for the reception of a husband, but she intimated as much by asking her if the piano was in perfect tune, and if she had the newest songs, and if her dress required remodelling in any way. The count added that Sir John Melville was his oldest and best friend, and that he could not think of allowing his son to go to a hotel, but that he should remain with them, and that he would himself present him at the Tuilleries. Ada retired to her own room persuaded that in a short time she would be the wife of her old and accomplished playfellow.

Edward was not long in making his appearance, and although he was but a brusque Englishman Ada did not fail to find him as amiable and as polished as the most fascinating of the young Frenchmen of the day. The count and countess thought otherwise of Edward. He appeared to them to have given a dangerous licence to his ideas. When they spoke to him of presenting him at the palace, he showed but little enthusiasm for the honour; on the contrary, he sought not to hide his intense admiration for the captive of Saint Helena. Edward spoke of the vanquished Caesar in the fervent and enthusiastic language in which Lord Byron would have indulged—the only difference being that one lauded the great man in prose, the other in poetry.

There was in Paris, in the Faubourg St. Antoine, a little mercer's shop, the struggling proprietor of which was called Mrs. Mathew. She was a widow, and the widow of a military man, and was scarcely forty years of age, and still beautiful and blooming, although a dangerous rival stood beside her in the person of a girl of sixteen, radiant with all the brilliancy of youth, and of a beauty so bewitching that it ought to have been sufficient to have sold all that was in the shop, if, in this poor quarter, admiration could have been as prodigal as it was generally bestowed. It was said that Mrs. Mathew had been often wooed herself, but had always refused, although many of the offers were very advantageous, and that she watched over her child with an assiduity so untiring that it was quite impossible for a word or even a look to be directed towards her without it being observed. Gentlemen perceiving the reserve of the mother, and the impossibility of forming any intimacy or even acquaintance with the daughter, deserted the shop, and the ladies withdrew from sheer jealousy, lest their proximity to so lovely a creature as Julia would deteriorate from their own charms, so that the venders were without purchasers. The neighbours spread reports the most strange and mysterious concerning these two isolated and friendless women. One hinted that the mother, having made an unfortunate match, had been abandoned by her family; others, that she had been placed there by the prefect of police in order to watch the doings of her neighbours.

It was before this shop that Edward Melville, a few days after his arrival in Paris, stopped his cabriolet. He entered, and bowing to the mother and daughter, asked if he could have some trifling alteration made to his whip. Mrs. Mathews was not deceived by this young Englishman, and guessed that his object in coming in was because he had seen Julia from the outside, and, wishing to see her nearer, he thought of having his whip repaired as an excuse for entering. The vigilant mother cast upon the stranger a look of cold defiance, and advanced towards him herself in order to reply to his interrogatories.

"Will you allow me to ask, young lady," said Edward to Julia, "if it is far from here to Vincennes?"

The young girl, upon seeing the polished and respectful manner of the young gallant, who spoke French with as much apparent fluency as she did herself, became covered with blushes, and arose for the purpose of pointing out to him the required information, when her mother stopped her by saying, "Go up stairs, Julia, you have occupations there awaiting you." Then turning to Edward with a serious sadness, which never forsook her, she said, "you pass the barrier, which is but a short distance from this, and the road to Vincennes is straight before you, your horse will take you there in ten minutes."

"What a lovely creature," said Edward, following with his eyes the disappearance of the young girl. "Your daughter's name is Julia?" he added, turning to the mother.

"Here is the whip you have asked for," said Mrs. Mathew, without replying to his questions.

Edward bowed, and asked the price of the alteration she had made.

"The half of a sous, sir," she replied, "a demisous."

Edward paid it, and seeing the difficulty there was of drawing her into conversation, he bowed, quitted the shop, and remounted his cabriolet, saying to himself, "The girl is very beautiful, but it is evident the mother does not like the English."

On leaving, he forgot two things, first to take the thong which he had just purchased in the shop, and secondly, to take the indicated road to Vincennes."

"I cannot be deceived," thought Mrs. Mathew when he had left.

An instant after Julia descended softly, and opening the door with caution, she smilingly enquired "Is he gone?"

"Yes, my dear child."

"What a splendid looking man, mamma!"

"Yes," replied the mother with severity, "but he is English."

This word spoke volumes, and replied to all she would have said, and the young girl, confused, again ascended to the upper apartment to engage herself in her accustomed domestic duties.

There existed at this period in France, a profound hatred for England and everything English; this feeling was strongly shared by all Europe. The defeat at Waterloo served but to augment the antipathy of the two nations. Mrs. Mathew partook in no small degree of the general sentiment, and used even more than ordinary caution in avoiding contact with the English. She was consequently grieved at the exclamation of her daughter's admiration of the Englishman, and did not again revert to his visit.

A week had just rolled by, when a second Englishman entered the shop. This time it was a man of middle age, with a face manly and vigorous yet of a remarkable sweetness of expression; he came on foot, and without condescending to notice the young lady he addressed himself to the mother.

"Is it Mrs. Mathew," said he, "that I have the honour of addressing?"

"Yes, sir," replied the lady.

"The widow of Captain Mathew of the Imperial Guard, who died at Waterloo?"

"The same, Sir."

"I am Major Melville," he continued, bowing, "I have come from London expressly to see you, in order to conclude an affair that interests both one and the other of us. And is this," said he, presenting his hand to Julia, "the daughter of the brave captain?"

Julia, in whom the figure and manner of the stranger had inspired complete confidence, because he had spoken so warmly of her father, placed her little hand in that of the major, who said to her in the most kindly and affectionate tone possible—

"Now, my dear child, you must leave me alone with your mother, I have somethings to say to her, which concern yourself, but yet it is not meet that you should know them until she has first been made acquainted with their import.

Mrs. Mathew, leaving her daughter in the shop, conducted the Major up stairs. The Englishman entered a small and gloomy chamber, solely decorated with cleanliness, the luxury of the poor; upon the mantel-shelf, which was unadorned with glass or ornament, stood a portrait, which he at once recognized to be that of Captain Mathew, and at the foot of the portrait was a cross of the Legion of Honour, the star of which wanted one of its brilliants. Mrs. Mathew requested the Major to be seated, and then looked at him without speaking, expecting that he would explain the purport of his visit. He remained silent for some time, then, placing his hand upon his heart, he said "Long live the Emperor."

"Ah! yes," cried the poor widow with tears in her eyes, "may God preserve him."

"Doubtless he will," said the Major, "for God alone can preserve him in his present extremity: So far we both understand each other, and now listen to me, I have already told you that my name is Melville, I have a fine house in London and a handsome estate in Sussex, with fifty thousand pounds sterling in the East India Company, and I have come to Paris expressly to marry you."

Mrs. Mathew had been seated near the Major, upon hearing this she arose and retreated a little. This man had exclaimed "long live the Emperor," and yet he was an Englishman. The widow replied not, and her beautiful eyes, which were filled with tears, were turned towards the portrait of her husband.

"This is not all," continued the major coolly, "I have a son, a splendid young man, you have seen him, Mrs. Mathew, for he called here eight or ten days back to get something done to his whip. I sent him to Paris in order to woo and win the daughter of my old friend Captain Mathew."

Mrs. Mathew thought the major was either mad or playing upon her some rude joke, but as he had a serious and apparently candid air, she replied to him with a reserved manner and downcast eyes, "that it was quite impossible for her to accept the double honour which he was kind enough to offer."

"You refuse—you really refuse," cried the major, "but retract these words, madam, for I shall remain here until I obtain your consent."

"But, sir," said the lady.

"I only ask you to listen to me," continued the major, grasping the hand of the widow, "listen to me, I wish to speak of your husband. I had the honour of being at Waterloo—be calm, for I do not intend to harrow your feelings by the recital of the details of that battle—I must, however, glance at its most afflicting result. The French were beaten, those who were not either killed or wounded fled, when at the extremity of the field of battle I saw, from a height where I was placed with my regiment, about a score of the young guard of grenadiers who were still fighting, or rather who were selling their lives at the highest possible price, surrounded as they were by four or five hundred Prussians. I ran to the French to draw them away, for if war has attractions for the courageous, it is only when the chances are equal, or nearly so, and not when the conqueror abuses his victory by the massacre of his fellow creatures. When I reached the French, I ordered my men to cease firing, and I rushed forward to protect the retreat of these brave men, when a gun-shot a few paces from me struck their captain, who fell into my arms, the ball having entered his chest. This was Captain Mathew, your husband. I ordered him to be carried into one of our tents, where I procured for him the immediate attendance of an experienced surgeon, my own particular friend. I fondly hoped that he would be able to save the brave man's life, but your husband encouraged not this hope. 'Major,' said he to me, 'tell me your name.' Having told him, we were left alone, for the surgeon was called upon to attend to the other wounded men, and on going he gave me a sign of how hopeless the case was. Your husband then said, 'I die unhappily, because I do not die whole and entire, I have a wife and child—'"

"Captain," I replied, "I shall take charge of them, I am rich, and they shall share my wealth."

"You are not an Englishman, are you?" questioned your husband."

"Yes, my friend, I am," I replied, "and one of the most candid Englishmen in old England. Calm your mind, for I again tell you that I shall take charge of your wife and child. I took his hand and pressed it within mine. Then the victim of Waterloo—the brave son of France—the faithful follower of the great Napoleon, opened his blood-stained vest and drew forth from his chest an article all covered with his heart's purest blood and which the ball had stricken in its course—this was his cross of the Legion of Honour, which now stands there, for I had it placed in your hands with as little delay as possible."

The major stopped for a moment, and rising, detached the cross which was hanging at the foot of the portrait. He approached the widow and pointed out to her the marks of blood.

"Brother Melville," said the dying man, 'take this cross, I place it in your hands; although our respective countries are at war, we are not enemies. What will you do for my widow?—what will you do for my daughter?'"

"The half of my fortune," I cried, "shall be from this moment at their disposal."

"No, no," said the captain, "that is too much."

"Then they shall have the whole of my fortune," I cried.

"No, no," said the dying man.

"Well then, I shall do everything that friendship and humanity shall dictate."

"He stretched forth his hand and, endeavouring to grasp mine, expired."

During this recital the widow was bathed in tears, she pressed the bleeding relic again and again to her lips.

"This cross," continued the major with emotion, "is the pledge of my word. My regiment, instead of being ordered to France was sent back to England. I therefore could not come directly to see you, but I made enquiries and learned who you were and how you lived. At the moment when I sought for the means of being faithful to my vow, and of fulfilling the promises made to a brave soldier dying in my arms, I lost my wife; then my previous design was arrested and I learned what I ought to do, and I felt that I owed you more than merely giving you the superfluities of my wealth. I determined to offer you my hand and protection, and that I would give to your daughter the bright hopes which gilds my own son's fortune. And now, madam," continued the major, grasping the widow's hand, "my son, Edward, cannot help loving your daughter, and must endeavour to make himself beloved by her, they have already seen each other, and that is sufficient. And we—"

"Have already seen each other also," said the widow, in a voice broken by sobs.

"Miss Julia, Miss Julia," said the good major bending over the stairs, "come up, and come up quickly, it is your step-father who calls you."

The young girl bounded up the stairs, but not alone, Edward Melville accompanied her, and they both threw themselves at the feet of Mrs. Mathew.

The same day Sir John Melville called upon his friend the Count De Cernay, and said to him.

"I have come to announce not one, but two marriages to you—I am about to wed the widow of Captain Mathew, who died on the field of honour in Waterloo, and my son will espouse the gallant captain's daughter; I have to request the pleasure of your company to the weddings, as well as my old friend the countess and your fair daughter."

SKETCHES OF

The Lives of Great Christian Artists, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

NO. IV.—ALBERT DURER.

It is with the most lively satisfaction we witness the gradual and steady development of a love and appreciation of the arts of the middle ages in opposition to the revived pagan art of the last three centuries, Cradled in the catacombs of Rome where the early Christians bore testimony to the faith in their blood, advancing with the church's progress and suffering in her trials, the arts continued till the close of the fifteenth century the chosen and cherished handmaid of religion, the beautiful symbols of her profoundest truths. While soaring above the dull comprehension of the materialist they inspired devotion in the instructed and pious Christian soul, and served, according to the definition of the council of Arras (1205), "as the books of the people who could read none other." From the twelfth to the fifteenth century existed that epoch in art so fine and pure, that, in the works of M. Montalembert, "nothing occurred to tarnish the glory of the new beauty with which the church clothed the world when all that graced and charmed the life of man reminded him of his heavenly home." During that period flourished the great artists whose works are sufficient to convince us of the immense superiority of their inspirations and habitual thoughts. Through them we catch a glimpse of the men and their inmost feelings; and when we read, in their well-authenticated lives, of their motives of action and their preparation for their daily tasks by religious exercises, we are compelled to think that it is in vain to expect works of similar beauty and perfection till we have artists who will cultivate the religious sentiments of the men of olden times. When artists esteem themselves the servants of the church and instructors of the people, and not the crouching slaves of fashion or of courts, the fine arts will again, as in other days, become one of the sublimest forms of Christian poesy.

To this brilliant era succeeded the unholy reign of paganism, which spread its vitiating influence alike over the domains of morals, literature, and the arts; in the latter substituting the grossness of materialism for the sublime ideality of the old Catholicity; in the former enthroning the wisdom of heathen philosophers above that of the fathers of Christian antiquity. A reaction has at length taken place, and men begin to perceive that the venerable old mother church is the veritable queen of the imagination as of devotion, of taste as of true science; that within her ample fold is contained all that is necessary for man during his pilgrimage on earth; that her bonds are true liberty; that she is the parent of the true and beautiful, which of her alone are legitimately begotten. The lives of the great artists of Catholic times are read and their works carefully studied by the most enlightened of their successors. Many a name that had lain in obscurity for centuries is now recognised with honour, and works that had been slighted and set aside are now put forth as models deserving imitation. This involves no servile copying, or restriction to a narrow circle of the exercise of genius; for, happily, there is a wide field between the catacombs, with their nameless artists, and the Florentine cloisters of St. Marc, with their monk painters Fra Angelico and Fra Bartolomeo; between the old Basilica of Constantine and the towers of Cologne; between the mosaics of Rome, "the paintings for eternity," and the storied windows of Bourge. Neither is Christian art confined to a few developments, as is its pagan rival, but, like its great parent, receives aid from every justifiable source, making all the productions of the natural world offer their meed of worship to the great Father of all, and affording a noble sphere of action for the humblest intellect as for the most exalted genius.

Amongst the great number of those heretofore most undeservedly neglected artists stands the remarkable name of Albert Durer, of whom Vasari,—notwithstanding his devotion to the school of painters known as naturalists,—says, that he was "so exact, so excellent, so universal a man, that had he been born in Tuscany as he was in Germany, and had formed his studies according to those beautiful pieces which are seen in Rome, he had proved the best painter of all Italy, as he was the greatest and most accomplished genius Germany ever bore." Had he indeed been born in Tuscany two centuries earlier he might have left a name and reputation unrivalled, but at the time of his birth the school of the "Naturalists" had made considerable progress in Italy, but had not as yet invaded Germany, so that the circumstance of his birth in the latter country is fortunate for his fame in the present times of juster views upon art.

The arts appear to have been in a great measure a hereditary profession in the middle ages, Albert Durer was descended of a race of artists who probably may have transmitted to him the traditions and experience of generations. His grandfather was a native of Eytas, an Hungarian village, and practised the goldsmith's art. Goldsmiths were no despicable artists in the olden times, as their works which remain to us show. They were, generally speaking, men of rich genius, cultivated intellects, and simple pious souls. His father, who was born in 1427, was also a goldsmith, and named Albert. By the exercise of his trade he became wealthy, and, influenced by a desire of becoming acquainted with the distinguished artists of his time, and improving by their example, he left his native country and travelled through Germany and the Netherlands. The fame of the strange artist spread abroad, and finding at Nuremburg congenial spirits and a sphere for the exercise of his talents, he adopted that city, all beautiful as it then was, as his future home. Here in 1464 he married, and became the father of a numerous family. It pleased God that those children died young, with the exception of three sons, Albert, John, and Andrea, who devoted themselves to the cultivation of the arts. John became court painter to the King of Poland, Andrea practised as an amateur, and Albert, as we shall see, exercised a wide spreading influence on the artists of his time.

Albert, the subject of our present sketch, was born at Nuremburg on the 20th of May, 1471. His father intended that he should follow his own profession of goldsmith, and accordingly gave him the necessary education for it. In his sixteenth year the young Albert produced a work which determined his future vocation, and conducted him to the pictorial art in which in after years he was destined to be distinguished, and in fact to create a great school and era in Germany. This effort of his early genius was embossed in silver, and represented the "Seven Falls of Christ," a portion of our Lord's passion which appears to have been a favorite subject with the artists of the middle ages. It had already been treated in stone, in Nuremburg, by "Master Adam Kraft," the mason whose "Sacrament-house" yet graces that ancient city. Young Durer's work is represented as wonderful for its time, uniting much dignity and simplicity with evidence of profound religious thoughtfulness. Albert, perceiving the probable scope of his own genius, informed his father of his determination to study painting. The elder Durer did not hesitate in gratifying his desire of knowledge, but immediately determined to send him as a pupil to Martin Schön, a celebrated painter at Colmar. Preparations were making for the departure of the young artist, when, on the eve of his setting out, news arrived of the death of Schön. This must have been a severe trial to the young aspirant for artistic fame, for Martin left not an equal after him; and, moreover, there appears to have existed a kindly friendship between the families of Durer and Schön, as we find, six years later, Albert received with honour at Colmar by Gaspar and Paul, goldsmiths, and Lewis, a painter, brothers of Martin Schön. After a short lapse of time he became a pupil of Haspe Martin, from whom he learned the rudiments of painting, and then went to Michael Wohlgenuth, who was at that time making great progress in the newly invented art of engraving on wood and metal. These artists were natives and residents in Nuremburg.

Leaving Nuremburg in 1490, Albert Durer travelled in many parts of Germany and the Netherlands for four years, during which time his skill and amiable manners gained him many friends. Two years after his departure his father died. On his return to Nuremburg, in 1494, he married Agnes, the daughter of James Frey, a mechanic of that city. She is represented as exceedingly handsome, but not of the most agreeable temper, being, according to some of the artist's biographers,* "a wretch of such miserable and sordid humour, that she shortened the days of this so excellent and universal a man." Far better for poor Durer had he been of the good old monk's† opinion, that "he who wished to paint had need of tranquillity and to live without care; that he who occupied himself with the things of Christ should always be with Christ."‡ Indeed, in the portraits of these two great artists, painted by themselves, we can trace the respective influences of the world and the Church. Durer has left us three portraits of himself; two of them exhibiting him in all the vanities of the dress of his time, above which littleness he appears not to have risen, notwithstanding his genius. In the last he is represented as a careworn man, with a countenance severe and serious, evidently that of a man who, after a brilliant worldly career, was not well at ease with himself. What a contrast does this portrait present to that of the blessed Angelico? Calm and thoughtful, yet not sad, the holy recluse who—had also seen something of the world, but had passed unscathed—meditates on the representation of his suffering Redeemer, his beads lie before him; at his side, the instruments of that art, which to him was an act of faith and love.

After his marriage and settlement in Nuremburg Durer devoted himself to the art of engraving on copper and wood, in which he made considerable improvements. He also applied himself to the study of optics and perspective, and is said to have invented instruments to facilitate the exercise of the latter arts, which were subsequently appropriated by the Italians. About 1498 he produced a series of wood engravings illustrative of the revelation of St. John, a work showing great fertility of imagination and boldness of design.

Before the commencement of the sixteenth century Durer appears to have done nothing in painting, but to have confined himself to engraving and to his original profession of goldsmith. A celebrated example of his skill in the latter art is the Maximilian cross, made for the archduke Maximilian of Austria, to ornament St. Peter's Church at Rome, the foundations of which were then laid by Pope Julius II. This work is a Latin cross, about eighteen inches high, representing all the actions of our Lord's life, with subjects in relief. It will afford some notion of the comprehensiveness of the subjects and the minuteness of the execution, when we say the cross contains upwards of twelve hundred figures, all bearing evidence of the richness of imagination with which the artist was so highly gifted. His oldest authentic painting now in existence is a portrait of the artist himself, at present in the Florentine gallery. It is supposed that this is the picture which was presented by the city of Nuremburg to the King of England, and which was found in the collection of the unfortunate Charles the First.

In 1506 he visited Venice and Bologna, where he painted a good many pictures which obtained him great celebrity, and disarmed the jealousy of some of the Italian artists, who had hitherto admitted him to be a good engraver but "unable to handle a brush." While in Venice he painted a picture for the German society, usually supposed to have been the martyrdom of St. Bartholomew, which afterwards passed into the possession of the Emperor Rudolph II. The intelligent Dr. Kugler discredits this opinion, and says that a painting now in the convent of the Premonastratenses, at Prague, is the work produced in Venice by Durer. It is described as between six and seven feet in breadth and four feet high. The Blessed Virgin and the Divine Infant are seated in the centre, crowned by angels. In front of them are kneeling the Emperor Maximilian, the Pope, and several ecclesiastical and secular princes receiving crowns of roses from our Blessed Lady. Durer and his friend Bilibaldus Pirckheymer, a worthy magistrate of Nuremburg, are seen standing in the back ground; to the right, an angel playing a lute is seated at the Blessed Virgin's feet. This beautiful work in its conception and treatment is worthy of the purest days of the Christian schools of Florence or Bologna. With it began the most brilliant period of Albert Durer's life. It was quickly followed by another picture, also painted at Venice, now in the Barbarini Palace, "Christ disputing with the Doctors of the Law."

Durer was now in the zenith of his fame; and within the twelve succeeding years were produced the numerous works which have given him a foremost place in the first rank of European artists. All departments of art appear to have been touched by his hand and adorned by it. Literature, too, occupied some portion of his time. He exercised a powerful influence on all artists around him; and the art of staining glass appears to have made extraordinary advancement during his time. When we hear of the undoubted works of his which yet remain to us, some of which we shall presently notice, and reflect on how many of his productions may have been lost in the lapse of time, we can form some notion of the man's wonderful industry. His fame had spread far and wide. He was the frequent guest and favourite artist of the Emperor Maximilian the First, in whose palace were executed many of his works; amongst others, about the year 1515, the celebrated marginal designs for the emperor's prayer book, which are now in the court library at Munich. They consist of a series of pen and ink drawings of subjects, sometimes grave and elevated, sometimes sportive, frequently appropriate to the text, occasionally fantastic, but never irreverent. He corresponded, too, with the first artists in Italy, and exchanged portraits (after the simple and affectionate manner of the times) with Raphael, who was so great an admirer of Durer's works that he had them hung up in his own chamber.

In 1520 our artist again visited the Netherlands, of which tour he has left us a journal, which is interesting for the quaintness and simplicity of its style, but more particularly for the view it gives of the manners of the times. At Antwerp he met some choice spirits, amongst others Quintin Matsys, the blacksmith and painter, and Master Erasmus (the celebrated Erasmus of Rotterdam), "who presented him with a Spanish mantle." Durer criticised the great church of Antwerp: and it would seem that the race of harpies, yclept "guides," were even then in existence, for the artist informs us he gave "a stiver for drink money, because he was allowed to see a picture." In this city he was received with such marks of respect as were then the vogue—they do these things finer now, but not as hearty. We shall let the old painter tell his own story:

"On Sunday, which was also St. Oswald's Day, the painters received me in their chamber, with my wife and maid, and served up with silver ware and other costly preparations, and a particularly costly banquet. Their wives, also, were there; and while I was at table the people stood on each side as if they were treating a great lord. There were also among them some persons of importance, who received me with very deep and reverential salutations, and they said they would do all they could, which might be agreeable to me; then came a messenger from the lords of Antwerp, with two servants, and presented me, from the lords of Antwerp, with four cans of wine, and sent me word, 'I should be honoured by them in this, and have their good will.' Then said that I thanked them humbly, and sent my humble service. Thereafter came Master Peter, the city carpenter, and presented me with two cans of wine, with the expression of his willing service. So were we long merry together, and late in the night when they conducted us with lanterns worshipfully home."

He also witnessed a celebrated procession called the "Procession of the Ommeganck"—the description of it we shall also give from himself:

"I have seen on Sunday, after Our Lady's Ascension, the grand procession of Our Lady Church at Antwerp, when the whole place was assembled, of all handicrafts and conditions, each clad costly according to his condition. Each condition and trade had its token by which it might be known; and there were also among them great costly banners carried, and then old French long trumpets of silver. There were also of Germans many fifers and drummers who made much noise. Also saw I, in the way in regular order, going along the procession, the goldsmiths, painters, masons, silk embroiderers, carvers, cabinet-makers, carpenters, sailors, fishermen, butchers, curriers, weavers, bakers, tailors, shoemakers, and other handicrafts, and many handworkers and dealers in worshipful array. So, too, were the shopkeepers, merchants, and all kinds of assistants. After came the musketeers, archers, and arquebusiers, as well horse as foot. Then came the guards of the bailiwick. Then came a whole body of very brave folks, genteely and richly clad; but before them went all orders, and each arranged, according to the several differences, very properly. There was also in this procession a great body of widows, who live by their own handywork, and hold a particular rule, and all with white linen tuckers, reaching from the head to the ground, very orderly to see; there among saw I many brave persons and the prebends of Our Lady's Church, with all the priesthood, scholars, and church officers going behind, where twenty persons bore the Virgin Mary, with the Lord Jesus, most richly clothed, to the honour of the Lord God. In this circuit were very many pleasant things done and very richly arrayed. Then there were brought along many carriages, models of ships, and other pageants. There among were the prophets, then the New Testament, then the angelic cross, the three holy kings on great camels, and riding in other scarce wonders very artfully arranged; also, how our Lady fled into Egypt, very devoutly, and many other things which, for shortness, I pass by. At the last came a great dragon, which bore St. Margaret with her ladies, on a girdle, which was very pretty; then followed St. George with his attendants, a pretty sketch. Also there rode in this company very bravely clad young men and maidens, in various dresses, and representing different saints."

At Ghent he was likewise received with distinction, and saw Van Eyck's celebrated picture of the "Adoration of the Lamb," of which he says, "it is exceedingly rich, most understandingly painted, and particularly the Eve, Virgin, and God the Father are very good."

Between the artist's visits to Italy and the Netherlands was the period of his greatest intellectual activity. The creations of his wonderful imagination were given forth with a rapidity of execution equalled only by that of our great dramatist, between whose genius and the German artist's there appears much resemblance. Both artists were men who sprung from no school. Their works were often formed, indeed, upon the crude conceptions of artists who had preceded them; but in their remodelling, an original character, showing the highest creative power, was bestowed upon them. The artist and the dramatist were bound by no settled rules of classicism or shackles of the "unities." They were laws to themselves; and availed themselves of their respective arts to shadow forth sentiments and feelings which dwell in man's inner nature.

THE following lines were suggested by reading Oliver Plunkett's dying speech in DUFFY'S MAGAZINE. They are expressed almost entirely in his own words.

Prayer of Oliver Plunkett

ON THE MORNING OF HIS EXECUTION.

"GREAT God," he cried, "thy will be done,"

With clasped hands on bended knee,

"Thou gavest for my sake thy son

To die accursed on a tree.

The death he sought I would not shun,

For oh! how beautiful appears

The dazzling crown the martyrs won,

To wear through never-ending years.

Ave Maria, Mother dear,

Thy aid now asks thy weary child,

In heavy chains and prison drear,

To keep his spirit undefiled."

"I give thee, gracious Father, thanks

That I shall die for serving thee,

The chain upon my feet now clanks,

My hands are banded to my knee,

But my free spirit soars to thee,

Their fetters cannot reach the mind—

God's glorious image—then to me

What reck's it that the flesh they bind.

Ave Maria, &c."

"They would have spared my life if I

Their perjured sycophant would be,

If against honest men I'd lie

And basely sin 'gainst them and Thee;

But I would rather gladly die

A thousand deaths of deepest woe

Than in his life or liberty

Injure my direst, falsest foe.

Ave Maria, &c."

"The morning sends his early beams

Into my lonely cell to peer;

The giddy crowd already streams

The victim's dying speech to hear,

But I can view it without fear,

For to my inmost soul is given,

Now when the fatal moment's near,

To see the dazzling light of Heaven.

Ave Maria, &c."

SKETCHES OF

The Lives of Great Christian Artists,

ANCIENT AND MODERN.

NO. IV.—ALBERT DURER—(concluded).

FROM the year 1508 to 1520, Durer's works ran through all departments of the arts. In the first of these years he painted a picture for the Duke Frederic, of Saxony, which is now in the Belvedere Palace. The subject is the "Martyrdom of the Ten Thousand." The artist and his friend Pirckheimer are introduced contemplating the scene; the former bearing a scroll upon which is written "Iste faciebat, anno Domini, 1508, Albertus Durer Alemanus." In 1509 was painted "The Assumption of the Blessed Virgin," which was esteemed a masterpiece. It was originally painted for Jacob Heller, of Frankfort, but was brought to Munich at the beginning of the seventeenth century, where it remained till destroyed by the burning of the castle. Between the years 1509 and 1513, Durer appears to have applied himself particularly to engraving, and to have invented the art of etching his subjects on metal plates.

In 1512 he produced his "Greater and Lesser Passion of Christ"—so called from the respective sizes of the plates—and his "Life of the Blessed Virgin." The Life of the Blessed Virgin was engraved on wood, and consisted of nineteen cuts, each about eleven and three-quarter inches high, and eight and three-quarter inches wide, with a vignette in the title-page. The title is as follows: "Epitome in Divæ Parthenices Mariæ Historiam ab Alberto Dureri Norico per figuras digestam, cum versibus annexis Chelidoni.*" The plates of the "greater Passion" are about fifteen and a-half inches high, by eleven and an eighth wide. The title of the work, "Passio Domini nostri Jesu, ex Hieronymo Paduano, Diminico Mancino, Sedulio, et Baptistu Mantiana per fratrem Chelidonium collecta, cum figuris Alberti Dureri Norici Pictoré." The size of the cuts of the "lesser Passion" is five inches by three seven-eighths. We are indebted to the work† of an ardent admirer and encourager of Christian art and antiquities, to whom is due the honour of having first given satisfactory notices of our artist's life to the English reader, for the following description of these admirable engravings:

The Great Passion.—The frontispiece represents the suffering Saviour seated naked upon a stone, bearing the crown of thorns; one of the soldiers presents a reed to him. The figure of Christ is highly dignified and of beautiful roundness of form; the soldier wears the costume of the middle ages; the form is also beautifully developed, and his countenance expressive of exulting scorn and eagerness. Christ wrings his hands, turning his head, full of majesty and mercy, towards the spectator. This frontispiece has also a symbolical signification, referring not so much to that moment of ignominious outrage as to the enduring injury inflicted on the Redeemer by the sins of men, for which reason the wounds appear imprinted on the hands and feet in this stage of the passion.

"The Apprehension" is a composition singular in its treatment, in which the brutality of the soldiery is particularly dwelt upon, while the minutiae of costume, &c., is a curious medley of that of the sixteenth century. The figure of Christ forms the centre of the group, and is being haled along, by ropes, by two grotesque and brutal looking figures in front; behind, a soldier is busied in binding his hands, whilst by his side is Judas, with the wages of his treason in his hand, in the act of saluting his Master with a kiss. This point of the story properly belongs to a period somewhat antecedent, but is doubtless here introduced to render the illustration more complete, and to distinguish the different characters with accuracy. In the foreground Peter is in the act of cutting off Malchus's ear; the latter is prostrate on the ground, and is endeavouring to defend himself with a club.

The next subject in order is the "Flagellation." Our Saviour is bound to a column in the midst of a hall, surrounded by soldiers and the rabble grotesquely habited, and with a countenance of savage brutality. These armed with rods and scourges, are offering him every indignity, while the chief priests are looking on. One of these, at the right hand corner of the picture, is a portly figure, attired in Oriental costume, with turban and long beard—an idea, without doubt, suggested by the Turks, at that time the terror of Christendom. In a corner in the foreground lies the crown of thorns, and a dog, similar to what we now know as a terrier of the Isle of Skye breed, is introduced: this is by no means unusual in Durer's designs, and may be observed in the carving preserved in the British Museum, as well as in the next subject.

"Christ bearing the Cross."—In this there is a more appropriate sentiment: the figure of our Saviour, oppressed by the weight of the cross, is in the centre of the picture, turning towards a female kneeling, and holding a handkerchief, which is said to have received the true impression of His face. A group of figures follow behind, consisting of the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, St. John, soldiers, &c.; figures on horseback, in the costume of the Turks of the time, are leading the procession; whilst a soldier, habited and armed as the Flemish infantry of the sixteenth century, is holding a rope bound about our Saviour. The accessories entirely belong to the country of the artist, and the background gives the same peculiarities. As a composition it exhibits great power in spite of its eccentricities. The figure of Christ possesses great feeling, and it may be interesting to compare it with Raffaele's on the same subject.

"Christ's Descent into Hell."—One of the noblest of his subjects. The treatment of the subject is here very curious, and displays the wildest imagination in the figures of the demons; but, at the same time, a noble majesty in the aspect of the Saviour. Christ, kneeling on one knee, holding in his left hand the crown and banner, bends downwards towards an arched dungeon, out of which he is about to lead the imprisoned souls—whilst the head of a serpent is stealthily peeping, with an expression of anger; above, from an aperture, are seen monstrous forms; one, with the head and snout of a boar, and a horn in the middle of his head, is threatening with a dart; still higher, a demon of a singularly grotesque combination, somewhat resembling the fabulous harpy of the ancients, is blowing a horn. The introduction of a demon with a horn in this subject is a very ancient convention, and may be observed for many centuries in the treatment of this story. Behind the figure of Christ are Adam and Eve. The former holds the cross in his left hand, and in his right the fatal apple: he is represented as a bearded, and venerable figure. Eve is immediately behind him, and patriarchs surround them; and children are introduced, probably more for the sake of composition than for any ancient convention. The gates of hell lie broken upon the ground.

"The Lamentation over the Dead Body of Christ" follows; and, as a work of art, must take the precedence of all the works of its kind. The composition is exceedingly fine and grand, although, in its details, the peculiarities of the master are apparent. The body of Christ is extended on the ground in a natural posture, his right hand being taken by his Virgin Mother, who, on her knees, bends over the body with excessive grief. St. Joseph supports the head, whilst St. John, the beloved disciple, throws up his hands in an agony of despair. A standing figure of a female, with clasped hands, perhaps St. Mary Magdalene, forms the centre and apex to the pyramidal arrangement of the composition; and a beautiful female figure, kneeling on the right, completes the subject. In the back ground is Mount Calvary, with the two thieves, and, still further in the distance, the city of Jerusalem. This composition is certainly worthy to be ranked beside the best conceived of the great Italian masters. The greatest simplicity and perfection prevail in the grouping of the figures, in the varied expression of the separate forms the high and attractive grace of the lines and attitudes. We easily perceive, from the study of such works, the reason of the just esteem with which, at a later period, the Italians regarded Albert Durer's compositions, as well as the advantage to be derived from making Italian copies of them.

"The Resurrection of Christ" comes next in order. The Saviour is represented in the conventional manner of the church, rising from his tomb, his right hand in attitude of benediction, his left holding the cross and banner; about the figure is a mass of drapery composed in a very grand manner. On each side recline the sleeping warriors, variously and grotesquely armed; one with bow and arrows, and coat of mail worn under his vest, resembling the equipment of the Slavonic tribes. It must be observed that all the soldiers do not sleep; one indeed is waking another, being conscious of the miracle taking place. This is quite in accordance with the religious views of the time, and marks an era in Christian art.

"Lesser Passion."—Amongst the most beautiful composition of this series is, the "Parting of Christ from his Mother," distinguished for its beautiful and imposing drapery.

"The washing of the Feet."—An admirable and simple arrangement of numerous figures with a small space; the principal group in the foreground is fine, and full of feeling.

"Christ's Prayer in the Garden."—Of the greatest simplicity, united, at the same time, to the highest dignity of expression, beauty, and the profoundest feeling.

"Christ appearing to his Mother after his Resurrection."—And as "the Gardener to Mary Magdalene," both these compositions, and especially the latter, possess a peculiar grace, and tranquil beauty.

"The Life of the Blessed Virgin."—If the above described work be distinguished by a grand and tragic character, that of which we are about to speak, displays, on the other hand, the elements of grace and tenderness. The gentle domestic cares, and amiable intercourse of life, are presented to our view, and the master has invested them with an interest to which few can offer a parallel.

"The Golden Gate."—Joachim and Anne embracing, after a painful separation, in the prospect of a joyful future. Joachim is represented as a mild and stately old man. Anne, full of feminine grace and resignation; the servants and attendants of Joachim, who are come to welcome their lord, converse in the back ground over the event.

"The Birth of the Blessed Virgin."—A design replete with the most attractive charms. It represents an apartment, such as would be used on the occasion, in which are several groups of women and maidens, bearing an interesting similarity to Ghirlandajo's, and others treatment of this subject, according to the Florentine life and manners.

"The Circumcision."—The composition of this subject, frequently so unpleasing, and even treated with a degree of absurdity by first-rate masters, appears here a most graceful and complete representation of a national custom. Rich as it is in figures, it is yet not too crowded; each takes an interest in what is going on, and the whole is distributed into several simple and intelligible groups.

"The Flight into Egypt."—This, in contrast with the former composition presents a space occupied in the most skilful manner by a few figures: the repose of a dark wood, richly laden with fruit, through which the holy family are journeying, enhances in a peculiar manner the charm of this interesting subject.

"The Residence of the Holy Family in Egypt."—Represents a court, with a dwelling erected amidst the ruins of a decayed palace. The Blessed Virgin is seated with a spindle in her hand, at the side of the cradle; two beautiful, adoring angels are by her; Joseph is busied at his handicraft, surrounded by a group of child-angels, who joyously assist him at his labours. The most graceful repose, and placid cheerfulness reign throughout this picture.

"The Death of the Blessed Virgin."—The perfect beauty of the arrangement, and simple distribution of the principal groups, the dignified forms, together with the expression of the most profound feeling in the exercise of a sacred rite, assigns to this composition a very high grade amongst Albert Durer's entire works.

After the engravings of "The Passion," and "Life of the Blessed Virgin," appeared the admirable engraving of the "Vision of St. Gregory." This is a master-piece of art, and bears the impress of the most lively imagination, and all the characteristics of German ideality. The subject is the vision of Pope Gregory the Great. That illustrious hero of the Church, and benefactor of mankind, while yet a simple priest, kneels at the foot of an altar, upon which is placed a chalice and the sacred Host. Immediately over the altar appears a figure of our blessed Lord rising from the tomb. He is evidently the "man of sorrows." His whole figure, as well as the expression of his countenance, is expressive of the most intense suffering: yet there is a majesty about the wounded and bruised figure, evidently denoting it to be that of the God-Man. The cross, spears, nails, and other instruments of His passion, surround Him; whilst angels, hovering on high, minister unto Him in awful admiration. St. Gregory is accompanied by a deacon, and in the back ground kneel figures bearing the emblems of his future exalted position in the Church. He is evidently the only person in the group who witnesses the miracle, as he is the only one for whose edification it is meant. The object of the vision is supposed to be intended to represent to the good priest the then miserable condition of Christ's Church, and the will of Divine Providence with regard to him whom He raised up as its champion and saint.*

The celebrated engraving of "The Knight, Death, and the Devil," was engraved in 1513, and is considered one of the most remarkable productions of Durer's genius. It represents a knight, clad in full armour, and on horseback, journeying through a deep and gloomy valley. Death, on the white horse, rises up before him, and the evil spirit follows close after. Death holds up an hour-glass before the knight, who, unmindful of his threats, proceeds on his way. This subject has also been called, and we think with propriety, "The Christian Knight;" and is meant to show with what composure and firmness the true Christian warrior who pursues the path of duty, may encounter the greatest foes of humanity. It is impossible for the mind to conceive more fearful embodiments of evil than those presented to us by the artist in this engraving. The knight himself is an admirable embodiment of Christian chivalry, in its exterior manifestation and inner life;—calm, thoughtful, and self-possessed, he pursues the path of rectitude, defiant—almost unconscious—of his terrible foes. As to the execution of the work, the copy we have seen enables us to say, that, in our judgment, few engravings of the nineteenth century is comparable to it.

"St. Jerome in his Study," a painting of the following year, is a work which merits to rank with the foregoing developments of Christian thought and German genius. It represents that great doctor in the Church absorbed in heavenly contemplation, sustained by divine grace, and evincing perfect cheerfulness amidst the temptation by which he is assailed.

Another work of the same year—"Melancholy"—exhibits a painful and a striking contrast to the foregoing. A figure of a powerful female sits in the foreground, "fruitlessly brooding, and ceaselessly dwelling on perplexing cares." The numerous objects spread in wild confusion around her, exhibit the various fancies of her diseased imagination.

The Belvidere Gallery at Vienna contains a picture

* Some writers are of opinion that this engraving is intended as an illustration of the miracle recorded by Ribadimiera in his life of St. Gregory. The saint whilst administering the Blessed Eucharist to a woman, who made altar-breads, observed her to laugh. Being asked the cause of her irreverence, she replied "is it possible that the bread made by my own hands can become the body of my Saviour?" To reprove her incredulity, the saint returned to the altar, and, having laid the Blessed Sacrament thereon, he prayed that the woman's profanity might be made manifest, when the Sacred Host assumed the corporal appearance of our Blessed Redeemer, all wounded and suffering.

representing the Blessed Trinity, surrounded by saints and angels, which was painted about this time for a church in Nuremberg. It was afterwards removed to Prague, and thence to Vienna.

All the works of Durer, we have hitherto noticed, may justly be classed amongst the most perfect productions of the Christian school of art in Germany. To Durer belongs the glory of having conducted it to heights unattained before his time; to him also belongs the disgrace of having yielded to the debasing influence of classicism, and of apostatizing from the old Catholic and national traditions of his country, to cultivate the ideas of revived paganism and the new philosophy which then inundated Europe. His last work which entitles him to rank amongst the masters of Christian art, is a beautiful wood-engraving of our Blessed Lady as queen of heaven, surrounded by adoring angels, produced in the year 1518. Alas! the same year saw his miserable fall, and a naked figure of Lucretia, the size of life, was his first unholy offering to the materialism of his age. He here ceases to interest us. Paganism and naturalism have their crowds of admirers, critics, and connoisseurs—to them and their tender cares we hand over the works of his subsequent brief and unhappy career, we have to do only with that art which was begotten of the Christian thought of the ages of faith—or, according to the enlightened of our days—of "the fanaticism and superstition of the dark ages."

Amongst the works of Durer's latter period, may be enumerated a series of wood-engravings of the date of 1522, representing the Emperor Maximilian's triumphal car; also engravings of Cardinal Albert of Brandenburg, the Elector Frederic the Wise, Pirckheimer, Melancthon, and Erasmus. In the Bettendorf collection, at Aix-la-chapelle, is a painting produced in the year 1525. It is but a poor imitation of Raphael's style—not that of his early and Christian period, but of the period of his paganism. In 1523, he appears to have made an effort to recover his early manner in an altar-piece which he painted, the centre of which is now in Cologne Cathedral. His last works, which are in his new manner, are now in the Munich Gallery. They are paintings of SS. Peter, Paul, John, and Mark, and were executed as a gift to his native city.

Contemporaneous with his change of style in art, Durer seems to have adopted some of the heretical notions of his times; at least from some passages in his journal, he appears to have sympathized with the apostles of the desolating heresy which was then beginning to raise its head. Some writers have gone so far as to call his paintings of SS. Peter, Paul, &c., "the first works of Protestant art;" a term, which we are certain sounds as strangely in the ears of these religionists, as in those of Catholics. Protestantism in art seems to us an impossibility by reason of the negative character of that creed. "Every religion," says Montalembert, "which partakes not of the nature of sectarianism, as Protestantism does, has always bestowed life and energy on that art which served as its organ—speaking its language to the imaginations and the hearts of its children, teaching its dogmas by venerated and delightful imagery, and investing its rites and ceremonies with an attraction at once mysterious and popular. This has been done by the Hindoos, the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Mexicans—by the Catholic religion also, but with an unrivalled power and magnificence."

In his journal of the date, Whitsuntide, 1521, he sympathises with the "godly man (Martin Luther) who is indeed enlightened by the Holy Ghost, and a follower of the true Christian faith," and adds some bitter censures on the "unchristian Popery, which strives to fetter Christian liberty with the incumbrance of human ordinances;" and "the blind doctrine which those men called 'the fathers,' have imagined and set forth." Luther was at this time, by the connivance of his friend and supporter, Frederick, Elector of Saxony, concealed in the castle of Wirtzburg, disguised as a knight, in order to preserve him from the apprehended violence of some of his enemies. Durer, supposing him to be killed, thus laments his death and beseeches Erasmus to continue the work which Luther had begun—"And is Luther dead? Who henceforth will so clearly explain to us the Gospel? Alas! what might he not have written for us in ten or twenty years. Aid me, all pious Christians, to bewail this man of heavenly mind, and to pray that God may send us another as divinely enlightened. Where, O Erasmus, wilt thou remain? Behold, now, how the tyranny of might and the power of darkness prevail. Hear, thou champion of Christ? Ride forward, defend the truth, and deserve the martyr's crown, for thou are already an old man." Erasmus however was deaf to this entreaty, and modestly declined the honour of martyrdom in the cause, by saying that—"his gift did not lie that way, and that he had as little taste for martyrdom as he had for fish."

Durer's course was now run, and in the fifty-seventh year of his age, worn down with domestic afflictions and worldly turmoil, he passed from this life on the 6th of April, 1528. His fellow citizens mourned over him, and his faithful friend, Bilibaldus Pirckheymer, was almost inconsolable. He was buried in St. John's church, Nuremberg, and a brass plate bearing the following inscription, marked his grave:

"Mem. Alb. Durer, quicquid Alberti Dureri mortale fuit sub hoc conditur tumulo: emigravit viii Id. Aprilis mdxxviii."

It is unquestionable that the wicked temper of his wife had rendered poor Durer's latter days miserable, and hastened his death. She appears to have been extremely avaricious, and to have urged the artist to incessant toil, in order that as much money as possible might be accumulated for her before his death. Her sitting-room was under the studio of her husband, and she was accustomed, whenever she suspected he was not plying his vocation with sufficient activity, to give a warning knock against the ceiling, which, if not effective, was followed by the "sweet music of her tongue." The following passages from a letter addressed by Pirckheymer to Johann Tscherte, an architect residing at Vienna, and a friend of Durer's, give some notion of the opinion entertained of this woman by her husband's friends.

"I have indeed lost in Albert one of the best friends I had on earth; and nothing pains me more than the thought of his death having been so melancholy, which, next to the will of Providence, I can ascribe to no one but his wife, for she fretted him as much and tasked him so hard, that he departed sooner than he otherwise would. He was dried up like a bundle of straw; durst never enjoy himself, or enter into company. This bad woman, moreover, was anxious about that for which she had no occasion to take heed—she urged him to labour day and night, solely that he might earn money, even at the cost of his life, and leave it to her; she was content to live despised as she does still, provided Albert might leave her six thousand guilders. But she cannot enjoy them; the sum of the matter is, she alone has been the cause of his death. I have often expostulated with her about her fretful, jealous conduct, and warned her what the consequence would be, but have only met with reproach. To the friends and sincere well wishers of Albert, she was sure to be the enemy; while such conduct was to him a cause of exceeding grief, and contributed to bring him to the grave. I have not seen her since his death: she will have nothing to say to me, although I have on many occasions rendered her great service. Whoever contradicts, or gives not way to her in all things is sure to incur her enmity: I am, therefore, better pleased that she should keep herself away."

Albert Durer wrote many books in German, which, during his life and after his death, were translated into Latin, and published in various parts of Europe. Amongst them may be mentioned—"De Symmetria Partium in rectis formis Humanorum Corporum," Nuremberg, 1532, Paris, 1557—"Institutiones Geometricæ," Paris, 1532—"De urbibus, arcibus, castellisque condendis et muniendis," Paris, 1531—"De varietate Figurarum et flecturis Partium et gestibus Imaginum," Nuremberg, 1534. He had many pupils, amongst whom was John Schorel, a Hollander, who afterwards became painter and architect to Pope Adrian VI.

Since the commencement of the revival of ecclesiastical art in England and on the continent, many of Durer's works have been reproduced in various forms. Amongst others, a stained-glass window has been restored in the chapel of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, after an engraving of "Christ washing his disciples' feet." It is greatly to be desired that reprints of some of his works were introduced to this country; especially of such subjects as the "Passion of Christ," and "Life of the Blessed Virgin." The wretched daubs that disfigure many of our country chapels, and even some of our more pretending suburban churches, under the name of the "Stations of the Cross," &c., are nothing more nor less than scandalous. They cannot possibly excite devotion in the hearts of the most simple and uneducated; they are painful to the pious and well-informed, and subjects of ridicule to the unbeliever or sceptic. Good engravings might really be brought out at the same price as these wretched daubs, if those interested would only buy them, and if some individual or number of individuals would take the risk. The Art Unions pretend to labour in extending a popular love of art: we are convinced if they published good reprints of religious subjects that would serve for the humble chapel, the farm-house, and the cabin, they would do more to popularize the fine arts in one year, than they have done by all the prints published since the commencement of their existence. The mere connoisseurs in the arts could not reasonably object to Christian subjects, as there is no danger of the "Man of Sin" ensnaring such enlightened people by the aid of the fine arts; and the representation of a Christian legend or tradition ought, one would think, to be as acceptable, as a picture, as one descriptive of some part of heathen mythology. In a word, Art Unions have yet to learn that there can be no national art but that which is based upon the religious sentiments of our people; as, happily, Catholicism is the deepest and most permanent feeling of the Irish heart.

THE FAVOURITE CHILD.—A TALE FOR CHRISTMAS.

(Concluded.)

"YOU may remember, my dear father," continued Mary Ann, "that on returning from a very long walk, about three months ago, I was obliged to go to bed; and that I was in so excited and feverish a condition that you thought it necessary to procure medical assistance as speedily as possible. That was the unhappy day of my wedding. On the very next morning, Mary brought me a letter from Brown, requesting that I would meet him in the same part of the demesne as formerly, as he had matters of the utmost moment to communicate to me. I shall never forget the thrill which ran through my bosom on reading the concluding words, 'your affectionate husband—W.B.' I burst into a flood of tears, tore the letter, trampled it under my feet, and cast the fragments into the fire. 'Go,' said I to the girl, 'and tell the base and dishonourable scoundrel that I now know him, and that I will never speak to him, or receive a letter from him again.' This message was faithfully delivered by Mary, and he had penetration enough to perceive that she had thoroughly repented of the part which she had formerly acted, and that she was now entirely devoted to me. She acted like a true woman, and when she had once taken her side, neither Brown's bribes nor her father's threats, nor even blows could make her change it. She carried Brown's letters to me indeed—for this she was compelled to do, lest they should be sent through some less safe channel, and fall into your hands—but she also brought them back to him unopened. When this had occurred several times, he suddenly left the neighbourhood, and Mary did not see him for more than three weeks. It was evidently his opinion, that during this period my indignation against him, for the injury which he had inflicted upon me, would have passed away, or would at least have been so far moderated as to induce me to receive his letters, and in a short time to grant him an interview. He was mistaken, for the letter which he sent me after the expiration of this time was returned like the previous ones, unopened. This rendered him furious, and, despairing of success by gentle means, he sent me back a verbal message to the effect that if I did not meet him on the very next day he would disclose the whole matter to you. I knew, and both Susan and Mary agreed with me, that he would execute his threat, and that I must either see him, or prepare myself at once to encounter your anger. Susan bravely advised the latter, offering to take upon herself as much of the blame as possible; but I was too pusillanimous to follow her counsel, and Mary agreed with me. On one thing, however, we were all unanimously resolved, that I should never meet him in any place where assistance would not be at hand, in case he should attempt to carry me off by force. I, therefore, consented to speak to him through a window for four or five minutes, on the next night, in the presence of the two girls. Even though Mary assured me that there was no one with him but her father, I would not allow Brown to approach the window until Susan had gone out and ascertained the same fact. When she had satisfied herself that there was no other person near, she returned into the room, and then Brown came to the window. Until Susan took my place, I sat with my hand on the cord of the alarm bell, which you had caused to be put in your own bed-chamber, when I came to sleep in this secluded part of the house, on my recovery from the fever. Susan then took my place, and I went within about three yards of the open window to speak to Brown. He knew perfectly well that if he made the slightest attempt to enter the apartment Susan would sound the alarm, and consequently that he could gain nothing but the chance of being mistaken for a housebreaker and shot. Mary sat at the door which communicated with the drawing-room, with a dark lantern in her hand. Her business was to listen and give notice if she heard the slightest noise in the house. This was an exceedingly useful arrangement, for if Brown attempted to prolong the interview beyond eight or ten minutes she declared that she thought she heard some one, and Susan threatened to ring if he did not leave instantly. He always found it necessary to comply, for he knew that his life was at stake, but although he attempted to smother his rage in my presence, in the hope that he would ultimately succeed, Mary told me she had learned from her father that he used to rave like a madman at being thus foiled by a woman, whom, like an idiot, he had allowed to escape when he had her completely in his power.

"Nearly ten weeks have elapsed since the first of these interviews took place, and notwithstanding all his threats and entreaties, he has obtained but four more, each of which was commenced, conducted, and concluded precisely in the same manner as that which I have described. After Brown's departure, I always fell upon my knees, and wept and prayed for hours, beseeching my Heavenly Father to deliver me from the evils with which my own folly had encompassed me. And I take God to witness that, with all my waywardness, I was more afflicted by the fear of bringing down your gray hairs with sorrow to the grave, than by all my own sufferings. O, father! father!" she continued, clasping the old man's hand, on which her hot tears trickled, "my heart is broken—you shall never again hear the merry laugh which gave you so much delight. My only hope of rest is in the grave, and happiness in heaven; and my only prayer to you is, that you will forgive your erring child, and that your hands will close her eyes when death shall have relieved her from her sufferings."

"God knows," said the old man, "that the sweetest dream of my life has been, that the last prayer of my departing spirit should be to invoke a blessing upon the head of my darling child. And, oh! how constantly have I entreated the Almighty that your hands might smooth my dying pillow, and that your breath might fan my aching temples, gentle and pure as the breeze of an angel's wing. I always thought that your death would kill me, but I now tell you that I would rather see you dead at my feet, than behold you as you are—the wife of that villain who has betrayed you."

"Oh! Father," she exclaimed, "I swear that I will never——"

"Stop," cried the old man, "I command you to make neither oath nor promise. Go to bed, as I will also, to seek a little rest. In the morning I shall command my sons to leave this matter for the present entirely in my hands, and I shall also desire the family to seek no explanation from you, as I know it all, and will, at a proper time, acquaint them with it. When I shall have satisfactorily arranged these things, I shall immediately go to Father Ned, who was the messenger sent here by heaven, when, on a former occasion, we were also in deep affliction on your account. He, like a true minister of the Gospel, warned us that we were ruining you, although he knew that he would thereby forfeit our friendship. It may be that God will make him once more the messenger of glad tidings, and at all events, I wish to show him that I am an altered man, that I now know and appreciate his truth, and that in this hour of trial it is in him I wish to repose my confidence."

Mary Ann eagerly seconded her father's proposal, and the result was Mr. O'Halloran's visit to me.

I went to Father John's bed-chamber, and without permitting him to rise, briefly repeated what Mr. O'Halloran had told me, and asked his advice as to how I should act, under all the circumstances. He said as there was no free consent, it was quite clear that there was no marriage either in law or in conscience, and consequently that Miss O'Halloran was perfectly at liberty to break of all connexion with Brown; but that it would be extremely imprudent to make this known to either of the parties until I had ascertained the exact state of their feelings. He did not doubt Miss O'Halloran's statement in the least particular, but at the same time he observed that she appeared to be a complete creature of impulse, that she was at present so overwhelmed by remorse that she did not understand her own feelings, and that as she had at one time freely consented to marry Brown, and had even forged a letter to effect this object, it was quite impossible not to believe that she entertained some affection for him. Moreover, although he did not entertain the slightest doubt but that she was innocent, he said that she had acted with great imprudence, and that an uncharitable world would most certainly put the very worst construction upon her actions. In fine, considering the stain which her character had received, the improbability that any respectable person would seek to make her his wife, the likelihood that, if the match were broken off now, both herself and her family would afterwards regret it, he gave it as his opinion, that no decisive step should be taken at present, and that if Brown conducted himself for a time so as to afford hopes that he would be a good husband, the best thing, perhaps, that could be done would be to have them married validly and legally.

These were precisely my own sentiments also, and I set out to Mr. O'Halloran's house, determined to follow, as far as practicable, the line of conduct pointed out by Father John, without, however, refusing their due weight to the desires and inclinations of the family, and especially of Mary Ann herself.

She was sitting on a couch when I arrived, supported by pillows, and so changed, that if I had seen her in any other place, I should not have known her. The bright eyes were dull and heavy, her face was deadly pale, and her delicate hands were of that transparent whiteness which is observable in those who are in an advanced stage of consumption. But all those blighting changes in the appearance of the beautiful girl struck me less forcibly than the absence of those dear friends who had formerly watched over her with so much anxiety and tenderness. Neither mother, brother, nor sister were with her; even Susan, her faithful attendant, had been dismissed, in spite of her tears, and a strange nurse sat by her bed-side, and watched over her. Oh! what a terrible havoc one thoughtless indiscretion will make of the affections of those who loved us most dearly. They feel that the hoarded love of years has been squandered on an unworthy object, and they are indignant to find the rich treasures of the heart so hopelessly wasted. And is not this both just and natural? Novelists often complain of the restraint which parents exercise over the affections of their children, but they forget to mention how often the children abandon those who have loved them from their infancy, to cast themselves away upon some worthless object.

Mary Ann O'Halloran was afflicted beyond expression by the abandonment of her relations, but most of all by that of her sister Julia. They had always been inseparable companions, they had loved each other most tenderly, and Mary Ann was in a manner worshipped by her elder sister. Indeed, it is certain that had it not been for the long absence from home of Julia, who was attending on a sick aunt, the connexion with Brown would never have been formed. She felt a kind of presentiment of evil when she took leave of her sister, and as she pressed her to her heart, she said to her,

"Mary Ann, promise me that you will not forget me, nor love any one more than me, till I return."

"Julia," replied her sister, "I shall never forget you, nor love any one so dearly as I love you."

After these words the girls parted, and when Julia returned, about a fortnight before my arrival, she found her sister strangely altered in her looks and manner. She vainly strove to gain her confidence, and from pitying her first on account of her evident unhappiness, she began to be hurt by her coldness. Poor Mary Ann longed to open her heart to her sister, and had only been prevented from doing so through the fear of losing her affection, and when her father set out for me, she sent for that loving sister, to weep upon her breast, and to make her the sharer of all her sorrows. A message, however, was brought back by the strange nurse, who was now the only attendant of the afflicted girl, that Miss O'Halloran could not see her at present. Oh! how this idol was cast down by its former worshippers. This cruel refusal was the death-knell of her hopes, for she now felt that even that gentle breast, in whose sweet and constant affection she could alone hope to take refuge from the scorn of the world, was estranged from her. It is not wonderful, therefore, that on my present visit, I found her as unwilling to live as she had been formerly unwilling to die, and that the world appeared to her now as full of falsehood and misery as it had formerly appeared to be the abode of truth and happiness. Deeply afflicted as I was by the misfortunes of this beautiful girl, I could not but rejoice at her humility and resignation. I saw that she at length put her whole trust in God, and that she loved Him with all her heart.

Although Susan Gorman had been dismissed, she did not abandon the service of her young mistress. She sought out Brown, informed him of what had occurred, and told him that if he had one spark of manly feeling he would write instantly to Mr. O'Halloran, that he was ready honorably to fulfil his contract with Mary Ann. Brown did write that he was ready to meet Mr. O'Halloran or any person whom he might choose, to explain how matters stood between himself and Miss Mary Ann O'Halloran, or as he should more correctly call her, Mrs. Brown; and that he was ready to do everything which the friends of the young lady might consider necessary. Mr. O'Halloran found this letter on his arrival, and I was summoned to be present at a solemn family consultation on its contents, the only person excluded from which was the one who was chiefly interested in the result. Julia, indeed, was also absent, but this was owing to indisposition.

At this conference, Mr. O'Halloran's two sons insisted vehemently that the marriage should be legally solemnized without the least delay, that the honour of the family was at stake, and that their sister must now abide by the choice which she had made. Their mother joined them in opinion, and almost silenced her husband, who had declared that his child's inclinations should not be forced, by asking him, if he thought it quite right to deprive a man of his wedded wife? I did not interfere, until my opinion was asked, and then, without mentioning the fact of the nullity of the marriage, I urged a little delay, not to ascertain the girl's inclinations (for I saw that this would have no weight), but to allow Brown time to reform his conduct; as to marry the girl to him at present, would be to deliver her up to certain misery and destruction.

"She should have thought of that," said her brother George, "before she became his wife, but now, as the old proverb has it, 'as she has made her bed, so must she lie down.'"

The poor girl, who had feared that this would be the decision of the family, had besought me in the most earnest and passionate manner to save her from Brown, and that she would not trouble them many weeks, as she felt that she could not survive her present affliction.

"Oh!" said she, "let me not be delivered up to that man, who has destroyed my peace in this world, and would blight my hopes of happiness in the next."

It is strange that at this time, when her mother and brothers looked upon her as a disgrace to them, and when even her father, who still loved her, was almost afraid to say a word in defence of his "Favourite Child," she appeared to me far more amiable than at any former period. Affliction had at once purified her of all her selfish and less amiable qualities, and it would have been impossible not to have been moved by the sight of the beautiful girl, all whose past follies now rushed upon her like an army of demons, and who was left in this her deep distress without a single friend to share her sorrows, or to speak one word of consolation. I, therefore, became her champion—pronounced the marriage null before both God and man, and appealed to Mr. O'Halloran not to allow his child to be sacrificed for an indiscretion of which they had been themselves the undoubted cause. The young men and their mother declared that this only made matters worse, and rendered the performance of the ceremony more urgent. It was ultimately resolved that Brown should be instantly communicated with, and that he should be requested to acquaint his family, who were then on the continent, with what had happened, with the view of having the preliminaries arranged and the marriage solemnized as speedily as possible.

This course, which Mr. O'Halloran peremptorily insisted on, ensured considerable delay—although it rendered the marriage certain, for old Mr. Brown was too upright a man, and Mary Ann was too much beloved by him and his family, to allow it to be doubted for a moment that he would cheerfully consent to the marriage. The old man came with me to visit his daughter, and, having embraced her tenderly, he went to his study to write to young Brown, leaving me to communicate to her the result of our deliberations.

I saw at once that something had occurred which greatly comforted the poor sufferer, for although there were still tears upon her cheeks, a sweet smile had taken the place of that look of utter desolation which had marked her countenance when I last saw her. As soon as her father left the room, she covered her face with her hands and wept profusely. Still I saw that this was a gush of affection rather than of sorrow.

"What is the matter," said I.

"Oh!" she replied, "dear Julia has been here, and loves me as tenderly as ever. I shall now die happy, since I have not lost the love of my darling sister. But my folly has made her very ill, and she can come here only by stealth, for my mother and brothers have prohibited her."

She was, however, greatly afflicted when I told her that she must make up her mind to marry Brown.

"Heavenly Father," she exclaimed, clasping her hands, "take me to thyself out of this sinful world, and do not permit me to be again led away from thee. Save me, O Lord, from becoming the slave of this man who would peril the salvation of my immortal soul."

I strove to comfort her in the best manner that I was able, told her to put her trust in her Saviour, and to ask the intercession of his Virgin Mother. Moreover, as the marriage was now resolved upon, I succeeded in reconciling the whole family to Mary Ann, and even in getting faithful Susan restored to her service. On Saturday morning I was obliged to set out for Father John's parish, in order to take my share of the duties of Sunday, but I promised to return early in the ensuing week.

The time which would seal the girl's fate for life, perhaps for eternity, came on apace. Mr. Brown was delighted at the prospect of a marriage which he hoped would be the means of reforming his son; he promised to make as large a settlement as possible upon him, and signified his own intention, as well as that of his whole family, to be present at the wedding.

No expense was spared, by Mr. O'Halloran, to deck out the bride with extraordinary splendour. The carpets were covered with silks, satins, laces, and other precious materials, and the little toilet-table of Mary Ann's dressing-room sparkled with jewellery. The bustle of preparation seemed to have completely chased away the dark cloud which, for some time past, had hung over the family. The servants thought their new gowns delightful; the bridesmaids, Julia and her bosom friend, Harriet Manning, thought their dresses exceedingly pretty and becoming, and the contagious gaiety of the young people infected, more or less, even the senior members of the family. But how did Mary Ann feel amid all these preparations for a festival which was to be celebrated in her honour? Like the poor fellow who, finding that he could not prevent himself from being carried over the falls of Niagara, calmly pulled his cloak around him, and met his fate without a struggle. She received Brown, who was now a constant visiter at the house, with a mingled sensation of terror, abhorrence, and disgust, which she struggled in vain to conceal. She retired to her room after their interviews, and, with tearful eyes, and on bended knees, besought God to take her out of the world, rather than permit her to become this man's wife. But she felt that if He did not save her she had no resource but to unite herself to Brown, in bonds which ought to be the links of love and of happiness, but which, alas! are often the chains of slavery and wretchedness. She believed that her own folly and indiscretion had rendered it necessary for her to sacrifice herself for the peace and honour of her family, and she determined not to shrink from her duty. At first she succeeded in hiding her sorrow and despair, so as to deceive even Susan and her sister. But as the time for her wedding drew near, her fortitude forsook her, and she gave way before these two faithful friends to passionate fits of weeping.

"Julia, my love," said she, kissing her sister, "I often think now of the happy times when you and I used to wander out together in the early spring, and weave garlands of the sweet violet and the modest primrose. When I am buried, I would like that you and Susan would sometimes visit me in the cold and lonely church-yard, and cast some wild flowers on my grave."

The girls could only answer with their tears. But when Julia recovered from her emotion, she started up and declared that she would instantly go to her father, and tell him that he must forbid a marriage which was breaking her sister's heart. Mary Ann stopped her by saying: "Dear Julia, you surely would not betray the weaknesses of your poor unfortunate sister. Do you not see how I conceal my feelings before my father, and how I strive to smile when he remarks my sunken cheeks and hollow eyes? No, dearest, I am in the hands of God, and if He pleases, He can take me out of this world before the time fixed for my marriage; but if He leaves me here, my only consolation will be to atone, as far as I am able, by this marriage, for the unhappiness which I have caused my family, and for the sorrow which I have brought upon my father's gray hairs."

Every person in the house, indeed, now saw that the "Favourite Child" was drooping her fair head like a tender flower, and yet no one made the slightest effort to save her. This was, most probably, owing to the conduct of William Brown. He seemed all at once to have reformed his life. He abandoned his lewd companions, drunken brawls, and cock-fighting, visited Mr. O'Halloran's two or three times in the week, and went to Mass regularly every Sunday. "He had not," he admitted, "quite made up his mind on religious matters, but, by gad, he thought the old religion the best, especially as it was the one which Mary Ann professed." Old Mr. Brown was delighted at the reformation in his son's morals, "and as to his being a Catholic," he said, "I have not the slightest objection to that." Mr. O'Halloran and his family thought that all this change in the reckless youth proved the depth of his devotion to Mary Ann, and that he would be a kind and devoted husband. They therefore concluded, and not unnaturally, that the girl's grief would not long survive her marriage, and that she had as fair a prospect of happiness as the average of those who enter for better or worse into matrimony. But Mary Ann herself never participated, for a moment, in these feelings; she believed truly that Brown's reformation was only a pretence, that she was herself a doomed victim, and like Jephte's daughter, she did not shrink from the sacrifice.

Mr. Brown had been making some repairs in his house during the absence of his family, so that even William, who alone remained in the country, but seldom lived at home, for he had taken lodgings in the town of —, which was about twelve miles distant. Latterly, however, he frequently made a visit of a few days at a time to Mr. O'Halloran's. On one of those occasions he had come on Sunday to stay until Monday morning, when he was to proceed to town to meet his family, who were to arrive there on that day; in which case the marriage was to be solemnized on the following Tuesday. If any accident should delay Mr. Brown and his family, the young man was to apprise the O'Halloran's by special message. After dinner on Sunday, when Brown and the old man were alone over their wine, the latter said:

"William, you did not come in time for Mass to-day."

"No, but I heard Mass in town."

"Oh! very well. I have consulted my lawyer about your marriage with Mary Ann, and I find that it must be solemnized in church to render it legally valid."

"Hang it," said the young man, "that is very hard as we are both Catholics. Besides, the minister cannot bear the sight of me since my conversion; and I hope you will not insist on this, as you know it to be totally unnecessary."

"I know no such thing, Sir," replied the old man, indignantly, "and I can assure you that Mary Ann will either be your wife according to the laws of the land, or she will not be your wife at all. I demand to know, this instant, your intentions on this point."

"My intentions on this point, as well as upon every other, are to do all that you shall require. Have I not sufficiently shown you by my whole conduct, that my sole desire is to make Mary Ann my happy and contented wife?"

"If I did not think so," said Mr. O'Halloran, "I would sacrifice my property and life, rather than give her to you."

Just at this moment a servant entered, with a letter for Brown. He turned deadly pale on seeing the superscription. Fortunately for him, however, Mr. O'Halloran was too much absorbed by his own thoughts to notice his emotion. He put the letter into his pocket without breaking the seal, and then asked how it had been brought?

"By your own servant," replied the man, "who wishes to see you instantly."

Excusing himself to the old man, Brown went out, and held a hurried conference with his servant, who evidently considered the intelligence of great importance, for he had travelled from town as fast as a fleet horse could carry him. The communication excited Brown very much also, for ordering his own horse to be got ready, and telling his servant to go before him at a swift pace, with his jaded steed, and that he would soon overtake him, he returned into the parlour, and begged Mr. O'Halloran to excuse him to the ladies, as he must depart instantly on business of the last importance.

"I hope nothing unpleasant has happened," said the old man.

"Something very unpleasant, indeed," replied Brown, "but I hope to be able to prevent it. That little property which I am about to purchase with Mary Ann's fortune and my own, and where I hope to make her a happy home during her life, is in danger of being bought up by a speculator, and my lawyer has written for me to go town without any delay."

Mr. O'Halloran's sons, who had retired shortly after the ladies, in order to afford their father an opportunity of conversing alone with Brown, now returned to the parlour, and asked their father the cause of that gentleman's abrupt departure. He told them it was a letter from his lawyer.

"That is strange," said the elder of the young men, "for Donnelly, who brought it in, told me that the superscription was in a lady's hand-writing."

"Oh!" replied his father, who was now satisfied that young Brown would act honourably, "Donnelly is but a poor judge of such matters, and besides the lawyer may have desired his wife or daughter to write the superscription for him."

"I confess," said the younger of the boys, "I have been told a great deal of evil concerning Brown, which I have endeavoured not to believe, but I think he knows us well enough not to dare to play us false, or to trifle with us."

Brown very soon overtook his servant, whom he commanded to put his horse to his speed, and accompany him. The man said it would kill the poor animal.

"D—n you and him," cried Brown, "is not that my loss, and not yours? Do as I order you."

They rode furiously until they reached the town, and then Brown, dismounting, and throwing the reins to the servant, told him to get some person whom he could trust, to look after the horses, and to follow him immediately to a certain hotel. The master arrived there first, and immediately enquired for a lady. He was shown into a private room, where he found the person whom he expected, attended by a maid servant, who had a child of about six months old in her arms.

"Why, in the devil's name, have you come here at this time," he exclaimed, as soon as the door was shut, "to ruin both yourself and me? Did you not know that I would go back to you as soon as I could get something to keep us from starving?"

"Oh! William," said the lady, who spoke English very correctly, although she was evidently a foreigner, "can you wonder that, when I am cast off by all the world on your account, I should come to you to seek for protection. When I became your wife, in Switzerland, two years ago, I enjoyed a lucrative and pleasant situation of governess in Lord H——'s family, and I had loving parents ever ready to receive me with open arms. But as soon as Lady H—— saw that I was enciente, she dismissed me with insults, treating my marriage as a fiction, and my parents refused to admit me into their house. I need not repeat, for you already know from my letters, the sufferings and the want which I have endured, I might have borne this myself, but when I saw your own child starving, when for months you neither came nor wrote to me, I felt, like Agar in the wilderness, as if I and my little one must perish. At that time, however, I met with an angel in human form. I saw a party of English travellers who had just arrived, and as there were several young ladies with them, and I spoke English well, I followed them to the inn where they stopped, and applied to them to engage me as governess. They refused, and I began to weep bitterly. A young officer, who was of the party, seeming to take pity on me, I related to him my story, without, however, violating your commands never to mention your name until you gave me permission. After I had ended, he conversed for a short time with the others in a low tone, and then the mother of the young ladies said that she was going to remain for a short time in Switzerland, and that if I engaged with her, she would take me with her to Ireland (to which country the whole party belonged) and that when we arrived there, she would supply me with the means of proceeding to any part of the kingdom I pleased. I was but a very short time in this lady's employment until I discovered that she was your mother, that the elderly gentleman who accompanied her was your father, and that the young gentlemen and ladies, a portion of whom were under my care, were your brothers and sisters. The family intended to have remained some weeks in Switzerland after I joined them, and I was about to write to you, to acquaint you with the situation which I held in your family, and to ask your advice as to how I should act, but I was prevented by a most unexpected announcement from Mr. Brown—that we must prepare to set out for Ireland immediately. You may imagine with what anguish I learned from one of your sisters that you were about to be married to the most beautiful young lady she had ever seen, and that the family were hurrying home, to be present at the nuptials. I tore the half-written letter which I was about to send you, and became more eager for the journey than any of my companions. I believe I have been the cause of our arriving here a day earlier than we expected. As soon as the family reached a hotel, they sent to enquire if you were in town, but were informed that you had gone to Mr. O'Halloran's, whose daughter you were about to marry. When I heard this, I almost fainted, but no one present had the slightest idea of the cause of my emotion. This incident fortunately enabled me to excuse myself from accompanying the family to church in the evening, and as soon as I was left alone, I sent for your servant, who, I understood, was in town, and when he came to me, I gave him the note, which he took to you, to Mr. O'Halloran's; and I told him at the same time that if he valued your life, he would carry it to you without a moment's delay. He was impressed by the wildness of my manner, by my foreign appearance, and, doubtless, also by the knowledge that I had come in the company of your family, and he promised at once to execute my commands in the manner I desired. I then obtained from him the name of this hotel, which he said was the most private in town, and desired him to tell you, that you would find me here. And now," she continued, taking her child in her arms, and throwing herself on her knees, "I beseech you not to desert your poor wife, and your infant child in a strange land. Oh! William, if you knew how devotedly I have loved you, how I have cherished your image in my heart, and how you have been the object of my thoughts, day and night, you would not abandon me for any other."

"Amelie," said Brown, "I never before had any intention of abandoning you, but I swear by the living G—d, that I will do so now, and for ever, if you do not obey me. It is just nine o'clock, there is a ship to sail for England in half an hour, and you must go back in that ship, and remain at B—— until I join you. This will not be longer than a fortnight at most, and here is money to support you and your child."

"I cannot go, indeed," said his wife, "for when I left the hotel where your family are stopping, I gave the waiter a note for Mrs. Brown, saying that I had only gone out for a walk, which I thought would do me good, and as I must see my kind friends before my departure, I cannot possibly leave town to-night."

"We shall see that, by G——" said he, and he rang the bell violently. When the waiter appeared, he asked if his own servant had arrived, and being answered in the affirmative, desired him to be sent up. To him he whispered a few words, and then changing his manner, advanced to console his wife, by assuring her that although his family wished him to marry Mary Ann O'Halloran, he would not, and could not do so, as he had already a lawful wife; but that it was absolutely necessary for her to leave the country for a little time, as his father was about to settle a handsome fortune on him; whereas if he found out his marriage, he would most indubitably disinherit him, and thus consign both himself and his wife and children, to hopeless beggary. He proceeded in this strain until his servant returned, and then desired his wife and the maid to follow him, bringing with them the child and whatever else belonged to them. They did so, but his wife told him firmly, as they went down stairs, that nothing would induce her to steal away like a guilty wretch, without taking leave of her kind friends; but she promised to depart as early as he pleased in the morning.

He made no reply, but when they had reached the inn-yard, attempted, with the aid of his servant, to thrust her into a chaise which had been evidently ordered to take her away to the ship. She resisted, and called loudly for help. Brown became furious as a demon, and struck her so violently on the face that it was soon covered with blood. She uttered a loud scream, and fainted in the arms of the servant.

"Throw her into the chaise," cried Brown, fiercely, "and you will follow her," seizing the maid, "unless you wish to be served in the same manner."

"Hold," cried a young man who had just rode into the yard, and had witnessed the cowardly blow, and heard the scream, as he was dismounting from his horse, "no person with the feelings of a man would strike a woman in that way."

"I say," said Brown, "he must be an impudent puppy who meddles in my affairs."

"And I say," retorted the other, "he must be a brute who can act as you have done."

Brown replied by a blow, and the stranger returned it with such interest that his antagonist measured his length upon the pavement. Brown's servant struck the young man with his whip—but he instantly lay beside his master. When Brown got up, he would doubtless have renewed the combat, if the screams of the maid had not, by this time, gathered a crowd from the inn and the street, who prevented a renewal of the strife. Every one was enquiring of his neighbour the cause of the uproar, which none seemed able to explain, and Brown, taking advantage of the confusion, leaped into the carriage, where the lady still lay insensible, and ordered the postilion to drive away for his life, and to trample down any one who obstructed his progress. But his very touch seemed to restore the lady to consciousness, and uttering, in a wild and piercing shriek, the words "save me! save me!" she attempted to get out of the carriage. But she was instantly held down violently, and her cries stifled. The horses dashed off at full speed, and, as generally happens on such occasions, some well-meaning persons were holding the innocent party, whilst the guilty was left at liberty. But when the stranger heard the scream, and saw the horses starting, he became possessed of almost superhuman strength, and bursting from his captors, in whose hands he left several shreds of his garments, he reached the carriage by a few bounds, and seized one of the horses by the head. Finding that he could not stop the horses, and that he was in danger of falling, on account of the rapidity with which he was dragged along, he drew a large key out of his pocket, and commanded the driver, who was whipping violently, to pull up, or he was a dead man. Fortunately, the postilion mistook the key for a pistol (for it was now dark), and having suddenly stopped the horses, leaped to the ground, and ran away, declaring that he would not lose his life between them. Before Brown could get out of the carriage, and shut in the lady, who struggled violently to free herself, the stranger had cut the traces. To escape was now impossible, and the crowd, which had again surrounded the carriage, demanded that the lady should be let out. At this moment, a gentleman came up, and saying that he was a magistrate, demanded the cause of the uproar. At sight of this person, for by this time torches and lanterns had been brought, young Brown seemed very like a person who was about to sneak away, but the gentleman happening to see him, cried out:

"Why, God bless me, William, I thought you were at Mr. O'Halloran's. How are you," he continued, shaking his son warmly by the hand (for it was old Mr. Brown).

Before he could receive any answer, the lady, who had by this time got out of the carriage, rushed up to him, and seizing him by the arm, implored him to save her from that man.

"What villain has done this?" cried the old man, when he saw the lady's face and dress covered with blood.

"It was your own son, my husband, O God! that I should have to call a devil incarnate by that name. But I renounce him from this moment. I thought he would have smothered me in the carriage, and he swore the most frightful oaths that he would murder me if I ever again crossed his path. Oh, Sir, have pity on me, for I am alone in a strange land."

"Why," said the old man, "we have been searching for you during the last two hours. But come with me now, and I will have this affair thoroughly investigated, for if your statement be true, that is the greatest villain"—he was about to say more, but on looking for his son, he found that he had disappeared.

When young Brown had perceived that all was discovered, he sought the stranger, who had gone to the outside of the crowd with the evident intention of avoiding the old gentleman, and when he had found him, said in a low tone:

"You know me, Frederick?"

"Of course I know you now, William; but I did not know you in the dark."

"That was quite natural, for six years make a great change in boys. I did not know, in the dark, who my assailant was; and if I had not heard of your return about three weeks ago, I might not have recognized you now. I was formerly your sworn friend, I am now your deadly enemy, and nothing but your life will satisfy my revenge. Where can you be found in half an hour?"

"In the inn where we met to-night; but I have no notion of duelling with you, or with any one else, for I have no right either to take away your life, or to give you mine."

"Then, by H——, I will horsewhip you in the public streets."

This stranger who had rescued Amelie, was the same young man who had been the means of first introducing her into Mr. Brown's family, although on the present occasion she had not recognized him, or rather she had not seen him. His name was Frederick Manning, and his sister, Harriet Manning, was the young lady whom we have already mentioned as Julia O'Halloran's bosom friend, and who was to be one of the bride-maids at Mary Ann O'Halloran's wedding. Mrs. Manning was still living, but her husband had died many years ago, leaving her an ample fortune, and two children, a son and a daughter. He had been a distinguished officer in the army, and his son, although only thirteen years of age when his father died, had yet heard from him of battles, "and longed to follow to the field some warlike lord." His mother, after trying in vain to persuade him to abandon the intention of encountering the perils of the field, purchased for him an ensign's commission, in his nineteenth year. He soon after joined his regiment, which he accompanied to India, and fought with distinguished bravery in the wars against Tippoo Sultan. After remaining nearly six years in the east, and obtaining the rank of captain, his health became somewhat impaired, and as peace was now restored in that part of the world, it was thought advisable for him to return to Europe. On his way home, he had met Mr. Brown and his family, who were old and valued friends of his, and they had induced him to accompany them in a brief tour through Switzerland, in order that he might see the wonders of that glorious and romantic country. He remained with them but a short time, for he was impatient, he said, to see his mother and sister. He did not tell them, perhaps he did not even acknowledge to himself, that there was one other person whom he was still more anxious to see, and that person was Mary Ann O'Halloran. She was little more than a child when he left home, and he had never breathed to her, or to any one else a word which could betray his feelings; but he recalled nothing with so great delight as his rambles with the two fair sisters, over the green fields, where he gathered the wild flowers which they wove into garlands; and the hope that they would hear and approve of his exploits, sustained him amid the privations of the camp and the perils of the battle. He also loved his mother and sister dearly, and he thought with what proud affection they would embrace him when he returned to them, covered with glory.

When his mother and sister had embraced him many times, and he had endeavoured to answer a few of the countless questions which they asked him, about himself, he took his sister's hand, and said playfully,

"Come, Harriet, you must not have all the questioning to yourself. It is my turn to interrogate you now, and I desire to know how all our old friends are?"

"Oh!" cried Harriet, "how stupid I am, not to know that you have been thinking all this time of Julia O'Halloran. Frederick, she has grown so beautiful, that you would not know her. And she is so good and loving, that she never thinks of herself at all. He will be a happy man who will get Julia for a wife, and indeed the young gentlemen know this, for she has had more proposals than I could count; but she has refused them all; and perhaps I could guess the reason, for she and I were never tired of talking about a certain young gentleman who was far away from us. But, oh! if you saw her devotion to her poor sister, you could not but love her."

"What of her?" cried the young man, who was alarmed by the tone in which Harriet had mentioned her.

"God bless me; Frederick, you gave me such a start!—Why there is nothing the matter with her. She is only going to be married."

"To whom?"

"To your old friend, William Brown."

The young man shortly afterwards, pleading fatigue, retired to his bed-chamber."

"Thus," said he, when he was alone, "ends for ever my dream of happiness. I cannot blame her for this, for she never knew that I loved her; and, indeed, when I knew her, she was only a child. If I had known this, I would have left my bones in India."

On the next day, his sister told him, as a secret, that they were, in fact, already married, but that as soon as the Browns returned, the ceremony was to be repeated with great pomp, and that she was to be bridesmaid. How anxiously he had looked forward, through long years, to this morning, when he could again, as of old, ride to Mr. O'Halloran's house, and behold those whom he had left almost children, now grown into womanly beauty, and again visit with them, those scenes which had ever been the sweetest memories of his early years. But now that the long-looked-for morning had arrived, this was the very last place upon the whole earth to which he could think of going. His sister begged of him to accompany her to Mr. O'Halloran's, as she had promised to go and help to get Mary Ann's wedding-dresses ready, but although she delayed her visit for several days, she could never alter his resolution of remaining at home with his mother, and he at length forced her to go without him. Old Mr. Brown and his sons visited him, and pressed him very much to spend a few days with them; but he pleaded the state of his health as an excuse, and remained at home. Poor Julia lost her spirits, and when Harriet and she were alone, she told her that she thought it very unkind of Frederick, that he would not come and see his old friends.

"Don't mind, my love," said Harriet, kissing her tenderly, "he will be here at the wedding."

And indeed Mrs. Manning had promised that she and Frederick would be present at the ceremony. But on the Sunday before the nuptials were to take place, Frederick suddenly remembered that he had neglected to execute for a brother officer in India, a most important business, which brooked no delay, and which, moreover, would occupy him for four or five days. All his mother's entreaties could not induce him to defer it, so he set out that very evening for the town of —, where he encountered William Brown and Amelie in the manner already related.

He had reached his inn but a very short time, when a military officer desired to speak with him in private. He was the bearer of a hostile message from Brown, and although he knew that neither reason nor religion allowed him to risk his own life, or to strive to take that of another in a duel, yet such is the tyranny which the opinion of the world exercises over us, that he immediately went to a friend, in whose hands he placed his honour and his life. This friend being an extremely honourable man, brought him word, in something less than half an hour, that at six o'clock in the morning he must make a target of himself, at the distance of twelve paces.

We will not attempt to analyze the feelings with which he made his will, and wrote letters which were to be delivered to his mother and sister, in case he should be killed. Suffice it to say, that he went through all this with a breaking heart, and that after spending a sleepless night, he was on the ground, with his second and a surgeon, at the appointed hour in the morning; but Brown did not appear at six o'clock, nor at a quarter past.

"This is d—d shabby of Brown," said Frederick Manning's friend, who was a great connoisseur in affairs of honour; "if he does not appear in half an hour, I shall march you off the ground, and challenge Bertram, who arranged this affair with me last night. I'm devilish sorry, but according to strict etiquette, I must shoot him."

In a few minutes, however, Captain Bertram arrived, alone.

"Where is Brown?" roared Major Swinford, who was Frederick's second.

"Why, I'm d—d," replied Bertram, "but he's dead."

"It was a d—d queer thing of him," said Swinford, "to die at such an awkward time."

But it was true nevertheless, for the excitement of the previous evening, which was not allayed by drinking deeply afterwards, brought on a fit of apoplexy during the night, and when his second called upon Brown in the morning, he was found dead in his bed.

All his villany was soon made public, and Mary Ann O'Halloran knew that when he had united himself to her, he was already a married man. Being delivered providentially from so great a calamity, and the terror of being forced to spend her life with Brown, she recovered her good looks and buoyant spirits, and became once more the "Favourite Child." But she was an altered woman; instead of being vain, worldly, and selfish, she was humble, devout, and self-denying. She now deserved the love which had been formerly so wastefully squandered upon her. When Frederick Manning therefore saw her, she appeared to him gay, innocent, and guileless—just as he had beheld her in his happiest dreams.

"I say," said he to his sister, about four months after Brown's death, "what a beautiful angel Mary Ann O'Halloran is?"

"She is indeed," said Harriet, "but I know a greater beauty and a brighter angel!"

"Who is she?"

"Julia O'Halloran."

"I don't believe it," cried Frederick, "for it is not possible."

"She will be here in a few days, for her aunt is better, and then you shall judge for yourself."

This decided Frederick to try his fortune immediately, for he thought, that if Julia had formerly entertained any affection for him, it would be best for her to know on her return, that he was engaged to her sister. Accordingly he offered his heart and his hand to Mary Ann O'Halloran; but she firmly refused.

"May I hope," said he, "that at some future time you will change this determination?"

"Never," she replied; "not, however, that I am insensible of your worth, or of the honour you have done me. But when God saved me from great perils, I implored Him, through the intercession of His Mother, to direct me how I could make him some return of love. I think it was an inspiration from heaven which whispered to my heart that I ought to consecrate the remainder of my life to Him, by becoming a Sister of Charity. With a grateful heart, I vowed this sacrifice to God, and nothing could tempt me to break my promise. I have not yet told my relatives of my resolution; but I think it only just to mention it to you; and now," she continued, giving him her hand, "you must never mention this subject to me again; and I will beg of God, on my bended knees, to grant you a wife more worthy of your noble and generous nature. I have only one more favour to ask of you, and that is, that you will never mention to any one that you have made me this proposal until after your marriage."

He pressed her hand to his heart, and then abruptly departed, without making any reply. On the next day he set out for a distant part of the country, to visit some of his relations. He did not return for two months, and then his arrival was so unexpected, that he surprised Julia O'Halloran, who had come to spend a few days with his mother and sister. Julia blushed deeply, and Frederick was scarcely less embarrassed. But this did not last long, and when Julia had retired, and Harriet was about to bid her brother good-night, she said:

"Well, Fred, was I right?"

"Why n—no," said he, "not quite; but she is the most dazzlingly beautiful, and the most angelic creature I ever knew, except Mary Ann."

His sister ran off, laughing; and when she was alone, said;

"Thank God! I have managed that. If I had told even mamma, that he was coming here to-day, Julia would have heard it, and gone away. But I knew that whenever they should meet, the marriage would soon follow."

And the arch girl was right, for it was solemnized in less than two months. No one was more heartily glad, or more sincerely happy at the wedding than Mary Ann. She shortly afterwards, with the full consent of her parents, entered a convent of the Sisters of Charity, where she was loved by the sisterhood, and almost adored by the poor and the afflicted, who looked upon her as a ministering angel, sent from heaven to comfort and console them, and to relieve their corporal and spiritual necessities. Before entering the convent, her father gave her five thousand pounds, which was to have been her fortune when she should marry. Her first act was to bestow two thousand pounds upon Brown's unfortunate widow, who had returned to her own country, and was living in great indigence.

Susan Gorman soon followed her beloved young mistress to the convent, and never were there two more pious and happy spinsters. And when Mrs. O'Halloran died, and the rest of his family were married, and surrounded with new cares, the old man went to live near his "Favourite Child," who now visited and consoled him, and returned with interest the affection which he had always lavished on her. His dearest wish was also gratified, for it was her hand that closed his eyes, when his pure spirit flew to heaven, on a Christmas morning, just as the convent organ was pealing the loud Hallelujah, in honour of the Saviour's Nativity.

TOWARDS the conclusion of the year 1824, the Association was increasing marvellously in wealth, in power, and in importance; and was evidently producing the greatest embarrassment to the government of Ireland, then directed by the Marquis Wellesley, and in no slight degree influenced by the left-handed wisdom of Mr. Peel. The priest at the altar was preaching in its behalf, the peasant in his cabin was ready to act, at its command—the female peasantry were forgetting their village gossip, and learning to speak politics, and even the young children could talk of nothing but the Association, O'Connell, and Ireland. 'Twas then the seeds of political agitation were sown which shot up with such force and energy in two years afterwards. Although the Association wisely disclaimed any claim to representative powers, yet it was considered by the people to actually possess them. The publicity given to all its proceedings was a great check upon the orange party, who if they did any thing wrong, were certain that their misdeeds would come before the public, and infamy attached to their names, not only where they were known, but wherever a public journal circulated. Besides this, if any illegal act was committed by an orangeman, immediate notice of it could be sent to the "committee of grievances," which was a species of grand jury, composed of barristers and attorneys, who sat upon each case that was brought before them, and according to the evidence, and their knowledge of the law, decided whether or not it was liable to prosecution. If it were, the client's expenses were paid for by the Association, and he was supplied with lawyer and attorney, neither of whom forgot their fees, nor their bill of costs.*

At this time, the opponents of the Association, designated it, an "imperium in imperio," and with some justice, for though the Marquis Wellesley might call himself the "governor of Ireland," the Association was at the time "viceroy over him," and much more feared than he was by one party, and far more respected by the other. The Association kept a watch-

* There was a Mr. Forde, an attorney, in the Association, who was a very active member of the Finance Committee, and so distinguished himself in curtailing the accounts against the Association, that he was entitled "their Joseph Hume"—a title in which, I am told, Mr. Forde justly took a great deal of pride.

ful eye upon the members of the English and the Irish government, and censured their proceedings with a bold and a fearless tongue.

Under the guidance and control of Mr. O'Connell, the Association contrived to keep itself within the limits of the law; but it had already given too much offence to be permitted to pass without an attempt to punish some of its members, if not to extinguish the body altogether. For the latter remedy, the administration was obliged to wait for the meeting of parliament, and in order to accomplish the former, the counsellors of the crown resorted to the low and mean expedient of hiring informers to attend the Association meetings. The government had not then thought of the fair, open, and safe plan of employing short-hand writers—men capable of giving correct reports, and incapable of committing their characters, by lending themselves to misrepresentation. This plan, however, was afterwards adopted, and the government sent to every meeting of the Association—first, Mr. Dawbarn, and afterwards Mr. Farquharson—both men of great talent, and the purest integrity.* Unfortunately for the fame and character of the crown lawyers, they had not such agents in the Association in 1824—they listened to the slanderous misrepresentation of some hired spy, who had sufficient cunning to enable him to plan mischief, but to whom nature had not given the requisite quantity of intellect to complete it. Acting upon the suggestion of this spy, whoever he was, a prosecution for sedition was commenced by the Rt. Hon. William Conyngham Plunkett, his Majesty's attorney-general, against Mr. O'Connell, for having had the audacity to wish, that if ever Ireland should be reduced to the same state as the South American colonies, there would arise in the country some man like Bolivar, who would be able to shake off the chains of the oppressor, and free her from the degradation of bondage. This was the substance of the constitutional sentiment for which a prosecution was instituted against Mr. O'Connell.

I believe that this prosecution would never have been thought of at the time, if it were not for the very remarkable manner in which the report of this sentiment appeared in the Saunders's News-Letter, when the Reporter (Mr. Elrington) stepped a little beyond the strict line of his duty, by affixing not less than six notes of admiration after this passage.† The report of Mr. O'Connell's speech, as it appeared in Saunders, seemed an extremely bold one, and was the subject of very general observation for some days. By the Association it was not regarded, as they had before that time complained of being misrepresented in that paper.

This obnoxious sentiment of Mr. O'Connell's was given utterance to on the 16th December, when handing in the subscription of £5 from the editors of the London Examiner. In a couple of days afterwards it was as completely forgotten by the Catholics as if it had never been spoken.

* Mr. Farquharson dined with the Dublin Reporters, on our return from the first Clare election, and in the course of the evening, we were naturally speaking of the laborious life of a Reporter, when I chanced to say—"Farquharson, I have often remarked, that I never yet have seen an old Reporter—you have been a long time connected with the London press, pray tell me what you do with them." "Why, I can easily answer that question," said Farquharson, in his dry, caustic manner, "In London, when the Reporters get old and stupid, we make—editors of them."

† Mr. Elrington used to account for the number of admiration notes thus, "I only put three—the printer added a fourth—the reader a fifth—and the corrector a sixth. I should bear but one half the blame, and the printing-office the other."

On the 22nd December, notes were received at the different newspaper offices, and addressed to the Reporters—these notes were written by Mr. Pemberton, of the Head Police Office, and as the one addressed to me commenced “Dear Sir,” I thought I was about to learn from the writer something of importance to the newspaper with which I was connected, and not to “stand” the “question” on a subject in which I myself could be interested. I was not then aware, no more than the other Reporters (excepting those connected with the Register) that Mr. O’Connell had been arrested the night before. I was, at the time I entered the police-office, completely ignorant that such an important event had taken place. On my arrival there, I was shown into the board-room by Mr. Ross Cox—a gentleman connected with that establishment, and who is as clever at penning a paragraph, or composing an epigram, as he is expeditious in drawing up an information. I had immediately the honour of an interview with Alderman Darley, when the following conversation took place between us ;

“You are, I believe, Sir, a Reporter?” “I am.”

“You were at the Association last Thursday?”

“I was.”

“Did you hear Mr. O’Connell say anything about Bolivar?”

“About Bolivar!—no—not that I recollect.”

“I am afraid you must be under some mistake—did you not hear him say anything to the following effect (here the worthy Alderman read the report from the Saunders)?”

“I never heard him make use of such an expression in my life.”

“Then I beg pardon for troubling you ; I wish you a good morning, Sir.”

Thus ended my examination at the Head Police Office ; and I verily believe the Alderman did not credit one word I uttered, although I had stated nothing but the plain truth ; for I really had left the Association a few minutes before Mr. O’Connell had delivered the speech in question. My examination had, I believe this effect—that it put the law officers upon a wrong scent. In a few days afterwards I received a second summons, and though I was ignorant, or, in fact, careless of the consequences of my disobedience, I refused to attend to it.

Amongst the Reporters there was but one general feeling—of disgust at the conduct of the government towards them—seeking to bring them before the public in the odious light of informers. Two of the Reporters, Mr. Charles O’Flaherty, of the Morning Post, and Mr. Byrne, of The Star, who were obliged to attend before the grand jury, gave their evidence in such a manner, and so favourable to Mr. O’Connell, that it was impossible the grand jury could consistently with their oaths act otherwise than they did—by throwing out the bills.

To hear the Reporters speaking of the government at this time, in the Head Office and in the very presence of the magistrates, it would be at once perceived that they were far more violent in their expressions, and more seditious in their language than the gentleman had ever been against whom it was sought to entrap them as witnesses. Upon this occasion, no man acted with more spirit than Mr. Haydn, the proprietor of the Star, who absolutely and totally refused to give the slightest aid or assistance to government.

Mr. Vousden, of the Morning Post, refused, point blank, to afford the magistrates the slightest information. Mr. Leech, of the Freeman’s Journal, and Mr. R. N. Kelly (a reporter for a “saints” newspaper which died shortly afterwards), were both served with crown summonses—they, rather than “appear and give evidence,” fled from Dublin, and the one concealed himself in Belfast, while the other hid himself in the wilds of Connaught. For this contumacy on their part, they were each fined £100—a fine which, it is due to the government to state, was never attempted to be levied.

Upon the 31st December, the commission court in Green-street, opened. It was well known that it was here the bills against Mr. O’Connell would be presented. Public curiosity was at its height—the court was crowded to excess, the very moment the doors were opened ; and the neighbouring streets were filled with people anxious to learn the result of the day’s proceedings.

Mr. O’Connell was engaged at this commission in the prosecution which the Marquis of Westmeath had instituted against some persons in his employment, for perjury alleged to have been committed by them, in the long continued divorce case between himself and his wife. Mr. O’Connell accordingly appeared in court in his wig and gown, and after a friendly nod to Mr. J. S. Townsend, the representative of the “diabolus regis” on this occasion, he applied to the court to fix a day for the hearing of the Westmeath case. In making this application, there was not perceptible in the voice or manner of Mr. O’Connell any very material change, but he looked certainly much paler than usual, and occasionally appeared completely absorbed in thought. That Mr. O’Connell had reason to fear the result of the decision of the grand jury, cannot be a matter of wonder, when it is remembered that upon that grand jury there was, as in all other political cases, not one Catholic, and there were many violent orangemen ; it was, however, fortunate for Mr. O’Connell that Mr. Plunkett was hated even more than himself by the orangemen. That was one great cause for throwing out the bills—another was, the strong testimony given in favour of O’Connell by O’Flaherty and Byrne.*

I should not omit to state, that upon this occasion, the grand jury were charged by Mr. Justice Moore—a man, whose lot it has been to decide upon the consequences of many of the political struggles in Ireland, and who came out of every one of them with increased fame. A more humane, upright, and benevolent man, I believe, there never moved in society, and a more honourable judge never sat upon the bench of justice.

The counsel selected by Mr. O’Connell, upon this occasion, were men well known to the people—they were Mr. Wallace, Mr. Perrin, Mr. Holmes, Mr. O’Loughlin, and Mr. Shiel.

The first of these, Mr. Wallace, is a gentleman who, by his industry and talents, has raised himself from the humblest station in society to be an eminent practitioner at the bar, and a member of the united parliament. I am told that it was not until he had passed his twentieth year, that a desire for distinction seized upon Mr. Wallace ; then often seen—for he was an humble weaver in the Liberty—working at his loom, and at the same time endeavouring to improve himself by reading some classical work which he had placed before him. In a few years, Mr. Wallace was enabled to practice at the bar, and there he appeared, without money, friends, or patronage. In a short time, however, his great talents as a nisi-prius lawyer became known—his dexterity in cross-examining a witness—his powers in addressing a jury, and his devotion to the interests of his clients, speedily won for him the rewards which he would not stoop to obtain. If Mr. Wallace had been of a crouching disposition, or if his principles were of that pliant nature that he could bend them to his own interests, there cannot be the least doubt but that he would have rapidly procured the highest and most lucrative situations in his profession. Mr. Wallace having conscientiously adopted certain political principles, perseveringly adhered to them through “every change and chance of fortune.”

* It was the intention of government had Mr. O’Connell been convicted, to have had him disbarred.

Mr. Perrin did by his devotion to the interests of his client, two or three times, put his life in danger—on one occasion he was violently and brutally assaulted, because he refused to give a gentleman the opportunity of shooting him for having obtained damages to a very large amount for his client.* In advocating any cause, Mr. Wallace was certainly apt to indulge in a latitude of expression that was for the moment as useful to those by whom he was engaged, as it was likely to be offensive to the party to whom he was opposed. That Mr. Wallace did not succeed in parliament was a matter of wonder and astonishment to his friends, for he was gifted with far more sterling talent, and a thousand times more useful and local knowledge than others, his contemporaries, who were received with no slight degree of favour by the honourable house. I can account for his failure only in this way—that the night he selected for his début was not one of those on which he was well calculated to produce a favourable impression. In the law-courts I have often seen Mr. Wallace plead, and whether it originated in indisposition, or dislike to the cause in which he was engaged, he did not seem to be the same person in clearness of thought, accuracy of style, or dignity of manner. There was some unevenness in his capabilities for display—at one time he is most powerful and eloquent, at another, he was dull, ineffective, and common-place.

Mr. Perrin is the son of a schoolmaster, Monsieur Perrin, the author of a French grammar, much used in the schools in Ireland. Like Mr. Wallace, Mr. Perrin has won his way at the bar unaided by any patron. He is considered one of the best black-letter lawyers in the courts, and though an ungraceful pleader, was always listened to with great attention by the bench. Mr. Perrin, like Mr. Wallace, advocated a line of politics which was long unfavourable to his advancement at the bar—so much so, that there was

* I may mention one instance of Mr. Wallace's generosity, it will serve to show how apt he was to forget his own pecuniary interest in his anxiety for that of his client. A worthy and respectable young trader, a Mr. C——, was involved in a long and expensive law-suit, with a litigious and very rich man, Mr. H——. Mr. Wallace was counsel for Mr. C——, and feeling that the young man's means were nearly exhausted, Mr. Wallace has repeatedly, after receiving his fee from C——'s attorney, called and insisted on returning the fee to C——. This fact I have from C—— himself, and he had little idea it should ever obtain publicity. When it is recollected how griping and avaricious Irish barristers generally are, this will be regarded as a most extraordinary instance of generosity and disinterestedness.

no act of Lord Mannors, the chancellor, that appeared so extraordinary and inexplicable as his making Mr. Perrin a king's counsel, previous to his departure from Ireland.

Mr. Holmes, unlike the two gentlemen whose names I have mentioned, is not a king's counsel, although the situation has been offered to him more than twenty times. Mr. Holmes is, I believe, a republican in principle, and in manners and address a complete humourist. It is a rich and delightful treat to sit in the courts, and listen to any case in which he and Mr. O'Connell are engaged, for from its commencement to its conclusion, the court is assuredly kept in one roar of laughter. There is one continued round of fun, and wit, and joke. Mr. Holmes is now an old man, but so hale and healthy, that his wit never tires, and his intellect never fails—he is now in his thirty-sixth or thirty-seventh year at the Irish bar, and I lately heard him boast, that from the time he put on a wig and gown to the present hour, he never missed a day in the law courts, and was present at each term from its commencement to its close.

Of Mr. O'Loughlin it is perhaps unnecessary to speak, he being made the subject of an article which appeared in the Monthly Magazine. I shall only observe that Mr. O'Loughlin has been long remarkable, as an Irish lawyer, for his great extent of practice—and as a Catholic, for never mingling in the discussions of the Catholic Association, although a liberal subscriber to the Rent, and a munificent contributor to every Catholic charity.

Mr. Shiel was also counsel for Mr. O'Connell, but in the prosecution for sedition, there was no necessity for calling upon his talents, nor upon those who were engaged with him, the grand jury saved them all that trouble. After deliberating for about four hours, they came into court at a late hour in the evening, with the proper and significant return on the bills of “ignoramus.” When Mr. Rickey, the clerk of the crown, looked at the bills, he turned and twisted them round in his hand, then whispered the judges, they arose from their seats to depart, and by the chop-fallen visage of the saintly Judge Vandeleur, the result was guessed at—some one in the court cried out “ignoramus,” and instantly the court-house rang with acclamations. The shouts were heard in the streets, and re-echoed there, and in less than half a minute the joyful tidings were thus conveyed to Mr. O'Connell, who was waiting at Coyne's, the Catholic bookseller, in Capel-street, to hear what might be the finding of the jury.

At the same commission, bills were sent up against the Rev. Sir Harcourt Lees, Bart., for sedition, and these also were most properly ignored. A man less likely to be guilty of sedition than Sir Harcourt Lees there could not possibly be—he is a warm-hearted, kind, and benevolent man, who speaks violently, and writes strongly, but would neither hurt nor harm any individual. To see Sir Harcourt Lees one would never take him for a clergyman, nor suppose him to be a baronet; he looks his own character much better—that of an honest, jovial, sporting, country gentleman. He has, however, unfortunately for his own peace of mind, read more than he has comprehended, and is therefore apt to give a premature opinion upon things which he does not understand. Although the head of Sir Harcourt Lees may err, his heart never does—although he speaks wickedly, he acts kindly; and I can give a very plain proof of how willing he is to serve even the purposes of "Popery," against which he declaims "so loudly and so long."

Sir Harcourt Lees, in addition to his situation in the Post Office, has two or three excellent livings, so that he, at least, has some reason for being interested for "Protestant ascendancy." A few years ago he paid a visit to a certain part of the country, and perceiving a large house, with the window-frames, filled up with boards, he asked to whom that house belonged?

"Shure, your honour," said a countryman, "that is our parish chapel; we have been driven mighty hard to bring it to that, but for the life of us we cannot make out the means of putting in glass windows, and after all, I am afraid it will be some years before we're able to have prayers in it."

"Then," said Sir Harcourt Lees, "if I can, you shall have prayers in it before a month passes by. Give my compliments to the parish priest, tell him to get in the glass windows—let him have it properly done, and send the bill to me, I will pay it."

This was no vain boast of Sir Harcourt, he paid liberally, and had the chapel fitted up properly.

I have already noticed that at this commission, was instituted a prosecution by the Marquis of Westmeath, against some persons in his employment for perjury. At that trial, which excited a good deal of interest, it was plain that the Marquis and Marchioness of Westmeath took very different views of the same question. The Marquis appeared as a witness for the prosecution, the Marchioness for the defendants. Her ladyship, upon this occasion, took her seat beside the judges, on the bench, and showed there the prettiest face that ever appeared upon it. To judge of her by the manner in which she gave her testimony, it would be at once conceived that her ladyship was not only a woman of great beauty and fascination, but also blest with the mildest of tempers. Whether she be so, or not, it is impossible for an humble individual like myself to say. If she be what she appears, it is a pity she should be separated from her husband, who, though a man of warm temper, is said to be possessed of an excellent heart, and most benevolent disposition. It has been generally reported, and was generally believed, that the differences between the noble pair have been fomented and increased by an individual in the very highest station in society. I do not pretend to vouch for the accuracy of this report, but I am certainly inclined to believe it is true, as I know it is corroborated by a fact of which I am a witness. In the entire course of agitation, I have had many opportunities of hearing violent speeches against the ministry, and the individuals composing it, but the most severe censures I ever heard pronounced against them, were spoken by the most noble the Marquis of Westmeath. To judge of his political principles by his expressions, he should be classed, not amongst the whigs, but the radicals. In the county of which he is the governor, and from which he takes his title, he is revered as a nobleman, respected as a man, and loved as a good landlord."*

* I need not add, this character of the Marquis of Westmeath was written in 1829. Not only has the Marquis of Westmeath changed his opinions as to the tories, but the Irish people have so changed their opinions of the Marquis, that his portraiture would never be recognized by them in the preceding description.

The Irish Catholics

AFTER THE DEATH OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

BY JAMES WHITE, VICAR APOSTOLIC OF WATERFORD AND LISMORE.

[Concluded.]

HAVING obtained permission to speak, I said, "that I was a Catholic priest, that I had by public and solemn rite purified many of our polluted churches, administered the sacraments of penance and the Eucharist to great numbers, celebrated private and solemn masses as occasion permitted, constantly; that I had not done an injury to any man in the kingdom; that to the crown I had given many undoubted proofs of my allegiance, having never denied to Cæsar what to him rightfully belonged; that if all or any of those things were treason, then was I undoubtedly a traitor; I confess it; you need not arraign me; but that I have ever sinned against my king or the law, I indignantly deny, and do here defy all mortal men to the proof." After this address, the lord deputy's countenance became mild and calm, and he laid aside the written proclamation which was to publish me a traitor.

Then directing himself to the crucifix, which I had brought into the camp, he called it an idol, and asked "why have you brought that idol into a Christian camp?" remarking at the same time, that he had promised security to my person, but not to my idol. I answered "the crucifix is not an idol, nor am I a friend or patron of idolaters; these points I am prepared to prove before any assembly of theologians, nor can your excellency confer a greater favour on me than to appoint a place and day for myself and two other companions to hold a controversy with any number of men selected from the whole kingdom, who would maintain the contrary opinion; and the only condition I ask is, that the executioner be present to cut off one of our joints without mercy as often as our adversaries would prove anything against our doctrine regarding the crucifix; but that as often as we confuted our adversaries, they should not be subject to the same lex talionis; our only reward would be to pray to God most sincerely for their conversion."

Our enemies instantly exclaimed "Oh! you would never enter the lists on such terms." But I repeated, that I would abide rigidly by each of those terms; that I most earnestly solicited a controversy, and if it were granted, that I was ready to remain their prisoner from that moment down to the appointed day, lest they might suspect me of a wish to run away. But they declined to grant the controversy, and there being no longer any doubts on that point, I declared confidently in the Lord, "that I and my companions could be killed, but could not be conquered, because we adhered to that rock against which the gates of hell can never prevail." This declaration was denounced as proud and arrogant.

Though not permitted to hold the controversy nor to address the army publicly, I ventured under the influence of what my conscience and common sense dictated to say a few words to make some impressions if possible. "The whole army," said I, "here in the camp, cannot consistently with common sense and conscience, have other than feelings of profound reverence for the crucifix." The words were no sooner uttered, than I was saluted with a general burst of derisive laughter, so paradoxical did my proposition appear until it was more fully developed. "If," said I, "you call me an idolater because I carry the crucifix in my hands, are you not all guilty of the same crime for marching under those banners, on every one of which is painted or depicted that ever-victorious cross, which you call the cross of St. George? Without that cross, from the first day that the English received the Christian faith, never did brave English army take to its tents, or charge an enemy. Is it not by that cross that the English host both by land and sea is distinguished from all other Christian armies? Now if it be criminal in the extreme to accuse you of idolatry, because you march beneath that resplendent and victorious cross of St. George, how can it be criminal in me to carry the cross of Christ, to venerate it, to walk under its protection? for whatever virtue or excellence is in St. George or in his cross, beyond all doubt comes from Christ and the cross of Christ. Being then a soldier of Christ, of the cross of Christ, why should I be ashamed? Let no man wonder that I carry the standard of my Lord and King. Tell me, I pray you, was it Christ or St. George that was crucified for us? What other glory did the Apostle Paul seek than in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ? Him and Him crucified he preached to the Gentiles. Oh! as St. George now reigns in happy peace with Christ in heaven, be there peace, I implore you, between you and me, the bearers of their crosses here on earth; be the first honour, the chief reverence paid to the cross of Christ: for if the principal glory of St. George's cross be that he conquered the dragon, how much greater the glory of the cross in which our Lord triumphed over the dragon of hell, over sin, over eternal death, over this wicked world? I appeal to all of you here present to pronounce on the truth of these arguments. Let each man say what his conscience honestly suggests." These few words appeared to produce an effect, on a very great number of the soldiers, greater, far greater than I could have expected.

CHAPTER III.

A QUESTION PROPOSED IN THE SPIRIT OF NICHOLAS MACHIAVEL, OF "CONDEMNED MEMORY," ALSO BY WHAT AUTHORITY I OPENED THE CHURCHES? THE PETITION OF THE CATHOLICS FOR A TOLERATION OF THEIR RELIGION—THE ENTRANCE OF THE LORD DEPUTY INTO THE CITY—THE OATH OF ALLEGIANCE ADMINISTERED—THE LORD DEPUTY'S DEPARTURE.

Though their railleries against the crucifix proceeded no farther, they began to attack us for the idolatry which we Catholics commit in adoring the Blessed Eucharist, and for our blindness in honouring the images of the saints, &c., &c.; but on them and all other points in which they accused us of error, I renewed my declaration, that if the day and place were appointed, I was ready to give an account of our faith, on the same conditions, and under the same heavy penalty as those which I have already mentioned.

Next, they proceeded to a question extracted from Nicholas Machiavel, and from a certain seditious book written in the English language, by a wicked and abandoned man, called Watsons, in which work many refined points are urged against many sincere and pious Catholics, especially against the Rev. Father Parsons, of the Society of Jesus, as well as against the wicked Puritans. The question was this—whether it is lawful in any case to take up arms against our natural king and lord? A question to which I was unwilling to give an answer; first, because it was too general, including not only Christian, but also Pagan princes and their subjects; secondly, because I suspected the present drift of that question; and thirdly, because it was not in the tented field, but in the schools of calm divines that a question so momentous should be discussed. I therefore requested that they would have the kindness to propose the question in this form—"whether de facto any subject of his most serene majesty, King James, would be justified in taking up arms against him? for to the question proposed in this form the answer was easy." But they would not propose the question in that form; they insisted on a general answer: which I firmly refused; however, lest I might appear to have been put down by them, I answered in this conditional mode—if all the actions of the prince were just, if his laws be good and honest, no subject could without grievous sin resist or disobey him.

But whether all the acts of princes are just, and all their laws so equitable that men are always bound to honour them and to obey them, may be learned, I said, from the sixth chapter of the Prophet Daniel, and the fourth and fifth chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, to which I referred them for a fuller solution of their difficulty.

Then a certain member of the privy council, by profession a minister, and superintendent of the bishopric of Meath in Leinster, collected from different sources arguments in favour of the authority of kings, which in fact no Catholic denies, namely, from the words of St. Paul, "Subditi estote, &c., &c." from the 13th chap. to the Romans, "qui potestati resistit, &c., &c." and from the 22nd chap. of St. Matthew, "Quæ sunt Cæsaris Cæsari, &c., &c." The proper place to give a full answer to these texts, I maintained, was the school, not the camp. But that in the meantime, I was a loyal subject of the king; that I resisted no authority; that my only arms were the crucifix, the standard of the King of Peace; that to Cæsar I would never deny what belonged to Cæsar, but that what was God's ought not to be given to any mortal; that all should have their own according to the dictates of the laws of man, of nature, and of God.

When our discussion had proceeded thus far, I was further interrogated by what authority I had opened and purified the churches? By the authority of the Pope, I replied. They ordered me to close them again. I have no such authority, was my answer. They asked me why I could not close them? I answered, that the only circumstances which could justify me in closing the churches, did not now actually exist; that I had a right to do only what was right; that on opening the churches my conscience told me I was acting well, and that I would not act against my conscience now and close the churches. But in the meantime some Catholics had closed the church doors, lest there might be a tumult amongst the people and a spilling of blood. The keys were brought to me: I delivered them up to the procurators (procuratoribus) of the churches, with directions that they should be given to the mayor and city magistrates, who, as far as it was in their power, should preserve the churches from being again desecrated by the heretics.

The profession of faith which the Catholic citizens of both orders had already made in the city, they now solemnly renewed in the camp by their deputies; they protested that they knew no other creed than that of the Catholic church; that alone they had received from their fathers; and they humbly begged the lord deputy that he would condescend to allow them to retain that creed; that so far from the Catholic religion impairing in the least degree their loyalty to their prince; on the contrary, that loyalty would every day be becoming more and more firm and affectionate.

I myself was called out to the camp a second time on that day, and on my bended knees I earnestly sued for free exercise of our religion; that if this liberty was now granted or promised to us, I pledged myself by the grace of Christ—first, that whatever had been or might be taken by robbers, should be restored to the rightful owner; secondly, that we would take care that those who were led by idleness in many dangerous proceedings, should now devote themselves to agriculture and other laudable works and mechanical arts; thirdly, that if his majesty ever required an army to enforce his just rights in a just war, the Irish would give their gratuitous and zealous armies for those rights in such a war; fourthly, that without any expense to his majesty, all the soldiers who might be injured or wounded in the war should be supplied with all things necessary for the health both of soul and body, until they had either recovered or passed into another world; fifthly, that Catholic priests would attend that army, would be present in the hour of danger, to encourage and console the soldier with the word of God and the sacraments; sixthly, that these conditions would at once cut off all pretence or fear of foreign invasion, for when strangers had lately landed on our shores, their sole pretext was that they came to secure for us liberty of conscience. But liberty of conscience and of religion once granted, there remains for them no longer even the shadow of a pretext for invasion; and should they actually invade us, so long as I live, I am ready to march straight to the place where they land, to meet them on the shore, to ask why they land: and should they answer that religion was their object, I will reply that now, by the blessing of God and the kindness of our prince, we enjoy liberty of religion, and consequently that we did not need their armies to obtain it; that if they did not retire instantly, I and all the Catholics of the kingdom would join heart and soul with the king's forces, and fight to the death against the enemy; seventhly and lastly, that some of the ruined churches be given to us; that we would rebuild them at our own expense, and pay for them a yearly rent into his majesty's exchequer.

To this petition made in the name of all the Catholics, the lord deputy replied: "that the king alone could grant liberty of conscience; that without the royal consent, he could not promise anything of the kind; that if the king consented (though the king could not make him become or wish to be a Papist), he would again restore the churches to us, and defend us in the peaceful possession of them against our enemies. But that for the present and until further orders, the king's express wish was, that all things should continue in the same state in which they were at the death of the late queen (the murderess of his mother). But as he did not deem it expedient to coerce the conscience of any man in matters of religion, he would tolerate the exercise of the Catholic worship for all, until his majesty issued contrary orders; he allowed priests to wear the clerical dress, and to celebrate mass in private houses, without being subjected to be molested as heretofore by the visits of bailiffs (apparitoribus), so long as the Catholics persevered in their loyalty and submission to the authority of the king."

Thus the priests celebrated low and solemn masses, with full liberty (in private houses), they preached to the people, and discharged all the other functions of their holy ministry, down to the date of my departure from Ireland, namely, the 18th day of November, last year (i. e. 1603).

These preliminary matters being thus arranged, Charles de Montjoy, lord deputy of Ireland, entered the city of Waterford on the 3rd day of May, where having ascertained, after minute examination, that all the citizens were Catholics, and all loyal to the king, he received a document to that effect, drawn up in the name of all, and signed by the leading men of the city.

The Catholic priests, as well as the laity, made a profession of their allegiance to his majesty, and delivered to the lord deputy a document to the following effect, to be laid before the throne:

"As by the law of nature, of nations, and of God, subjects are bound to obey their lawful princes and lords, we, the undersigned Catholic priests, hereby declare, and let all whom it concerns know, that his majesty King James being our natural and lawful king, we shall obey him and give him all the service due to a king by his subjects, in all things not conflicting with, or impairing the honour, obedience, reverence, and service due to the Majesty of God. In attestation of which we hereby sign our names. May 5th, 1603."

This declaration was given to Sir Nicholas Walsh (mentioned above), and to Mr. Gerald Comerford, second judge (secundo judicis) of the province of Munster, who both attested to us a second time on behalf of the lord deputy, and in presence of the mayor of Waterford, Robert Walsh, knight, that we had full liberty to celebrate mass except in the churches, and to wear the sacerdotal dress that became our profession and rank; that permission was repeated by the lord deputy a third time in his own mansion near the cathedral church of the Holy Trinity, in presence of Thomas Cocles and Richard Boyle, two heretical officers.

Relying on this oft-repeated permission of the lord deputy, we continued the celebration of divine service in private houses, but with all due solemnities; we wore the sacerdotal dress in public and private; nor were we ever once insulted by any of the garrison, which now amounted to 1,200 men; on the contrary, many of the soldiers began to conceive favourable thoughts of the Catholic religion, and to speak well of it. Many of them had recourse to the sacrament of penance, and were restored to the communion of the Catholic church.

But it must not be omitted, that the more rapacious among the soldiers became almost tired of their life, when they found their hopes of plundering the city frustrated. It must also be observed, that although the whole army entered the city with the lord deputy, not even one of the citizens was injured, so well had precautionary measures been taken by him and the city magistrates; and this was the more remarkable, because it were hard to tell whether the desire of plundering the city, or of deluging its streets with the blood of the inhabitants, was predominant in the hearts of the ferocious soldiers. No doubt their souls were fixed on both, but in both, by God's blessing, they were entirely disappointed.

The lord deputy, having thus arranged all matters to his satisfaction in Waterford, marched on the 5th of May to Cork and Limerick, and the other chief cities which had publicly professed the Catholic faith. But after visiting all these places, he found that all were agreed on one point, their adherence to the faith of the holy Roman Catholic church, and that their only wish in this world was to be true to God (prout dece) and to the king of England (prout par est), and to bear true allegiance and perpetual service to both.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SPIRITUAL GOOD ACHIEVED AFTER THE DEPARTURE OF THE LORD DEPUTY—THE DELEGATES AND REPRESENTATIVES, SPECIAL AND GENERAL, DISPATCHED FROM IRELAND TO THE KING, FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE CATHOLIC CAUSE.

From the date of the lord deputy's departure from the city of Waterford to the other towns, down to the festival of Pentecost, which fell that year on the 12th of June, all things proceeded favourably for the glory of God and the exaltation of the Catholic faith. On Pentecost we celebrated divine service with all the solemnity we could command. The English soldiers of the garrison came every day to the Catholic sermons; the Almighty and merciful God softened and moved their hearts, and they began to speak to their fellow-soldiers friendly of the Catholic religion and its believers. A great number of them attended a sermon preached on Tuesday in Pentecost week, on the "gate of the sheepfold," "the sheepfold," "the thief," and "the robber." At the close of the sermon, one of the officers raised his voice in presence of all, and exclaimed, "that by every law, the churches ought to be restored to the Catholic priests; that the ministers ought to be expelled without delay; that Catholics taught a doctrine which pricked and purged the conscience; but the ministers, a doctrine, which rather favoured than checked concupiscence." From this moment many of the soldiers began to doubt the truth of their religion, because they saw manifestly that the "gate" was open to Catholics alone; that Catholics alone were safe in "the sheepfold," and were known by Christ our Lord, the prince of shepherds; but that the gate was closed infallibly against Luther and Calvin (that is the thief and the robber), and against all their followers, the croaking frogs and ill-favoured goats, the abettors of condemned doctrines.

Among the persons present were two English heretic soldiers of the garrison, who took down in writing the whole sermon, and presented it to their superior officers. The officers submitted it to be examined by some heretical ministers, who pronounced the following decision: "That the passages alledged by the Papist preacher were cited faithfully as they are found in the Bible and Fathers, but that as he was not illuminated by the spirit, no man should pay the least attention to his words. But as to his attack on our doctors, Luther and Calvin, neither you, who are soldiers of the king, nor we, who are ministers of the reformed church, can tolerate or permit them." So far the ministers.

From that moment the ministers and soldiers were continually plotting together, until they came in the end to the conclusion, that I ought not to be tolerated in any Christian state, I who had rashly dared to raise my voice against Luther and Calvin, the sainted doctors of the reformed church: consequently, that at whatever cost, some plan should be devised for getting rid of me. The persecution, directed personally against myself, shall be given in another place.

The Catholics having thus secured a toleration of their faith, all the chief cities and principal places, in fine, almost the whole kingdom, dispatched special and general deputies to his serene majesty King James, to congratulate him on his peaceful accession, without blood or wound, to the throne of his kingdoms, but especially to provide for the rights of the Catholic faith. As the special and private deputies were very numerous, I omit their names here, and confine myself to the general delegates sent in the name of the whole kingdom, and selected from Leinster. They were Sir Patrick Barnwall and Sir Gerald Aylmer, baronets; Henry Barnwall and D. Rochfort, knights, and both profoundly versed in municipal law. The result of their labours and attempts in the Catholic cause; their sufferings and subsequent fate; the death of one of them (Rochfort) in prison; their constancy and magnanimity; their noble deeds; and finally, their return to Ireland, are matters of public fame and need not be mentioned here.

The ecclesiastics, seeing this determined and general stand made by the laity for the Catholic faith, unanimously elected me as their delegate, to go on their behalf to the king of England? I at once acceded, and with all my heart, to their wishes; but after putting out to sea, our ship was driven back by contrary winds. In the meantime, the other deputies returned from England, and announced that no person could get an audience from the king, in consequence of the ravages of the plague and the multitude of traitors prowling about England, who in the month of July last had made an attempt on his life. Thus I was obliged to renounce my intended visit to England. The soldiers and ministers being apprized of that fact, laid an ambuscade for me on the road which they believed I would take from Wexford to Waterford, but as God and my angel-guardian would have it, I took a different route.

I should have observed before, that we began to purify the churches on the Monday of Passion-week, and that during all that week, and Holy-week, and during the whole octave of Easter Sunday; and down to the 3rd of May (the invention of the Holy Cross), we had enjoyed full and peaceable possession of the churches; but on that last day, in consequence of the events already explained, we were expelled and shut out. So that our poor people had an opportunity of beholding how our holy mother, the Church, expresses her grief for the sufferings and death, and her joy for the resurrection and triumph, of her Divine spouse, our Lord Jesus Christ.

Such is the brief sketch which I give on these matters for the present, reserving more copious details for a large treatise, which, with the blessing of God, I intend to publish. There I will narrate what the Catholics did on the day of the coronation of our king; and also how Catholics, both lay and clerical, acted when they heard of that diabolical attempt of infidel and wicked subjects in England, against the sacred person and life of his majesty.

CHAPTER V.

PERSONAL SUFFERINGS OF THE WRITER, AND GOD'S KIND PROVIDENCE TOWARDS HIM.

I now proceed, according to the intimation given above, to give, for the glory of God, some account of my own sufferings.

Though it was well known through the whole kingdom of Ireland that I had the lord-deputy's permission, given, too, in presence of the heretical soldiers and ministers, to go wherever my duties required; yet, after that clique meeting of the Tuesday in Pentecost-week, when it was decided that at whatever cost, I should be killed or put out of the way, my enemies began to invent calumnies against me, their ministers maintaining that I was the most abandoned idolator, because I never preached without the crucifix. In these plans they were aided by the Richard Ailleward above-mentioned, who was in the army, and a pretended Catholic. But what credit is due to those ministers, who themselves preached doctrines which were a compound of Atheism and Judaism?

But to descend, however, to the accusations concocted against me by these men, on the eve of the festival of Corpus Christi, I went from Waterford to Kilkenny, in order to celebrate that festival with all possible solemnity, because of the immense number of Catholics in the latter city, and the crowds that flocked thither from all parts of Ireland, to reverence the wood of the Holy Cross on that day. I went by invitation of the citizens, and gladly, for their consolation and the glory of God.

But while I was remaining at Kilkenny, the aforesaid Richard Ailleward, accused me of high-treason. I had intimation of his proceedings by an express messenger, and without a moment's delay, I started for Waterford, the day after Corpus Christi, and with the greater haste, because it has been alledged my object in coming to Kilkenny was to seduce the numerous population of that place, and excite them to revolt on the evening of the same day. About six o'clock in the morning I arrived at Waterford, and the first man I met on the quay or mall (Navalli), was the same Richard Ailleward, who welcomed me home with the usual forms. But though his words to me there were words of peace, during the whole of that night he was plotting snares and pitfalls. For next morning, when he came to the place where the mayor and magistrates were assembled, waiting to go in procession to the monastery of St. Francis, for the anniversary of a respectable gentleman, named Nicholas Dollen, his constant theme during the whole time was, James White, is a traitor, and that the whole kingdom ought to be on its guard against his wiles and machinations. As witnesses of this odious calumny, I appeal to the mayor and all the magistrates of the city, for they were present. They unanimously protested that they had never seen any grounds for that charge either in my conduct or sermons. "Oh!" exclaimed Ailleward, "you do not know the man." But finding that he could not persuade the mayor (a very sensible man), nor the magistrates, to adopt his own opinion, he proceeded straight from Kells, on that very day, to the house where Sir Richard Morrison, commander of the garrison, was lodging, and tried every means to induce him to have me brought to trial, and condemned to death; for that he had evidence more than enough to convict me before any tribunal.

But finding it difficult to bring round the governor to his opinion, he visited him again after supper, when after dancing for a couple of hours, he retired to the governor's bed-chamber, and held a long conversation with him there until midnight, the result of which was that I was to be imprisoned, and speedily brought to trial.

From that day, namely, the 26th of June, down to the 29th of the same month (the festival of SS. Peter and Paul, Ailleward never departed one moment from Morrison's side.

Morrison accordingly sent directions to the mayor, that I should be summoned about 10 o'clock in the afternoon, to appear before the council (senatus) officers of the garrison, to answer for certain grave charges touching my loyalty. The mayor and magistrates of the city, according, having assembled, Morrison came, attended by an English captain, named Josias Bodley (who had formerly been in the holy inquisition here, and renounced his heresy), and a lieutenant called Litchfield. Morrison having ordered me to be called in, the mayor of the city sent one of his bailiffs, named Nicholas Lombard, who asked me in the name of the mayor to appear. There were with me at that moment two Jesuits—one the Rev. Father Richard Field, superior of the Society, in Ireland, and his companion, Father Patrick Senan (Sinon perhaps, or Lennan), both of whom recommended me by all means not to appear, but to abscond without delay, on the grounds that from the well-known principles of the judge, and the wickedness of my accuser, I would in all probability be condemned to death, as innocence could be no protection. But I answered, that as the glory of God, and the honour of the Church, were at stake, I would certainly stand forward, even at the imminent risk of my life. Flight, I declared, would be in the circumstances, equivalent to a confession of guilt. Accordingly I appeared at the appointed hour; but the event proved that it was only a mountain in labour, delivered in the end of a ridiculous mouse.

The two witnesses named were Nicholas Power, and Thomas Butler, the latter a nephew, the former a servant, of my accuser. But so great is the power of truth, that my accuser himself was struck dumb, and neither of his false witnesses ventured to appear. Now I take God to witness that I never spoke to either of the witnesses, except once to Power, and that by mere accident, at Kildedan, on the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin (the 8th of September), when on my return from Wexford, after renouncing my intended application to the king, in consequence of the impediments already mentioned.

It would be too tedious at present to enter into full details, but as they deserve to be preserved, please God, they, and many other interesting things, shall soon be committed to writing. Suffice it for the present to say, that the whole accusation was concerted in this plan: if I fled, as my accuser and his witnesses believed I would, they would boldly present themselves before the judges, accuse me of treason, and attest this assertion by oath, and confidently protest that if I was not conscious of treasonable dangers, I certainly would not have fled. But when I appeared, they had nothing to accuse me of, except that I had spoken against the person of his majesty—a charge, however, which neither my accusers, nor the witnesses ventured to make. Morrison, the governor of the garrison, who was sitting there before the tribunal, was the only person to speak, and he had no proof to cite, except the promise made to him by Ailleward, the preceding night, that the charge could certainly be substantiated.

As soon as proceedings commenced, Morrison was expecting that Ailleward would prove the accusation, but in vain, the man had not one word to say, for it was manifest to the whole kingdom, that my doctrine ever had been, to give unto Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's, but to take from God nothing that belonged to God.

When the accusation was made, I challenged them to produce legal proof, which Morrison attempted in the following way, namely, that I had preached against the king's religion. To which I answered, that we were all bound in charity to judge well of others, and especially of kings and princes, unless the contrary was manifest; and that, for my own part, I knew nothing certain of the king's religion, but that he was a Catholic, reared in the faith of his mother and ancestors (whose creed, it is to be presumed, children embrace), that the mother of my king was not only a Catholic, but had suffered imprisonment, and laid her head on the block for the Catholic faith—a fact well known all over the world, so certain in truth that no person living ever dreamed of questioning it. To this Morrison briefly replied, that the king was a Protestant.

But I answered, that I had no proof of that, and that in the meantime, I would hold my own opinion until the contrary was proved. He asked me then, whether I had preached against Luther and Calvin. I answered, "that it was my duty to do so, as both were pestilential and condemned heretics, the vile springs of all sorts of pernicious errors, and that I was preaching expressly against both of them on that Tuesday in Pentecost week, when explaining the gospel of the day; but whether I had preached to the point and successfully, I left to the judgment of the learned. That I was ready again to speak on the same subject in presence of the chief men of the land, and to confute those two heretics." After this answer, Morrison stated that the charge brought against me did not belong to his tribunal, but to the court of the civil magistrates.

Ailleward, finding that his scheme had not succeeded, said only two words—one against my principles, the other against my dress—for I was dressed at the time in my soutan, and the long cloak descending to my feet. "O Spanish heart! O Spanish cloak! that cloak has infected the whole city, and tainted the garrison itself with Papistry." But of this I will give you an account elsewhere.

Before this meeting broke up, I solicited permission to speak, and made a brief address to the following effect:

"I have been accused before this honourable and intelligent tribunal of various presumptuous treasons, none of which have been established by proof. The first charge has not been urged, because those wicked witnesses, who were either corrupted by bribes or instigated by malice, have not dared to appear. The other charge is, that I have preached against the king. What is the proof? because I preached against the king's religion; and that they attempt to prove thus—you have preached against Luther and Calvin; as if the doctrines of these two heretics were either Catholic or consistent, or could be upheld or maintained by any man with a safe conscience; for who that has ever inspected their works, does not know how flatly those two men contradict, how furiously they assail one another.

"Who can listen without a smile to proofs of that kind? Do my accusers intend to make me, who am an Irishman, a subject or vassal to a Frenchman or German—a Frenchman who has been cauterized for his unnatural crime, a German who is at once prince of toppers and of Apostates (Archipotatori, Archipostalis). From such government, from such kings, deliver me, O Lord! Know, honourable gentlemen, that my king is neither a Frenchman nor a German, but his serene majesty King James, only son of Mary, queen and martyr, a prince both pure and temperate, virtues with which Luther and Calvin were unacquainted. Against them, with God's aid, I must wage eternal, implacable war."

After this address, by a unanimous decision of the magistrates I was allowed to depart in peace. Not to them, however, but to the prayers of my patrons, SS. Peter and Paul, whose festival day that was, do I attribute my deliverance from the dark plots and deep malice of Ailleward and the soldiers and ministers. My innocence was protected against the cruelty of the heretics, by the same Almighty arm which formerly, for the consolation of the Church, liberated St. Peter from the chains and prison to which he had been consigned by the fanaticism of the Jews.

But those wicked conspirators did not renounce their malice. They dispatched an English heretic, Lieutenant Litchfield, to Dublin, with a request to Sir George Cary, baronet, then deputy of the kingdom, whose temper, they well knew, inclined him to believe everything bad of the Catholics, that a warrant should be issued for my arrest. The warrant was issued, with directions that I should be brought by sea from Waterford to Dublin. Being apprised of the fact, I took every possible precaution not to fall into the hands of the cruel and faithless heretics, though the word of the lord deputy had been expressly pledged for my personal security.

Finding that I was enabled to baffle their pursuit, they had recourse to another expedient. They bribed a common soldier, named Dick Reddish, a sanguinary bravo belonging to the troop of Sir Benjamin Berri, baronet, to watch his opportunity, and if he met me while I was going in the night to visit the sick or dying, to put an end to my days by sword or dagger. If he succeeded, his reward was to be no less than 3,000 florins. But from this danger, also, I was saved by the merciful hand of Providence.

All their plots having yet proved abortive, they devised another expedient—namely, to calumniate and abuse me, and thereby make me an object of popular odium; but that people can never be induced to believe ill, unless there be strong grounds for their belief. It was therefore resolved, that a band of determined enemies should bind themselves to snatch some opportunity and murder me at the altar in some of those houses where they suspected I used to celebrate mass. They proceeded, accordingly in haste from Waterford to Clonmel on the eve of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin (7th September), expecting that I would celebrate mass on that festival in the house of my eldest brother. There was a large body of ferocious soldiers on that expedition, commanded by Richard Morrison, Raphael Constable, Josias Bodley, Nathaniel Litchfield, and a few other lieutenants. But, fortunately, it happened that on that very festival I was at Kilmedan, about six miles from Waterford, and celebrated mass there for the people, thus escaping "the hands of my enemy in the name of the Lord."

Being disappointed in their expectations, they returned after three days from Clonmel to Waterford. They reported that their only object in going to Clonmel had been to hunt and fowl; but the falsehood of that statement soon became manifest, for a servant of Ailleward having seen, late in the evening of the 13th of September, Father Nicholas Laynach, a priest of the Society of Jesus, whose face and figure bore some resemblance to mine, he immediately reported to his master, who lost no time in going to his "fowlers and hunters," informing them that they could easily take me that very night asleep in my bed. Having partaken of a sumptuous dinner, and fired their courage by deep potations of wine, they came at midnight with three troops of soldiers, and surrounded my house on all sides. The officers—that is, the above-mentioned "hunters and fowlers," with some others of their own rank, advanced with drawn swords, to the door. They knocked loudly—my servant starting from his bed, asked, "Who was there?" and fearing it might be a "sick call," ran down in haste to the door. But no sooner had he opened, than he was seized by the throat, and commanded, under pain of death, to tell where I was. The servant told the truth—that for a month or more, I had not been in the city; but they did not believe him. He was instantly chained, given up to a guard, and again threatened with death, if he would not inform. But he again told the truth—for in reality, on that very night, the eve of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, I was in my brother's castle, which was about twenty miles distant from Waterford (probably between Carrick and Clonmel).

Again disappointed in their schemes, next day they were ashamed of their performance, and to disguise in some way the ridicule which they had incurred, gave various and contradictory accounts of their proceedings. But beyond all doubt, if they had taken me that night, I was strung up, without further trial, at the foot of my bed, as an atonement to the insulted memories of Luther and Calvin; so, at least, my enemies confessed to an intimate friend of mine. But when they were sincerely asked by some respectable men, why did they persecute a mad priest, who had the lord-deputy's word for his protection, some of them answered, that on that night they were under the influence of wine, and now they were very glad I had not fallen into their hands. Singular, indeed, it is, that the attacks against me should have been always by night, though they might have taken me sometimes in noon-day, and in the public streets, through which my necessary duties sometimes compelled me to go. But the wonder ceases, when we reflect that he doth evil, hateth the light, lest the light should reprove his works.

All their wicked plans having hitherto failed, there was some lapse of rest when Morrison, who was the unwilling instrument in the hands of my arch-enemy, Ailleward, was recalled some time after to England. But, alas! another and a more fatal plan was then adopted—false brethren were suborned to ensnare me, and, beyond all doubt, I was a prisoner, if I had not succeeded in making my escape, with great difficulty (per latrinæ orificium), ten days before the festival of All Saints. After running great risk, I succeeded, by God's blessing, in getting on board a vessel, bound for Bourdeaux, where I arrived safely. From that port I wrote a letter to Sir Nicholas Walsh,* Bart., and chief-justice of the king's-bench, informing him that I had been compelled to fly to France, for the protection of my life; that I had been in continual danger from the treacherous plots, and atrocious calumnies of the ministers and soldiers, who endeavoured to cut me off by law or by violence; that he would confer a favour on me, if he forwarded, in his next letter to the lord-deputy, an explanation of my case. I also added, that men who could be so intolerably violent as to violate the lord-deputy's word, ought not themselves be encouraged, or even tolerated in the kingdom; but that it was no wonder snares should be laid for my poor life, when even the king himself had nearly fallen a victim lately, in London itself, to men of the very same principles, and religious profession.

From Bourdeaux, where I got a letter from his eminence, Cardinal de Sardis, to Cardinals Aldobrandini and Basenius, I came here to Rome, to give authentic information of Catholic affairs in Ireland, from the death of Elizabeth, late queen of England.

This brief summary I humbly present to your holiness, that the faculties and spiritual forms necessary for the condition of that kingdom, may be granted (should it seem good to your holiness), lest they who have already evinced such intrepidity, may lose courage in the cause of their faith. Timely interference must confirm them in their holy purposes, and enable them by prudence and careful foresight, to avoid those obstacles which would retard the long-wished-for perfect liberty of the creed of their fathers. Of the establishment of that liberty, I entertain very confident and sanguine hopes in the Lord, both from the facts I have already stated, from the incredible hungering and spiritual thirsting of that people after justice; in fine, from their special devotion and attachment to the holy Apostolic see, and the Roman pontiff—an attachment so profound, that rather than separate from his communion, and paternal embrace, they are ready to sacrifice not only their fortunes but their lives. Such a favourable change having thus taken place in the spiritual affairs of the north, during your pontificate, deign to give us peaceful aid, oh! illustrious Clement! Can we doubt, that aid will be given, when we reflect on your titles and prerogatives? Thou, the Father and the Pastor, who givest to thy children and thy sheep the means of propagating the faith; thou, in thy fatherly and pastoral kindness, will provide for its propagation and greater exaltation in Ireland. But if I, or that Catholic people, should seem to your holiness to have erred, or acted imprudently in anything we have said or done, we are ready to confess our errors humbly, and make all the reparation in our power. Being men, "te nihil humani a nobis alienum putamus," we have resolved, as long as we live to give unto Cæsar, the things which are Cæsar's, and to God what belongs to God, according to the mandate of Christ our Lord. And that we may succeed therein, may our Lord arise, may his enemies be scattered, may the holy Roman church flourish, may heresy and the accursed satan, the mortal enemy of all good, be crushed—omnia ad Dei opti. maximam gloriam et honorem.

* The Catholic lawyers, though sometimes temporizers, were generally true to the good old cause, "nec sine rubore fateor," says Dr. Lynch, "plures e sacratis viris quam a jurisperitis a Catholicâ fide ad hæresim defecisse."—Suppl. Anthonologiæ, p. 54.

The Castlereagh Correspondence.

MEMOIRS AND CORRESPONDENCE OF VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH, SECOND MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY. Edited by his Brother, CHARLES VANE, third Marquis of Londonderry, G. C. B., &c. Vols. I. & II. London: Colburn. 1848.

THE volumes published by the Marquis of Londonderry, relate to one of the darkest and most melancholy periods of Ireland's sad history. We took them up eagerly, convinced that we would find them full of instruction, replete with matters of deep and solemn interest to all those who like ourselves took an interest in the story of this unhappy country. We were confirmed in these impressions by perusing the very first page of the book, wherein the editor says: "Though conscious that my abilities are not adequate to the task which I have undertaken, I feel it to be my duty to rescue the name of Castlereagh from the calumnies and abuse which have been so long and so industriously cast upon it by political adversaries and pardoned rebels. This object cannot, in my opinion, be more effectually accomplished than in submitting to the public the select correspondence of Lord Castlereagh, from the commencement of his official career to the close of his laborious and useful life. The first division of this collection, relating exclusively to the affairs of Ireland, will occupy four volumes, two of which are before the reader. The prominent points comprehended in these volumes are—the rebellion of the United Irishmen; the abortive attempt at invasion by the French; the proceedings adopted for effecting the important measure of the union with Great Britain, and arrangements commercial and financial preparatory to it; the state of the Roman Catholics and of the Presbyterians; and the insane outbreak of the younger Emmett." Undoubtedly those subjects are of vast importance; yet we must candidly confess, that we never before met so uninteresting a collection as that which has been just published under the auspices of the Marquis of Londonderry. There is not in the entire of the two volumes one important fact which was not already perfectly well known to every person who had an ordinary acquaintance with the history of the period. The publication is also accompanied by circumstances which will make many not very uncharitable persons fear that the most interesting portions of it have been withheld, for it is professedly only a selection from Lord Castlereagh's correspondence, and a selection made for the express purpose of vindicating the character of that bad man. We must say that the publication is as unsuccessful, as a vindication of Lord Castlereagh, as it is unimportant and uninteresting to the student of Irish history. Notwithstanding the harrowing scenes which came within Lord Castlereagh's cognizance, and of some of which he must have been a witness, his correspondence is as destitute of feeling for the sufferings of the victims of an iniquitous government, as it is unilluminated by a single ray of genius. Courageous, persevering, and determined he undoubtedly was; but these qualities, which would have been virtues if used in a good cause, were uniformly prostituted by Lord Castlereagh to the base purpose of enslaving his country.

When Theobald Wolfe Tone was made prisoner, he was tried by court-martial and condemned to be hanged. The only favour he asked was to be allowed to die a soldier's death, by being shot. He urged, that being an officer in the French service, he had a right to this poor indulgence; but it was refused, and to save himself from what he conceived to be the ignominy of the gallows, he cut his throat. The wound, however, not proving immediately fatal, Curran moved, in the King's Bench, for a habeas corpus to bring up his body, which was granted. Sir John Moore, who had seen persons flogged by order of the Sheriff of Tipperary—Judkin Fitzgerald—rejoiced at this result, as he hoped that it would put an end to martial law being exercised when the country was peaceable, and the ordinary tribunals sitting. But in this expectation he was disappointed, for Castlereagh instantly became alarmed, and wrote to England, to allow him to bring in a bill to perpetuate martial law. Here is the letter:

LORD CASTLEREAGH TO MR. WICKHAM.

"Dublin Castle, November 16, 1798.

"SIR—You will observe by the papers that T. W. Tone, having been sentenced by a court-martial to suffer death, on the morning of his execution cut his throat, so as to render his recovery very precarious. On the same day, Mr. Curran moved to have him brought up by a writ of habeas corpus, which was of course granted. The return made to the court was, that he could not be moved from his place of confinement with safety to his life: in this situation the matter rests. The opinion of the crown lawyers has been taken, and they have advised, in case he is brought before the King's Bench, and that it is purposed, he being in custody of the court, that he shall be disposed of under the municipal law, to inquire into his treatment, rather than bring the question of martial authority to a solemn decision, which would occasion delay, embarrass the court, and perhaps expose the state to have its summary interference for its own prosecutions deferred in a manner injurious to the public safety. When the proclamation of the 24th of May, authorising martial law, was had recourse to, on the breaking out of the rebellion, Lord Pery then suggested the expediency of passing a bill to authorise the military authorities to try by court-martial persons engaged in the rebellion, alleging that, without such a law, as the exercising of the power could only be justified by the necessity of the case in the strictest sense, and as much doubt and difference of opinion might arise upon what circumstances constituted the necessity so required, he thought it safer to legalise the proceeding by a temporary statute, than to expose the parties exercising those powers to the necessity of coming to parliament for indemnity.

"Whilst the rebels were in the field in force, the necessity of punishment by military tribunals was so obvious as not to admit of a question: indeed the degree of public danger was then such as to preclude the ordinary courts of law from sitting. Latterly, the rebellion has degenerated, particularly in the counties of Wicklow, Wexford, Kildare, Westmeath, and Dublin, into a petty warfare, not less afflicting to the loyal inhabitants, though less formidable to the state. In those counties, the number of persons taken in the commission of the most shocking crimes, still acting upon treasonable and systematic principles, has been such as to render it impossible to trust to the usual administration of justice for the punishment of the offenders: indeed, in Wicklow and Wexford it has been found altogether impracticable to hold the assizes. The situation of the districts above alluded to, as also those parts of Connaught which were disturbed at the time of the late invasion, has compelled my lord lieutenant to punish summarily by martial law, at the same time that the general state of the kingdom admitted of the courts being opened in the metropolis, and of the judges going their circuits in the other parts of the kingdom as formerly.

"The two jurisdictions being in activity at the same time, could not fail to clash sooner or later, as has happened in Tone's case. His conviction will be effected, with equal certainty, by civil as by military law; his trial being had in the metropolis, where the courts are open, and under the circumstances of the case, it is not of that description upon which it would be expedient to bring the matter to issue; but it certainly deserves to be well considered, should the country remain unsettled for any length of time, whether both jurisdictions are not requisite, and if so, I do not see how they can proceed together without embarrassment, unless Lord Pery's idea is adopted, under such restrictions as may be thought necessary. It was before resisted on the principle that there was less violence done to the constitution in giving indemnity to those who have acted illegally for the preservation of the state, than in enacting laws so adverse to the usual spirit of our legislature.

"This consideration prevailed; and, were the struggle but of short duration, perhaps the inconvenience would be trifling; but if it is to be procrastinated, which there is but too much reason to apprehend may be the case in this kingdom, where religious resentment as well as principles of resistance are so deeply and extensively implanted, it is a question whether military authority, in some degree, is not requisite to keep society together; and if so, the responsibility of doing an act which, in the eye of the law, is in strictness murder, is too weighty to be encountered in the prospect of future indemnity.

"I trust, however, that the internal situation of the country may improve, now the prospect of foreign assistance is in a great measure at an end, and that we may be saved an alternative so unpleasant as that of yielding to this tormenting evil, rather than risk the adoption of a strong remedy, or of being driven to extend the powers of a military code to civil crimes, if crimes can be called civil which are invariably committed in arms.

"I have troubled you with these suggestions as the hasty sentiments of my own mind on this question, which connects itself with Tone's case. When I venture to write without much consideration what may meet the Duke of Portland's eye, I trust his grace will receive it with indulgence.

"I have the honour to remain, &c.,

"CASTLEREAGH."

(P. 445-448, Vol. 1.)

There is a subject said to be on the tapis at present with regard to a provision for the Catholic clergy. We know from the Castlereagh papers that a similar scheme was contemplated by government in 1798. The following letter from Lord Chancellor Clare will show how anxiously every measure of the kind should be watched by the clergy:

THE EARL OF CLARE, LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND, TO LORD CASTLEREAGH.

"Grosvenor-square, October 16, 1798.

"MY DEAR LORD—I have seen Mr. Pitt, the Chancellor, and the Duke of Portland, who seem to feel very sensibly the critical situation of our damnable country, and that the union alone can save it. I should have hoped that what has passed would have opened the eyes of every man in England to the insanity of their past conduct with respect to the Papists of Ireland; but I can very plainly perceive that they were as full of their Popish projects as ever. I trust and I hope I am not deceived, that they are fairly inclined to give them up, and to bring the measure forward unencumbered with the doctrine of emancipation. Lord Cornwallis has intimated his acquiescence in this point; Mr. Pitt is decided upon it, and I think he will keep his colleagues steady. Most fortunately we have a precedent in the articles of the union with Scotland, which puts an end to all difficulty on the only point insisted on by Lord Cornwallis, of which they are equally tenacious here. By one of the articles, it is stipulated that every member of the parliament of Great Britain shall take the oath of supremacy, &c., on his taking his seat, unless it shall be otherwise provided for by parliament. So that it cannot admit of a question, that a similar provision should be made for Ireland, which Mr. Pitt is perfectly satisfied shall be done. He is also fully sensible of the necessity of establishing some effectual civil control over the Popish clergy, which he thinks will be best effected by allowing moderate stipends to them, and obliging every priest to take a license from the crown for performing ecclesiastical functions, on pain of perpetual banishment if he shall officiate without it. I have pressed on him the necessity of immediate communication on the subject with the principal persons in Ireland, and I do believe he will desire their attendance here. I also stated to him the indispensable necessity of a secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland being sent over immediately. Pelham is now at Stanmer, but I should hope he will not long be suffered to remain there. I hope to be released from my attendance here very soon, and whenever I can see the king shall set out for Ireland. If I have been in any manner instrumental in persuading the ministers here to bring forward this very important measure unencumbered with a proposition which must have swamped it, I shall rejoice very much in the pilgrimage which I have made. I expect that by this time some of the British squadron on the Irish coast have nabbed the Brest fleet.

"Yours always very truly, &c.,

"CLARE."

(P. 393-394. Vol. I.)

The following letter from the lord lieutenant, Cornwallis, to the Duke of Portland, then secretary of state for the home department, will prove that some of the Catholic bishops and laity were induced to support the union on the distinct understanding that it would be immediately followed by the removal of Catholic disabilities. That pledge was not redeemed, and this letter strongly insinuates, if it does not prove, that Lord Castlereagh, who took office under Addington in 1802, and thus became a member of a government pledged against emancipation, was the person through whom the government pledged itself to the Catholics that their future hopes would be made a part of the measure:

LORD CORNWALLIS TO THE DUKE OF PORTLAND.

"Phoenix Park, December 5, 1798.

"MY LORD—Since I last had the honour of addressing your grace on the subject of the union, I have had an opportunity of extending my communications with individuals, and of observing, in some degree, the first impressions produced on the public mind by the agitation of this important question.

"I beg leave to refer your grace to Lord Castlereagh (whom, I trust, I shall be enabled to dispatch from hence to-morrow evening), for the particular sentiments of the several persons who have been sounded, since I last addressed your grace, on the measure. The general result enables me to confirm the opinion stated to your grace in my despatch of the —, that the prevailing disposition amongst those with whom I have had communication is to entertain the question dispassionately, and to rest their decision upon the merits of the arrangements when detailed, rather than to reject the principle of the measure.

"The opponents of the union are desirous to prevent the discussion of the subject, and leave no means untried to commit the public, in the first instance, against the measure, as subversive of the constitution; and, as such, not to be entertained. Pains have been taken to represent an acquiescence in its principle as a violation of the oath of a yeoman, in which he swears to support and maintain the "constitution of this kingdom as by law established."

"The bar have been most forward in this opposition, and have been this day assembled as a corps, it is understood, with an intention of taking up the question. Should that learned body be so intemperate as to set an example to the yeomanry at large, unconstitutional in the extreme, and dangerous to the public safety, I shall feel myself called on, in the outset, to meet this attempt to overawe the king's government and the legislature with decision.

"I am happy to observe that the leading Catholics, notwithstanding the measure is understood by them to be unconnected with any immediate extension of constitutional privileges to their communion, express themselves highly in its favour. Lord Fingall, whose good sense is as distinguished as his attachment to his majesty's government and to the British connexion, has expressed much satisfaction that it was not meant to complicate the question of the union by attempting, at present, any change in the test laws. He considers it would be injurious to the Catholic claims to have them discussed in the present temper of the Irish parliament, and was satisfied it would hazard the success of the union, without serving the Catholics; and considers it much more for their interest that the question should rest till it could be submitted, in quieter times, to the unprejudiced decision of the united parliament, relying on their receiving hereafter every indulgence which could be extended to them without endangering the Protestant establishment.

"Lord Kenmare joined in this sentiment, and is a warm advocate for the measure; both these noblemen expressed an anxious wish to see the Catholic clergy rendered less dependent on the lower orders, by having reasonable provision under the state.

"Lord Castlereagh has seen Dr. Troy, and finds his sentiments perfectly correspondent with those of my Lord Fingall and Lord Kenmare. He expressed himself perfectly satisfied, provided no bar to their future hopes made a part of the measure, and was ready to use his utmost influence in its support. Upon the whole, it appears to me, as far as the dispositions of the Catholics have yet disclosed themselves, that there is every reason to expect from them a preference for the measure. An active support from that body would not, perhaps, be advantageous to the success of the union. It would particularly increase the jealousy of the Protestants, and render them less inclined to the question.

"I feel it unnecessary at present to trouble your grace more at length upon this interesting question, as Lord Castlereagh will be enabled to explain to your grace my sentiments on every part of the subject, particularly on the topics treated of in your grace's despatch of the 25th, marked secret.

"I trust that the Speaker and Sir John Parnell will not have left London before Lord Castlereagh's arrival, as I consider it highly important that he should have an opportunity of hearing them state their opinions before the king's ministers on the question. Some of the king's Irish servants appear to be amongst the most impracticable in their opinions, and I feel confident that your grace will leave no means untried to impress these gentlemen more favourably before their return to this kingdom.

"I have the honour, &c.

"C."

P.S. I am happy to inform your grace that the good sense of the bar has prevailed, and that the meeting has dispersed: it being the decided opinion of the majority that any deliberation on the question or political measures in their military capacity, was highly criminal. I trust the failure of this attempt to make it a question of arms will secure us against any interference of a similar description. A general bar meeting is summoned, I understand, for Sunday next.

The following letter, written by a Catholic bishop to his metropolitian some time before the breaking out of the rebellion, will be read with interest:

THE REV. DR. LANIGAN, ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOP OF OSSORY, TO THE MOST REV. DR. TROY.

"Ballyragget, March 10, 1798.

"MOST REV. SIR—I was absent from Kilkenny these eight days, and was a great part of that time occupied with the priests that border on the Queen's County, in consulting them, and concerting measures with them, in order to prevent, if possible, the introduction of United Irishmen and their principles into this county. The letter you honoured me with, was sent after me, and I received it there. I could make this short but true answer to it, that the charges mentioned there against the priests and me are false, malicious, and groundless. It is necessary, perhaps, to prove this more at large. I beg your patience, then, while I state the facts, as they happened.

"A sermon was preached in St. James's chapel about a month ago, on faith, its necessity, its utility, and the conditions required for true faith. The preacher had in view only to confute the lax principles of the richer Roman Catholics, who, under pretext of liberality of sentiment, wished to establish an indifference about all religion and all religious modes of worship. This sermon was most maliciously misrepresented in town; probably, by some Protestants who were present. Sir Charles Asgill and the mayor came to me about it. Sir Charles said that he was urged by some Protestants in town to pursue this business; and said, further, that he was told by them that the priest preached against government. As far as I can recollect my words, I answered him as follows—that "the sermon was strangely perverted in town: that it contained nothing directly or indirectly against government; that it was directed rather against Catholics of loose principles than against any other persons; that what I asserted would be proved by the testimony of more than fifteen hundred persons who were present, and many of these the most respectable Roman Catholics in the county: and to convince him entirely of the truth of what I said, I sent the sermon itself to the mayor, and to him. The mayor, after reading it declared that the priest said nothing but what a zealous Roman Catholic priest should say. Before Sir Charles left me, I solemnly declared to him, that attached by conscience and by principle to his majesty, and to his government, I would neither say myself, nor suffer to be said by anybody else, if I could prevent it, anything contrary to the respect and obedience due to both, by every good subject. And as for the truth of all this, I confidently appeal to the honour of Sir Charles and the mayor. As for the charge of our holding no communion with Protestants, I never heard of it, before I saw it in your letter. Among all the perversions of the sermon, that was never mentioned to me. There was not a single sentence in the sermon about it; and, indeed, I do not see how any one could extort such a sense out of it, except a man who spoke once in parliament against your pastoral charge.

"Let me make one remark before I conclude. The priests told me, and I believe them, that the fear of assassination prevents them from speaking as much as they wished against United Irishmen. This did not deter me from exposing, at the altar, in the neighbourhood of the Queen's county, their horrid principles; execrating them as well as I could, and warning the poor people not to be deluded by these monsters. I told them that they should rather lose their lives than take the infernal oath of the United Irishmen: and declared at the same time, that I would prefer death before I would take it myself. Does it not appear odd enough that, while I was thus employed, at the risk of my life, complaints should be lodged against me in Dublin, and to government, as abetting sermons of dangerous tendency in Kilkenny?"

"This long account has perhaps tired you; I know it has myself—yet I could not say much less on this extraordinary occasion.

"I have the honour to be, &c.
